The Reverse God smiled very kindly: "They were about to see such a powerful person like you, but you temporarily changed the world line and sent them to another place in the game instance, not wanting them to see you."

"Are young people embarrassed to see their friends after their makeover?"

The expression on Bai Liu's face froze, and without turning his head, he raised his hand to block the hand that was attacking him from behind by the Reverse God.

"Probably." Bai Liu replied calmly, "Why? Can't I be embarrassed?"

As he said this, the whip in Bai Liu's left hand turned half black and half white, and the black paint on the lower part of the junction began to rise.

Seeing this change, the Reverse God's face froze, and he wished he could find the time to slap himself twice!

After Bai Liu became the evil god, he was able to face his desires so honestly!

The more honestly one faces one's emotions and desires, the deeper the desires will penetrate. The Reverse God's words to stimulate Bai Liu were intended to make Bai Liu reject the desires, but it had the opposite effect, causing Bai Liu to psychologically accept himself with emotions, desires and negative emotions.

Bai Liu opened his eyelids, and the black color on the lower part of his whip was spreading upwards like blood. "Personally, I prefer the white bone whip, but if it is used to kill people, I think the black one is also good."

"Dirt-resistant."

Bai Liu smiled and looked at the whip with blood streaking upwards: "Why not just wait until it's transformed and then end this game copy."

Finally, even the last trace of smile on the Reverse God's face disappeared.

On the other end.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has modified the Red Cross into a looping, close-contact space that cannot be escaped from, restricting player Tang Erda's attack and player Liu Jiayi's skill usage.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has activated a large number of zombie corpses and body parts in the Red Cross map, forcing player Tang Erda to fight, and player Liu Jiayi to voluntarily quit the game.]

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda stood back to back, looking vigilantly at the Red Cross surrounded by fog.

They were at the lakeside one second, just listening to the instructions given to them by the Reverse God, and the next second they were inexplicably sent to the Red Cross that was surrounded by white fog, and couldn't get out no matter how hard they tried.

In the fog, corpses kept staggering and roaring, trying to get closer to them.

“In ten minutes at most, these unkillable corpses will completely alienate us.” Tang Erda looked around intently, “—by then we will have no choice but to quit the game.”

“I haven’t found any obvious decryption points either.” Liu Jiayi gritted her teeth, still unwilling to give up, “But Bai Liu is still here.”

“I heard his voice but I didn’t see him.”

Tang Erda was silent for a while: “I heard it too.”

He raised his hand, and the revolver in his hand kept changing shape, eventually turning into a long rose revolver with a bullet belt.

Tang Erda raised his head, pointed his gun at the corpses, and slowly exhaled a long breath:

“——Then we should go all out and hold on until we can no longer. Let’s see if we can break the barrier that traps us and see Bai Liu.”

[System Alert: Player Tang Erda has obtained the equipment “Monster Book Status: Withered Rose Hunter”]

At the edge of town, at the intersection leading to the cemetery, the fog was heavy.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has modified the face setting of the zombie bride, changing the face setting of the zombie bride from NPC Guy to Bai Liu’s face]

[System Alert: In order to confuse the player Spades’ ability to identify monsters, the state of the Corpse Bride (Bai Liu version) has been adjusted to a drunken version. The panel value is being changed…]

[System Alert: Improved the comprehensive panel of the Corpse Bride and increased the attack power attribute to the highest setting value of this monster.]

[The setting collection of “Dense Forest Frontier Book: Corpse Bride” modified by player Bai Liu is loading…]

Spades held the whip. He was supposed to be the first to reach the other side of the lake, but was inexplicably sent here.

He looked around indifferently, and without hesitation, he whipped the whip to tear apart this close space and time and rushed out of this place that could not trap him at all.

But at the moment when Spades swung his whip, a gray shadow in a veil walked slowly out of the white fog, and the whip split the rolling fog.

A guy named Bai Liu, with a smile on his face, wearing a long veil and holding a bouquet of flowers, appeared in front of Spades. Except for his pale skin, he looked as lively as a living person.

Next, several zombie brides in the “Bai Liu” state appeared intermittently. In a cluster, they surrounded Spades and smiled with curved eyebrows: “I am willing to be with you.”

“I’ll never hate you.”

“We will be together forever, till death do us part.”

“I will never say goodbye to you again.”

Hiding behind the bouquet, “Bai Liu” stared at Spades intently with intoxicated eyes and smiled sweetly: “I miss you so much, Spades.”

“——I don’t want to see Xie Ta, I want to see Spades.”

Hearing these words, Spades, who was holding the whip, narrowed his eyes slightly.

Although he knew that Bai Liu’s words were all fake, Spades still paused in swinging the whip.

At this moment, the zombie “Bai Liu” came from behind and grabbed Spades’ wrist.

“Bai Liu” smiled happily, but did not stop: “——These are all the words you want to hear from me, right?”

“Do you want to continue listening? Come escape this game with me and we’ll stay together forever.”

Spades’ whipped back coldly without holding back any strength, but the moment he hit the zombie “Bai Liu”, he heard the alert sound of his own system.

[System Alert: Player Spades has been attached to the Corpse Bride. Attacking the attached object is equivalent to attacking the player’s own body.]

[System Alert: Player Spades was attacked by himself, and his health has decreased by 7]

Spades slowly lowered his eyes and saw that the place where the zombie Bai Liu was holding his wrist had completely grown into him, and from the place where he was holding it tightly, the corpse transformation was still spreading upwards.

The bride “Bai Liu” smiled with a strange cruelty and sweetness: “You and I are combined together, we are one. Killing me is the same as killing yourself.”

“Let’s all become complete monsters and stay here, so we’ll never be separated again.”

An endless stream of “Bai Liu” zombie brides smiled and ran over with guns in hand to attach themselves to him. Spades finally transformed his back and left shoulder, and he frowned.

[System Alert: Player Spades has turned into a corpse, and his mental value is decreasing…]

Next to the lake.

The Reverse God’s pushing and pulling speed was getting slower and slower, and blood was flowing from the corners of his mouth. However, Bai Liu’s whipping speed was still very moderate, and he was as still as a mountain, slowly confronting the Reverse God.

“I’m actually quite curious.” With a smile, the Reverse God coughed up blood while chatting with Bai Liu, “Since you used Spades so cruelly, sacrificed their pain, and set a dead end for Spades and the others, it seems like you don’t care about them at all.”

“But why don’t you dare let them see you like this?”

“If you are truly as you say, and you can accept becoming an evil god completely—”

The Reverse God suddenly grabbed Bai Liu’s neck and said, “——Then what are you afraid of?”

Bai Liu leaned back, swung his hand and wrapped the whip around the Reverse God’s wrist. After the bone spurs of the whip opened and embedded into the Reverse God's flesh, he grasped the handle of the whip and pulled it vertically.

The Reverse God's hand was forcibly torn apart, and blood and flesh splattered between the Reverse God and Bai Liu.

"I can accept the way I am, which is completely different from what others can accept." Bai Liu shook the whip up and down twice to shake off the blood foam on the whip, and then retracted it.

Bai Liu calmly looked at the Reverse God who took several steps back while covering his wrist: "It is too self-conscious to ask others to accept your utilitarian and lustful negative side."

The Reverse God covered his wrist which was dripping with blood and looked directly at Bai Liu: "–Since you don't expect them to accept you as you are now, and you have already accepted the reality that they won't accept you, then what are you afraid of?"

The Reverse God laughed: "Bai Liu, you are not afraid of another possibility?"

Bai Liu's hand holding the whip slightly curled inward, and blood dripped along the edge of the bone spur.

The Reverse God endured the severe pain in his wrist, grinned, and continued: "–Are you afraid that they will still accept you even at this point?"

"You're afraid that they have real feelings for you, and what you've done is unworthy of everything they've done to win you back, right?"

"You would rather they hate you than accept you after they meet you."

The Reverse God raised his eyebrows: "Bai Liu, I have never seen a player as strange and contradictory as you."

"So do you want them to accept you or not?"

The black color on the lower half of the whip that Bai Liu held at his side paused for a moment as the Reverse God spoke, and then began to slowly spread upwards.

The Reverse God stretched out his hands, pulled it up and pushed it outward, a typical Tai Chi starting posture.

His palms created wind as the wheel spun, blowing his robe and hair in the face.

There was a faint and gentle smile in the Reverse God's eyes, and his face was calm: "I may not know much about your teammates."

"——But there is an intuitive wild animal among my teammates. I know that as long as he identifies someone——"

Bai Liu looked at the Reverse God Calmly, the whip in his hand spread out again, and the blood-colored paint on it climbed up ferociously and boiling.

The Reverse God rushed forward suddenly and was close to Bai Liu almost in the blink of an eye.

He raised his hand and turned over to avoid Bai Liu's whip that was aimed at his face. He dodged it smoothly with his shoulder tilted, and his wrist turned inward and outward, hitting Bai Liu's ribs hard. The Reverse God said with a smile: "–Don't expect him to let you go."

"You were paid to help me get rid of this guy."

Bai Liu raised his whip to block the Reverse God's high five.

At the moment when the palm and the whip hit each other, a huge white mist exploded on the spot.

At the Red Cross.

Tang Erda coughed and choked as he held the gun. The corpses in front of him became more and more broken into pieces and more and more numerous. The poison from Liu Jiayi's side corroded the corpse parts. As long as they were not completely corroded, the scattered corpse foam would make it easier for them to hide and attack them.

In the later stages, Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda simply gave up their skills and chose the most stupid physical attacks, but physical attacks could easily be "stuck" to the corpse parts and then directly possessed and became one with them.

After drinking the last bottle of mental bleach, Liu Jiayi staggered. Almost 50% of her body had turned into a corpse. Now she could only grit her teeth and hold on.

Mental bleach can restore mental value, and her healing potion can restore health value. Logically, they should be able to hold on longer.

But there were too many corpses, and the mental bleach was soon used up. Her healing potion skills needed time to recover, so within a dozen minutes, she was almost out of ammunition and food.

——The people behind the scenes who designed this game map have almost pushed the limitations of the scene on their skills to the extreme.

“It’s no good. You need to quit.” Tang Erda held Liu Jiayi’s shoulders and lifted her up, who was half-kneeling on the ground and gasping for breath. He said calmly, “I can still hold on for a while. You quit first.”

Liu Jiayi was about to shake her head to reject it when an extremely strong wind swept in from outside and hit the gap in the close space and got stuck.

The fierce wind only paused for less than two seconds, and the space shattered.

A pure black whip smashed the entire barrier with a force that could split the sky and the earth, then it swept away all the body parts and corpses on the ground and directly swept the whip to the outside of the Red Cross.

The fog dissipated, and Spades, covered in blood and wounds with no emotion on his face, stood at the exit of the Red Cross.

Spades held the whip in one hand. The whip was stained with blood and tangled with some wedding dress scraps and some bouquet fragments. Then with his other hand, Spades reached around the back of his neck with an indifferent expression and tore off a zombie’s severed hand that was still moving and stuck to his shoulder.

[System Warning: Attacking the zombie attached to your body is equivalent to attacking yourself!]

[System Warning: Player Spades attacked 23 zombie brides attached to him, and his health has dropped to 37]

The zombie was still wearing a wedding ring on its hand, and the broken part looked like it was torn directly by Spades, with some flesh strands pulled out.

After pulling off the zombie's hand, blood gushed out from the broken neck of Spades. He pressed it casually, but gave up when he found that he couldn't hold it down.

Spades turned to look at Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda, and asked casually as if he had accidentally met them by chance: "I'm going to look for Bai Liu, are you coming?"

In the jungle.

Bai Jiamu was running quickly with Bai Yi on his back, his eyes were sharp, and a scalpel kept flashing in his hand, spinning left and right, nailing the body parts that were close to them to the ground or tree stumps.

Bai Yi weakly called out from Bai Jiamu's back: "… Stop shaking, I'm going to fall."

"…You are so stupid." Bai Jiamu shrugged speechlessly and pushed Bai Yi, who was about to slide down, onto his back a little. "You lose as soon as you make a move. Are you a loser?"

Bai Yi was not convinced: "How was I supposed to know that Bai Liu was so strong!"

"He can fight against the Reverse God on equal terms, so he should be a player of the same level as Spades." Bai Jiamu dodged a corpse falling from above his head with a serious expression, "…If a player of this level wanted to kill you, you wouldn't even have time to log out of the game. Bai Liu should have held back on you just now."

Bai Yi paused and hummed.

Bai Jiamu added: "I feel like the Reverse God also held back, otherwise if he used his skills and weapons, he could have forced Bai Liu out of the game."

Bai Yi let out a long sigh: "Anyway, I never understood what the Reverse God was going to do."

"He could have just cleared Bai Liu out directly, so why did he use Tai Chi to slowly consume Bai Liu? He also made Liao Ke (the last member of the Killer Sequence Team) quit the game and let us come out to find Spades."

"If you can understand the Reverse God's operation, it would be a bit insulting to the Reverse God's intelligence point of 96." Bai Jiamu rolled his eyes, “Do you remember what the Reverse God said to us when he first contacted Bai Liu?”

Bai Yi tried to recall the past carefully for a while and said, “I don’t remember.”

Bai Jiamu was speechless to the extreme: “He said that Bai Liu is a rival recognized by Spades and can make Spades understand many things.”

“He asked us to find Spades to meet Bai Liu so that Bai Liu could influence Spades.” Bai Jiamu took a deep breath. “I don’t know if it was because of Spades that he was infected. My intuition at this moment tells me that after this game, Spades can rejoin the team and fight with us.”

“It’s so simple as you say!” Bai Yi said with a bitter face, “The Reverse God asked us to find Spades, but when have we ever found him in the game? Even if we are teammates, Spades never lets anyone follow him once he enters the game. It’s super hard to find him, okay-“

Before Bai Yi finished speaking, he saw Spades leading Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi and jumping past them without looking back.

From a distance, Tang Erda’s questioning voice could be heard: “Spades, we just passed by that tree, and I seemed to see your teammates?”

Spades' voice was very calm: “No, you are mistaken, it is a corpse. Go find Bai Liu first.”

“Corpse” Bai Yi: “…”

“Corpse” Bai Jiamu: “…”

“Spades——!” Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu’s twisted and angry voices startled countless birds, “Stop right there!!”

Next to the lake.

The huge white smoke exploded and was then opened by the waving whip. Bai Liu stood in place with the whip hanging by his side and blood dripping from the bone spurs.

Two long, deep mud tracks were left on the ground. The Reverse God knelt on one knee at the end of the mud track, covering his right

The fingers of his right hand were bloody and trembling slightly as blood dripped down.

The Reverse God took a few deep breaths, looked up with a smile and said, "——I thought you would need some time to get used to this new whip, but I didn't expect you to get the hang of it so quickly."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: "I didn't expect that you still won't use your skill weapons."

"Is there anything about me that deserves your repeated mercy?"

The Reverse God had a faint sweat on his forehead, but his eyes and mouth curved up: "I want to ask you the same question. You could have killed me earlier, so why did you show mercy to me again and again, and limit the damage to my right hand several times."

"What?" The Reverse God smiled, "Are you not ready to kill yet, or is it the same reason why you and I showed mercy?"

"——I like you because of Spades." The Reverse God laughed playfully, "He likes you. He has never liked anyone since he was born. You are the first one."

"As his tactician, I won't easily hurt the only person he loves, so why don't you kill me?"

Bai Liu slowly opened his eyelids and looked down at the rebellious god who was half-kneeling on the ground. The black paint on the whip spread upwards several times but was strangely pressed back again.

The smile on Nishen's face deepened: "You didn't kill me because you also like Spades and care about his feelings, right?"

Before he finished speaking, Bai Liu's whip suddenly stabbed towards the Reverse God. This time, it was no longer controlled by the Reverse God's right hand as before, but stabbed fiercely towards the Reverse God's heart.

The Reverse God half-knelt on the ground, holding the whip that Bai Liu stabbed at him with his left hand. The force of the whip pushed him to his knees and slid back a distance.

When the whip was about to pierce his heart, the Reverse God gritted his teeth and held the opened bone spurs on the whip tightly, deflecting the whip so that it pierced his shoulder.

After the whip penetrated, it paused only slightly, and the bone spurs expanded one by one, as if to make sure that every bone spur had pierced into the Reverse God's flesh, before Bai Liu pulled it back.

The tail of the whip that pierced into the Reverse God's body, directly tore the flesh on the Reverse God's shoulder during the process of being pulled back, and a large hole that was bleeding and deep enough to reveal the bone appeared on the Reverse God's shoulder.

The Reverse God's eyes half closed due to the pain, and he noticed that the black color of Bai Liu's whip had spread to two-thirds.

…This isn't good. Bai Liu is getting more and more skilled at using this new whip. Keeping him like this to slowly torture him during sparring, isn't it for the purpose of…

"I'm not going to show mercy to you, it's just that any new weapon needs practice after it is acquired." Bai Liu walked towards the Reverse God, dragging the bloody whip, "Your physical skills are very good, just enough to restrain me."

Bai Liu looked down at the rebellious god who was gasping for breath in silence. There was no human expression on his face, and he was as indifferent as a statue.

"There's no need for me to reject a high-quality training target that's been sent to me." Bai Liu said calmly, "I limited the attack range to your right hand before so that I could practice [Disarmament]."

The paint on the whip seemed to run upwards rapidly with joy, and soon it was three-quarters black.

"But now, since you are unwilling to use your skill weapon, you have lost your value for practice." Bai Liu raised the whip calmly, "Let's stop here today."

The whip that was dripping blood was raised high, and the hideous bone spurs on it were clearly visible.

The Reverse God's eyes gradually turned cold. He slowly put his hands behind his back to hold something and took a deep breath.

He really didn't expect that Bai Liu could force him to this point before he even got the complete inheritance of the evil god.

How should he put it…? Is he worthy of being the successor that the evil god has been waiting for so long?

[System Alert: Player Reverse God, do you want to use your personal skill…?]

A pure black bone whip suddenly flung over from the opposite shore of the lake in a brutal manner, directly hitting Bai Liu's abdomen and sending him flying hard at the waist.

The Reverse God finally breathed a sigh of relief. He collapsed backwards onto the ground: "…Finally, you're here."

Spades jumped several times and landed on Bai Liu who had just gotten up from the ground. For the first time, a serious expression appeared on his face: "You took something you hate."

Bai Liu coughed twice, brushed the dust off his knees, stood up straight, and looked at Spades calmly: "I thought I would be very annoying, but now I'm not that annoying."

Spades interrupted Bai Liu expressionlessly: "You are lying. You are afraid."

"People are always afraid of the unknown self." Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at Spades, "But that doesn't mean the unknown is a bad thing. If the unknown contains what you want, then the unknown is not a bad thing."

Spades' eyes moved downwards: "Then why don't you hold the whip tightly?"

Bai Liu was silent. He clenched the whip suddenly. The black color on the whip suddenly shot up. Then he raised his hand and whipped Spades in the face without hesitation.

Spades dodged nimbly by stepping back, then with a cold expression, swung his black bone whip, which was full of holes, sideways.

The two black whips instantly intertwined in the air, pulled by Spades and Bai Liu respectively, and entangled in the middle to form a thorn.

Bai Liu was about to pull back his bone whip.

Spades did not let go. He exerted force with his wrist, gripped the whip tightly and lifted it up, and the whip separated under his control.

At the same time, Spades jumped up smoothly, stepped coldly on the whip that Bai Liu had pulled back, and quickly approached Bai Liu at the other end, reaching Bai Liu in the blink of an eye.

Bai Liu quickly loosened his grip on the whip and tried to draw other weapons from the skill panel, but Spades was already close to him, leaving him no time to react.

Spades used his waist to exert force, turned sideways and kicked Bai Liu's neck without holding back any strength.

Bai Liu could almost hear the sound of his bones being broken by Spades' kicks. He could see Spades' eyes, reflecting his own reflection with pure indifference.

Spades was…angry.

The next second, Bai Liu was kicked by Spades and rolled several times on the ground. After hitting the shore, he choked and coughed then fell directly into the lake.

The tangled bone whips finally separated, and Bai Liu fell into the lake holding the bone whip. Spades followed suit and jumped into the lake.

The Reverse God, who was supported by Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi, was shocked when he saw this scene: "Spades is using all his strength. He is serious."

Bai Yi was stunned: "Fuck! I've never seen Spades move so fast! I can't even see it clearly!"

Bai Jiamu hadn't reacted yet: "Why did Spades suddenly use all his strength?"

The Reverse God touched his chin and said, "…If I must say something, it's that you finally fall in love with someone, but that person completely denies himself and forces himself to become another person. The problem is that he himself hates this appearance, but he forces himself to endure the disgust and keep acting."

"He doesn't accept himself, nor does he let the people around him accept him as he is. No one in the world accepts Bai Liu like that. He has even erased the meaning of his own existence, but he still has to calmly tell everyone, this is what I want."

"The person I love is being abused like this." The Reverse God looked at the lake, "Go and be angry, Spades."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Liu Jiayi stared at the lake intently, then turned to look at the Reverse God: “Am I absolutely not allowed to go over there?”

“It’s better not to.” The Reverse God looked at Tang Erda who was holding the gun, “The same goes for you. If Bai Liu sees you two, you might be sent to other maps again. You don’t have the ability to break through space like Spades. If you are sent again, you will probably quit the game directly.”

Liu Jiayi closed her eyes and took a deep breath.

What the Reverse God said was reasonable, but…

“We are Bai Liu’s teammates.” Liu Jiayi stared at the Reverse God, “Is there nothing we can do?”

The Reverse God shrugged and spread his hands: “I am also a teammate of Spades, but now look, is there anything I can do?”

“The connection between these two people.” The Reverse God turned his head and looked at the calm lake surface, “It’s not something that teammates like us can interfere with.”

Under the lake.

The corpses swam back and forth with hideous and rotting faces, blocking out all light in the darkness.

Bai Liu hid himself behind a group of corpses, with no expression on his face, and slowly sank.

A pure black whip was swung left and right, knocking open the corpse covering Bai Liu. The faint dawn light from the lake fell on Bai Liu’s face as the corpse was thrown away.

Spades’ cold face appeared in front of Bai Liu. He held the bone-spurred whip that Bai Liu was swinging at with one hand.

The bone spur pierced into his palm, and as Bai Liu pulled the whip back, a blood mist erupted from Spades’ palm in the water.

But this did not stop Spades from approaching Bai Liu. He grabbed Bai Liu's wrist that was wielding the whip and pulled it upwards with great force.

Bai Liu was pulled so hard that he opened his mouth subconsciously. A large amount of water poured into his throat. He was thrown out of the water and fell to the ground, where he turned around twice. He then raised the back of his hand, coughed, and wiped the water from the corner of his mouth as he tried to stand up.

Spades suddenly appeared behind Bai Liu who had just stood up. He bent his knees in the air and knelt on the back of Bai Liu's neck. He pressed down with an expressionless face, and Bai Liu was forced to kneel down on one knee.

Bai Liu subconsciously wanted to whip back.

But Spades' movements were too fast. He controlled Bai Liu's shoulders on both sides with his hands and slid down to grab Bai Liu's wrists, twisting them upwards with his left knee still pressing on the back of Bai Liu's neck.

It's completely an arresting posture.

Bai Liu knelt on the ground, breathing silently, his fingers curled up as if struggling to retract. His long hair spread out, covering his profile, winding down to the ground, and drops of water swayed and fell from Bai Liu's eyelashes.

The black whip with bone spurs fell to the side, and the black paint on it stayed weakly at the area that was three-quarters black, and no longer spread upwards.

Spades used force with his knees, and Bai Liu was forced to tilt his head back to look at Spades who was pressing him down.

There was a kind of dazed and empty look in Bai Liu's eyes, his chest heaving slightly, and because he had just suffocated, his eye sockets were slightly red.

Spades lowered his head and looked at Bai Liu. His eyes were focused, but the expression on his face was unfamiliar, and his tone was unprecedentedly cold: "——Bai Liu, didn't you say you were going to beat me?"

"You are no match for me in this self-loathing state."

“You could have defeated me or anyone else, so why did you exile and erase yourself?” Spades asked him calmly, “–Looking at yourself now as a carrier of other people’s desires and weapons, don’t you feel sick?”

“I will never let you, like this, beat me in the game.”

Spades slowly reached out his hand, trying to take away the inverted cross pendant from Bai Liu’s neck.

Bai Liu’s pupils shrank slightly for a moment, and the black color that had been stagnant on the whip next to him seemed to boil and began to twist on the entire whip. He suddenly smiled.

“What qualifications do you have to say that to me?” Bai Liu raised his eyes and stared at Spades. The smile on his face became extremely dangerous. His light-colored lips slightly opened and closed, and drops of water flowed down his jaw and across his Adam’s apple. “–Didn’t you do the self-erasure thing first?”

Spades was slightly startled.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu is mobilizing all the corpses in the lake…]

A huge, twisted hand made of corpse parts suddenly rushed out of the lake and smashed towards Spades. Spades tried to drag Bai Liu away, but Bai Liu rolled over and grabbed the black bone whip next to him.

The moment he turned over and knelt on the ground, Bai Liu looked at Spades who was approaching with a cold look and raised his hand to whip him diagonally upwards.

Spades dodged sideways.

Bai Liu continued his attack, with the whip’s spurs fully extended, aiming at Spades’ throat and pulling back, attempting to use the whip’s spurs to directly open Spades’ large blood vessels.

The inverted cross pendant swung out from the collar of Bai Liu’s shirt during the movement, emitting a dark glow that was almost blood-red.

The halo shone on the huge corpse hand behind Bai Liu. The corpse hand seemed to be crazy, twisting and hitting Spades continuously.

The huge corpse hand slammed heavily on the ground, and cracks continued to appear on the ground. Spades was only the size of a bean in front of this huge corpse hand, and he jumped nimbly to avoid it.

Spades' whip fell again and again, hitting the corpse's hand, which was broken into pieces. However, the pieces were not dead and soon gathered together again, blocking Bai Liu.

Bai Liu raised the whip, and with the defense and help of the corpse hand, he fought on equal terms with the constantly attacking Spades.

The wet long hair flew around Bai Liu in disorder, and the whip in his hand became darker and darker, with a smile on his face that was almost careless and cruel:

"What are you angry about?"

"You appeared in front of me again and again, playing games with me, and then you took the initiative to erase your own existence, dig out your own heart, erase my memory and leave. Aren't you the one who left?"

There was a light in Bai Liu's eyes that was almost like fire, swaying between his dark pupils:

"—I haven't said anything yet."

Bai Liu's whip suddenly appeared from the side of Spades under the cover of the corpse's hand. Spades quickly dodged, and Bai Liu suddenly appeared from the other side.

The whip in front of Spades disappeared like an afterimage, and returned to Bai Liu's hand like a boomerang. Bai Liu swung the whip with an extremely cold tone:

"——What right do you have to be angry in front of me?"

The whip hit Spades' back with a loud bang, knocking Spades directly into a pit. Then the corpse hand also whistled and hammered down, creating a huge cloud of smoke.

The mud on the lakeshore all cracked, and the pit where Spades fell into sank directly into the lake as it cracked and collapsed.

Bai Liu stood on the corpse's hand, lowered his eyes and looked at the pit that fell into the water. Only the last trace of white was left on the whip in his hand.

He was silent for a moment, with no emotion in his eyes, and slowly raised his hand and made a downward gesture.

The outcome of a game agreed upon between two people may be decided when one of the players deserts.

It doesn't make sense.

The huge corpse hand was raised high up and smashed down fiercely, causing huge waves.

Bai Yi, who was standing next to him, stared with wide eyes: "… Damn, these must be some S-level monsters…"

"Reverse God." Bai Jiamu turned his head sharply and looked at the Reverse God, "Is Spades safe?"

The Reverse God glanced hesitantly at the still violently shaking water surface: "That should be the case, right? Spades' defense is very high…"

"If Spades is hit by these corpses, he will be connected to them. If he resists, he will lose his own blood." Tang Erda suggested hesitantly, "And Spades has been resisting just now. I think his health should have dropped a lot. Are you sure you don't want to go down and take a look?"

Seeing that Bai Liu was fine, Liu Jiayi added calmly, "When we met Spades, he told us that he only had 37 health points."

Bai Jiamu: "…"

Bai Yi: "…"

The Reverse God: "…"

It's over, Spades will really become their "corpse" teammate!

The Reverse God looked miserable as he sat cross-legged by the lake, wiping his tears with his hands: "Spades! Spades! Come out quickly, Spades! I will never teach you a lesson so harshly next time!"

"It's my fault. I trusted the wrong person. I thought Bai Liu would show mercy to you because of your old relationship with him, and at least leave you an intact body!"

“Wuwuwu.” Bai Yi cried loudly, “Spades, I will never curse you to death again because you didn’t recognize me as your teammate on the court. You’d better not die. If you die, it will be more likely for me to die on the court. Come back soon!”

Bai Jiamu froze for a moment, then solemnly pounded his fist towards the lakeside and said in silence: “Spades, I will always remember you as my teammate.”

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda: “…”

What happened to this team?!

Spades hasn’t left yet, why do you seem to have already prepared a buffet for him?

“Hey!” Liu Jiayi interrupted the Reverse God’s fake crying, “What on earth are you guys up to? Won’t Spades get into trouble?”

The sorrowful look on the Reverse God’s face suddenly disappeared, and turned into a smiling face: “How should I put it? Spades’ health points are only 37, not to mention if there were only 7. It is not easy to kill him.”

“But.” The smile on the Reverse God’s face faded. He looked at Bai Liu who jumped into the lake and seemed to be searching for Spades. “——I really didn’t expect that Bai Liu would really kill him.”

“Spades’ current health won’t make him die so easily, but it will probably still be difficult for him to defeat Bai Liu. However, Spades should know that he can’t defeat Bai Liu in this situation with the blessing of the evil god and the world line.”

“Bai Liu really did what he said. He defeated Spades. After this incident, Spades should have a new goal.”

The Reverse God rubbed the wound on his shoulder and stood up with a grin: “My goal has basically been achieved. I can pack up and prepare to quit the game.”

Liu Jiayi dodged cautiously: “How do you know Spades is really not dead?”

“Because this is a game pool, you can quit the game at any time.” Spades smiled, “Spades looks stupid, but he won’t force it. When he really knows he can’t win, he will run away.”

“You can all prepare to quit the game. I’ll tidy up and complete one last goal.” The Reverse God eyes were fixed on the place where Bai Liu dived.

Liu Jiayi asked alertly: “What are you going to do to Bai Liu?”

“Stop Bai Liu from becoming the complete successor of the evil god.” The Reverse God said casually, waving his hand with a smile, “Don’t thank me too much for your help. Protecting the rare tactician resources is everyone’s responsibility.”

Liu Jiayi looked at the bowl-sized wound on the Reverse God’s shoulder with suspicion: “You were beaten like a dog by Bai Liu just now. Can you stop Bai Liu?”

“…What the hell do you mean?” The Reverse God pretended to be angry. “You little girl, you have a very dirty mouth. Be careful or I will tell your tactician about you.”

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes speechlessly.

“But I do have something that can restrain Bai Liu.” The Reverse God took a step forward, his back facing Liu Jiayi, his voice still with a smile, “My skill weapon can restrain the evil god, isn’t it amazing!”

Liu Jiayi was stunned for a moment and her face turned surprised.

A skill weapon to contain the evil god. What is the origin of this skill weapon?!

“Then why do you want to help us?” Liu Jiayi paused doubtfully and asked, “Do you need us to help you with something?”

The Reverse God turned around, smiled at Liu Jiayi with curved eyebrows and eight teeth, and gave a thumbs up: “After all, I am called the Reverse God, and my favorite thing to do is to go against the evil god.”

“As long as the evil god is unhappy, I will be happy.”

Liu Jiayi stared at the Reverse God’s smiling face in a daze.

Just now, for a moment, she sensed a very different and intimidating aura from the expression of the Reverse God, who had always looked very gentle.

The Reverse God turned his head, his hands resting on his back as if he was about to draw a weapon, and the smile in his voice was rarely serious: “And Bai Liu, the tactician, was able to fight against the evil god’s desires for so long during the inheritance ceremony without losing his original intention and being completely devoured——”

“——I admire him very much.”

[System Alert: Does the player Reverse God want to be equipped with the identity of “Monster Book: the Reverse God”?]

【Yes.】

In the lake.

The corpse’s hand had just smashed hard, stirring up the entire lake water, making it turbid and with bubbles rising continuously. Bai Liu waved his hand to the left, and the corpse parts that were blocking his vision dispersed, revealing the bottom of the lake.

The lake bottom, which was originally filled with thick mud and sand, has now been smashed into a huge, sunken pit with nothing in it.

Bai Liu stared calmly at the deepest part of the pit for a while.

He had the editing rights for the entire world line of “Dense Forest Frontier”, and he couldn’t feel the presence of Spades here.

Spades is out of the game.

Bai Liu’s sight seemed to be fixed on this pit. His eyelids were half closed, and the rising black color of the whip in his hand stopped at a point where there was still a line of damage and no longer moved.

Was it because just now… He felt that the way his emotions and desires were out of control was disgusting, and that he had lost the right to be taken seriously as an opponent, so Spades left?

Bai Liu’s long hair spread out and fluttered in the water, hiding all the expressions on his face. The whip hung casually, all the way to the bottom of the lake.

Again… like this.

It was this person who clearly said that he would always play horror games with him, and it was this person who clearly said that he would reunite with him in the horror game.

But this person is also the first to leave, to be destroyed, and to withdraw.

The Dense Forest Borderlands

… He left so abruptly, leaving behind only a soulless container.

Bai Liu knew very well that all he had done was to trick Spades into liking him, and then his death, his pain, and the agony of his betrayal ensued.

Spades is a very special player, he has no soul and simply exists as a container, so Bai Liu cannot complete a soul transaction with him to control him.

This container named Spades has extremely strong defense. Even if any attack breaks through the defense barrier and hits Spades, or even beats Spades half to death, it cannot make Spades, an intuitive creature, feel “pain”.

This guy’s mind is so clear that the only thing on his mind is winning or losing, and he won’t feel any physical pain from any external attack.

To sacrifice the pain of Spades, it can only be psychological.

That is to make Spades develop an emotional attachment to someone, and then use this medium to make Spades feel pain.

That’s what Bai Liu did.

And if Spades had a soul, the whole process would be much simpler.

Bai Liu only needed to trade souls with Spades, because after the soul trade, the player who sold the soul to him will develop an irresistible emotional dependence on him, and Bai Liu can easily make the other party feel pain through his own “death”.

For example, Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda.

Fortunately, Spades was very simple, and the whole process was not difficult for Bai Liu. Although the level of favorability was not clear in the end, Spades did develop feelings for him that were at least more than friendship.

【 Except you, no one is not afraid of me. 】

【 I like you very much. 】

【 Do I need your consent to kiss you? 】

【 Sorry, please don't hate me. 】

【 Would you like to marry me? 】

【 Do not lie to me. 】

Spades' pain is nothing more than Bai Liu's most precious and pious sacrifice to the evil god.

So he is now hovering here, facing this container, struggling with himself…

Is it valuable?

There is no value.

After the sacrifice, the offering is the most worthless thing.

It's not worth it to him to remember it.

Bai Liu's fingers hanging down at his side slightly clenched and gripped the whip. The black color that had been controlled on the whip began to slowly climb up again, and it was only a little bit away from completely dyeing the entire bone whip black.

He calmly withdrew his gaze from the bottom of the lake, turned around in the water, and when he raised his head his expression was as indifferent as if nothing had happened.

Bai Liu raised his hand, and the huge corpse hand rose up gently, ready to send Bai Liu, who was standing on the back of its hand, out of the lake.

The whip that fell at the bottom of the lake slowly rose up. At the moment when it was about to completely leave the lake surface, a cold white hand suddenly emerged from the bottom of the lake, grabbed the whip tightly, and pulled it down hard.

Bai Liu, who was pulled away from the corpse's hand, turned around and looked at the hand, bubbles escaping from the corners of his mouth.

…How is it possible? He couldn't feel Spades' presence in this game at all.

Now, pulling his hand gave Bai Liu a very familiar yet strange feeling, as if it was Spades, but also as if it was not a Spades.

Another hand emerged from the mud and sand, also grasping the whip and pulling down. The movement was strong and fast. Bai Liu was pulled down unexpectedly and fell to the bottom of the lake very quickly. At the moment when he was about to hit the mud and sand, something broke out from the bottom of the lake and caught Bai Liu steadily.

The long silver-blue curly hair fluttered at the bottom of the turbid lake, and the pure eyes looked like a god looking down on the world. He held his only believer in his arms, and his voice was soft and gentle.

“You are my only believer, so you cannot believe in others.”

One of Tawil’s eyes was a shimmering silver-blue, and the other was a bottomless black. He bent down, calmly grasped the whip in Bai Liu’s arms and pulled it upwards. Bai Liu was pulled up and moved closer to Tawil:

“Just imagine that I left you behind, went about wreaking havoc, betrayed me and believed in someone else, hurt myself, and erased myself.”

“I’ll be angry, Bai Liu.”

[System Alert: Player Spades uses his personal skill (Degenerate into Monster), forcing the spirit value to drop to 0]

[System Alert: Player Spades is equipped with the Monster Book identity “Monster Book: The Fallen Old Evil God”]

Bai Liu’s pupils contracted sharply.

On the lake.

The god who was squatting on the shore seemed to have noticed the changes in the lake. He stood up suddenly and his expression changed drastically: “This Spades guy is too reckless!”

“In order to avoid quitting the game and continue to fight Bai Liu, he actually used his skills in a place like the game pool. The world line in the game pool can’t bear his monsterization at all. Does he want to destroy this game world line!”

“All of you, quit the game immediately!” The Reverse God turned around and roared, “Quickly!”

When Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi heard that Spades had used his personal skill, their faces changed. Bai Yi couldn’t help but exclaim , “Using skills in a place like this, does Spades want us to be wiped out?”

“Stop talking and go! Otherwise you will really become Spades’ dead teammate!” Bai Jiamu hit Bai Yi on the head.

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu called up the panel and simply quit the game.

When the Reverse God saw that Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi had not left, the expression on his face almost broke, and he said in despair: “Why are you still here! Go away!”

Liu Jiayi stared at the lake steadily: “Bai Liu hasn’t come out yet.”

Tang Erda turned his head to look at the Reverse God: “The one who was most affected by Spades’ skill is Bai Liu. We need to meet him and go with him.”

“You went crazy when you saw Spades using his skills!” The Reverse God held his forehead helplessly, “The destructive power of that guy’s personal skills is terrifying, and he doesn’t have enough control over his skills. Every time he uses a skill, he can only maintain consciousness for a short period of time, and then he loses his self-awareness and attacks indiscriminately.”

“Spades himself is well aware of the destructive power of his skills. No matter what the situation is, he has almost never used his skills in the game.” The Reverse God turned his head to look at the lake, took a deep breath with an inexplicable look, “…but this time, he is so stubborn that he really doesn’t want to leave easily…”

“This is terrible… Two evil god-level characters appear in the same game together, and they refuse to leave.” The Reverse God put his hand on the back of his neck. He turned his neck, his eyes were cold, but there was still a casual smile in his tone, “I don’t know if I can control it.”

“These two little bastards in love are really good at causing trouble for the people around them.” The Reverse God exhaled, “But now I have no choice but to force it.”

[System Alert: Does the player Reverse God want to use the skill weapon (the Judge's Cross Heavy Sword)?]

【Sure】.

A huge cross-shaped heavy sword appeared across the Reverse God's back, and the handle of the sword was just held by the Reverse God's hand behind his neck.

The sword was huge, with a blade about two meters long and about the width of two adult palms. The horizontal handle was also fifty to sixty centimeters. At first glance, it looked like a cross and was very heavy, weighing down the Reverse God so much that his shoulders seemed to be a little lower.

"It's so heavy…" The Reverse God complained, "Why is the skill weapon so heavy? Isn't it made from my desire? Make it lighter for me."

Before he could finish his words, the lake in front of him, which had been calm till now, suddenly formed a whirlpool in the center. It spun and sucked in everything around it, whether it was grass, dead trees, corpses, or things on the shore, all into some kind of abstract colored lines.

The whole world was like a game that collapsed after touching a bug, and began to disappear bit by bit with the whirlpool in the lake as the center, and this disappearance soon spread to the feet of the Reverse God and Tang Erda on the shore.

Tang Erda quickly carried Liu Jiayi on his back and jumped to a place where the wall had not yet collapsed, with a serious look on his face.

"Go out." The Reverse God said calmly without looking back, "I will bring your tactician out safely."

"I don't like casualties."

The flowing lines of color were sucked into the vortex crazily. Tang Erda glanced at the Reverse God and the heavy sword on his shoulder, patted Liu Jiayi, and said calmly: "Let's go first. We can't help here."

Liu Jiayi stared at the Reverse God's back, bit her lower lip, and finally pointed to the panel: "I know."

They were never able to interfere in anything that Bai Liu didn't allow them to.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda quit the game.

The Reverse God finally breathed a sigh of relief and left.

He was not sure that he could protect Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda from two evil god-level characters.

The Reverse God took a look at the lake where the whirlpool was growing bigger and bigger, took a deep breath helplessly, then jumped in without hesitation with sword in hand and swam towards the center of the whirlpool that was sucking everything away.

…Spades is really messing around.

Knowing that the evil god is searching everywhere for his fallen soul in the monster book, the old evil god Tawil wants to completely pollute this identity card.

Then Spades actually unsealed his soul in a game full of evil pollution sources and summoned the monster identity of Tawil. As a result, the world line collapsed and he was forced to absorb and store everything in this world.

If the monster identity of Tawil is completely contaminated by the evil god, Spades' soul will be completely hopeless, and he will really become an NPC in the game who has no self-awareness and only knows how to attack.

——Will become a complete monster that will never be able to leave the game again.

The center of the vortex has rolled to the bottom of the lake, revealing a strip of exposed mud. Kneeling on the mud are two people, or monsters, hugging each other.

The lines of the entire world mixed in the lake water and continued to pour into Tawil's back. He hugged Bai Liu, his eyes becoming more and more distracted: "I didn't abandon you and leave. I have always been… trying very hard to stay by your side and come to see you."

Bai Liu held Tawil's shoulders tightly with both hands and buried his head in Tawil's arms: "…I know."

"Don't hate me." Tawil's voice was so light that it was almost ethereal. He raised his hand to hug Bai Liu, but it fell down halfway. "Don't… sacrifice your pain to the evil god. Don't do things you hate for me."

“I will be very angry… and very sad.” Tawil said very softly.

Bai Liu took a deep breath and said, “I won’t do that again. Never again.”

Tawil lowered his head and placed it on Bai Liu’s shoulder, his lips were so pale without any blood.

He saw the whip beside Bai Liu that was still turning black, and said softly, “You are lying, you are deceiving me.”

“You can’t control your desires, and you still want the power that evil god has given you. Why?”

Bai Liu’s lips were pursed into a straight line.

Tawil drooped his eyelashes: “Do you hate me so much that you don’t even want to answer me?”

The lake water absorbed by Tawil behind him became redder and more viscous. The old wooden sculpture of the evil god was smiling in the lake. The heart gap on the sculpture was getting bigger and bigger. A large amount of red paint poured out of the gap, turning all the lake water red.

As the lake water poured into Tawil’s body, his silver-blue eyes, which had been glowing with light, became out of focus, and his voice became increasingly hoarse and dazed: “–Are you really unwilling to believe in me anymore?”

[System Warning: Player Spades’ monster book identity “The Fallen Old Evil God” is about to make him lose control of his desires! Please remove the identity equipment in time!]

“Do you really want everything he can give you?” Tawil’s voice was intermittent, revealing an unsettling emotion, “Everything he can give you, I can give you too.”

Tawil suddenly pressed down on Bai Liu, holding Bai Liu’s hands with one hand and pressing them to the ground. His eyes showed an uncontrollable persistence, but his tone was very gentle:

“I am the only God you believe in, and God will not allow you to abandon your faith.”

“If you really want to be completely contaminated by an evil god, that evil god should be me."

Tawil's long eyelashes trembled slightly. He leaned over and pressed his forehead against Bai Liu's heart. At the same time, he awkwardly put his hand under the hem of Bai Liu's shirt: "I will thoroughly pollute you, Bai Liu."

The Dense Forest Borderlands

“Shit. Tawil!” Bai Liu lay on his back on the ground. He looked at Tawil, who was holding him down with his head down, with a rare expression that seemed like he couldn’t react. His breathing was completely disordered, but his tone was still calm. “What are you doing? Let me go.”

There was no emotion in Tawil’s silver-blue eyes. He used the whip to circle Bai Liu’s hands, pressed them down with one hand, and looked at him intently with his eyes lowered:

“Bai Liu, there is a price to pay for making a wish to the evil god.”

“You took my affection, companionship, heart and love from the beginning, and wanted me to stay with you forever.” Tawil’s long hair was winding on the ground, mixing with Bai Liu’s hair. He looked directly at Bai Liu, “In return, you have to give me the same thing.”

The shadow of Bai Liu was fully reflected in Tawil’s pupils:

“You are my only believer.”

“Your feelings, heart, love, pain and faith can only be sacrificed to me. You are not allowed to offer them to any other evil god.”

The lake water, completely dyed red by the fuel, poured toward Tawil’s back with more joy. An inverted cross vaguely appeared in his silver-blue eyes, and Bai Liu was reflected on this inverted cross, as if he was imprisoned in Tawil’s eyes by the inverted cross.

[System Warning: The desires of the player Spades’ monster book identity “The Fallen Old Evil God” are completely out of control, and the mental value is jumping at a high frequency…]

Tawil’s hand reached into the hem of Bai Liu’s shirt, and his cold fingertips slid from the waist all the way to the ground, finally stretching out his curled fingers and stopping at the position of his heart.

“…Your heart is beating so fast, is it because you are afraid of me now?”

Bai Liu covered his eyes with his bound hands, and said with a slight gasp: “No.”

“I can feel that you are afraid.” Tawil’s voice suddenly lowered, and Bai Liu could feel that he was very close to him. “An evil god who is about to turn into a complete monster is unwilling to let you go. It’s scary, isn’t it?”

“But even so—” Tawil grabbed Bai Liu’s wrist and suddenly pulled away Bai Liu’s arm that was covering his eyes. With a calm expression, he forcibly fixed Bai Liu and made Bai Liu look directly at him, “I will not allow you to escape from me.”

“The moment you looked me in the face, you lost the right to be afraid of me.”

Tawil’s face and flying silver-blue curly hair were reflected in slow motion in Bai Liu’s pure black eyes.

The black color on the whip covered with bone spurs paused for a moment, then exploded upwards.

Bai Liu whipped out the whip and instantly freed himself from the restraints. The whip wrapped around Tawil’s arm and swung to the side, throwing Tawil off him.

Tawil looked at Bai Liu who was escaping from under him, his eyes were empty, and the lake water behind him was pouring into his back like boiling water.

He looked up at Bai Liu who was standing at the other end:

“——You have abandoned your faith in me, haven’t you?”

“I no longer have faith in you, Xie Ta.” Bai Liu held the whip hanging by his side, with only one spot of pure white on it, and his tone was very calm.

“So what is the relationship between us?” Tawil asked Bai Liu.

Bai Liu looked at Tawil quietly, the red paint in the lake reflected in his pure black eyes, refracting a faint red color, and the only white spot left on the whip was swallowed up, leaving only an edge.

“As for the other relationships between us, since you can’t exist by my side as an individual, and even your memories and soul can’t be preserved, don’t you think it’s unfair to me to discuss any relationship between us now?”

“So I thought about it and felt that there was really no need to discuss it.”

Bai Liu arched his eyebrows, tilted his head and smiled: “So now, there is no relationship between us.”

After saying that, Bai Liu swung the whip in his hand.

The whip full of bone spurs rushed directly towards Tawil’s front.

“Boom–!”

Bai Liu used a gun to open Tawil’s black whip. He half-knelt on the ground, his chest heaving violently, his face covered with scars, his white shirt completely stained red with blood, and even his voice was hoarse: “Spades, stop.”

Tawil lowered his head in a trance. He saw the black whip full of bone spurs with blood dripping from it in his hand, and in Bai Liu’s hand was a silver revolver.

…and what he just saw in Bai Liu’s hand was a whip full of bone spurs.

Everything around was a mess. The lake water disappeared, and only a huge pit remained where the lake used to be. The swampy mud at the bottom of the lake was exposed, covered with piles of bones, and an old wooden sculpture of an evil god was exposed at an angle, and the head of the sculpture was smiling at Tawil.

In the vague and messy space, Tawil heard the old woodcarving say to him with a compassionate tone and a smile:

[Tawil, is the evil god still an evil god if he falls in love with someone?]

[The old evil god who was once indestructible is now full of desire for someone, full of emotions, full of weaknesses, and full of fantasies.]

[Look, your desire as a human is strong enough to hear the oracle I gave you, a former evil god.]

[In your own subconscious illusion, are you so afraid of being scared and abandoned by Bai Liu?]

[Tawil, you are just a mortal now.]

[You are only a hair's breadth away from selling your soul because of extreme emotions, desires, and delusions, and falling from human to monster.]

Tawil looked at Bai Liu in front of him.

Bai Liu looked up at him straightly, then suddenly rushed over with a gun in hand, fired several shots at his head, and revealed a strange smile: "–As long as I sacrifice you, the old evil god, I can completely become the successor of the new evil god."

Tawil was knocked down into the mud by the recoil of the gun. Suddenly, a rainstorm fell from the sky. The rain was incredibly heavy and instantly filled up the lake. Vines quickly grew in the mud underground and entangled Tawil.

The head of the old wooden sculpture of the evil god rolled to the side of Tavel, who was entangled at the bottom of the lake, with the same smile on his face:

[What's wrong? You didn't resist Bai Liu's attack at all. This is just an illusion. You won't fight back?]

[You knew that this Bai Liu was most likely fake, but you didn't dare to resist his attack on you. Is it because you were afraid that it might be real?]

[Maybe if Bai Liu really hates you, dislikes you, and fears you, maybe he will really do this to you, right?]

[After all, the connection between you two is so tenuous, it was just a chance encounter ten years ago.]

The lake shrank inward, became narrower, deeper, and smaller in area, from a large lake to a pond the size of a weir. The water turned from turbid to clear, with small fish and shrimps swimming around.

There was a rope around Tawil's ankles, tying him to the bottom of the lake, and the knot was tied very tightly, as if the person who tied it was afraid that he would be washed away by the water if he didn't tie it tightly enough.

Someone jumped into the water and pulled Tawil out. It was Bai Liu with wet hair. He looked about 24 years old, but the surrounding environment was obviously the welfare home where they stayed when they were 14 years old. Bai Liu was also wearing the clothes issued by the welfare home at that time.

“I’m here to feed you, Xie Ta.” Bai Liu’s face was pale, and he suddenly smiled, “As long as you drink this, everything will be over.”

“I will never again let my life be messed up and made miserable for so long just because of a terrifying monster like you.”

Tawil looked at what Bai Liu was holding – it was a bottle of poison.

Witch’s poison.

When Bai Liu put the poison to Tawil’s mouth and looked at him expectantly, Tawil paused for a moment and then opened his mouth.

After drinking it, Tawil was mercilessly thrown into the pond again. With his eyes half closed, he sank, sank, and sank until he touched the bottom of the pond.

The mud and sand flowed away rapidly, and the bottom of the pool suddenly changed inward, from a bumpy stone bottom to an extremely smooth ceramic. As Tawil’s head was sinking, someone suddenly grabbed his hair and pulled him out of the water.

The pond in front of Tawil was transformed into a bathtub-shaped baptismal pool, and the environment changed from the orphanage pond to the church.

The faint moonlight shone through the church’s stained glass windows onto the face of the captured Tawil, creating a beautiful halo. The god enshrined on the baptismal font was originally Jesus on the cross, but now it has been replaced by an inverted cross and a broken wooden sculpture of an old evil god.

The wood carving smiled at Tawil, whose hair was grabbed.

Tawil had just been pulled out of the baptismal font. Someone grabbed his head and forced him to tilt his head back to face the statue. A sharp, twisted female voice came from behind him: “You monster, what strange thing have you done again!”

“I will punish you severely in the presence of God!”

Tawil was pushed into the water again, and when he was pulled out, the statue of the god on the stage had changed again.

Bai Liu stood on the stage with a smile. He squatted on one knee, lowered his eyes, and used his gloved hand to lift Tawil's hair from his forehead. He held Tawil's wet face and whispered, "It hurts, right?"

"I was at the back of the church, hiding behind the curtains and it was very painful when I saw this scene."

Bai Liu smiled very gently, and the moonlight through the window cast a colorful halo on his eyelashes:

"——But the pain you, a monster who will never die, feel at this moment may not even be one tenth of the pain I feel for you."

A shrill female voice hysterically interrupted their conversation and pushed Tavel under the water again.

"——That weird kid Bai Liu is willing to hang out with you, so he's probably not a good person!"

Tawil was dragged out of the water again, and the sculpture on the altar was replaced. The director of the orphanage had been drained of blood, and his body was hung on the cross with a horrified face, kneeling on the ground, as if he was confessing to them.

This time, it was Bai Liu who pulled Tawil out of the baptismal font.

Bai Liu gently wrapped his hands around Tawil's neck, and his hands began to slowly deform. His nails became sharp and black, turning into two extremely sharp monkey claws, and then he elegantly crossed his hands to grasp Tawil's throat.

The thief's monkey's paw.

"You know, if it weren't for you." Bai Liu's claws dug into Tawil's veins, and her tone was so light that it seemed like a whisper, "I would just be an ordinary person who follows his desires wholeheartedly."

"What a blessing that would be."

The blood spurting out of Tawil's throat flowed into the baptismal pool in front of him, instantly dyeing everything red. Spiky blood-ganoderma vines emerged from the bottom of the red baptismal pool, encircled Tawil's limbs and dragged him down.

Bai Liu stood aside with an indifferent expression as he watched Tawil being dragged into the baptismal pool, blood dripping from the nails of his hands:

“Xie Ta, the faith you gave me is worthless and only makes me suffer from beginning to end.”

“Even so, do you selfishly want me to keep believing in you?”

The vines entangled Tawil’s limbs and dragged him deeper and deeper into the bottomless place. The blood around him became redder and redder, as if some kind of red paint was constantly seeping into his body.

Tawil was fished out of the lake by some strange-looking natives, who hung his limbs with vines and fixed them on an inverted cross to make a wooden sculpture. Then they gathered around him, singing songs in strange accents, and walked up to him from the crowd, surrounded by Bai Liu.

Bai Liu held a sharp dagger in his hand. He smiled and walked step by step to Tawil, who was tied to the inverted cross. He put the tip of the dagger against Tawil’s heart and whispered softly:

“Xie Ta, from the time I met you until now, I was only free for ten years after you died and I completely forgot about you.”

“I have no faith in you, no feelings for you, no thoughts of you. I am just an ordinary person in this world who occasionally suffers from the desire for money. What a vulgar happiness.”

“You kept saying that you wanted me to be happy, but you never let me go after I entered the game. You held me tightly again and again, guarding me during every game, and you couldn’t wait to mark me as your only believer, fearing that I would abandon you, forget you, and stay away from you.”

“You kissed me, seduced me, and influenced me.” Bai Liu opened her eyelids with a gentle look, “You selfishly allowed your only believer to fall in love with you, to sacrifice his love and soul to you, and to quietly take possession of his ten-year pain as a sacrifice.”

“To me, is there any essential difference between your despicable possessiveness of me and this evil god now?”

Tawil lowered his head, breathing slightly, but did not deny anything Bai Liu said, and drops of water dripped from his long eyelashes.

Bai Liu smiled and stabbed the dagger into Tawil's heart. The bright red paint flowed out and dripped onto the almost black whip that Bai Liu held in his other hand.

Assassin's dagger.

The only remaining white spot on the whip was gradually stained black by Tawil's blood.

"You see, your blood is all equally evil." Bai Liu's smile deepened, "It has the same polluting effect on me."

Bai Liu held Tawil's face with bloody hands, lowered her eyes and smiled softly: "Xie Ta, now that it has come to this, do the only thing that will benefit me before you disappear."

Tawil raised his head and looked at Bai Liu with a pale face.

Bai Liu's smile was extremely bright:

"——As a sacrifice to the new evil god, break free of all restraints and become a god for me, and die in the horrific illusion you created, Xie Ta."

The black whip in Bai Liu's hand had bone spurs spread out, and the thorn-like bone whip climbed and entangled on the inverted cross, coiling around Tawil's hands and feet.

The bone spur pierced into the snow-white skin, and the tip of the bone whip stopped at Tawil's heart, then pierced in fiercely.

Blood seeped out and dripped onto the whip. The last white spot on the whip disappeared, turning it pitch black.

Bai Liu reached out and hugged Tawil, who was wrapped in bone whips. He leaned close to Tawil's ear and whispered with a smile: "–Xie Ta, your death is the most valuable thing to me."

"I like valuable things, so I will fall in love with you the moment you die, and then I will always pursue and miss you when you die."

"After you die, you will have my love forever. Isn't that what you want?"

"Want to make a deal with me?" Bai Liu smiled. He placed his hand on Tawil's heart. "Trade your death for my love?"

Hearing “Eternal Love”, Tawil’s heart, into which the end of the whip had been inserted, suddenly began to beat rapidly.

The evil god’s oracle came from afar, smiling:

[So this is what you fear and want the most, Tawil.]

[You used to be afraid of nothing and had no desires.]

[But now your fears and desires are all about Bai Liu. You are afraid that he will abandon you and forget you. You are afraid that Bai Liu will fall in love with someone else and believe in someone else. You want to possess his feelings and gain his faith.]

[You see, once God has emotions and becomes a human, he will be filled with desires and fears, and he will soon become a monster.]

[You knew this would happen, but you still fell in love with a person who was full of desire and reason, and who was likely to use you, and fell further for him.]

[This is really… so interesting.]

Tawil’s blood dripped from the bone spurs. He blinked slowly, and the luster in his silver-blue eyes gradually faded.

When he opened his eyes the next second, Tawil appeared in the tavern in the town again.

He was surrounded by a crowd of people who were jumping for joy and shouting, but a closer look revealed that these people had pale faces and marks of stitches on their bodies; they were all dead.

Tawil was wearing a black groom’s suit, neatly groomed. He looked up and saw Bai Liu, who was standing on the stage in a white shirt and suit pants, holding a bouquet of bright flowers and smiling at him.

The corpses around laughed grimly and shouted, “Now let the groom put the ring on the bridegroom, and then the bridegroom may kiss the bridegroom.”

So Bai Liu walked down from the platform step by step, holding a bouquet of flowers. He walked to Tawil’s side and took out a bone whip-shaped ring from the pocket of his suit pants. The ring was surrounded by thorns.

Bai Liu smiled and looked up at Tawil: “After you put on the ring, I will love you forever, let's get married."

Tawil looked at Bai Liu, and there was no light in his silver-blue eyes.

When he was a child, he and Bai Liu occasionally talked about the topic of marriage.

[Marriage is when two people use love and law to bind each other and promise to be together forever.]

[Bai Liu, have you ever thought about who you will marry?]

Bai Liu propped up his chin and dozed off out of boredom. When he heard Xie Ta ask him, Bai Liu turned around and laughed, as if he found it very funny: [No.]

Xie Ta was silent for a long time before continuing to ask: [Why?]

[I won't love anyone forever.] Bai Liu laughed casually and replied, [Because that is too worthless.]

Xie Ta was silent for a very long time. Bai Liu seemed to notice his abnormality and leaned over to look at his expression with interest. Xie Ta slightly shifted his eyes and did not look at Bai Liu's face.

Bai Liu leaned against the bookcase, crossed his chest and smiled in an ambiguous manner: [You don't want to marry a woman and start a family, do you?]

Xie Ta didn't look him in the eye, but lowered her eyes: [Can't I have the idea of marrying someone?]

[You can have it.] Bai Liu smiled maliciously with his eyebrows curved, [But that's just a fantasy.]

[Because an immortal monster like you cannot be registered and allowed to marry someone.]

[You'd better be honest and give up those weird ideas of yours and follow me forever.] The fourteen-year-old Bai Liu squatted down, held Xie Ta's chin and turned him around, so that Xie Ta looked directly at him.

Bai Liu smiled with a very evil smile: [Because I am the only one willing to accept you and play games with you, little monster.]

The Dense Forest Borderlands

Bai Liu walked towards Tawil step by step, lifted Tawil's hand, placed the black bone whip ring on it, and smiled gently: "Have you thought about it?"

Tawil calmly stared at Bai Liu in the illusion, his silver-blue eyes were silent, and a pure black whip appeared in his hand.

"Maybe one day in the future I will die in exchange for your love, but not now."

The smile on Bai Liu's face grew stronger: "Why not? Your presence now only makes me feel painful, doesn't it?"

Tawil raised his eyes and looked directly at Bai Liu: "Because I don't want to."

The expression on Bai Liu's face froze.

"Even if I can only make you suffer, I will stay by your side." A hurricane blew up from behind Tawil, ruffling his long hair and blowing the collar of his suit into disarray.

"Your pain and faith can only belong to me, your desire and love can only be bound to me."

"Until you completely kill me, I will never let you believe in other evil gods."

"You are mine."

Tawil raised the whip and looked into Bai Liu's eyes: "Although it's despicable, I am indeed so greedy when I fall in love with someone."

"Is that so? Then there's nothing we can do." Bai Liu sighed with regret, raised his whip, and looked at Tawil with a smile, "Then I can only kill you."

The tavern in front of him shattered like a burning old photo, the illusion collapsed, and Tawil stood at the bottom of the muddy lake holding a black whip.

Everything around me turned into messy, jumping colored lines, like a series of uncolored drafts randomly superimposed on Photoshop. Only the lake bottom under my feet was real muddy gray, with rotten, twisting corpses struggling in the mud.

This is the real game world, and it is about to collapse.

Bai Liu was holding a whip that had been completely stained black in his right hand, standing far away from Spades. His shirt was soaked through, sticking to his body in patches, with water dripping down drop by drop.

“You are unwilling to give up and accept the power of the evil god, right?” Tawil asked calmly.

Bai Liu slowly raised his head: “Xie Ta, we both chose the way we hate the most to solve the problem.”

“If I turn back now…”

“The essence of all human desires is to gain value.” Bai Liu looked at Tawil calmly, “It’s just that some value can be obtained from oneself, and some value must be obtained from others.”

Tawil’s long hair was blown by the wind that came from nowhere, and even his voice was blown to sound unreal:

“Bai Liu, what about you? What value do you want to obtain?”

Bai Liu looked at Tawil, whose figure was blurred by the wind, and spoke slowly: “I want to be able to dominate the value of God’s existence.”

“Even if you are completely consumed by desire because of this value, does it matter?” Tawil asked softly.

Bai Liu exhaled, and he suddenly smiled: “Completely consumed by desire?”

“Is this your first day meeting me, Xie Ta? When did I exist without desire?”

“I am originally a collection of desires. If there is anything to be swallowed, it is me swallowing up the desires, not the desires swallowing me.”

The wind was getting stronger and stronger, and the inverted cross pendant hanging on Bai Liu's neck fluttered in the wind, flashing a strange halo.

Tawil rushed out from the wind, and a clean and neat black whip came straight towards Bai Liu's face. Bai Liu dodged by tilting his shoulder. Tawil was already close to Bai Liu. He reached out to grab the inverted cross pendant on Bai Liu's chest without looking away, and his fingers had already touched the surface of the pendant.

Bai Liu didn't stop at all, he raised his hand and whipped, but Tawil whipped back to block.

At the moment when the two whips hit, the entire space continued to vibrate and twist.

[System Warning: The world line of "Dense Forest Frontier" is collapsing because it cannot accommodate too much data related to the evil god… It has collapsed by 80%…]

Bai Liu was almost forced to his knees by Tawil's whip and took several steps back.

Seeing that Bai Liu could no longer hold back the blood that was flowing from the corner of his mouth, Tawil took a step back, pursed his lips, and pulled the whip back slightly.

…No matter how determined he was, he couldn't be cruel to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu swung the whip again without any hesitation.

Tawil did not use the whip. Instead, he dodged sideways and pulled the whip back with one hand, while reaching out with the other hand to hook the inverted cross that was hanging out of Bai Liu's shirt collar.

The moment Tawil touched the inverted cross, Bai Liu looked straight into Tawil's eyes without dodging. He suddenly smiled, lowered his head and held the inverted cross in his mouth, pressing the pendant to the bottom of his mouth with his tongue. Even Tawil's fingers were bitten by Bai Liu.

Tawil paused, released the whip, bent his knees to hold down Bai Liu, opened his thumb and index finger to block Bai Liu's mouth, and reached in with his other hand to pull out the reverse cross that Bai Liu was holding in his mouth.

In close combat, Bai Liu was not at an advantage with the whip and was pinned by Tawil, unable to resist.

The next second, countless corpse hands stretched out from the mud around Tawil and grabbed Tawil's feet and pulled him down.

Bai Liu took the opportunity to escape. He turned his head and spit out the reverse cross, then turned around and whipped Tawil again.

[System Warning: The world line of "Dense Forest Frontier" has now collapsed by 95%…]

Tawil whipped the corpse's hand that was holding him away, stared at the long whip with bone spurs coming straight at him, and tightened his grip on the whip.

"It's forbidden to fight so hard in the game pool–!!" A roar interrupted the world at the bottom of the lake. The Reverse God came out from the messy lines around the bottom of the lake with a heavy sword in hand and landed steadily at the bottom of the lake.

As soon as the Reverse God landed on the ground, he collapsed and shouted: "You two little bastards, do something good! If you hit each other again, this place will collapse! There is no need to let the whole world be buried with you two just because of a lovers quarrel!"

But neither Bai Liu nor Tawil listened to him and continued fighting.

The bottom of the lake was shaking, and the edges, like dry soil that had solidified long ago, began to break under the rapid stomping of Bai Liu and Tawil.

Being ignored by both of them, the Reverse God took a deep breath. He slowly raised his heavy sword, his face dark as if water was dripping out: "–Use the authority of the judge–the judgment of the evil god."

[System Warning: Does the player, Reverse God, want to use the highest-level personal skill (Judgment of the Evil God) in the monster book identity (Judge of the God of Rebellion)?]

【Yes.】

When the two whips collided and crossed each other again, The Reverse God appeared between Bai Liu and Tawil with his heavy sword raised like a flash.

The Reverse God looked solemn and slashed hard at the point where the two black whips crossed.

A violent white light exploded from where the heavy sword was chopped down. The huge impact force forced Bai Liu and Tawil to let go of their whips and were knocked far away.

The two pure black whips and the heavy swords shattered under the weight almost at the same time. The entire world line burst into a distorted colorful halo, and the sky flickered like a mosaic. Fragments kept falling from everywhere and hitting the bottom of the lake, being swallowed by the mud.

The corpse at the bottom of the lake let out heart-wrenching howls.

The black whip made a crisp sound under the heavy sword, and the smooth surface of the heavy sword had clear cracks like broken glass. The world line that had been disturbed by the two whips finally calmed down.

The Reverse God gritted his teeth and pressed down the heavy sword in his hand. The blue veins on his forehead and neck bulged, his eyes and face turned red, blood oozing out of his mouth, nose and pores. The bones in his hands holding the heavy sword broke one by one, and even his shoulders collapsed.

[System Warning: The health of the player Reverse God is rapidly decreasing…]

The Reverse God coughed and vomited a large mouthful of dirty blood, and said word by word: "–I've told you, children should not play with toys that are too aggressive when playing games. It's easy to hurt each other, and in the end you will be the ones who get hurt–"

"There is no need to continue this game of fratricide."

[System Alert: The player, Reverse God, used the Judgement of the Evil God to terminate the Evil God Succession Ceremony, neutralize the power of the Evil God, and the world line collapse ends.]

[System Warning: The world line of "Dense Forest Frontier" is being fully repaired, and all players are forced to exit the game.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has exited the game.]

Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi, who had been guarding the game pool, noticed the unusual movement in the game pool and turned their heads to look over.

Bai Liu, with his long hair spread out and his body soaking wet, stretched out a hand from the game pool. Tang Erda immediately reached out and pulled him up.

When Liu Jiayi saw the front of Bai Liu's face, her expression changed: "How did you get so badly injured?"

Blood was oozing from the corners of Bai Liu's mouth, his long hair was disheveled and stuck to his pale face, the long whip in his hand was only left with a broken handle and bone whip fragments falling down, and his shirt was covered in blood.

"My injury is not serious." Bai Liu raised the back of his hand to wipe the blood from the corner of his mouth, his expression was very calm, "The injuries of others are more serious than mine."

"That tactician named the Reverse God might die in the game."

Tang Erda was shocked: "You killed him?!"

"No." Bai Liu said, "I don't know what method the Reverse God used to rush over and cut off Xie… Spades' whip and mine. Some kind of power related to the evil god in the whip backfired and attacked the Reverse God."

"When I logged out, I saw the Reverse God kneeling on the ground with his hands on his heavy sword and vomiting blood. He looked like he was going to die."

Even Liu Jiayi was shocked by this: "Did they break both your whip and Spades whip into pieces? Yours is fine, it's just an additional item, but Spades is a skill weapon, how did they break it?!"

"I don't know." Bai Liu lowered his eyes and walked forward, "It seems to be related to his skills."

"Bai Liu." Tang Erda took a deep breath and held Bai Liu's shoulders to prevent him from moving forward. "… Let me ask you something. Have you really completed the inheritance ceremony of the evil god?"

Bai Liu glanced sideways and said, “When did Captain Tang become interested in this kind of second-rate, game-like identity-changing ceremony?”

“I actually haven’t figured out what this ritual is, but I don’t think it’s as simple as you said.” Tang Erda stared at Bai Liu with his dark blue eyes, “Did you complete it?”

Bai Liu was silent for a while, then said frankly, “If I have to say it, I’ll leave it half-finished.”

“I got the status of the evil god’s successor and a strengthened body, but the whip was cut off, and the most important inverted cross in the ceremony was desperately snatched away by Spades.”

Tang Erda heaved a sigh of relief for no apparent reason. He let go of Bai Liu’s shoulder and said awkwardly, “…I was a little anxious just now. Are you okay?”

“It’s nothing.” Bai Liu turned around, curved his eyebrows at Tang Erda, and smiled, “It is Captain Tang’s duty to supervise me and prevent me from becoming a bad person. Good citizens like me will fully cooperate with Captain Tang’s inquiries on the performance of his duties.”

Tang Erda was stunned when he saw Bai Liu’s smile.

Bai Liu’s smile before had a sense of polite hypocrisy, as if he wanted to write the five big words “I’m deceiving you” on his face. He was very nonchalant and didn’t seem like he was deliberately deceiving anyone.

But now Bai Liu’s face was pale and there was blood at the corners of his mouth, but he did not show any weakness at all. Instead, when he smiled, there was a sense of superiority that came over him, making people feel as if he was the person you wanted to ask for help, and he was also listening to your troubles very seriously, indulging you with a smile, and willing to solve your problem.

…This way of facing people with the attitude of God is like Bai Liu.

“I’m not seriously injured. Let me go back to the guild to check on the other team members.”

After saying that, Bai Liu walked forward without looking back. Tang Erda glanced at the game pool hesitantly and called out to Bai Liu:

“Don’t you want to… wait for Spades for a moment?”

Bai Liu smiled and looked at Tang Erda: “I didn’t kill Spades, nor did I kill the Reverse God. I didn’t kill any good people in the game, so you don’t have to worry about that.”

“Or maybe you are worried about me and think I am lying. Can we stay here and wait?” Bai Liu said considerately.

“No.” Tang Erda stretched out his hand and drew a line between Bai Liu and the game pool, and asked hesitantly, “You and Spades were in the game, and the two of you…” They got married, kissed, and carried each other on their backs…

“It looks like you two have a very good relationship.” Tang Erda tried his best to find an adjective and said dryly, “Don’t you want to confirm the status of Spades?”

Tang Erda quit the game very early. He did not see the subsequent dispute between Bai Liu and Spades. He was still at the stage where Spades rescued them and went to find Bai Liu.

Bai Liu blinked slowly and said in sudden realization, “Oh, that.”

“That’s just a game.” Bai Liu smiled, “I didn’t take it seriously.”

The Game Pool

The Reverse God staggered out of the game pool, dragging Spades with one hand.

He was covered in blood, with almost every part of his body covered in wounds. Spades, who was dragged out of the game pool by the Reverse God, was in even worse condition than him. He was lying in a pool of blood, and it was almost impossible to recognize him as a human being.

The Reverse God dragged the unconscious Spades like a mop, and walked towards the direction of the Killer Sequence Guild with every step he took.

As the stunned players nearby watched, the Reverse God used the [Spades Mop] to drag a long bloody trail on the floor of the game pool.

When it came to the Killer Sequence, the Reverse God let out a long breath, coughed twice, looked back at the motionless Spades, sighed, and then helped Spades up the stairs with difficulty.

After hitting the back of Spades' head countless times, the Reverse God finally climbed up to the conference room on the second floor exhausted.

The Reverse God weakly knocked on the door of the conference room and called out hoarsely, "Is anyone there? Open the door. Your tactician and main attacker are about to die."

The door of the conference room was opened, and Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu, who were bandaging themselves, stared at the Reverse God and Spades, who were covered in bruises.

Bai Yi gasped: "How did you get hurt like this?!"

"It's hard to explain." The Reverse God slumped on the sofa, threw the corpse-like Spades to the side, and looked at the ceiling with lifeless eyes, "——I judged Bai Liu and Spades at the same time, and was drained."

Bai Jiamu stepped forward and handed a bandage to the Reverse God, but the Reverse God waved his hand and refused: "I'm fine. Although the fight was fierce, my mental state is stable. I didn't get hurt during the dungeon, but my health was depleted."

Bai Jiamu was startled: "The blood on your body is…"

"The blood belongs to Spades." The Reverse God pointed at Spade and sighed, "After I judged Bai Liu, this guy went crazy for some reason and fought with me in the dungeon. I vomited three liters of blood and almost died on the spot. He also destroyed the world line that was being repaired."

Bai Yi squatted beside Spades' "corpse" curiously and poked it: "This is the first time I see Spades take injuries out of the dungeon, and such serious injuries at that."

"I had a hard time knocking him out." The Reverse God glanced at Bai Yi, "If you wake him up, Spades' weapon can be used to attack people in the hall. If he goes crazy, he will beat you in the hall."

Bai Yi was so frightened that he immediately retracted his hand, and crawled to a corner far away from Spades, looking at Spades in horror: "You haven't beaten Spades into submission yet?!"

"No, Spades is going crazy this time. If I hadn't stopped him, he would have gone to find Bai Liu as soon as he logged out of the game." The Reverse God was silent for a while, and then added, "But Spades' skill weapon was shattered by me, so he can't go crazy and beat people up in the lobby for the time being."

Bai Yi patted his chest in exhaustion: "Reverse God, why didn't you tell me earlier that you wanted to find a weapon master to repair Spades' weapon?"

The Reverse God looked at the "corpse" of Spades lying on its back for a while, then suddenly said, "Before we ask the weapon master to come over, let's first call Liao Ke over to take a look at Spades."

"Liao Ke?" Bai Jiamu paused, "You want Liao Ke to give Spades psychological counseling for the game?"

Spades hummed tiredly through his nose.

Bai Yi was surprised and said, "Spades is the only one among us who has never received psychological counseling for the game."

"Liao Ke's psychological counseling was very painful." Bai Yi looked at Spades with a gloating look, "You have come to this day too!"

“Stop laughing. Call Liao Ke over and all of you get out.” The Reverse God waved his hand weakly.

Bai Jiamu was about to leave with Bai Yi, who was still laughing at Spades, when the Reverse God suddenly stopped them: “Hey, wait, there’s one more thing I haven’t told you.”

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu turned around, and the Reverse God’s eyes were so calm that they didn’t stir up any ripples: “Although I have told you many times, I will remind you again.”

“Spades must never be given the code to leave the game and enter the real world.”

Seeing the Reverse God’s expression, Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu were both stunned.

The Reverse God rarely has such a serious expression. Although he is a tactician who coordinates the overall situation, he is smiling most of the time and is not often angry. When talking about serious matters, even if some teammates are smiling, he rarely frowns to blame them.

But this also means that when the Reverse God really says so, this matter is usually very important.

[Don’t give Spades the code to enter the real world] was the first ban that the Reverse God issued to all members in this tone after entering the Killer Sequence.

This is a very strange ban.

How strange is it?

When a normal player logs into the game from a certain location in the real world, the game will automatically generate a twelve-digit code for that location. When the player wants to leave the game, he only needs to enter the twelve-digit code into the system and the player can log out of the game from this location.

Spades had no code.

He didn’t have any codes for any of the places in the real world.

So he was never able to log out of the game.

Spades is a very special player. He doesn’t even know the existence of reality. Even Bai Yi didn’t realize until later that Spade was completely different from ordinary players like them.

“You don’t have a code?!” Bai Yi looked at Spades in shock, “Then where did you log into the game? Even if you log in and out from the same place later, you must have one when you log in to the game, right?!”

Spades lowered his head and played with the whip in his hand from time to time: “I logged into the game from Siren Town, and the game didn’t give me a code.”

Bai Yi took two seconds to react before he asked vaguely, “You are a player who logged into this game lobby from a horror game. You didn’t log in from reality?!”

Spades raised his head and looked at Bai Yi: “Reality, what is it?”

Bai Yi was speechless, racking his brains to explain the meaning of “reality”: “Reality is… after the players play the game, they feel scared and tired. They will leave the game and return to reality, to a place where they are no longer scared and no longer need to play games. Then they will hug their wives, or if they don’t have wives, they can hug their dogs, and sleep peacefully.”

Spades listened carefully, and then asked, “When I want to sleep, I will find a game instance, kill the monsters in it, and then lie on their corpses to sleep. Is this my reality?”

“No!” Bai Yi immediately retorted, “Reality and games are different!”

Spades looked at Bai Yi: “Why is it different?”

Bai Yi felt like his brain was in a mess. He touched his chin with a serious expression, trying to further explain the meaning of “reality”.

This is a completely philosophical topic that goes beyond the scope of Bai Yi’s topic.

“That’s right, that’s right, emm, how should I put it…” Bai Yi said while gesturing, “Reality is the real thing, which is different from a game copy. In reality, there is nothing you must do, and there are no messy lines like [true end] for you to follow. Generally speaking, you won’t encounter monsters, so you can stay there peacefully.”

“It’s the same after I complete the game,” Spades said calmly. “There are no monsters, and nothing for me to do. I can stay there forever.”

Bai Yi was speechless again. He began to pull at his hair frantically: “Ahhh! Anyway, reality is different. Everyone prefers to stay in reality rather than in the game. Reality is good and important! It is a thousand times and ten thousand times better than this crappy game copy!”

“If I had a choice, I would never enter this game and stay in reality.”

Spades was silent for a moment, lowered his eyes and shook his whip: “How is reality better than games?”

“There are so many good things about it.” Bai Yi kept talking about it like he was complaining. He counted on his fingers, “First, you don’t have to be so nervous when fighting monsters.”

Spades pursed his lips: “I’m not afraid to fight monsters.”

Spades: “I won’t die easily.”

Bai Yi glared: “Don’t bother collecting all the monster books to pass the level.”

Spades: “I can clear the level without collecting all of them.”

Bai Yi listed a lot of reasons, but each one was dismissed by Spades lightly. Bai Yi finally lost his temper. He muttered to himself with his eyes wide open: “For you, it seems that compared with reality, games are not that bad.”

Spades glanced at Bai Yi calmly and said, “You like the reality dungeon because you are too weak.”

“That’s not true!” Bai Yi was so angry at Spades’ secret taunting that he stood up and jumped twice. “Even if I were as strong as you, I would rather stay in reality!”

Spades paused and asked, “Why?”

Bai Yi slowly sat back next to Spades. He was quiet for a while, and his expression softened: “Because my lover, friends, relatives, these people who are very important to me are all in reality.”

“Living with them is different.” Bai Yi suddenly blinked, his eyes reddened, he raised his hand and wiped his eyes fiercely, “Even if the reality of living with them is as scary as a horror game, I will work hard to become as strong as you, and then go back to protect them."

Bai Yi sniffed, as if he was trying very hard not to cry, but in the end he couldn't help it and started to sob: "Wow – I miss my wife so much -!!"

After Bai Yi had almost stopped crying, Spades started to ask questions.

Spades seemed to be really confused and asked slowly: "Friends, relatives, lovers, these——"

Spades turned around and asked seriously: "What are they?"

Bai Yi was stunned.

The Game Pool

Bai Yi met Spades' inquiring eyes. He opened his mouth and wanted to answer Spades' question, but at that moment, he couldn't utter a single word.

The definitions of friends, relatives, and lovers are actually very simple, but for some reason, Bai Yi felt that… the answer to these question is very cruel to Spades.

Although Spades himself didn't care.

Seeing that Bai Yi didn't answer him, Spades turned his gaze back and said, "Friends, family, and lovers are just like reality. You can't really tell what's important about them."

"Then there's no need to tell me the answer." Spades used his knee to push the whip hanging on his leg, lowering his eyes, "It doesn't matter."

Bai Yi was silent for a long time before he smiled awkwardly and hummed, "…Indeed, to Spades, none of this should be important."

"Because these things are just like [reality], they are just the gentle places where weak people like us escape."

Bai Yi muttered absentmindedly.

From then on, Spades never asked anyone any questions related to reality, and just played games alone like before.

The people in the Killer Sequence also unanimously decided not to tell Spade anything about reality.¸

Spades doesn't like living in the central hall. He usually sleeps in a game. If he finds a game that he really likes, he will often go to this game to sleep or rest.

For example, for a long time before, Spades slept in "Ice Age".

Bai Yi once said in shock, "You actually like to sleep there. Don't you feel cold in such a low temperature?"

Spades calmly said that he would not feel cold.

Bai Yi asked in shock, why?! Isn't it better to choose a warmer place to sleep?!

Spades glanced at him and said, “My body temperature is very cold. I can’t warm up no matter where I sleep, so it’s all the same.”

So Bai Yi stopped talking again and stared blankly at Spades as he left with the whip and went to sleep in “Ice Age”.

In fact, Bai Yi knew in his heart that all the sympathy-like emotions he had towards Spades were unnecessary for the other party.

Spades doesn’t care about the opinions of ordinary human players like them. They are not a species that survives in the same environment, and their standards for judging the world and the future are completely different.

If it must be said then Spades is more like a monster that accidentally escaped from the game and accidentally entered the ranks of players.

It is foolish to look at Spades from a human perspective.

But sometimes… when Bai Yi occasionally discovered something very subtle and close to human in Spades, he would really feel sad.

——It’s a pity that Spades is a guy who sometimes acts like a human being. Why can’t he enter reality?

But Bai Yi knew in his heart that this sadness was unnecessary.

Because not allowing Spades to enter reality is the consensus of all players in reality.

Bai Yi couldn’t understand before why the Reverse God strictly prohibited everyone from coding the spades, but later he understood.

Once, when Bai Yi was in the lounge, the door was half-closed. At the moment when he was about to push it open, he heard the voice of Spades coming from inside.

“Reverse God, are you the one who forbids everyone to give me the code of reality?” Spades asked calmly.

Bai Yi’s hand, which was about to open the door, stopped there.

After a while, the Reverse God replied: “Well, I forbade it. Why? Do you want to enter reality?”

“No.” Spades paused, “But why can’t I go?”

The Reverse God smiled. Bai Yi could see through the crack in the door that the Reverse God was leaning on the sofa, his head tilted back and looking at the ceiling, as if he was in deep thought: “Spades, it’s not that you can’t go to reality. You can go.”

Spades asked, “Why?”

The Reverse God said: “Because when [reality] has no meaning to you, [reality] is just a copy of your game, and you will look at [reality] with the eyes of looking at a game.”

“If one day, [reality] loses its meaning as a game to you, or [reality] makes you unhappy, you will choose to destroy [reality] without hesitation. You have the ability to do so.”

“But the most fundamental reason is that [reality] is not important to you.”

“Then you will become a monster in this copy of [reality].” The Reverse God raised his head and looked at Spades levelly, “You will destroy the [reality] that others are trying their best to protect.”

Spades raised his eyes and said, “Isn’t [Reality] a copy of a game?”

The Reverse God stroked his chin and thought for a while: “You can say it is.”

Spades continued to ask: “Then destroying the game copy is not something that [players] often do?”

“The players I met hated all copies of the game. They were terrified of them and often collapsed and screamed about destroying them completely.”

“Why do these players want to protect this copy of [Reality]?”

Spades looked at the Reverse God: “Is it because these players like the [Reality] dungeon?”

“No.” The Reverse God thought for a moment, and then he smiled as if he found it very interesting, and looked at Spades, “On the contrary, many of the players who come to this system hate [reality].”

“There must be something in reality that makes them very unhappy and greatly stimulates their desires, so they will enter the game. For many players, the horror of reality may not be less than the horror of any game here.”

Spades stared at the Reverse God: “Then why do they want to protect reality? Shouldn’t they do everything they can to destroy it?”

The Reverse God smiled and said, “It’s hard to understand, right?”

Spades paused and hummed.

“What they want to protect is not the copy of [reality] itself.” The Reverse God looked at Spades, “but some specific people in this copy.”

“So no matter how hideous, terrifying and gloomy this copy of [reality] is, and how it forces them to suffer and tortures them to survive, they will protect [reality] for these people.”

“Spades, humans, or the players you see are such creatures.”

“People instinctively seek their own existence, feelings and values in other people, and the desire generated by this pursuit is often more tenacious than the desire generated from themselves.”

“If people only rely on making profits for themselves, they will become the subjects of desires and spiritual needs. Games will soon drive such people crazy. This is normal because people are the product of groups. It is difficult for them to completely rely on themselves to meet their emotional and spiritual needs. They must rely on others.”

“You must have seen a lot of players who enter the game just for themselves, and then die in the game very quickly.”

“So most of the high-level players in this game are not playing for themselves, but because of someone or some very important people in [reality].”

The Reverse God held his chin and looked at Spades with a smile: “But for Spades now, these things are still difficult to understand, so just listen to them.”

“If Spades wants to enter reality, then he must make reality have irreplaceable meaning to you.” The Reverse God patted Spades’ shoulder.

“When there is someone in reality who is very important to you, and you are willing to not destroy reality for him or her no matter how much reality tortures you, then you can enter reality.”

Spades was silent for a long time. When the Reverse God stood up and prepared to leave, Spades suddenly spoke again: “Those very important people, are they friends, relatives, lovers?”

Bai Yi, who was standing outside the door, and the Reverse God, who was inside the door, were both startled at the same time.

The Reverse God sat back down with amusement: “Did Bai Yi tell you that?”

Spades hummed and lowered his head: “But he didn’t tell me what these are.”

“In a popular sense, relatives are people who are related to you by blood, friends are people who have a good relationship with you and are willing to help you and accompany you at all times, and lovers are -“

When talking about [lover], the Reverse God clenched his fist and coughed. His face turned red and he said distressingly: “Lover… Although I already have a wife, it is difficult for me to explain this to you clearly.”

Spades squinted at the Reverse God: “Love, is it complicated?”

“It’s not complicated.” The Reverse God scratched the back of his head and said embarrassedly, “I fell in love with my wife at first sight.”

“But it’s not complicated, it’s also complicated.” The Reverse God sighed helplessly, “I have been my wife’s boyfriend so many times. She was very good to every boyfriend, and every boyfriend was also a good person. But I don’t know why, maybe it’s because of bad luck, we can never make it to the end.”

“I was so anxious before the wedding that I didn’t sleep well for several days.” The Reverse God clasped his hands together and prayed devoutly, “Thank God for allowing her and I to marry smoothly.”

Bai Yi, who was outside the door, suddenly heard such a big gossip and took a breath of cold air – Wow, a highly intelligent person like The Reverse God would also worry about his marriage problems.

Bai Yi thought that only idiots like himself would worry.

“You have an intelligence score of 96, and you can also predict the future.” Spades looked at the Reverse God, “If you really want to know about the future of your marriage with her, there is always a way.”

The Reverse God slowly sat up straight, clasped his hands on his knees, lowered his head and remained silent for a long time before speaking: “…I can’t predict her.”

Spades looked at the Reverse God: “Your skills have no limit, why not?”

“Because I’m afraid.” The Reverse God slowly raised his head and looked at Spades. “I can predict the future of my friends and relatives, but I can’t predict it for her.”

Spades stared at the Reverse God: “What are you afraid of?”

The Reverse God paused and said, “Among all the relationships that people need according to common sense, love relationships are the most special. You can have some expectations about your relationships with friends, and most of the relationships with family members are innate. Only love relationships are difficult to determine.”

“Before I met her, no matter how smart I was, it would have been difficult for me to predict what kind of love relationship I would have and how it would progress.”

“Romances are full of unknowns.”

“You don’t know who you will fall in love with, nor do you know whether that person will love you or how long they will love you.” The Reverse God half closed his eyes, “I don’t know how far we can go, so while I still love her, I am afraid of not being able to see her future.”

“I’m not going to make any predictions about lovers.”

“As for me…” The Reverse God leaned back on the sofa and said softly, “A lover is probably the one who makes me fear a future without her.”

Spades was silent for a while, as if thinking, and then gave a serious evaluation: “It’s hard to understand.”

The Reverse God put his hands behind his head, turned his head to look at Spades, and laughed: “Indeed, for Spades, whether it is friends, relatives, or lovers, it is difficult to understand.”

“Your birth is different from that of normal humans. You don’t have any relatives with whom you have a natural blood relationship. As for friends…”

“All the players around Spades are afraid of you, let alone being your friend.” The Reverse God sighed, “Although we teammates know your background, we can’t empathize with you. The best we can do is not be afraid of you.”

“It’s hard for us ordinary humans living in [reality] to understand your thoughts, and it’s hard for you to understand our thoughts either.”

“If friends can’t understand each other, there’s no point in the relationship.”

The Reverse God glanced at Bai Yi outside the door with a blank look: “It is very disrespectful to make friends with others based on superficial sympathy, and the other party does not need it.”

Bai Yi’s fingers on the door contracted slightly, and he slowly put them down.

“Lovers…” The Reverse God sighed, “I really can’t understand this relationship. I am still troubled and can’t give you more explanation.”

Spades was silent for a while: “If I have [relatives, friends, lover], will you give me the code to enter reality?”

“I won’t give it to you.” The Reverse God looked at Spades and smiled, “But at that time, Spades, your [friends, relatives, and lovers] will give you the code.”

Spades said “oh” and nodded as if he got an answer, then stood up and left.

When Spades pushed open the door, he saw Bai Yi standing outside. Bai Yi smiled and greeted Spades. Spades nodded to indicate that he saw it, and left without saying hello.

Bai Yi was silent and walked into the lounge.

He walked in and sat on the sofa. The smile on his face quickly disappeared. He sat in silence for a while, then took out a box of cigarettes, took out a cigarette and put it in his mouth, then handed the box to the Reverse God opposite him.

“I apologize.” Bai Yi paused and said, “Reverse God, I was wrong. I didn’t think it through. I will never think of secretly giving Spades the code to reality again.”

The Reverse God lifted his eyelids, stretched out his index and middle fingers to pinch a cigarette in the box, took it out and lit it.

Then the Reverse God spoke slowly: “Don’t help someone you fear deeply just because of momentary sympathy, and naively think of becoming friends with him.”

He exhaled a puff of smoke, and the white smoke spread out on the side of his face.

The Reverse God turned around and smiled, “It’s easy to get punished, Bai Yi.”

From that time on, Bai Yi barely understood why the Reverse God did not allow anyone to encode the Spades reality.

But Bai Jiamu didn’t understand. He asked the Reverse God several times why he couldn’t give the code to Spades.

[Spades is an idiot! He won’t do anything to destroy reality! So what if we give it to him! At least let this guy sleep in a normal, warm bed for once!] Bai Jiamu yelled.

The Reverse God always laughed it off when it came to the younger Bai Jiamu, saying with a smile, “I can give it to him, but not now, and not by you.”

[Wrongtime!!] The Reverse God always said to Bai Jiamu in a funny tone.

It was not until this moment, when the Reverse God was covered in blood and Spades was lying on the ground with bruises all over his body, that Bai Yi suddenly realized.

When a monster has the power to destroy [reality], it will never be allowed to enter this copy of [reality] until it has a weakness.

Although this is unfair to the monsters.

Bai Yi took a look at Spades, who was lying face down in a pool of blood, then retracted his gaze and was pulled out of the meeting room by Bai Jiamu.

The Reverse God lay on the sofa motionless. After a while, the door of the conference room was opened again, and Liao Ke walked in carrying a cross-shaped medical box.

Liao Ke is a team member with a very low sense of presence. His appearance does not match the name of Killer Sequence at all. He is very gentle, with long and thin eyebrows, and wears a pair of plain reading glasses. There are some unintentional fine lines at the corners of his eyes, but at a glance he looks to be only 27 or 28 years old, less than 30 years old.

But in fact, the second child is already in high school.

Liao Ke looks very young and doesn't look old at all, but he is actually 48 years old this year and his eldest son has graduated from university for more than a year.

"Oh, Liao Ke, you're here." The Reverse God rubbed his shoulders and chatted casually, "Is your little daughter going to be a senior in high school next year?"

"It's not easy for you to still remember this." Liao Ke teased, then half-knelt beside Spades, turned him over and tied him up with a restraint belt.

The Reverse God squatted down to help.

Liao Ke tied Spades' hands and feet to the wall with restraints, then bandaged Spades' wounds with bandages. He looked up at the Reverse God and smiled, "My daughter has a hard time studying, but she has things she wants to do, and it's good to work hard for what she wants to do."

The Reverse God also smiled: "It's great that you found what you want to do at such a young age."

Liao Ke glanced at the Reverse God and said, "You are the same, aren't you? You entered the game at a young age just for what you wanted to do."

The Reverse God was silent for a few seconds, then smiled as if nothing had happened: "Let's not talk about this anymore. I asked you to come here today to give Spades psychological counseling."

"It is indeed a harmless skill that can be used directly in the central hall." Liao Ke half-knelt in front of Spades, who was hung up by the restraints, with a strange expression on his face. "But this is the first time I use this skill on Spades. Are you sure this guy won't wake up and beat me up halfway through?"

The Reverse God sat cross-legged beside him: "He can't beat you anymore, his whip was broken by me."

Liao Ke smiled: "Then I feel relieved."

Liao Ke's eyes darkened. He looked directly at Spades whose head was hanging in front of him, and pulled out a stethoscope, a pen, and a notebook.

[System Alert: Player Liao Ke uses personal skills (medical consultation) and (medical record writing) on player Spades].

The stethoscope stretched out in suspension, with the head placed on Spades heart, and the ear hooks floating in the air, emitting regular heartbeat sounds like an amplified speaker.

Liao Ke took out a pen and wrote on the paper: "Patient Spades, what are your main psychological symptoms? How long has this situation lasted?"

"Tell me with your heart."

The heartbeat sound in the stethoscope became disordered, gradually changing from a regular thumping sound to the sound of poor contact and finally to Spades' own voice.

Spades' voice came out calmly from the ear hook: "I felt happy and sad, and it lasted for a game."

Liao Ke nodded: "Why are you happy and why are you sad?"

"I'm happy because I met Bai Liu, and I'm sad because I met Bai Liu." said the stethoscope.

"Do your happiness and sadness coexist all the time, or are you sometimes happy and sometimes sad?" Liao Ke asked.

The stethoscope was silent for a moment: "Sometimes I am happy, sometimes I am sad, and sometimes they coexist at the same time."

Liao Ke wrote on the notebook, the pen tip making a rustling sound on the paper: "Can you give me some examples of your happiness, sadness, and different scenes that coexist?"

"I was happy when I slept with Bai Liu, his body was warm, I was happy when I drank with Bai Liu, I had never drunk before, I was happy when I married Bai Liu, he hugged me…" The stethoscope suddenly fell silent, "It's hard for me to list the sad scenes."

Liao Keshu's pen stopped writing: "Why?"

"Because I don't actually feel very sad, but I do feel very sad," said the stethoscope.

Liao Ke asked: "If you don't feel sad in a scene, but you are indeed sad, then this sadness may come from someone else. Who is this person?"

"Bai Liu." Stethoscope answered smoothly this time, "He is very sad, but I don't understand why."

Liao Ke asked softly: "Under what circumstances would Bai Liu be so sad that you would also feel sad?"

"When he hugged me," said the stethoscope, "When he dug out my heart, when he married me, when he said goodbye to me, when he performed an evil ritual to fight me…"

The stethoscope was silent for a long time: "He seems to be sad all the time."

Liao Ke asked: “You are feeling sad for Bai Liu’s sadness, but you are not actually sad, right?”

The stethoscope hummed.

Liao Ke lowered his head and wrote: “You and Bai Liu empathized.”

Stethoscope asks, “What is empathy?”

“Empathy is because you two have similar experiences, or the other person has a very different special meaning to you, which leads to your being able to empathize with the other person’s emotions.” Liao Ke wrote in his notebook, “Spades, do you know why you feel sad because of Bai Liu’s sadness?”

The stethoscope answered honestly: “I don’t know.”

“You actually lack the basis for empathy. Your experience is too blank, which makes it impossible for you to imagine what another person would feel in that situation based on your own experience.”

Liao Ke explained: “Most empathy is based on mutual understanding, but this does not apply to you and Bai Liu. You don’t understand Bai Liu, or in other words, you don’t understand anyone. You don’t even understand the mechanism of human emotion.”

“So it’s very strange that empathy appears in you.” Liao Ke raised his eyes, “Based on my understanding of you, I think the only explanation is——”

“You are instinctively sensing Bai Liu’s emotions.”

“But correspondingly, although you feel it, you have no way to handle such complicated emotions.” Liao Ke smiled, “To put it in an analogy, if Bai Liu’s emotions are some special data, and you are a computer, and you do not have the ability to process this special data, the influx of this data will cause you to have a very strange reaction.”

Stethoscope asked, “What’s the reaction?”

“In order to process this special data, you will also keep producing special data to respond to the other party.” Liao Ke smiled gently, “Sometimes people will fall in love with those who love them, and hate those who hate them. This is a kind of human emotional feedback. You can feel the other person's emotions, and accordingly, you will also generate emotions to deal with the other person's emotions."

"Bai Liu is sad for you, so you will also be sad for Bai Liu."

Liao Ke continued: "But we need to find the source of this empathy together. That is, among all the people around you, Spades, why did you instinctively or subconsciously choose Bai Liu instead of others to feel their emotions?"

The stethoscope seemed to be thinking, and drooped slightly: "Bai Liu…is different from others."

"How is he different from others?" Liao Ke said softly, "This question may be difficult for Spades to answer. Let's cite the progressive relationships around you, Spades, to explore why Bai Liu is different."

"For example, the strangers in the game pool, what's the difference between them and Bai Liu to you? Why don't you choose to empathize with them?"

Stethoscope was silent for a long time: "These people are afraid of me."

Liao Ke nodded as if he had realized something, expressing his understanding: "Because these people are afraid of you, there is a natural barrier of empathy between you. They have ill will towards you, so you will shield them accordingly."

"In fact, normally speaking, if Spades was a human who grew up in a normal environment, his first reaction to being frightened by a large crowd would be to be infected. He would subconsciously fear and hate himself, thus aligning his ideas with those of other humans, seeking a sense of spiritual identity, and avoiding being isolated by the group."

"Humans are social animals and instinctively avoid loneliness, but Spades is not like that."

Liao Ke looked at the Reverse God standing beside him: "Spades must have always been in an environment where he was highly excluded. He is used to this state, so when he is feared on a large scale, he will just think it is normal and ignore the other party, instead of seeking recognition from these people who fear him."

“I want to ask you, Reverse God, do you know the circumstances of Spades’ birth?”

The Reverse God silently clasped his hands together and placed them against his nose. After a pause, he spoke: “This Spades guy… logged into the system from the single-player game in Siren Town.”

“Tawil, the previous evil god, became good friends with a human. After being forced into a deep sleep and falling, he drifted to the real Siren Town map.”

“From that time on, the new evil god punished Tawil by letting it drift between various games in a dormant state. It was beaten by players as a wandering god-level NPC, and was also cut into various evil origins to create and design game copies.”

“In order to go back and find that human, Tawil returned to the Siren Town where he first drifted into the game instance. While the new evil god was diverting his attention to finding his successor, he severed his soul and flesh there.”

“Tawil let his soul be trapped in the game and suffer forever, while his body transformed into a human form, sneaked in when a group of new players logged in, and finally logged into the game through a dead player’s small TV.”

Liao Ke realized: “Before, they said that there was an extra small TV in the new single-player game copy, and it was blocked so that the content inside could not be seen. Is it referring to Spades?”

The Reverse God hummed and said, “Spades was born from Tawil’s mermaid body. When he was born, although the player and the main NPCs were already dead, the game was actually almost completed.”

“That is to say, the residents of Siren Town have basically regained their normal consciousness and are now normal humans. They know that their tragedy was caused by the mermaid who was caught at the beginning, Tawil. This makes them extremely afraid and repulsive to Spade, who was born from Tawil’s body.”

“…These townspeople tried many ways to kill Spades, such as burning him with fire and cutting him with knives. However, Spades’ resistance was too high, so these things couldn’t hurt him at all, and he didn’t feel any pain.”

The Reverse God took a deep breath and said, “Spades did not resist from the beginning to the end. Or rather, he did not understand what was happening at all. He just calmly let the townspeople deal with him."

"But because the townspeople have not been able to kill Spades, extreme fear has driven them crazy."

"They lined up in front of Spades, yelling at him with twisted and crazy faces, "You're a monster!" and then collectively slit their throats and committed suicide.

"Later, Spades searched through the bodies of these people and found the body of the dead player. He took his system coin and logged into the game covered in blood."

Liao Ke nodded as if he understood, then turned to look at Spades: "Spades, why don't you choose your teammates as the object of empathy? Your teammates are not afraid of you."

Stethoscope bowed his head, as if thinking seriously, and then replied: "They don't have any special data for me."

Liao Ke responded and laughed: "You are using my previous analogy, right? Feelings towards you are data, but your teammates' feelings towards you are not strong enough for you to generate special data in return."

"This is quite normal." Liao Ke seemed to be thinking, "Just like strangers in normal human society, there is a sense of distance, but your teammates' feelings towards you, Spades, should be stronger than those towards strangers. You should be able to feel it a little bit, and they have been with you for much longer than Bai Liu. Why can't they give back to their teammates, but can give back to Bai Liu instead?"

This time, the stethoscope was silent for a while: "Because… the first time I met Bai Liu, he smiled at me."

"I felt like he wanted me to hug him."

"I felt like he didn't want me to leave and wanted to stay with me forever."

"Other people are not like this. They are not afraid of me, but they also don't want to hug me and be with me forever."

“Only Bai Liu can produce this kind of special data for me.”

Liao Ke and the Reverse God were both silent for a moment, and then Liao Ke continued to ask: “The special data Bai Liu gave you is different from the feeling given to you by others, such as your teammates, right?”

“Yeah.” The stethoscope answered quickly.

Liao Ke continued to ask: “Can you use something to compare the feeling that this special data generated by Bai Liu brings to you?”

Stethoscope paused: “When Bai Liu first met me, he held my wrist.”

Liao Ke lowered his head and continued writing on the notebook, then raised his head and looked at the Reverse God: “I have finished asking questions. I believe that you know what the psychological problems of Spades are, do I need to say it?”

The Reverse God held his forehead with his hand and sighed helplessly: “Although I guessed it in the game, when I really confirmed it, I still felt a little…”

Liao Ke smiled, he stood up and loosened the restraints that were helping Spades, then turned around and patted the Reverse God’s shoulder: “It’s complicated, right? When my little daughter first told me that she had a crush on someone, I felt the same way.”

“On the one hand, I’m glad that she has grown up and has someone she likes.” Liao Ke turned and looked at Spades with a smile in his eyes. “On the other hand, I’m worried that this fool will fall in love with a bad person.”

“But fortunately, it’s easy for you to understand each other.” Liao Ke suddenly reached out, grasped the Reverse God’s forearm, and pulled it out violently, “I think I should not only provide psychological counseling to Spades, but also to you.”

The Reverse God was caught off guard and hissed when he was pulled out. His hands were covered with bloody whip marks when he was pulled out by Liao Ke.

Liao Ke raised his eyes and looked at the Reverse God: “You can fool Bai Yi by saying that you are not injured, but you can’t fool a professional like me. What are these whip marks? Why did you show your injuries?"

The Reverse God paused, then pulled back his hand, and said with a slightly complaining smile: "What could have happened? When I was about to log out of the game, that bastard Spades suddenly went crazy and whipped me with the broken whip. I was caught off guard and didn't have time to react, so I was injured and kicked out of the game."

Liao Ke looked at the Reverse God steadily: "The wounds on your body and Spades' body are the same kind of whip marks, both with barbs, Spades' whip doesn't look like this."

The Reverse God sat on the back of the sofa, lowered his head and said nothing for a very long time.

The blood from the whip marks on his body dripped onto the floor.

“I won’t ask any more questions. No one can get you to say anything you don’t want to say.” Liao Ke stopped talking and took out a roll of bandages. “Is it okay to treat your wound?”

“Sure, sure, of course!” The Reverse God joked with a smile, “It’s my honor that Brother Liao is willing to take care of me.”

“Stop talking nonsense and turn around and take off your clothes.” Liao Ke said.

The Reverse God bared his teeth as he took off his clothes, revealing his naked and muscular upper body. There were many whip marks from his shoulders to his chest. The wounds were torn and blood was still oozing out.

“I think you and Spades both have some abnormal pain perception.” Liao Ke sighed, “You two are so seriously injured, but you can’t even tell from your faces.”

Liao Ke wrapped bandages around the Reverse God’s back one roll at a time, until his entire back was almost covered.

Spades was not much better than the Reverse God, and was almost wrapped up like a mummy.

After finishing, Liao Ke picked up his medicine box and was about to leave. After pushing open the door and leaving, Liao Ke paused, turned around and looked at the Reverse God who was sitting on the ground guarding Spades who had not yet woken up, sighed with a complicated expression, and called out.

“Reverse God.”

The Reverse God turned his head with a smile: “What’s wrong?”

Liao Ke looked at him and said, “If you die casually, my sister-in-law will definitely remarry.”

“Hey!” The Reverse God face cracked. He watched Liao Ke push the door and leave. “It’s hard for me to get married. Don’t make such a joke!”

Liao Ke waved and closed the door. A smiling voice came from behind the door: “If you don’t want your wife to remarry, then try to live well, Captain.”

The Reverse God leaned against the wall and suddenly laughed. He staggered to his feet with the help of the wall, grabbed the cigarette box on the table, put on his coat and pushed open the balcony of the meeting room.

Reverse God leaned against the balcony railing, holding a cigarette in his mouth but not lighting it.

He looked far away, looking at everything in the game. There was a light breeze blowing his hair and the coat hanging on his shoulders.

There is no natural wind in the system hall, but the movement of people sometimes causes air movement, giving people the illusion of wind.

The Reverse God was silent for a while, and finally took out a lighter from his pocket, covered the cigarette and lit it.

The flickering flame of the lighter made the Reverse God’s ordinary eyebrows and eyes look peaceful and gentle. The cigarette flickered as he was inhaled, and the Reverse God exhaled a puff of smoke. The rising white smoke quickly covered up the tranquility and gentleness, leaving only a hazy and strong feeling of sinking.

The door to the balcony behind the Reverse God was pushed open at some point, and Spades, who was wrapped like a mummy, staggered and leaned against the Reverse God.

The Reverse God subconsciously wanted to put out the cigarette.

Spades interrupted the Reverse God’s actions and turned his head to look at the Reverse God: “What does smoke taste like?”

“Why are you suddenly curious about this?” the Reverse God found it funny, “Weren’t you never interested in it before?”

Of course, this also has something to do with the fact that the Reverse God almost never smokes in front of Spades.

“This is something from [reality].” Spades stared at the burning cigarette between the Reverse God’s index and middle fingers and asked inquiringly, “Will Bai Liu like this?”

The Reverse God suddenly smiled and patted Spades on the back of his head: “I taught you so many good things before, but you didn’t learn… Don’t learn to smoke, Bai Liu doesn’t like cigarettes.”

After saying that, the Reverse God put out his cigarette. He held the extinguished cigarette in his mouth boredly, glanced at Spades, and said teasingly: “I didn’t expect you to fall in love with Bai Liu at first sight.”

Spades was silent for a moment, then asked, “What is love at first sight?”

“When I first saw this person, I felt that I would spend my whole life with her.” The Reverse God had a light smile on his face, as if reminiscing about the past. “In fact, no matter whether I can spend my whole life with her in the end, the moment I saw her looking at me and smiling at me in the crowd was really a happy moment.”

“Can’t I fall in love with Bai Liu at first sight?” Spades looked at the Reverse God.

The Reverse God smiled and said, “It’s not that you can’t do it, it’s just that it’s quite strange.”

The Reverse God lazily held the cigarette in his mouth: “Because in my opinion, people like Bai Liu will never easily take the initiative to approach anyone until they die.”

“Maybe it’s you who can make him feel happy, so he took the initiative.”

Spades looked at the Reverse God and asked, “What is the happiness that Bai Liu feels?”

The Reverse God was silent for a while and said, “Are you happy?”

“To explain it in a way that you can understand, Spades—” The Reverse God held the extinguished cigarette in his mouth and turned his head with a smile, “When Bai Liu hugged you, besides sadness, you felt another emotion from Bai Liu.”

“How does it feel to be psychological counseled?” The Reverse God changed the subject and asked Spades.

Spades paused and said, “I don’t feel anything.”

Hearing this, the Reverse God laughed so hard that he choked and coughed a few times, and almost laughed the cigarette out of his mouth: “Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu both shut up for a long time after they were done.”

“It is actually very embarrassing to express your inner voice to others.”

“But we still have to listen to it to find out where the problem lies…”

Spades glanced at the Reverse God and asked, “Have you ever received any psychological counseling?”

The Reverse God calmed down. He subconsciously put his hand into his pocket and touched the lighter, as if he wanted to light a cigarette, but in the end he suppressed his anger and did not light it.

“I have.” The Reverse God replied to Spades with a sighing smile, “but unfortunately I didn’t finish it.”

Spades asked, “Why haven’t you finished it?”

The Reverse God smiled and said, “Because I have too many things in my heart, I can’t finish talking about them.”

Spades squinted at the Reverse God and said, “Why don’t you do it more often?”

The Reverse God leaned lazily on the balcony railing: “The purpose of psychological counseling is to let you know where your problem is. I know what my own problem is, so I didn’t continue to ask Liao Ke to counsel me.”

“And psychological counseling is not a panacea. Many times, even if you know that your psychological problem is this, when the time comes, you still have to suffer the damage that you deserve.”

Spades noticed that the Reverse God’s back was covered in bandages. He paused and asked, “Why do I still get hurt even though I know my own mental problems?”

The Reverse God took the extinguished cigarette from his lips, turned over and leaned his back against the fence, looking at Spades with a smile: “Because humans are such emotional animals, Spades.”

“Even if you know you will get hurt because of someone, you still can’t help but get close to them.”

The Reverse God smiled and said, “Just like the next time you have the opportunity to play games with Bai Liu, even if you know he can hurt you, you will go without hesitation, right?”

Spades answered quickly: “Yes.”

The Reverse God smiled again: “You are quite persistent.”

The wind-like flow coming from behind blew on Spades and the Reverse God. The Reverse God squinted his eyes and leaned against the wall for a while, then suddenly stood up and pushed open the balcony door.

“The whip I used to beat you two brats broke my heavy sword. I’m going to ask the weapon master to fix it. Remember to fix your own whip too.”

“The league is about to start, get ready.”

The Reverse God turned around and gave the Reverse God instructions with a smile, then he pushed open the door of the conference room, waved goodbye and left.

Inside the wandering circus.

Wang Shun was anxiously guarding outside Muke’s room, with Mu Sicheng squatting next to him and yawning.

“It’s been so long. Muke locked himself in this small warehouse as soon as he woke up. There has been no movement since then.” Wang Shun was so anxious that he almost broke into the room. When he saw Mu Sicheng squatting next to him and yawning, he was overwhelmed and didn’t know whether to laugh or cry. “How can you still be in the mood to sleep?”

Mu Sicheng was so sleepy that he sat cross-legged on the ground and stretched his body lazily: “Why are you in such a hurry? As long as the person is not dead, we can wait for Bai Liu to come back and deal with it.”

While stretching, Mu Sicheng looked at the three people walking towards him from the end of the corridor. His eyes suddenly widened and he suddenly jumped up: “Bai Liu is back!”

Bai Liu walked in front without looking around, while Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi walked on his left and right behind him.

When Bai Liu really approached Mu Sicheng, Mu Sicheng was stunned: “No, Bai Liu, how come you are injured? And your hair has grown longer?”

“Something happened. Let Jiayi explain it to you later.” Bai Liu answered Mu Sicheng casually, then looked at Wang Shun, “What happened?”

When Wang Shun got a questioning look from Bai Liu, he couldn’t help but stand at attention, holding up his notebook and reporting one thing at a time, as if he was performing an occupational disease.

“When Mu Sicheng went to attack the assassin sequence, he was sent to the Golden Dawn Union. He was attacked and trapped, but he escaped. After removing the restraining props, he is now fine.”

Mu Sicheng shouted beside him, interrupting Wang Shun: “What do you mean by attacked? I was ambushed! Amazing, okay?”

Bai Liu ignored Mu Sicheng’s explanation and looked at Wang Shun: “What’s going on with Muke?”

“When Muke brought Du Sanying into the game pool, he met a new member of the Deer Hunter team.” Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu with a serious expression, “It seems that the other party used a very special memory prop on Muke, which can transfer his own memories into Muke’s brain.”

“When Muke came back, he was in a coma, but after he woke up, he took the key to the warehouse and a lot of paper and pens and locked himself in the guild’s warehouse. He never came out, saying that he wanted to be alone and separate his memories from that clown.”

Wang Shun hesitated for a moment: “The guild’s warehouse is almost like a small dark room, and Muke’s mental state is not right. If he stays there for too long, something will definitely go wrong.”

“I wanted to break in, but I didn’t know Muke’s current state. If he was in the critical period of memory differentiation, forcing in might cause Muke to have a stronger mental shock reaction.”

Bai Liu looked at the tightly closed warehouse door thoughtfully, then he took a step forward and knocked three times slowly, then spoke in a calm voice, “Muke, I’m Bai Liu, can I come in?”

Muke’s trembling and broken voice came from the warehouse: “No!”

Inside the warehouse.

Muke knelt on the ground, hugged his head and curled up into a ball, his eyes blurred and he quickly muttered to himself: “Forget it, forget it, forget it all!”

There were more than a dozen used pens and a lot of scraps of paper covered with words scattered around Muke.

The handwriting on these scraps of paper was neat and fluent at first, but later became messy, as if the person who wrote these words could barely keep his mind clear at first, but later lost his mind and could only draw randomly.

On the front of each piece of paper were some strange-shaped tables, and on the back were many hysterically distorted clown mask patterns drawn on them.

These tables are all comparative tables, and the contents of the tables are very strange.

What is a comparison table? It is a comparison in the form of a table to distinguish the differences between two seemingly similar things, such as comparing bananas and plantains, and kiwifruit and gooseberry.

The comparison tables written by Muke do not compare things, but two people.

He was comparing the differences between [Bai Liu] and [Bai Six].

Muke’s comparison table was very detailed, listing appearance, life, and origin. He wrote down everything that happened to Bai Liu and Bai Six as if he was writing a chronicle, and then compared them one by one.

Muke murmured to himself: “They are different. Bai Liu and Bai Six are different.”

“Bai Liu saved me…” Muke scratched his hair, his eyes widened, “But Bai Six also saved me."

"Bai Liu is just an ordinary employee who was once bullied by me. He wouldn't do so many things to hurt others like Bai Six did…"

Various details and memories kept flashing back in Muke's mind.

Bai Liu smiled as the puppet master Zhang Kui was sent to his death, tricked Mu Sicheng to get his soul at the most critical moment of the game, and used Liu Jiayi's weakness to bring her into the team. Without a trace of emotion in his eyes, he hugged the bruised and dazed Tang Erda, and whispered softly, "I'm sorry for everything that happened to you."

[Give me your soul, and let me atone for the sins of those Bai Six.]

Bai Liu lifted his chin emotionlessly, lowered his eyes to look at Muke, and said softly:

[If you continue to be so useless, I will abandon you.]

[I don't want worthless followers, Muke.]

Bai Liu would do things that hurt others. He didn't do it at first just because he was an ordinary person trapped in an ordinary position, without identity or ability.

But if Bai Liu and Bai Six were given the same identity, status, capital and ability…

Muke bent his waist in pain and gasped: "…What is the difference between them?!"

The lazily smiling Bai Six in Daniel's memory and the casually smiling Bai Liu in Muke's memory gradually overlapped.

No!!

Muke's heart beat wildly and he started to cough.

The clown was a fanatical believer in Bai Liu. Even if that insane belief was only present in his memory, it was enough to drive Muke crazy.

Muke's memory was eclipsed by the clown's chaotic and colorful memory. Muke gradually forgot his parents, school, and the people he had interacted with since childhood. Everything was distorted into what Daniel remembered.

Muke felt like he was being swallowed by Daniel's memory.

His parents became Daniel's aloof and indifferent father, the school became a huge shooting range, and the people he interacted with changed from hypocritical and polite peers in the mall to people from the enemy party who beat him up.

Muke felt that his existence was being squeezed out bit by bit by Daniel.

Memory gradually turned Muke into another Daniel, and the only thing that belonged to him that remained in Muke's memory was Bai Liu.

If Bai Liu is Bai Six, then what is the difference between Muke and the clown who has the same memories?

Muke's heart was beating rapidly. He covered his arrhythmic heart and opened his mouth to gasp. His lips were purple. A feeling similar to colic forced Muke to wake up again.

He frantically searched for the tables on the ground, trying to find the difference between Bai Liu and Bai Six.

"They are different, totally different." Muke took a deep breath, his eyes red, and he tried to convince himself, "Bai Liu, Bai Liu has short hair, Bai Six has long hair, they look different."

"Muke." Bai Liu knocked again. His tone was still calm, but it changed from a negotiation to an order. "Don't make me say it a third time. Open the door."

Muke's shoulders trembled, and he subconsciously obeyed Bai Liu's order, staggered to his feet and opened the door.

Outside the door, the long-haired Bai Liu looked at Muke with no expression on his face: "Do you still recognize me?"

Muke stared at Bai Liu's long hair almost in a daze, and his hands trembled uncontrollably as he opened the door.

In an instant, all the memories that could not be forgotten were mixed together.

Muke slowly knelt on the ground, covering his twisted and hideous face. The pain from his rapidly beating heart forced Muke to bend over and gasp for breath, his breathing so rapid that he was about to retch.

Bai Liu calmly glanced at Muke who was curled up on the ground, walked into the warehouse, closed the door, then squatted on one knee, picked up a few pieces of scraps of paper on the ground and looked at them.

“So you were trying to differentiate between me and Bai Six.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes, “… Now that it has come to this, the rest of the memory has been devoured, and only my existence remains.”

Bai Liu found an abandoned step in the warehouse and sat down. He clasped his hands in front of him, leaned forward and helped Muke, who was lying on the ground, up.

Muke looked up at Bai Liu in a trance, and couldn’t help revealing a clown-like crazy smile on his face. His expression twitched as if in a spasm, but the next second Muke raised his hand in panic to cover it up, and his voice was filled with tears: “Don’t look at me like this! This is not me!”

“Is it because your memory is so good that you have no way of forgetting the memories that the other party instilled in you?” Bai Liu asked in a calm tone without being affected by Muke’s emotions.

Muke lowered his head like a child who had done something wrong: “Yes.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes: “I can indeed find a way to erase this memory for you, but if it is just erased, you will be afraid when you meet the clown again, right?”

“After all, even if it was erased, you were defeated by his memory. You escaped his memory.”

Muke’s shoulders trembled, he bit his lower lip and said nothing.

“Why was he devoured by the clown’s memory?” Bai Liu asked, “Doesn’t Muke have any meaning for his own existence?”

Muke still didn’t say anything.

Bai Liu continued: “When a person has his own meaning of existence, knows what he is and why he lives, it is difficult for the existence of another person to erase his meaning."

"No matter how much that person's presence affects you, and no matter how similar they look to you, they are not the same person as you."

Bai Liu handed the scraps of paper filled with comparison tables to Muke, who was hanging his head, and said calmly: "Just like me and Bai Six."

Muke looked up in surprise.

Bai Liu looked at Muke: "Muke, don't you have any meaning for your existence? Friends, family, lover, career, material things, etc.?"

Muke hesitated for a long time, then slowly lowered his shoulders, became less nervous, and narrated absentmindedly:

"Because of my illness, I have had few friends since I was a child. They are all afraid of hurting me, and making friends with me is a very dangerous thing. My parents have always been very good to me and have tried their best to treat me and meet all my needs, but the doctor said a long time ago that I probably wouldn't live long…"

Muke was silent for a while and said, "So the way they looked at me was as if they were waiting for me to die."

"I have never liked anyone. I feel like they can live for a long time, but they are from two different worlds than me."

Muke slowly clenched his fists: "…I'm jealous of those healthy people who can live a long life, so I can't like them."

"Material and career…" Muke paused, "Everyone is very kind to dying people, so they gave them to me without hesitation."

Muke was silent for a long time, tears rolling down his red eyes. He raised his hand to wipe them away, and suddenly burst into laughter while crying:

"…For someone who knows his own death from birth, it seems that there is no meaning in his existence."

Bai Liu leaned on the steps, dragging his leg and half closing his eyes: "If we use stocks as an analogy, no one is willing to invest their feelings in a stock like you that is destined to lose money because it will die soon."

"You are a worthless short stock, but in this situation, you met me who is willing to believe in and invest in you, so you clung to me tightly as if you had grabbed the last straw. You exist by my affirmation, you get emotional feedback from me, and you find the value of your own existence."

Bai Liu looked at Muke calmly: "And in this respect, you are the same as the clown who exists with the affirmation of Bai Six. So when you can't distinguish between me and Bai Liu, it's difficult for you to defend yourself and Daniel, is that right?"

Muke responded hoarsely: "Yes."

"Look up at me, Muke." Bai Liu said in an imperative tone, "Look at me and tell me what I have in common with Bai Six."

Muke subconsciously obeyed Bai Liu's order, looked up at Bai Liu, and said in a trembling voice: "You both like money."

Bai Liu hummed lightly.

"Use whatever means necessary to achieve your goals."

"Very good at games."

"…"

"Now you both have long hair."

Muke stated tremblingly, his vision blurred and he felt himself gradually sinking into a confused mind, unable to tell the difference between the real long-haired Bai Liu in front of him and the Bai Six in Daniel's memory.

"Long hair?" Bai Liu glanced at Muke thoughtfully, and suddenly smiled, "I remember that your skill weapon can be taken out in the central hall."

Although Muke didn't know what Bai Liu was going to do, he nodded and took out his dagger from the panel.

"Come here." Bai Liu lowered his eyes and ordered.

Muke went over with a dagger.

Bai Liu, with no expression on his face, quickly grasped Muke's hand with his left hand, and put his right hand around his neck to hold back his long hair that fell to his waist. Then, holding Muke's hand and the dagger in his hand, Bai Liu slashed upwards without any pause.

The long hair was cut off neatly.

Muke held the dagger that cut off Bai Liu's long hair with a blank expression.

"I don't have long hair anymore." Bai Liu raised his eyes, scattered strands of hair falling on his shoulders, "Muke, remember, if you choose to exist for Bai Liu, then never confuse me with Bai Six."

"Because it's me who has invested emotions and recognition in you, not Bai Six."

Bai Liu said calmly: "I don't like the idea of making investments myself and having others receive the appreciation of my assets for me."

"You are far more valuable than you think, Muke."

Muke knelt on the ground as if stunned, holding Bai Liu's severed hair in both hands, and the memories of Daniel in his mind faded quickly.

…Bai Liu and Bai Six are different.

Bai Six will abandon his worthless followers.

But Bai Liu won't.

The true God will give new value to incompetent believers.

Bai Liu stood up with the help of a bracket. He found a rubber band from somewhere in the warehouse and stretched it with three fingers. With his other hand, he combed his skin from the back of his neck upwards, gathered his messy black hair into a bunch, and with a nonchalant look, tied it into a ponytail that was neither too high nor too low.

Some dishonest strands of hair hung on both sides of his forehead.

Bai Liu pushed open the door of the warehouse and turned his head in the light that rushed in. His eyes were dull, and the backlight from his hair on his forehead made it difficult to see clearly. His shirt was covered with bloodstains that had not yet dried.

“Muke, get yourself in a good mental state and come out for the meeting. The league is about to start.”

Muke gritted his teeth and stopped Bai Liu who was about to leave: “…But I can’t completely get rid of the influence of Daniel’s memory on me for the time being! Is this okay?”

He asked in a low voice, almost in panic: “Don’t you need to… replace me during the league?”

“Will this influence shake the meaning of your existence for me?” Bai Liu asked.

Muke was startled and immediately replied: “Absolutely not!”

Bai Liu retracted his gaze, turned around, pushed the door open and left without looking back: “Anything that cannot shake the meaning of your existence will eventually be transformed into the value of your existence, but there will be an unstable process in the middle.”

“I personally don’t hate this process.”

The door was closed. Muke sat quietly in the warehouse, holding Bai Liu’s long hair that he had cut off without hesitation, and muttered to himself, repeating Bai Liu’s words: “…anything that cannot shake the meaning of my existence can be transformed into an increase in my value…”

“As long as Daniel’s memory can’t devour me…” Muke looked at the long hair in his hands with trembling pupils, “I can find all the memories about the league in it, and then make myself stronger!”

Muke covered his heart, which was beating wildly and achingly, with his long hair, and laughed chokingly with tears.

The group walked towards the Wandering Circus meeting room.

Wang Shun followed behind Bai Liu, and from time to time he looked back worriedly at the small warehouse where MuKe was, whose door had not yet been opened: “MuKe, are you really okay? It’s hard to regain consciousness after being forced to merge memories.”

“If you can’t handle it, I’ll take over. First, let me report what happened recently.”

Wang Shun reluctantly felt relieved. He held a pile of folders, stepped forward and opened the door of the conference room for Bai Liu.

Bai Liu bowed his head slightly to express his gratitude politely.

Wang Shun placed the documents on the long table in the conference room and pulled out the main seat for Bai Liu to sit down.

Liu Jiayi, Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng sat on both sides of the long table. Wang Shun walked to the end of the long table and opened his system panel, calling up a huge floating panel. Wang Shun reported recent major events to Bai Liu as if he was playing a PPT (PowerPoint).

“First, let me emphasize the league’s operating rules.”

“The league is divided into pre-season, mid-season, and playoffs.”

“The pre-season is the league we are about to participate in. The main participating teams are some new teams with no foundation and some old teams that are not very strong. The main confrontation mechanism is random confrontation. You play against the same team as the enemy in the next game. If you win, you advance. If you lose, you are eliminated directly.”

“The top two teams that advance to the finals of the pre-season, that is, the champion and runner-up, can directly enter the post-season challenge. Except for these two teams, all other pre-season teams are eliminated."

Wang Shun clicked on the system panel:

"The mid-season tournament is a round-robin points system."

"The participating teams of the mid-season tournament are the top 30 teams in last year's league rankings and the last two teams remaining from last year's pre-season, a total of 32 teams."

"There are 496 games in total in the mid-season tournament. Each team will play a round with 31 other teams except itself. Each round includes singles, doubles, and team matches."

"Each win in a singles match earns 1 point, each win in a doubles match earns 3 points, and each win in a team match earns 8 points."

"After 496 games, the top eight teams with the highest accumulated points among the 32 teams will enter the playoffs. The two teams with the lowest accumulated points will be disqualified from participating in next year's mid-season tournament, and their qualifications will be given to the two teams that won the final pre-season games this year."

Wang Shun gave an example:

"For example, last year's first place in the pre-season was the Killer Sequence, so this year they don't have to start from the pre-season, but can directly enter the mid-season game. The last two teams eliminated from the mid-season game last year will have to start from the pre-season."

Wang Shun's brows turned serious:

"The following is the key work I will report today, which is also the serious situation you will face as you enter the pre-season."

"The overall combat quality and combat level of the pre-season teams are not high, but there are two teams that you must be vigilant against. They are the two teams that were eliminated from the mid-season tournament last year."

"One of these two teams is called Russell Cemetery, and the other is called Furious Lambs."

Wang Shun clicked it, and the PPT turned to another page, on which a gloomy collective cemetery logo appeared.

“The Mass Cemetery is the logo of Russell Cemetery. They ranked 12th the year before last, and ranked 8th in the mid-season last year, making it to the playoffs. Then they were drawn by Spades in the Challenger League and became the first team to face the Challenger League.”

Wang Shun looked at everyone and slowly exhaled:

“I believe we can all guess the result of this challenge. The Killer Sequence won, but the Killer Sequence paid a heavy price for this victory. This is also the main reason why I think they poached the Reverse God as their tactician this year.”

“In this match against Russell Cemetery, one of the Killer Sequence members died, and Spades was seriously injured and on the verge of death. It was a very tragic victory.”

Mu Sicheng felt dizzy after hearing this: “That’s not right. Russell Cemetery made it to the top eight last year and participated in the playoffs. So they won’t be eliminated from the mid-season tournament, right?”

“Why did you drop the pre-season to play against us this year?”

Wang Shun looked at the collective cemetery logo on the panel with complicated eyes: “…This is a long story.”

“The normal league process is like this. The mid-season game selects eight teams with high points to enter the playoffs. The pre-season game selects the champion and runner-up. The champion and runner-up of the pre-season game randomly select two teams from these eight teams that enter the playoffs to compete against each other.”

“If the champion and runner-up of the pre-season win, they can replace the two drawn teams and enter the playoffs. If the champion and runner-up lose, these eight teams will proceed to the playoffs normally.”

“So the challenge tournament is generally called ‘Ten into Eight’. Some players use a more general term, such as ‘Sixteen into Eight’.”

“The two teams that lost in the challenge match will have to face off in the final to compete for the ninth and tenth places in the league.”

“After losing to the Killer Sequence, Russell Cemetery entered the qualifying match for the top 90. However, in this qualifying match, the Russell Cemetery tactician lost his balance and made mistakes, resulting in the team being wiped out."

The whole audience was silent.

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but glance towards Bai Liu.

…The tactician's influence on the entire team is really huge.

"After being wiped out, Russell Cemetery got the tenth place ranking. Logically, they could have participated in the mid-season tournament normally this year, but they gave up this ranking and the qualification to directly participate in the mid-season tournament this year, and chose to start all over again from the pre-season."

Wang Shun raised his hand and clicked the panel again, and the situation introduction of the Russell Cemetery team appeared on the PPT.

"Russell Cemetery, the nickname that circulated among players is 'Double Cannon Team'. The reason for this nickname is that this team will directly abandon the single and double matches as soon as they enter the game, firing two blanks and only playing the team match."

"Because they gave up the singles and doubles competitions and lacked outstanding individual performance, this team did not produce any star players." Wang Shun clicked on the panel and continued, "In other words, in Russell Cemetery, players are not important at all."

"This is the number of players who have died in the league over the years."

Mu Sicheng looked at the numbers and gasped, "Last year, Russell played in the mid-season tournament and more than 80 players died?!"

"That's right." Wang Shun narrated calmly, "In 31 games, Russell lost 82 players, an average of 264 players died per game, and this was even after they gave up singles and doubles games."

"Why did so many people die?!" Mu Sicheng was really shocked.

Bai Liu looked at the introduction of Russell Cemetery and said, "The core strategy of Russell Cemetery is to use skills reasonably according to the characteristics of other guilds, right?"

Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu and said, “Yes, Russell Cemetery prepares more than 500 reserve team members every year.”

Bai Liu seemed to understand something: “Most of these players are new, right?”

Wang Shun nodded. “That’s right. Most of these reserve players have never participated in the league. Even in the team match against the Killer Sequence, the players in Russell Cemetery were basically pure rookies.”

Mu Sicheng turned around and looked at Bai Liu, his head full of question marks: “What does this mean? How did you know?”

“A large number of new players died, high-frequency rotation, giving up single and double competitions, not training star players, and concentrating on team competitions.” Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng, “This is obviously a tactic based on sacrificing players.”

Mu Sicheng was getting more confused: “What tactics?”

“Let me explain it this way.” Bai Liu picked up a piece of paper and placed it between himself and Mu Sicheng, and wrote a keyword on it: [Skill].

“Among each batch of new players, the first player to clear the game will gain a skill, or more precisely, a skill identity.”

Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at Mu Sicheng: “For example, mine is [Poor Wanderer], yours is [Capuchin Monkey Thief], and Captain Tang’s is [Withered Rose Hunter].”

“This identity is mainly generated based on the player’s core desires. Different players have different desires, so the generated skill identities are also different, and the derived skills are therefore very different.”

“But also for this reason, very high-quality skills with great growth potential and suitable for use in the game are not the majority. Most of the skills generated by players are either not suitable for use in the game, or have no growth potential, or have very limited use or strange use methods.”

“There are very few players who possess all three qualities, which also means that once a good skill player appears, he will be strongly sought after by the big guilds.”

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng and said with a half-smile: “For example, the King’s Guild’s pursuit of you.”

“Don’t mention this.” Mu Sicheng waved his hand speechlessly to interrupt Bai Liu’s ridicule, “But what does this have to do with the league’s death and injury rate as high as Russell Cemetery?”

“It does matter.” Bai Liu smiled. “As a guild that is not very big, not ranked high, has no star players, and is not very powerful, Russell Cemetery has no competitive advantage when competing for new players with high-quality skills. The players it can recruit are all players with lower skills.”

“How can we win the league with these inferior players?” Bai Liu asked slowly.

Mu Sicheng was stunned.

“Since Russell Cemetery could not win in terms of [quality], they put a lot of effort into [quantity].” Bai Liu lowered his eyes and wrote the word [targeted] on the paper.

Mu Sicheng rubbed the goose bumps on his arms, stretched out his hand and raised five fingers in astonishment: “But no matter how many reserve players they prepare, they can’t use the human wave tactics. There are only five players who can play!”

“Five newcomers, with second-level skills, and they’re playing against a top-tier guild… Now I can understand why the guild has a high mortality rate in the league. It would be strange if no one died.” Mu Sicheng asked in confusion, “But this operation, no matter how you think about it, there’s no way it can win, right?”

Wang Shun answered Mu Sicheng’s question: “On the contrary, although the team competition in Russell Cemetery has a high mortality rate, the winning rate is also very high.”

After saying that, Wang Shun lowered his head and clicked the panel, and a new page appeared on the PPT:

“From the data I got, I can see that in last year’s mid-season tournament, excluding the single and double matches that Russell Cemetery voluntarily gave up, their win rate in the 31 team matches they actually played was as high as 9355, and they only lost two games."

Wang Shun continued to click: "In the two games that Russell Cemetery lost, one was against the King's Guild, and the tactician was Hearts. The other was against the Deer Hunter, and the tactician was the Reverse God from the Killer Sequence."

Mu Sicheng looked at the result and exclaimed in astonishment: "This winning rate is too outrageous!"

Chapter End Notes

> Round-robin points system :
> Teams compete against each other in a round-robin format, where every team plays against every other team at least once. Points are awarded based on match results (e.g., win in a singles match = 1 point, win in a doubles match = 3 points, win in a team match = 8 points, and a loss = 0 point). The standings are determined by the total points accumulated, and the top teams may advance to the next stage or win the tournament, depending on the rules.

“How did they do that?!” Mu Sicheng was completely confused.

Bai Liu said calmly: “Intelligence and targeted skills screening.”

“I also tend to agree with this answer.” Wang Shun nodded and agreed with Bai Liu’s statement, “Russell Cemetery has collected a large number of new players with low skills, and then sent out a team of new players with skills that can suppress the opponent according to the different skills of the members of each guild team they are fighting against.”

Wang Shun continued, “This tactic was demonstrated when Russell Cemetery fought against multiple guild teams. Their players’ skills consciously targeted the enemy’s ace players.”

“The most obvious one is the one in Russell Cemetery vs. Killer Sequence Challenge.”

Wang Shun clicked on the panel and a short video appeared on it.

The character in the short video was obviously Spades trapped in the mud. Wang Shun explained:

“In this game, the skill of the Russell Cemetery Tactician is to swallow an enemy player into a mud, restricting their movement speed and reducing their attack damage. However, in return, one of our own players must sacrifice himself to activate this skill.”

“This skill is useless in daily games and normal leagues.”

“In the game, no team member would be willing to sacrifice themselves just to trap a monster. In the league, no guild would sacrifice the players they have worked so hard to train just to block the movement of an opponent’s player.”

Wang Shun turned his head and looked at Spades who was trapped in the panel: “But this seemingly useless skill is very effective when facing Spades who is used to leaving the team and acting alone, and uses fast movement and fast attack as his main killer moves.”

“After trapping Spades, the fierce offensive rhythm of the Killer Sequence was instantly interrupted. One day later, one member of the Killer Sequence was killed.”

Wang Shun turned his head and looked at Mu Sicheng: “If it wasn’t for Spades’ final breakthrough, last year’s first place would not have been the Killer Sequence.”

Mu Sicheng couldn’t believe it: “With this method, can we have a 93% chance of winning?!”

“It is precisely because of this method that we can have such a high winning rate.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the paper. “Gather a large number of new players, and then select the skills that just restrain the enemy from a large number of players. Change the team as the enemy rotates. Each team has been carefully selected to be consumables, and they are replaced when they die.”

“Very good tactics.” Bai Liu commented calmly.

Wang Shun sighed deeply: “This tactic is very cruel, but cruel tactics are often effective in this game. I haven’t thought of a good solution yet.”

“How come there is no solution?!” Mu Sicheng was very unconvinced, “They developed tactics against us, and we can also develop tactics against them!”

Liu Jiayi, who had been silent, suddenly said, “It can’t be done.”

Mu Sicheng glanced over and said, “Why can’t they do it? They are just ordinary newcomers with ordinary skills. As long as we know the information about them…”

“The problem is that it’s hard to know.” Liu Jiayi looked directly at Mu Sicheng. “Russell Cemetery has 500 to 1,000 reserve players. In order to reduce the exposure of these players, Russell Cemetery gave up training star players and gave up single and double competitions. Basically, every player has no way to find game videos that can be entered into the small TV library.”

“Under such circumstances, it is difficult to obtain the skills intelligence of so many ordinary newcomers.”

Mu Sicheng turned his head to look at Wang Shun: “We can let Wang Shun sneak in, and then use his skills to obtain the other party’s intelligence…”

Liu Jiayi interrupted Mu Sicheng coldly: “Do you think the King’s Guild has never tried it?”

“First of all, even if Wang Shun could sneak into Russell Cemetery and obtain the intelligence of these hundreds of people without being discovered, it would be difficult to determine which of these hundreds of people’s new skills are targeted at our team based on the intelligence obtained from Wang Shun alone.”

“Secondly, Mu Sicheng, do you know how many permutations there would be if hundreds or thousands of people were to perform the permutations of five?”

“Tens of thousands.” Before Mu Sicheng could answer, Liu Jiayi gave the answer directly, “These hundreds of people can form tens of thousands of team combinations, and there are tens of thousands of possibilities for how their skills will look after being assembled and combined.”

Liu Jiayi looked directly at Mu Sicheng: “We are in the light, and they are in the dark. There are only five of us, and they have hundreds of newcomers who have hardly been exposed.”

“Besides, because of our excellent skills, our exposure rate is not low. Except for Tang Erda, almost everyone has several game videos that have been included in the small TV library.”

“We can’t do what they do and completely abandon our star players, because we need the audience’s support to get a golden ticket to immortality, so our exposure will become higher and higher in the future, and it will be easy for them to obtain intelligence on us.”

“During last year’s mid-season tournament, even the Kings Guild didn’t know which players Russell Cemetery would send out to compete until the moment they took the court.”

Mu Sicheng slowly leaned over the table after hearing this, his eyes wide open: “…How can we play this? Isn’t this too shameless?”

Suddenly, Mu Sicheng straightened up again and slammed the table. “No! Russell Cemetery is using up so many of these reserve players and sending them to die. These reserve players definitely don’t want that!”

“We can start from this aspect!” Mu Sicheng said confidently, looking at Bai Liu with shining eyes, “Bai Liu, it’s time for you to play your role. With your eloquence, you can definitely persuade these reserve members to join our Wandering Circus Guild!"

For a moment, Bai Liu, Wang Shun, and Liu Jiayi all looked at Mu Sicheng with a very friendly expression.

"Actually," Wang Shun said tactfully, "I think you don't need to be so active in tactical discussions, God Mu."

Mu Sicheng took a while to react, and after realizing what Wang Shun meant, he lay down on the table again in frustration: "…Did I say something wrong again?"

"It's impossible that this group of reserve players know that they are going to be used as cannon fodder, yet they are still willing to participate in the league for this Russell Cemetery?" Mu Sicheng put his head on the table and looked at Wang Shun.

Wang Shun sighed with mixed feelings: "That's true."

Mu Sicheng was really confused now: "Why?"

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes and said speechlessly: "Idiot, do you know why the Russell Cemetery is called the Russell Cemetery?"

Mu Sicheng paused for a moment, then said in disbelief: "Fuck, no way? Cemetery? Is that what I thought it meant?"

"Bingo, yes, that's what you think." Liu Jiayi snapped her fingers. "New players who join this guild know what kind of guild they have entered, and they also know that they are likely to be sacrificed by the guild."

"They knew they were walking into a public cemetery and were prepared to become one."

Mu Sicheng leaned back in his chair, his eyes out of focus: "…I can't understand why they would do this."

"God Mu, you rarely pay attention to this news because you don't like the guild." Wang Shun explained, "Russell Cemetery is essentially an escape-type guild, accepting a large number of new players of the horror game."

"Some new players are very averse to the game and want to escape from it, so the president of Russell Cemetery stepped forward and established this collective cemetery association."

"He promised these players that you can deposit your death here in Russell Cemetery. When the day comes when Russell Cemetery wins, I will make a wish to revive you from the cemetery and distribute the points to you, satisfying your desires and allowing you to leave the game."

Mu Sicheng thought it was ridiculous: "How could anyone believe this?"

Wang Shun nodded: "Many players believe it. Apart from the high-level skilled new players who were screened out by the big guilds, a considerable number of skilled players of varying quality went to Russell Cemetery."

Mu Sicheng was speechless: "What if Russell Cemetery can't win the championship at all? Wouldn't they have died in vain?"

Liu Jiayi kicked Mu Sicheng and raised her chin to signal him to take a look at the winning rate on the PPT.

Mu Sicheng was speechless again, but he still felt something was wrong: "Even if Russell can win, can these people ensure that the guild leader can fulfill his promise?"

Liu Jiayi couldn't help but show a "you are such a fool" expression to Mu Sicheng again: "Do you know what the slogan of Russell Cemetery is?"

Mu Sicheng looked at Liu Jiayi: "What is it?"

Liu Jiayi said: "May we die in hope."

"These new players who chose to join Russell Cemetery were the ones left behind by the big guilds. They had high hopes for their skills at the beginning and thought they could survive by relying on their skills. But later on, they found that their skills were not worth mentioning at all and no one cared about them. Their self-value system collapsed."

Liu Jiayi paused for a moment and continued, "In the later stages, these newcomers no longer believed they could survive in the game on their own. They lived in fear, thinking they would die sooner or later. Rather than being tortured to death in a horror game, they would rather choose a way to die with hope."

“In fact, many people don’t expect the president of Russell Cemetery to fulfill his promise. They just want to die in peace.”

Wang Shun, who was standing by, sighed as he listened: “God Mu, you and Bai Liu may not pay much attention to this kind of guild, because you are both high-level skilled players, and this kind of guild is the last resort for low-level skilled players.”

“I always find it amazing that such a guild formed by low-skilled players can actually have such great destructive power in the end.” Liu Jiayi recalled, “Although Hearts won last year, it was not a smooth game.”

Bai Liu turned his head to look at Liu Jiayi: “How did Hearts win Russell Cemetery last year?”

Liu Jiayi thought for a moment and replied, “The people in Russell Cemetery have no way to deal with Hearts. Her skills involve appearance change and charm. It is difficult to find a player who can resist her skills.”

“But the rest of the team was in a tight spot.”

“Hearts fought a war of attrition, slowly grinding away, and fighting very hard, but the opponent was a newcomer and his board was not as good as Hearts’, so in the end she still won.”

Bai Liu turned to look at Wang Shun: “How did the Reverse God beat this team last year?”

Wang Shun and Liu Jiayi fell silent at the same time.

After a while, Wang Shun said, “I didn’t see it clearly.”

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows: “Didn’t you see clearly?”

“One minute after the game started,” Wang Shun said with a wry smile, “The tactician from Russell Cemetery surrendered to the Reverse God.”

Reality

“It is still unknown why Russell Cemetery gave up the qualification for the mid-season game, but in short, this team is our number one enemy in the pre-season.”

Wang Shun clicked on the panel, and a bloody lamb head popped up on the PPT:

“In addition to Russell Cemetery, another team we need to focus on is the Fanatic Lambs, which was the last place in the mid-season tournament last year.”

“This team was the first in the pre-season two years ago. In the challenge match, they faced Deer Hunter, and their tactician was still the Reverse God. As expected, Fanatic Lambs lost the challenge match, but still successfully entered the mid-season match last year.”

Wang Shun raised his head and said, “The reason why I specifically mentioned this game is because in this game, the Reverse God, a famous moderate tactician, killed someone for the first time in the game. He killed the opponent’s tactician.”

“However, since this tactician was a popular player that year and had a golden medal of immunity from death, he is still the tactician of the Furious Lambs and continues to be active on the field.”

“During the Fanatic Lambs Challenge, all the members of the Deer Hunters played with injuries, including the Reverse God. Later, I checked and found that their injuries were not in the game, but injuries brought in from reality.”

“I found that as long as the opponent of the Fanatic Lambs is a very strong or reputable team, the players of this team will get into trouble in real life and participate in the competition with injuries.”

“There were even a few times when the core players of the opponents of the Furious Lambs died on the eve of the competition.”

Wang Shun said very seriously: “So I made a guess. There is an information collector with similar skills to mine in this fanatical lamb. He can get the player’s exact address information in reality through some means, and then attack the opponent in reality."

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but sighed: "How shameless, if you can't beat him, just fight him in real life."

"It's really mean, but in real life you are not as powerful as you are in the game. You are just ordinary people." Wang Shun emphasized, "You are already a very outstanding pre-season team. You must pay attention to protecting your own safety in real life."

"Especially Bai Liu."

Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu: "Mu Sicheng is a registered college student, Liu Jiayi has just experienced a major incident and is under multiple surveillance, Captain Tang has strong self-protection capabilities, MuKe's family is an old money family, and only you."

"You are now a marginalized person in society."

Everyone's eyes turned to Bai Liu.

"I'm talking to Bai Liu." Mu Sicheng came over and held Bai Liu's shoulders. "Do you want to live in my dormitory?"

Tang Erda frowned: "The security function of the university dormitory is not good enough, Bai Liu, your small rental house is not safe. I have a house near the base, why don't you move in with me…"

"It's not okay to live near the base. If something happens to your base, you can blame him." Liu Jiayi rejected Tang Erda's proposal. She looked at Bai Liu and said, "I think you can talk to MuKe and live with him. It's convenient for money and transportation."

Bai Liu thought: "It is indeed inconvenient to live alone."

Several people came over at the same time and looked directly at Bai Liu: "Who do you live with?"

Bai Liu smiled: "My current idea is to bring Du Sanying over to live with me."

Several people were silent for a while, and then Mu Sicheng was the first to ask a question: "Huh??"

After the meeting, Bai Liu logged out of the game from his rental house.

He took off his blood-stained white shirt and threw it into the laundry basket, unbuckled his belt, took off his pants and threw them into the laundry basket too.

Bai Liu walked into the bathroom naked, turned on the shower, unhooked his hair tie, closed his eyes and tilted his head back to let the warm water wash over his face, then reached out to take the shampoo next to the mirror.

The mirror was covered with water vapor, dimly reflecting Bai Liu's upper body. Bai Liu paused as he looked at his own hazy reflection in the mirror.

Compared to when he first entered the game, his body had undergone some visible changes.

Bai Liu never orders takeout or milk tea after work because they are too expensive.

He seldom participated in team-building activities, dinners or social events. At most, he would go to Heluyi Station with coupons every month to dine at a restaurant. He usually ate the cheapest eight-yuan set meal of one meat and one vegetable at the company, and the meat dish also included scrambled eggs with tomatoes.

From childhood to adolescence and then to adulthood, Bai Liu had never experienced a stage of food abundance. Due to insufficient intake, he always seemed to be the most backward in development among the crowd.

When Bai Liu was a child, he was the shortest among his peers. When he reached adolescence, he was the thinnest in his class. After he became an adult, he almost had trouble finding a job because of his height.

This year, Bai Liu is 24 years old. He looks at himself in the mirror and feels like…

He grew a little taller.

Tang Erda had been beating Bai Liu intensively for more than a month, and the changes brought to Bai Liu's body were more than that.

Bai Liu's skin color was originally pale due to working in the office without seeing the sun for years, but now it has a bit of redness. His shoulders, neck, waist and back are stretched backwards, and his originally skinny limbs and abdomen now have muscle lines.

Especially the shoulders, back and abdomen, a thin layer of muscle wrapped around Bai Liu's body, making these parts look a lot stronger.

Although he still doesn't have the neatly trained six-pack abs like Tang Erda, Bai Liu has shallow depressions on both sides of his rectus abdominis. It feels like if he exercises more, he will soon see formed abdominal muscles.

Mr. Bai Liu, who is nearly 25 years old, feels strangely that he looks as if he has grown older.

While drying his body after taking a shower, Bai Liu suddenly paused.

He felt the whip marks left by Spades on his back.

But there was only a brief pause, and Bai Liu put on his clothes as if he had not touched anything, still wearing a white shirt and suit pants – these were the only two types of clothes in his closet.

Bai Liu was going to the sanatorium to pick up Du Sanying later. In order to look more formal, Bai Liu put on a rarely worn tie.

After going to the sanatorium to go through a bunch of procedures and having Du Sanying sign them one by one, Bai Liu successfully took Du Sanying out amid the questioning and horrified eyes of the person in charge.

"I'm sorry, please pick me up." Du Sanying scratched his head embarrassedly, "Because I was diagnosed as having no personal mobility, it's very troublesome to pick me up from the sanatorium. Did Bai Liu find someone to help?"

Bai Liu hummed and took the suitcase from Du Sanying: "Captain Tang helped me find someone."

Actually, it was Su Yang who helped.

Su Yang felt that it would not be good for either Du Sanying or the sanatorium for the children who would cause harm to people around them to stay in the sanatorium.

Originally, Su Yang was planning to apply to send Du Sanying to a training camp near the base, but after Bai Liu took the initiative to express his willingness to take care of Du Sanying, Su Yang was surprised and simply helped to get the matter done.

Du Sanying followed Bai Liu with his head down, occasionally stealing a glance at the suitcase in Bai Liu's hand.

Bai Liu walked in front and said without looking back: "If you have any questions, just ask directly."

Du Sanying hesitated for a while before asking in a low voice: "…If I live with you, will it really not affect you?"

"I'd better live alone in isolation…" Du Sanying's voice became very weak.

Bai Liu pushed the suitcase and continued to move forward, saying calmly: "Do you want to live alone?"

Du Sanying lowered his head and looked at the corner of his clothes: "I have lived alone since junior high school. The people who lived with me…whether they were friends, parents, or my sister, something happened to them later."

"Yes." Bai Liu said calmly, "I have read your information and I know all these things."

"So you want to live alone?"

Du Sanying shrank his head and said in a low voice, "I don't want to."

Bai Liu dragged the suitcase and turned around to glance at Du Sanying: "You living with me won't hurt me, you can help me, you don't want to live alone, I can solve all the problems you worry about, so do you have any other questions?"

Du Sanying straightened his chest with red eyes, and his voice suddenly became louder: "No, no more!"

"Thank you Mr. Bai Liu for arranging for me to live with you!"

"Oh no!" Du Sanying suddenly slapped his head and asked nervously, "I have another question, Mr. Bai Liu, can you keep a parrot at home?"

Bai Liu thought for a moment and said, "It should be possible. The landlord didn't say no."

Du Sanying's eyes widened: "Mr. Bai Liu, do you live in a rental house?"

Bai Liu hummed: "Don't you like the rental house?"

Du Sanying waved his hands hastily: "No, no! I also rented a house when I was in junior high school, but I felt that people like Mr. Bai Liu…"

Du Sanying racked his brains to describe how he felt when he heard that Bai Liu lived in a rental house: "Living in a rental house is weird."

Bai Liu glanced at Du Sanying and asked, "What's so strange?"

"It's not strange…" Du Sanying changed the way he asked, "Why does Mr. Bai Liu want to live in a rental house?"

Bai Liu answered naturally: "Because I can't afford to buy a house, I rent one."

Du Sanying was shocked: "Isn't Mr. Bai Liu very rich?"

"I'm a laid-off worker and don't have much money." Bai Liu squinted at Du Sanying, "Although I saved some money in the game later, I would feel unhappy if I used it to buy a house."

Du Sanying asked curiously: "Why?"

Bai Liu said: "Because I don't like to spend money on highly premium products."

Du Sanying said "oh" as if he understood what was said, then looked at the suitcase in Bai Liu's hand and said, "Mr. Bai Liu, let me take it myself."

"Mr. Bai Liu will take a taxi home later." Du Sanying asked cautiously, "I don't like taking a taxi. Can I walk back by myself?"

Bai Liu asked calmly, "Is it because you've experienced a lot of traffic accidents?"

Du Sanying nodded, his expression downcast again: "…I'm prone to accidents when I'm in a car, and drivers who encounter me are unlucky, so I usually walk."

"I don't like taking taxis either. Let me walk back with you." Bai Liu said.

Du Sanying's eyes first lit up, and then they couldn't help but turn into wavy eyes, and he looked at Bai Liu with tears in his eyes: "Woo woo, Mr. Bai Liu, please take care of yourself."

Bai Liu glanced at Du Sanying and said, "I really don't like taking taxis because they are too expensive."

Du Sanying: "…"

Bai Liu said that he would not take a taxi and would walk with Du Sanying, so he really accompanied him all the way. On the way back, Du Sanying consciously walked on the small paths with few people, and became very nervous when he had the slightest contact with others.

Because of this, Bai Liu and his friend walked along older streets with very old stalls on the side of the streets.

For example, Du Sanying saw a height and weight measuring machine. An old man was sitting next to it with a sign at his feet that read "One dollar for three measurements."

"It's really cheap." Du Sanying said to Bai Liu, "I saw it was only one dollar per time before."

So Bai Liu suddenly stopped in front of the stall.

Du Sanying reacted for a while, then asked in surprise: "Mr. Bai Liu, do you want to take the test?!"

Bai Liu hummed, took out a dollar from his pocket, bent down and handed it to the old man next to the scale, then stood on it without hesitation.

The measuring rod of the measuring instrument slowly descended, touched Bai Liu's head, and then slowly moved up.

The big speaker on the measuring instrument emitted a flashing red light and loudly broadcast the report: "——Height 176 cm, weight 58 kg, normal thin!"

Bai Liu stood on the scale for a long time, until the loudspeaker finished broadcasting three times, then he slowly walked down.

There were three measurements. Seeing Bai Liu coming down, Du Sanying subconsciously thought whether he should go up and take the measurements himself.

But that was not the case. After Bai Liu walked down, he slowly walked up again and took the test again.

Du Sanying: “????”

After the three measurements were completed, Du Sanying followed Bai Liu, whose steps he inexplicably felt lighter, in confusion: “Mr. Bai Liu, why did you have to measure three times?”

Bai Liu said calmly: “Confirm the established fact that my product has increased in value.”

Reality

Du Sanying was confused: “???”

After returning home, Du Sanying took the parrot out and hung it by the window. Bai Liu was watching from the side. When the parrot in the cage saw Bai Liu, it got angry and shouted twice, “Bai Liu, run away.”

Seeing that Du Sanying didn’t run away, the parrot looked around, then slowly widened its green eyes and stared blankly at Bai Liu who was smiling outside the cage.

It seemed to finally realize that it had arrived at Bai Liu’s territory. After standing there for a minute, it quickly buried its head under its wings and then shrank motionlessly in the corner of the cage.

Du Sanying explained awkwardly: “San San is not like this usually.”

Bai Liu expressed his understanding: “It is indeed difficult for animals to accept changes in their residence, but you usually use this parrot to remember things because it has something special besides being able to teleport people?”

Du Sanying nodded excitedly: “Yes! Mr. Bai Liu, you should know that many things in the game cannot be remembered in reality. They will be tampered with or erased, but San San can remember these erased things!”

Bai Liu looked at the parrot and said, “How can we make it remember these things?”

“It’s very simple.” Du Sanying said, “Just keep repeating it to it and wait for it to agree with you.”

“But San San can’t remember complicated things.” Du Sanying scratched his head embarrassedly, “It can only remember simple things, so I usually only let it remember the most important things.”

Bai Liu nodded as if he understood something.

After Du Sanying packed up his things, he held up the basin and clothes and greeted Bai Liu: “Mr. Bai Liu, I’m going to take a shower.

Can I use your bathroom?”

Bai Liu nodded.

After Du Sanying entered the bathroom, Bai Liu stood up and walked slowly to the windowsill.

Although the parrot in the birdcage buried its head under its wings, it couldn’t help but tremble slightly because of Bai Liu’s approach.

Bai Liu half closed his eyes, stretched out his index finger, and stroked the parrot’s fur.

The parrot trembled even more violently.

“What do you remember?” Bai Liu asked softly, “Tell me nicely and I won’t do anything to you.”

“Bai Liu, you bad guy!” the parrot screamed and shrank back as if resisting.

Bai Liu sighed with regret: “It seems that you are unwilling to cooperate, so let’s try another way. I will tell you something that you must remember, how about you help me remember it?”

“In return, I will ensure your and Du Sanying’s survival.”

The parrot hesitated for a moment, then slowly poked its head out from under its wings and looked at Bai Liu with a pair of vigilant green eyes, as if asking him what he wanted it to help remember.

Bai Liu turned around and sat on the window sill. Behind him was an unprotected tall building. The night wind blew gently, making Bai Liu’s half-long hair, which was not cut neatly, sway gently.

“On August 17, Spades broke my whip and my cross.”

The parrot hesitated for a long time, then repeated what Bai Liu said. It tilted its head in confusion and said, “Just remember this?”

“Just remember this for now.” Bai Liu said softly, “If he breaks other things of mine in the future, I will make you remember it too.”

The parrot spoke with genuine confusion: “Is this important?”

“It’s very important to me.” Bai Liu looked at it and smiled. “I don’t want what this person owes me to be erased or forgotten again.”

After taking a shower, Du Sanying came out dressed neatly. He looked at Bai Liu nervously: “Mr. Bai Liu, where should I sleep?”

“I have two single beds in my room. I bought them this afternoon.” Bai Liu said, “Please choose the one you like and sleep in the position you like.”

Du Sanying chose a single bed near the inside, and Bai Liu slept near the window.

There was a bedside table between the two beds, which was a bit like the cold, commercial layout of a hotel, but…

Du Sanying turned over carefully without making any noise. He looked absent-mindedly at Bai Liu who was sleeping on the other side. The moonlight faintly seeping through the window sprinkled on Bai Liu’s peaceful face, giving Du Sanying a dazed feeling.

…He had forgotten how long it had been since he had been in the same room with someone like this.

He had been with Mr. Bai Liu for nearly seven hours since leaving the sanatorium. It was just like what Mr. Bai Liu said, nothing bad had happened…

“Can’t sleep?” Bai Liu suddenly spoke without opening his eyes.

Du Sanying was so scared that he sat up from the bed: “Did I wake you up by turning over? I’m sorry!”

“It’s not like you woke me up.” Bai Liu opened his eyes. “This is also my first time living with someone. I’m a little uncomfortable with it.”

Du Sanying sat cross-legged on the bed and asked in surprise, “Has Mr. Bai Liu always lived alone?”

“Yeah.” Bai Liu replied, “I only slept with someone when I was very young, and since then I have always lived alone.”

Du Sanying was very surprised: “When Mr. Bai Liu was a child, did he sleep in the same bed with someone? Where is that person now?”

“Dead.” Bai Liu said calmly, “He committed suicide. He doused himself in gasoline and set himself on fire.”

Du Sanying paused.

He seemed to remember the incident vaguely, but he couldn't remember the details. It was just that a sense of sadness that he had witnessed the scene before made him apologize uncontrollably: "I'm sorry… I seem to have amnesia again, I can't remember it."

"It doesn't matter." Bai Liu said calmly, "Not many people need to remember this kind of thing."

Du Sanying was silent for a long time, and almost at a loss, he changed the subject: "Um, the gaming league of Mr. Bai Liu's team is about to start!"

"Well, we will start team competition training soon, and the training intensity will be increased." Bai Liu replied, "Because the league is about to start."

"I think Mr. Bai Liu will definitely be the champion of the league." Du Sanying cheered for Bai Liu earnestly, then lay down again. He looked at Bai Liu's profile, "What do you want to do after Mr. Bai Liu wins the game?"

This time it was Bai Liu's turn to remain silent. Du Sanying yawned and thought Bai Liu had fallen asleep. Then Bai Liu suddenly spoke again:

"With that guy, sleeping on a lot of money."

Du Sanying was stunned, then couldn't help but burst out laughing.

Bai Liu glanced at Du Sanying: "Is it funny?"

Du Sanying scratched his head, still smiling: "It seems normal for other people to make this wish, but Mr. Bai Liu said this wish so seriously…"

He said honestly: "I think it's funny."

"But it's a wish that can make people laugh." Du Sanying said seriously, "Mr. Bai Liu will definitely be very happy when it comes true."

Bai Liu turned his gaze back, a faint smile appeared on his face: "Maybe."

Killer Sequence Guild, Weapon Modification Room.

Hua Ganjiang hammered away at the cracks on the God-Defying

Heavy Sword, sparks flying with each strike. Seated on a high bench nearby, Spades watched him in silence, his gaze unwavering.

"Don't look at me like that," Hua Ganjiang muttered without lifting his head. "I know. I'm a weapon modification engineer for the Deer Hunters. I shouldn't be working for the Killer Sequence."

He let out a long sigh. "But what can I say? Your tactician—the Reverse God—is the soul of the Deer Hunters. The highest-ranking strategist in the guild. The judge who defied the gods themselves."

"The Reverse God saved a lot of people, including me."

"I owe him more favors than I can count, and yet... I didn't follow him when he left the Deer Hunters. That alone makes me ungrateful enough," Hua Ganjiang admitted, his expression conflicted. "Now that he's in a new guild and asked for my help with weapon modifications, how could I refuse?"

Shaking his head, he added wryly, "What a ridiculous year it's been. I'm a privately employed weapon modder, yet I've handled the weapons of three guilds and outsourced work for two others."

It was only then that Spades spoke. "Is that a problem?"

He lifted his gaze and met Hua Ganjiang's eyes. "Our guild's warehouse protection is outsourced too. Golden Dawn took it over."

Hua Ganjiang blinked, then burst into laughter—hard, uncontrollable laughter that left tears in his eyes. "The Reverse God outsourced weapon modifications to me and prop protection to Golden Dawn? Of course he did."

He exhaled sharply. "That man gathered the best weapon modifiers and item protectors in the game and put them to his own use. Your Killer Sequence is a brand-new guild that had no business surviving, yet thanks to his connections, you've solved the two hardest problems a new guild faces."

"You really lucked out, Spades," Hua Ganjiang said, his tone tinged with bitterness. "The Reverse God was so firm when he left. Our guild leader—cold and unyielding as he is—even softened his tone, practically begging him to stay. Said he'd do anything. But in the end, he still couldn't keep him."

He glanced at Spades. "I've always wondered—what did you offer him? What made the Reverse God leave Deer Hunter?"

"You misunderstand." Spades' voice was steady, indifferent. "The Reverse God wanted to leave. I simply gave him a reason."

Hua Ganjiang froze. "That's impossible." His reaction was immediate, almost defensive. "The Reverse God was the core of the Deer Hunters. He got along with everyone. He was even our leader's close friend in real life. We fought together for years."

He shook his head, trying to make sense of it. "The guild leader trusted him more than anyone. He took injuries in the arena to protect him. And the Reverse God never let us down—his tactics kept us alive."

"Everyone loved him. Admired him. And he cared about us just as much. He was the soul of our guild."

Hua Ganjiang's gaze dropped to the heavy sword he was repairing. Slowly, he exhaled. "So when he transferred this year…" He trailed off. "I'm just a blacksmith. If even I can't accept it, how could the others?"

He slid the glowing-red sword into the forge, then nudged a bench closer with his foot and sat beside Spades.

Wiping his hands on his apron, he watched as the sword's silhouette melted into the furnace's magma. "...How cruel. That sword once protected us. Now, it's turned against us."

"And here I am, fixing it."

Hua Ganjiang let out a self-mocking laugh, pulling out a pack of cigarettes. He flicked one free, lit it against the lava, and took a slow drag. Smoke curled lazily in the air.

"Want one?" He offered the pack to Spades.

Spades declined.

Hua Ganjiang narrowed his eyes through the smoke. "Let me guess—the Reverse God doesn't let you smoke?"

He chuckled. "He was like that with the Deer Hunters too. Always pretending to be righteous, banning smoking. Funniest part? Our guild leader—biggest chain smoker I've ever met—actually obeyed him.

Just because the Reverse God said so."

"The man followed every order to the letter. Never smoked again, no matter how much he craved it." Hua Ganjiang shook his head. "Meanwhile, the Reverse God—who banned it in the first place—would sneak into my workshop whenever he wanted one."

He smirked. "I never smoked before, but he got me into it."

The laughter faded. Hua Ganjiang was quiet for a moment before he muttered, "I still don't get why he left."

"The Deer Hunters… that was his guild."

"He built it. He pulled us in—people who had nothing left, people who were about to die—and gave us a place to belong. A miserable, desperate place, sure, but at least we had each other."

His voice softened. "He always told us, smiling like it was a joke, 'I can see your future. It's going to be good. Just hold on a little longer.'"

"So we held on."

Hua Ganjiang took another drag, eyes distant. "I met him in real life, you know."

"In reality, I was just a poor bastard no one cared about. I ran a tiny blacksmith's stall that barely kept me afloat."

He exhaled. "I couldn't even take care of myself, let alone him."

"I picked up a stray kid, made him my apprentice. Thought I could give him a better life, but he just made me poorer." Hua Ganjiang laughed bitterly. "Sometimes, I got so desperate, I did things I shouldn't have. When you start down that path, it only gets worse."

"We were supposed to get financial aid that year. Didn't know we already had records against us. We lost our chance before we even knew it."

"The less money we had, the worse things got. The worse things got, the worse we became."

He lowered his head. "But back when I started stealing… all I wanted was enough to buy a decent meal. To send that kid to vocational school, get him out of this mess."

"But when I finally got caught, that idiot stepped up and said he did it too." Hua Ganjiang let out a breath. "So we both went to jail."

"I always thought he was a little messed up, living like a beggar. Turns out, I was right."

For a moment, silence. Then Hua Ganjiang suddenly chuckled.

"When I thought there was no way out, I met the Reverse God by chance. He bought me a meal—nothing fancy, but it tasted good. Opened two bottles of beer. Got my apprentice drunk."

He smiled faintly. "And then, drunk off his ass, he told me everything would be okay. That he could see the future."

"For a moment, I believed him."

"But reality doesn't work that way."

Hua Ganjiang's voice dropped. "I logged into a horror game in the same alley where I ran my stall. By the time the Heresy Bureau arrived, my apprentice's body had been cold for half an hour."

He paused. Then, softly, "That was the end of my real life."

"But in the game, I met the Reverse God again. He saved me more times than I can count. Because of him, I survived. Because of him, I joined the Deer Hunters."

He took a slow drag. "Eventually, I used my points to buy a body. Molded it into my apprentice's face. Forced it to move, act like it was him. Pretended he was still here, still helping me forge iron."

"But he can't leave this workshop. So I spend more time here than in reality."

Spades studied him. "You don't want to go back?"

Hua Ganjiang scoffed. "Go back to what? I don't even have a home in reality. At least here, I have my apprentice, my forge, and teammates who treat me well."

"I'm living a decent life."

"Sometimes, I wonder if what I'm doing is really the right thing," Hua Ganjiang muttered, tapping the cigarette between his lips. "I've thought about resurrecting my apprentice. But on one hand, I don't have enough points. And on the other… what's the point?"

He exhaled a plume of smoke, his gaze distant. "Life was so hard for him. The best meal he ever had in his entire life might have been the one the Reverse God treated him to."

Hua Ganjiang took another drag before continuing, his voice laced with regret. "That day, my apprentice told me he had never eaten shrimp before. I was afraid the Reverse God would find it too extravagant, so I didn't let him order any. I even scolded him for being greedy."

"But in the end, the Reverse God just smiled, ordered a plate of shrimp, peeled them one by one, and let my apprentice eat them all by himself."

Hua Ganjiang stubbed out his cigarette, inhaling deeply as his eyes turned red. "I still don't understand… How could someone so kind and gentle leave so cruelly, without even saying goodbye?"

"When the president found out the Reverse God was gone, he went looking for him—he begged him to come back."

Hua Ganjiang's gaze drifted to the furnace, where the heavy sword had completely melted. His voice was vacant. "Our president is so arrogant, yet he lowered his head at the entrance of your Killer Sequence guild hall. He was even ready to kneel. But the Reverse God held him up and said he'd already signed up for the league… as a member of the Killer Sequence."

"He's not coming back."

"The president locked himself in his room for a long time after that. When he finally came out, he seemed… different. Gloomier. He used to be the team's main attacker, but now he's taken over as tactician, completely changing our entire playstyle."

"Recently, he brought in a new clown—a brutal one—to fill the void the Reverse God left behind."

Hua Ganjiang's fingers clenched into a fist. "The Reverse God never liked seeing unnecessary casualties on the field, but this guy—he wants to kill every time he strikes."

A hollow laugh escaped his lips. "…It feels like the president is just taking revenge on the Reverse God for leaving."

Spades, ever blunt, remarked, "You guys are all so childish."

Hua Ganjiang bristled instantly. "You? A naïve bastard who benefited from all this? You have no right to talk!"

“Hey.” Hua Ganjiang leaned his head back, leaned against the wall, sighed, and suddenly laughed out loud, “Actually, I think it’s childish too.”

“I heard from others that the president has been the main attacker of the Reverse God for many, many years. Since the Deer Hunter Guild existed, the president has been the main attacker of the Reverse God.”

“In a team match with the president as the main attacker, no matter how fierce the battle is, the tactician the Reverse God will never get hurt, because the president will do his best to protect the Reverse God.”

Hua Ganjiang recalled: “If the Reverse God is a [prophet], the president is just like his [hunter].”

“——A Hunter born to protect the Prophet.”

“It was said that everyone wanted the Reverse God to be the guild leader at first, but he didn’t want to, so he handed the position over to the guild leader and said with a smile that he believed the guild leader would be able to lead everyone to the future that he saw.”

“But the future has not yet arrived.” General Hua exhaled and laughed at himself, “The person who gave us the future fled at the critical moment.”

Spades said calmly, “It’s not desertion.”

Hua Ganjiang was stunned.

Spades stared at him without any expression on his face: “The Reverse God is trying to give you the future you want in a different way.”

“When you can’t see the future, you can choose to believe in those who can see the future.”

Hua Ganjiang was stunned for a moment, then laughed out loud: “That’s right, we [villagers] who don’t know the truth still have to follow the [prophet’s] instructions.”

After saying that, Hua Ganjiang jumped off the stool and took the Reverse God's heavy sword out of the furnace with pliers.

Hua Ganjiang turned the sword over and looked at it a few times, then dipped it into the water and said, "It's almost done. Spades, where's your broken whip? Bring it here and I'll start repairing yours."

Spades handed over the whip, which was broken into pieces with only the handle left.

Hua Ganjiang looked at him blankly for a moment: "Although I never ask why weapons are broken, this is too outrageous!"

"If you fight with others, it will be bad." Spades explained perfunctorily.

Hua Ganjiang was stunned: "Is there any player who can fight like you? The league is about to start, and the Reverse God didn't stop you?"

Spades had a deadpan expression on his face: "The Reverse God has joined the other side to fight me together."

Hua Ganjiang: "…Then you must have done something really excessive."

Spades slowly leaned over the back of the stool, rested his chin on the back of his hand, and said, "Yes, so I want to apologize to that person."

Hua Ganjiang raised his whip to examine it carefully, and replied casually: "Then go ahead."

"But the Reverse God won't allow that." Spades slowly lowered his eyelids, "He said that before you figure out why the other party treated you like this, going to the other party casually will only make things worse."

Hua Ganjiang nodded in agreement: "That's true, have you figured it out?"

Spades was silent for a moment.

Hua Ganjiang laughed: "Haven't you figured it out?"

Spades was silent for a moment before speaking: "I feel like he likes me, but he always feels sad when he sees me, and he always thinks a lot.”

“I don’t understand what he’s thinking or what he’s sad about.”

Hua Ganjiang dipped the handle of Spades' whip into the magma and smiled maliciously: “Love problems…”

“Generally speaking, based on my experience, if you give her (see notes) what she wants, she will forgive you a little, even if she doesn’t say it. What does she want?”

Spades paused for a moment and said, “Yes, a whip similar to mine and an inverted cross.”

After that, Spades was silent again: “But I didn’t want him to get it, so I broke them all.”

Hua Ganjiang was completely stunned: “Isn’t it normal for the other party to hate you?”

Spades suddenly raised his head and stared at Hua Ganjiang: “Can you do it? A whip that feels similar to my whip.”

Hua Ganjiang was full of questions: “Brother, do you know what level your whip is?”

“If I could mass-produce whips of your quality, I would have formed a union long ago!” General Hua said as he swung the whip in his hand. “To be honest, I’ve never seen anything like the texture of your whip bones.”

“I can’t find this kind of bone in the entire game, nor in real life. I don’t know what kind of lizard monster you used as a reference to create such a perverted skill item.”

Spades glanced at the whip in the lava and replied calmly, “It’s my bones.”

Hua Ganjiang was startled: “…Didn’t you say lizard bones?”

“At first, many people said I was a lizard,” Spades replied, “I thought I was a lizard too, so I said I was a lizard bone.”

Hua Ganjiang became more and more confused: “…Why do you think you are a lizard?”

Spades recalled: “Because when I came out of the shell, my lower body was a fishtail, but I also had legs. I laid on the ground and looked like a lizard."

When Spades was born from Tawil's skin in the Siren Town, he had not yet completely shed his mermaid form. He had a huge fishtail on his lower body, but his feet slowly grew out of the fishtail. He looked weird and out of place, and almost scared the townspeople crazy.

The townspeople frantically slapped Spades who had stood up, trying to get the "lizard man" to get out.

So for a long time, Spades really thought he was a lizard. When he encountered a lizard in other copies, Spades would even take the initiative to observe and imitate the lizard's movements.

This misunderstanding continued until the Reverse God entered the Killer Sequence and seriously explained to Spades that lizards would not play games. It was only then did Spades suddenly realized.

——It turns out that I am a human being.

"Can you use my bones—" Spades raised his head and looked at Hua Ganjiang, "—to make a whip for Bai Liu?"

Hua Ganjiang was shocked and rejected it subconsciously: "No!"

Although his proposal was rejected, Spades still stared at Hua Ganjiang motionlessly, causing Hua Ganjiang to walk back and forth several times in annoyance: "No means no, even if you can stare a hole through me!"

"Even if I'm willing to help you, players are forbidden from hurting each other in the central hall. I can't pick your bones out at all. That's the first point."

Hua Ganjiang turned around and raised two fingers seriously: "Second, even if you go into the game and pick the bones off, you can't bring them out to make a whip for me."

"You can only get out of the game with injuries and game reward items. I've never heard of anyone being able to get out with their own bones."

"Third, even if you really find a way to get the bones for me, a whip will require at least four to six sets of your spine. You need a recovery period after you remove the bones and then grow them back. I can't stay in the Killer Sequence to make whips for you during your bone growth recovery period. The Deer Hunter is also preparing for the league, so I have to be there."

"To sum up, your fantastic plan is not feasible."

"Once all these problems have been solved, you will help me, right?" Spades looked at Hua Ganjiang with a very focused and serious look.

This look made Hua Ganjiang speechless for a moment, and he evaded the question: "How do you solve it?"

Spades lowered his eyes to look at Hua Ganjiang's whip which had returned to its original shape in the furnace. He pulled it out, and the whip made a slight hissing sound as it was soaked in water, emitting wisps of white smoke.

Then he raised his hand to the back of his neck, and without any expression on his face, he placed the whip against the spine of his neck and slashed it down mercilessly.

Blood dripped instantly, and Hua Ganjiang looked shocked. Spades slowly withdrew his clenched fist from his back and opened it in front of Hua Ganjiang.

In the palm of his hand was a bloody spine.

"My whip can tear through time and space, so I can hurt myself in the central hall and remove bones." Spades said calmly, "My regenerative ability is very strong, and the bones I remove will grow back quickly, so it won't delay you for a long time."

"That's all solved. Now can you make me a whip?"

Hua Ganjiang's lips were trembling. He was silent for a very long time. With trembling hands, he took out a cigarette box from his pocket, put a cigarette in his mouth, and lit it. Then he dared to slowly lower his eyes to the bone in Spades' white palm that was still dripping with blood.

"You…don't you feel anything?"

Spades paused for a moment and said, "I can feel it."

Hua Ganjiang looked at Spades unreasonably: "Then why the hell can you dig out your own bones without batting an eyelid?!"

Spades was silent: “Because I just know that he wants this.”

Hua Ganjiang was startled. He remembered what he had just said to Spades – [Give her what she wants, and she will forgive you a little.]

“If you have to pay such a painful price to give the other party what they want…” Hua Ganjiang sighed with a complicated expression, “There’s no need to give it to them…”

“Give it to me.” Hua Ganjiang took the bone with a cigarette in his mouth. Seeing that Spades started to take the bone again, he turned away, “Don’t let the blood splash everywhere. Be careful when you take it.”

Spades hummed.

Hua Ganjiang looked at the bone in his hand and took a deep breath: “Damn, what is going on…”

The league day is getting closer day by day.

All the guilds were making their final frantic sprint. Not only in the game pool but even in the small TV area, the atmosphere was much heavier.

The Wandering Circus trained almost day and night, and under the high-intensity training of various games, not only Mu Sicheng cried out in unbearable pain, but even Tang Erda sometimes showed signs of fatigue.

Mu Sicheng lay helplessly on the desk in the lounge of the Wandering Circus, his eyes dim, “…I am about to experience the most terrifying thing in my life.”

Liu Jiayi was speechless: “It’s just a pre-season game, you weren’t that scared before, right?”

“No.” Mu Sicheng retorted with his eyes blank, “It’s not just the pre-season, I have to start school.”

Tang Erda lifted his clothes and wiped the sweat off his face. He smiled when he heard this and said, “Is the start of college going well?”

“Yeah, it should have been fine…” Mu Sicheng said angrily, “But I spent the whole last semester playing games and failed two subjects at the end of the semester! Make up for it when school starts this semester!"

Mu Sicheng grabbed his hair and howled in pain: "And I haven't even started reviewing yet!"

MuKe was puzzled from the bottom of his heart: "The college exams are very simple, why did you fail?"

Liu Jiayi scoffed mercilessly: "You are the only one among us who will fail the exam."

Bai Liu, who was standing by, paused for a moment and said calmly, "I've failed them before, too."

In an instant, everyone in the office looked over there in shock.

"What's wrong?" Bai Liu returned these looks calmly, "Is it strange that I failed the exam?"

"My studies have always been average."

MuKe recalled thoughtfully: "I remember now. I saw on the resume that Bai Liu's grades didn't seem to be very good. I remember that his college entrance examination score was -"

"485 points." Bai Liu took a sip of water and said calmly, "I remember it was quite a distance from the first-tier line."

Mu Sicheng was shocked: "Your college entrance examination score is actually more than 100 points lower than mine!"

Then Mu Sicheng quickly fell into complacency, crossed his chest, and raised his eyebrows, looking at Bai Liu with a very annoying smile: "I didn't expect it, Bai Liu, you have thick eyebrows and big eyes, you look like an excellent student, but you didn't do as well as me in the exam!"

"Very strange." Liu Jiayi frowned. "Bai Liu has strong thinking and learning abilities. How could he score lower than Mu Sicheng?"

Mu Sicheng was angry: "Hey–!!"

Bai Liu thought for a moment and said, "When I was in high school, I didn't work very hard, and I wasn't sensible. I was quite rebellious, and I never focused on studying. I only started to study seriously in the last half of the semester."

“When the results came out, I considered repeating the year under the persuasion of Lu Yizhan, but I decided not to go in the end.”

Mu Sicheng rubbed his hands together, looking horrified: “What’s going on? I feel so uncomfortable hearing you say you’re considering repeating a grade that it scares me!”

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng and said, “Normally, people would consider repeating a grade after doing poorly on an exam.”

MuKe asked curiously: “Why didn’t Bai Liu go in the end?”

Bai Liu paused for a moment and said, “Because I had no money. I was over 18 years old and the welfare home had stopped providing financial support.”

Everyone was silent, even Mu Sicheng was stunned.

This reason is really… a little unexpected.

“Although the welfare home also provides educational subsidies for adults, there are not many places for that kind of subsidy. You need to have good grades or work hard to get it, such as Lu Yizhan. It would be very unfair if someone like me could get it.”

Bai Liu sat on the chair with a calm expression: “Although Lu Yizhan told me to repeat my studies, he would work hard to earn money to pay for my tuition and living expenses after I go to college, and then I can pay him back after I get a job, I still refused in the end.”

Liu Jiayi couldn’t help but ask: “Why?”

Bai Liu raised his eyes and said, “Because I hate studying and living in high school, so forget it.”

Wang Shun interrupted the atmosphere of a group of people chatting:

“Everyone, the pre-season game will start in one day. Now I want to tell you some important pre-game matters. Then please go back and have a good rest tonight. Tomorrow we will enter the game and officially draw lots for the game.”

“First of all, the main stage of the league is in the central hall. The days without spectators, which everyone is used to, will soon be gone.”

Wang Shun’s expression was serious: “None of you has obtained the golden medal of immunity from death. You really need popularity."

"So when you encounter weaker opponents in the pre-season, please try to play more entertaining games to attract the audience's attention."

"Secondly, the game pool will be closed to the public soon. According to the practice in previous years, the game pool will be used as a private rental venue and rented out by bidding every day. The guild with the highest bid on that day will be able to rent the game pool for one day."

Wang Shun emphasized: "Although the league has already started, except for Captain Tang, the rest of you are all pure rookies, and the training intensity is far from enough."

"So from now on, not only will you have to participate in the pre-season, but the guild will also actively bid to rent a game pool every day. Once you rent one, please endure a little hardship on that day and continue to come to the game pool for training after the competition. We must make up for the cost of the rental."

"I asked Mr. Charles about the expenses for the game pool bidding, and he said he would reimburse them in full."

Wang Shun looked around at everyone and smiled knowingly:

"Finally, I wish you all a successful start and achieve what you wish for."

The night before the league game.

Mu Sicheng was half leaning against a desk lamp emitting white light, pouting his lips and lazily holding a pen, scribbling on his textbook with a highlighter from time to time, reviewing the subjects he had to take make-up exams for.

As he was drawing, Mu Sicheng's eyes suddenly shifted to the empty bed on the left side of the dormitory entrance.

That is Liu Huai's bed.

Because someone died in the dormitory, other students moved out of fear. Only Mu Sicheng did not move out despite being persuaded twice by the dormitory manager and lived here alone.

“It’s so annoying…” Mu Sicheng muttered to himself, “If you were here, you could draw a picture for me to review the key points.”

“You listen to the class very seriously…”

As he was talking, Mu Sicheng scratched his head in annoyance: “Ahhh! I wish I had only scored 485 points in the college entrance examination! I can’t do the test at all with all the league stuff in my mind!”

Liu Jiayi curled up on the bed, holding a clumsy and ugly doll in her arms. She closed her eyes and recited:

“Stupid brother…”

“Although Bai Liu, whom you entrusted me to, seems to be not good at anything, he is quite faithful to his promises.”

There were two soft knocks on Liu Jiayi’s door. She immediately hid her doll and huddled under the quilt, pretending to be asleep.

The door was slowly pushed open. Xiang Chunhua pushed the door open carefully, tiptoed to Liu Jiayi’s bed, tucked the quilt for her, touched her head, and then left.

Liu Jiayi slowly opened her eyes. She held the doll’s hand under the quilt and said softly:

“I have a very good family now, brother.”

“Bai Liu found it for me.”

MuKe sat on a bench in the hospital and put down the clothes that had just been taken off during the electrocardiogram.

The doctor opposite looked at the electrocardiogram carefully for a while and nodded: “Further examination is needed, but your condition has been relatively stable recently. Avoid strenuous exercise and keep a calm mind.”

MuKe stood up and bowed politely to thank him: “Thank you for your help, doctor.”

The doctor smiled and said, “You don’t have to be so polite. You have been my patient since you were a child. But MuKe, you seem to be in a good mood recently. Did something good happen to you?”

MuKe raised his head and smiled: “Yes.”

“I met someone who allowed me to exercise vigorously, to have an uneasy state of mind, but still be happy.”

The doctor was stunned.

Without waiting for the doctor to react, MuKe bowed again and said goodbye, then turned around and walked out of the room at a leisurely pace.

As soon as Tang Erda came out of the room, he saw Su Yang and a group of members of the third team standing in front of him.

He was slightly startled: “What are you doing…”

“Come on, come on, we’ve finished our business! Let’s go have a drink!” The team members rushed over, grinning, “It’s been a while since I’ve had a drink with you!”

Tang Erda was almost at a loss as he held these people back: “What are you doing! I have already left the Heretic Management Bureau and am no longer your captain!”

Su Yang smiled, his eyes curved: “Yes, but if you leave, can’t I come to drink with you?”

“We are not here to find the captain of the third team, Tang Erda. We are just here to catch up with our old friend Tang Erda. Is that not okay?”

Tang Erda lurched, then his shoulders slowly relaxed and he smiled with relief: “Okay.”

On the road, Tang Erda and Su Yang walked side by side. Su Yang glanced at Tang Erda and laughed: “I always feel that you have changed a lot.”

Tang Erda paused: “Is there?”

Su Yang nodded: “Before, I always felt that you were worried, as if you were carrying a lot of burdens that we didn’t know about. You refused to tell us, and you were very tense every day.”

“It feels like you are protecting everyone within your territory.” Su Yang raised his head and exhaled a breath of white air, “but at the same time, you are keeping everyone out of your door.”

“But now, it feels like you’ve lifted that burden off of you.”

Su Yang turned his head and smiled: “I’ve never seen you so relaxed. It seems that retirement is really a good thing for a 40-year-old man like you.”

Tang Erda paused for a moment, then laughed, “Although retirement life also has many uncertainties.”

“But the burden has indeed been taken over.”

Su Yang laughed: “Is it Bai Liu?”

Tang Erda held a cigarette between his fingers, a faint smile floating in his dark blue eyes: “Yeah.”

In the game pool.

[System Reminder: Due to the upcoming league, the game pool will be closed soon, please evacuate as soon as possible!]

People kept climbing out of the game pool. The game interface that was constantly rotating on the water surface gradually stopped and darkened. The bottom of the water changed from an illusory image to a solid reality. Only the shaking and turbulent water waves reflected the dim colorful halo that was pouring down from above.

Bai Liu stood up from the game pool, water dripping down his body.

From now on, you have to spend points to rent here. Although it is not his money, according to Bai Liu’s basic principle of “if you don’t take advantage of a good opportunity, you are a bastard”, he still trained in the game pool until the last moment.

Now Bai Liu was the only one in the entire game pool. Just as he was about to walk out, Bai Liu looked up and saw another person.

Spades stood outside the game pool, staring at him motionlessly.

Bai Liu stopped walking out and looked directly at Spades.

Neither of them spoke, they just looked at each other in silence.

Spades stood outside the game pool, Bai Liu stood inside the game pool, and the colorful halo flowed silently between the two people.

The game pool, which was originally bustling with people, now only had the two of them, but it did not feel empty. An inexplicable atmosphere permeating between the two people made people feel breathless.

Bai Liu spoke first, his tone was very calm: “What do you want to talk to me about?”

Spades paused, then slowly extended his hand to Bai Liu: “This is for you.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at what Spades was holding.

In Spades’ hand was a pure white bone whip.

——It is exactly the same as the bone whip that Bai Liu got from Tawil at the beginning.

Bai Liu just lowered his eyes and watched, water drops dripping from his eyelashes and falling into the closed game pool, spreading out in circles of colorful halos.

When Spades saw that Bai Liu didn’t take it, he curled up his fingers hanging at his side and said, “It’s a lizard bone whip with the same strength as the mermaid bone whip you used before.”

“Don’t you want it?”

Bai Liu was silent for a long time before he looked up at Spades: “Is there only a whip?”

Spades lurched.

Bai Liu calmly asked back: “You also broke my reverse cross, shouldn’t you return it to me as well?”

“The inverted cross…” Spades’ eyes wandered for a moment, “…it’s not fixed yet.”

The material of the inverted cross is so special that Spades drove Hua Ganjiang crazy but still couldn’t make something similar.

Bai Liu nodded and took the whip: “Is that so? I’ll take the whip first. What do you want to use as collateral for the cross?”

Spades stood in front of Bai Liu like a statue with an expressionless face for a long time.

This guy practically has “I can’t think of anything I can use as collateral right now” written all over his face.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked away, with a slight smile in his eyes: “Didn’t you expect it?”

Spades nodded honestly, then paused: “Is this okay?”

Bai Liu asked, “How is it?”

Spades took out a black marker and explained seriously, “If you really want it now, I can draw one for you first.”

Bai Liu: “…”

After logging out of the game, Bai Liu changed his wet clothes, walked into the bathroom, turned on the shower, and started showering.

Halfway through rinsing, Bai Liu seemed to realize something and turned his head to look at the mirror.

In the mirror, a very clear inverted cross was drawn in black marker in the middle of Bai Liu’s collarbone, which was very conspicuous against his fair skin.

Bai Liu leaned against the cold tiles and closed his eyes. He raised his head and let the water wash over him. He whispered softly, “…I actually let him draw it.”

In the game pool, after listening to Spades’ words, Bai Liu paused for a moment, then simply unbuttoned a button of his shirt, and tilted his neck back to expose the skin between his collarbones, making it easier for Spades to start writing.

Spades stepped into the game pool, his eyes fixed on Bai Liu’s heart, he picked up the pen and started drawing.

Bai Liu looked away: “Who told you to draw if you can’t give it?”

Spades’ eyes rested on Bai Liu’s collarbone without fail, and he said as he painted, “The Reverse God taught me this.”

Bai Liu asked softly, “How did he teach you?”

Spades glanced at Bai Liu and said, “The Reverse God said that when you don’t have a way to give something to someone for the time being, but you really want to give it to him, you can draw one for him first.”

“One day.” Spades returned his gaze to Bai Liu’s heart and said seriously, “I will return the cross I broke to you.”

“What others can give you, I can give you too.”

In the bathroom, Bai Liu buried his face in the bath towel, covered the towel with one hand, and slowly exhaled a long breath.

He kind of regretted letting Spades draw on him.

Pre-season

Pre-season day.

The group, who had not left the game pool for a long time, finally returned to the small TV area.

Mu Sicheng screamed as he entered the small TV area. He stared at the central hall with wide eyes and said in surprise: “What the hell is this?!”

The small TV area, where small TVs were originally densely arranged, sank in the middle, revealing a huge, sunken round hole. This round hole was filled with seats layer by layer, forming a viewing venue similar to the Roman Colosseum. Standing on the edge and looking down, it looked like a deep, wide, flat round pool.

In the center of the venue, there is a huge screen made up of countless small TVs spliced together on both sides, floating in the air. Audiences continue to enter the arena and take their seats, chatting excitedly with each other.

“Oh, right. This is the first time that God Mu has seen the small TV area during the league.” Wang Shun slapped his head, “I forgot to tell you that the central hall will undergo a major change in appearance during the league.”

Wang Shun pointed at the large pool that Mu Sicheng was looking at in shock. “Some of the small TV areas will be converted into viewing pools. The one you just saw is the largest viewing pool. It’s for the mid-season tournament. We can’t climb up there.”

“The mid-season games will be broadcast live in this largest pool.”

“In addition to this largest viewing pool, there are many viewing pools of different sizes around it.” Wang Shun pointed around, “The pre-season games will be shown in these viewing pools of different sizes.”

Mu Sicheng frowned: “These pools are just like the recommended spots on a small TV, with good and bad spots and high and low exposure, right? How can we ensure that our competition can enter a good pool?”

Wang Shun smiled and said, “This involves another thing, called the gambling pool.”

Mu Sicheng asked suspiciously: “[Gambling pool]?”

Wang Shun nodded. “Over the past year, the points that the audience has accumulated from you will be multiplied five times by the system and added to the [Gambling Pool] as a basic fund. Of course, the same goes for your opponents.”

“Generally speaking, the bigger your and your opponent’s gambling base funds are, the bigger your combined [gambling pool] will be, the bigger the viewing pool you will get, the better the position, and the higher the exposure you will get.”

Mu Sicheng raised his eyebrows and asked back: “In other words, if I want my game to be broadcast in a high-exposure viewing pool and attract more viewers, either I have to have a high amount of points charged, or the team I’m playing against has a high amount of points charged?”

Wang Shun smiled and nodded: “But you don’t have to worry about this problem for now. In the pre-season, you are already a team with relatively high charging points, so the viewing pool you get will not be too bad.”

“And as the game progresses, there will be a steady stream of spectators putting points into your [betting pool]. As long as you keep winning, the viewing pool you get will get better and better.”

Mu Sicheng crossed his arms looked at the largest viewing pool, and snorted, “Our match will definitely be broadcast here in the end anyway!”

“That’s because you guys made it to the playoffs.” Wang Shun pushed Mu Sicheng’s shoulders and walked forward, “Let’s go to the pre-season registration point to draw the opponent team first.”

Wang Shun walked away while looking back: “By the way, Du Sanying is indispensable for selecting teams, where is he?”

Bai Liu moved aside slightly, revealing Du Sanying who was trembling and about to cry behind him.

Du Sanying held Bai Liu’s clothes with tears in her eyes: “Wuwuwu, where is this place…”

Wang Shun: "……"

Forget about this.

After Wang Shun explained science to Du Sanying until he was almost dry-mouthed, Du Sanying barely understood where this place was and what he was supposed to do now.

Du Sanying was taken to the pre-season registration office by Bai Liu.

The registration office was packed with people, especially next to the line-up for team drawing. There were few friendly-looking players, all of whom were eyeing Bai Liu's team, which had an outstanding appearance and was very popular.

Du Sanying pulled out a piece of paper from a large lottery ticket box with shaking hands. He looked down at the name on the paper and whispered, "Nomadic House?"

The expressions of the people guarding nearby changed, and Wang Shun's eyes lit up.

Du Sanying hesitated for a moment, then reached in and drew: "North Star?"

[System prompt: (North Star) has given up, (Wandering Circus) won without a fight and swallowed up the other party's gambling pool.]

【Please select the next team.】

Du Sanying was silent for a while, then continued to draw: "[Stern River Ship Helmsman]?"

[…Has given up…]

"[Sheep-horned Snake Shadow]?"

[…Has given up…]

"[Stormtroopers]…?"

[…Has given up…]

“[Minions of Uza]…?”

[…Has given up…]

“…”

The eyes of the pre-season team players surrounding him almost made a big hole in Du Sanying, who was still drawing the team’s attention. They gritted their teeth and were full of shock.

All the teams gave up, how the hell is this reasonable?!

For others, a random draw is a life-and-death battle, and they have to use all their strength to win a round. But this person is like drawing a scratch-off lottery, with a 100% winning rate. Every time he draws, he takes up the entire gambling pool.

Du Sanying was at a loss as the people around him stared at him. He turned around and glanced at Bai Liu. Bai Liu smiled and motioned for him to continue smoking.

“Butcher?” Du Sanying pulled out another punch and raised his head.

The people around stared at Du Sanying intently, waiting for the system’s answer with bated breath.

[System prompt: (The Butcher) is actively preparing for battle. Please ask the Wandering Circus to go to Game Pool No. 17 to play the game.]

Everyone breathed a sigh of relief at the same time – finally, they were not the team that gave up.

“I, I, I won’t fight anymore, I give up!!” A panicked voice came from the side, “I won’t fight with Mu Sicheng!”

When Mu Sicheng heard his name, he groaned and looked over with a fierce look in his eyes, but he paused when he saw the other person’s face.

“Wow, Wuwu, Mu Shicheng beat me in the game, but I couldn’t beat him!” The man ran away crying, “He also took off my pants and showed them to the monsters!!”

“I don’t want him to take my pants off me again!”

[System Prompt: (The Butcher) has given up, (The Wandering Circus) has won without a fight and swallowed up the other party's gambling pool]

Everyone: "…"

What the hell is going on here?

Bai Liu slowly shifted his gaze to Mu Sicheng's face: "Do you still have this hobby?"

Mu Sicheng was furious: "Can you blame me for this? I was trying to steal something from him, but he plotted against me and I never stole anything. So what's wrong with me bullying him? I didn't really kill him!"

Liu Jiayi sneered: "Only an idiot like you would do such a boring thing."

Mu Sicheng was angry: "Anyway, the result is good!"

Du Sanying continued to draw. He asked slowly and doubtfully, "[Witch Saigao]…?"

Someone nearby stood up and choked up, "I am the tactician of [Witch Saigao], I also give up."

"Our entire team has been saved by the witch, and we are all fans of Liu Jiayi. We will never do anything to hurt her!"

The man looked at Liu Jiayi with affection and said, "Little witch, you have to win our share as well!"

Then he ran away crying.

[System Prompt: (Witch Saigao) has given up, (Wandering Circus) won without a fight and swallowed up the other party's gambling pool]

Liu Jiayi: "…"

Mu Sicheng crossed his arms and said "Wow" while dragging his tail. He looked down at Liu Jiayi with a slanted eye and said, "Is it only a fool like me who would do such a boring thing?"

Liu Jiayi had a blank expression on her face: "What are you talking about? I'm blind and can't hear you."

Du Sanying nervously drew another card: “Silver Rose Team?”

Tang Erda was stunned when he heard the name.

Someone walked out of the team. He looked at Tang Erda and smiled bitterly: “I didn’t expect to meet again in this way, Mr. Hunter.”

“It seems that I have no other choice but to give up.”

The man stepped forward and shook hands with Tang Er, patted his shoulder, and sighed: “Keep up the good work, take care.”

Tang Erda paused and shook his hand back: “Sorry.”

Wang Shun explained to Bai Liu, “Silver Rose is a league team that previously employed Mr. Tang Erda. After leaving Captain Tang, their ranking plummeted and they have been struggling in the pre-season for the past two years.”

“It can be said that this is a team that relies solely on Captain Tang.”

Du Sanying continued to draw at Bai Liu’s signal: “[Puppet Relics] Team?”

A man pushed through the crowd and slowly walked in front of Bai Liu and MuKe, and suddenly laughed: “Long time no see, MuKe, Bai Liu.”

MuKe paused: “Can it be possible?”

Fang Ke scratched the back of his head: “You have a really good memory. You still remember me.”

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes: “Hiss – I feel that this person looks very familiar, but I can’t remember where I met him…”

Wang Shun sighed with a complicated look in his eyes: “I didn’t expect to meet Fang Ke here.”

“He was the last one to survive among the group of puppets that Zhang Kui created before his death. He was in the same group as Liu Huai and Li Gou.” Wang Shun sighed, “After Zhang Kui’s death, he left the King’s Guild. I didn’t expect that he would form his own team to participate in the league.”

Mu Sicheng suddenly realized: “Oh, I remember now, Bai Liu saved his life when the last train exploded.”

Fang Ke looked at Bai Liu and MuKe with mixed feelings and finally smiled with relief: “After Liu Huai died, I was the only puppet of Zhang Kui who was still alive. I joined other guilds and became their tactician.”

“But it seems that I am not destined to be someone else’s tactician.”

Fang Ke raised his hand: “System, I abstain.”

[System Prompt: (Puppet Remnant) has given up, (Wandering Circus) won without a fight and swallowed up the other party’s gambling pool]

Before leaving, Fang Ke turned around and looked at MuKe: “We have to win Liu Huai’s share as well.”

MuKe hummed: “I will.”

Fang Ke looked at Bai Liu again and laughed: “I think you can do it too.”

“You found a very good operator this time.”

Then you can wave goodbye and leave.

Du Sanying was still carefully drawing, and the looks of the onlookers nearby changed from disbelief and amazement at first to envy and jealousy, and finally to hatred.

But as things have developed to this point, everyone’s eyes have become numb.

What’s the point of competing? Hurry up and destroy it.

Pre-season

On the day of the pre-season, the entire game community buzzed with a shocking revelation—there was a team that had won 41 consecutive matches without playing a single official game.

The discussion spread like wildfire. Even during the mid-season matches, where crowds gathered to watch intense battles, people couldn't stop talking about it.

"That's insane," one spectator exclaimed, staggered by the news. "What kind of luck is that?"

A spectator beside him smirked knowingly. "It's because of a newcomer with a luck value of 100."

The first spectator was dumbfounded. "A full hundred points in luck? Why hasn't a big guild recruited this player?"

The other shook his head. "It wouldn't help them. The big guilds don't rely on random draws—they compete against every team in the mid-season based on rankings. Luck doesn't play a role there."

"And in the playoffs? You think luck matters in a structured, skill-based competition?"

The first spectator clicked his tongue. "Fair point, but a high luck value can be really useful in the pre-season."

"Not enough to carry them," the other scoffed. "This team looks like it's just cheating its way through the pre-season, drawing only the weakest opponents."

"They might breeze past the lower-tier teams for now, but once they hit the stronger teams, they'll crumble."

The first spectator hesitated. "Still… I don't think they're that bad. I kind of want to place a bet on them."

His companion snorted. "That so-called 'Wandering Circus'? Yeah, no thanks. I wouldn't bet on them."

"Better them than the big guilds," the first spectator argued, his eyes locked on the massive screen displaying a match. "Look at that—that's what a real, bloody showdown looks like."

On the screen, a man in a Joker mask grinned maniacally, his face splattered with blood. He raised a bright green sniper rifle and, without hesitation, pulled the trigger.

[System Alert: Congratulations to Daniel for winning the single-player tournament. The Deer Hunter Guild has earned one point.]

For two long seconds, silence gripped the viewing pool. Then, deafening cheers erupted, shaking the screens.

“JOKER-!!!”

“JOKER-!!!”

Daniel, still covered in blood, logged out near the massive screen. Thick drops of blood slid down his skin. His paper mask had been soaked through, making it crumple and peel away. He removed it carelessly, tossing it aside.

Just as he was about to leave, he suddenly stopped. Then, with a slow, calculated turn, he looked back at the audience. His smile was so perfectly theatrical, it seemed almost artificial. With exaggerated politeness, he tipped his hat and bowed.

“I’m a clown,” Daniel said smoothly. “So don’t forget to support me.”

His apple-green eyes gleamed with amusement as he grinned. “Or else… well, you saw what happened to that guy on TV, didn’t you?”

On the screen behind him, his latest victim lay in a pool of blood, his face twisted in agony. Bullet holes riddled his body. He had been tortured to death.

Daniel let out a soft chuckle, waving a hand dismissively. “Ciao~”

Then, he walked off the stage, completely ignoring the frenzied cheers.

The first spectator gulped. “He’s… terrifying. I think I prefer a more tactical playstyle—like Bai Liu’s. That Wandering Circus team at least plays smart.”

The first spectator frowned. “Still, Bai Liu’s playstyle is impressive—”

“Bai Liu?” The other sneered. “That guy’s nothing but a coward. Always looking for the easy way out. He’ll get crushed by the real strong players sooner or later. The moment he dies, I’m betting everything on his opponent.”

At that exact moment, Daniel—still dripping in blood—came to a halt in the middle of the street. He turned his head slightly… and then, in an instant, he vanished from sight.

Before the spectator could react, Daniel appeared directly in front of him, his movement too fast to follow.

A cold, metallic barrel pressed against the spectator’s forehead.

Daniel’s eerie, smiling face hovered just inches away. “I think I just heard you bad-mouthing Bai Liu.”

The crowd collectively sucked in a breath.

The spectator was frozen, his whole body trembling. He stared at the green sniper rifle aimed at his head—a weapon that could destroy a person’s very soul.

“I-I… I said Bai Liu is a coward, and that you’re really strong.” His voice shook violently. He forced a trembling thumbs-up.

Daniel’s expression turned ice-cold in an instant. His fake smile vanished.

“I hate hearing people talk badly about Bai Liu.”

His voice was void of warmth.

“Because he’s the best.”

Daniel pulled the trigger.

BANG, BANG, BANG, BANG—!

The spectator shrieked, covering his head, cowering under his chair. But after a moment, he realized—he was still alive.

It hit him then. This was the Central Hall. Daniel couldn’t actually attack him here.

Daniel sighed dramatically, looking at his useless sniper rifle with disappointment. “Right. I forgot… no killing in Central Hall.”

The spectator raised his hands, practically in tears. “I won’t say a word about Bai Liu again! I swear! I—I’ll bet everything on him! He’s the best! The absolute best!”

Daniel tilted his head, watching him with an unreadable gaze. Then, his lips curled into a mocking smile.

“But you’re not the best.”

He lifted the man’s chin with the barrel of his rifle, looking at him like he was something filthy. “You think you’re worthy of betting on Bai Liu?”

“Bai Liu doesn’t need low-level fans like you.”

Daniel straightened, putting his gun away with an almost gentle motion. His tone turned soft, disturbingly friendly.

“So, how about this?” His eyes gleamed. “Come into the game with me.”

His grin stretched wider.

“Let me kill you.”

The spectator’s breath hitched. His eyes darted around, searching desperately for help.

But the surrounding audience had already backed far away.

No one was coming to save him.

"Joker." Cen Buming, president of the Deer Hunters, approached, sweeping a casual glance over the spectator before turning back to Daniel. "There's a doubles match coming up. Don't cause trouble."

The audience looked at Cen Buming with gratitude.

Daniel didn’t take his eyes off the spectator. "I’m not in the doubles match, am I? I’ll be back before the team match starts."

He finally turned to Cen Buming, a smile curling on his lips. "I’ll be back when I’ve killed him. It won’t take long."

The audience went limp, stunned into silence.

In the lounge, Wang Shun looked at the others. "We'll have an easier time early in the pre-season thanks to Du Sanying," he said.

"But that doesn't mean we can get complacent. The mid-season is just as important."

Clicking on the system panel, a mid-season round robin flowchart popped up.

"Unlike the pre-season, which has multiple random matches, the mid-season consists of 496 games in total—16 games per day, lasting for 31 days, or about a month."

He scrolled further. "As per usual, the mid-season tends to end around the same time as the pre-season, sometimes even earlier."

Another click, and a table of rankings appeared.

"What matters in the mid-season is the popularity rankings. Most of the audience-favorite players are concentrated here."

He pointed at the screen. "This is the current top 300 list. But take note—you need to be in the top 100 before the next league starts to secure a death-free pass."

Wang Shun turned to them. "The reason I'm showing you the top 300 is that two of you are on it."

"Liu Jiayi, ranked 267 in popularity."

"Bai Liu, ranked 248."

He tapped the panel again. "Incidentally, thanks to Du Sanying's impressive card draw today, he shot up to 351."

Du Sanying let out a surprised squeak, pointing at himself. "Me?"

Mu Sicheng slammed the table. "Bullshit! Du Sanying made the list, and I didn't?!"

Wang Shun looked like he wanted to cry. "God Mu, you, Tang Erda, and Muke ranked low because you guys don't engage with the audience. Once you enter the game pool, you basically vanish."

"Plenty of viewers thought you were dead."

Mu Sicheng: "… I'm sorry to disappoint, but I'm still alive."

Tang Erda coughed awkwardly.

Muke remained calm. His skillset as an assassin meant keeping a low profile was preferable.

"During the league, every match can cause drastic ranking shifts," Wang Shun continued. "Today, aside from Du Sanying, two newcomers experienced major ranking changes."

"One was Golden Dawn's Armand, who climbed from 681 to 302 after a stellar solo performance."

His gaze flickered to Bai Liu. "The other is Deer Hunters' Joker. He jumped from 549 to 203, then dropped to 321."

Wang Shun focused the display on Joker. "He rose in the rankings due to his outstanding singles match and his brutal, aggressive playstyle, which drew the audience's attention."

He tapped the panel, and an image appeared—a corpse with a grotesquely twisted face.

"This is what an opponent looks like after dying to Joker. A gruesome death."

His expression darkened. "But that's not the issue. Abusing opponents is fairly common in the league—it shocks the audience, but it doesn't usually affect rankings negatively."

"Joker dropped because he left the match to attack a spectator while the Deer Hunters were still competing in a doubles round."

Another tap. A player with his skull caved in appeared on the screen.

"This is what his players look like."

Wang Shun's voice was tight. "From what I've gathered, Joker used some kind of prop to force a spectator into the game, then logged in after them, killed them to clear the match, and came right back out—just in time to catch the Deer Hunters' team game."

His face was grave. "This newcomer is very, very dangerous."

Du Sanying hesitantly raised his hand. "Uh… his ranking is climbing again."

Wang Shun stiffened, then snapped his head to the rankings—Joker's placement was skyrocketing from 321 to over 200 in an instant.

Mu Sicheng gawked. "How the hell is he going up again?!"

Wang Shun's eyes flicked across the forum. "The Deer Hunters lost their doubles match, forcing them into a team match. When I last checked, their team match was still ongoing."

His grip on the panel tightened. "This ranking jump can only mean one thing."

Bai Liu's voice was cold. "He won again."

Wang Shun exhaled sharply. "Yes. And not just that—he must've been the MVP, or his rank wouldn't have shot up this much."

Mu Sicheng stared at the rankings, hesitating before tapping Bai Liu's shoulder. "Bai Liu… am I seeing things, or…?"

"Your ranking is going up with his."

Mid-Season Viewing Pool
[System Alert: The Deer Hunter Guild has won the tournament, accumulating 8 points.]

[System Alert: The Deer Hunter Guild has won one singles match and one team match, totaling 9 points.]

The crowd erupted—nothing excited them more than a rising dark horse.

But this time, it wasn't like when Daniel won his first match.

The audience stared at the Joker in fear, wanting to cheer but not daring to make a sound.

It hadn't been long since the last spectator was murdered. No one wanted to provoke him.

The entire viewing pool buzzed with hushed excitement, their silence feeling eerily like a moment of respect for the two players Joker had just slaughtered.

Blood dripped from Daniel's body as he logged out. He shrugged off his clown mask and strode down the walkway—before abruptly stopping.

He turned back, gaze locking onto the spectators.

They flinched, instinctively leaning away.

… Terrifying.

Then, Daniel grinned. He waved, a casual, almost boyish gesture—like a neighbor greeting an old friend.

"I had a tough game today. Be sure to support me by placing your bets, yeah? Thanks."

His expression remained light, apple-green eyes gleaming with amusement.

"Oh, and—" his voice turned airy, almost playful. "If you hate Bai Liu, don’t bother betting on me."

The audience held their breath.

Daniel’s grin widened. "Because I don’t need the support of dead men. I’ll kill you all."

He waved once more—this time, blowing an uncharacteristically flirtatious kiss with two fingers before turning on his heel. "Ciao~ (Goodbye)"

Pre-season

Pre-Season Day 2
Du Sanying was drawn for the eighteenth time before a team finally appeared that didn't forfeit.

But this team… went on stage crying.

Wang Shun sat in their viewing pool, the corner of his brow twitching, while Bai Liu remained calmly beside him.

Their opponents huddled together on a bench, trembling. Every so often, one of them would sneak a glance at Bai Liu—who returned their gaze with such gentle eyes that they nearly screamed in terror. The five of them shivered in unison, sobbing quietly.

"They're scared because of the Joker's declaration earlier." Wang Shun groaned. "They think you're one of those Joker types who enjoys taking things to the extreme."

Bai Liu chuckled. "Not bad for showing up despite being this terrified."

"It's not like they have a choice." Wang Shun sighed. "A small guild like theirs doesn't even know if it'll survive next year. It's a gamble either way."

Bai Liu turned his gaze toward the large TV screen in the middle of the viewing pool. "Do you think we can finish the battle before the team match today?"

Wang Shun hesitated. After a long pause, he admitted, "I don't know."

"The pre-season uses a point system per game," he explained. "Unlike the mid-season, where points are settled cumulatively, here, it's per match."

"One point for singles, three for doubles, and eight for team matches."

"On paper, that makes singles and doubles seem insignificant. In the end, the real decider is the team competition."

"But that's not entirely true." Wang Shun's expression turned serious.

"There's one particular case where the match ends immediately—if you win both singles and doubles."

He pulled up a panel for Bai Liu. "There's a special rule for singles and doubles called the 'Time Limit Rule.'"

"This rule states that if a single or doubles match is completed within one dimensional hour, the points for that match are doubled."

"In other words, if both singles and doubles finish within the time limit, their combined points double to eight."

Wang Shun glanced at Bai Liu. "At that point, the match ends early. We call it an 'early kill.'"

"Early kills are nearly impossible in the mid-season and playoffs. Even in pre-season, they're rare. The time constraint is so strict that it only happens when there's a massive gap in strength."

Bai Liu rested his chin on his hand, a lazy smirk curling his lips. "Which means if we manage to pull off an early kill, the attention we'll get will increase exponentially, right?"

Wang Shun nodded. "Exactly. It proves the team is overwhelmingly strong—and strength is the most attractive trait in the league."

"If you secure an early kill…" Wang Shun took a deep breath. "The sheer amount of attention it draws can instantly make up for all the exposure you've missed in the game pool."

His gaze flickered toward Tang Erda, who was warming up in the viewing pool. He murmured, "An early kill… That's what every tactician dreams of."

Suddenly, the large screen in the center of the viewing pool flickered to life, displaying a new message.

[System Alert: Single-player tournament is about to begin.]

[Wandering Circus Crew (Rose Hunters) vs. Celebes Crew (Hikers)]

[Game: "Dreamboat"]

[Objective: Kill the captain of the Dreamboat. The first player to land on the Lost Lands wins.]

[Game start!]

A flash of white light engulfed Tang Erda and his opponent. The next moment, their figures appeared on the massive TV screen.

Seven dimensional minutes later.

Tang Erda logged out, securing his gun against his back.

Almost immediately, his opponent's eyes glazed over, and he collapsed to his knees, trembling in pain before logging out.

Tang Erda hesitated for a moment but then reached out, helping the dazed player to their feet. He nodded naturally and said, "Thank you."

[System Alert: Player (Rose Hunter) has achieved an early kill and won the single-player match, accumulating 2 points.]

Tang Erda walked over to Bai Liu and sat down, nodding in greeting. Bai Liu smiled. "Well done, Captain Tang."

"It's our turn next."

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng stood up leisurely.

[System Alert: The doubles match is about to begin.]

.....

Fifty-seven dimensional minutes later.

Bai Liu straightened his white shirt as he stepped off the field, accompanied by a grumbling Mu Sicheng.

"Shit, why did it take so long?!" Mu Sicheng was visibly frustrated. "Tang Erda finished in seven minutes! Why the hell did it take us over fifty?!"

He shot Bai Liu a pointed look. "Bai Liu, is there something wrong with your command?"

Bai Liu, completely unfazed, replied smoothly, "Yes. Especially when you dropped out of the group mid-match, rushed off to kill the boss alone, and almost dragged me down with you. I'd say that did present some issues with my command."

Mu Sicheng: "……"

His arrogance deflated instantly. He muttered under his breath, "Didn't I just want to finish the match early…"

Bai Liu's smile was almost predatory. "If you want to end the game quickly, you should listen to me next time."

Mu Sicheng: "……Fine."

On the opposite side, their defeated opponents sat paralyzed on the floor, gasping for breath. Their eyes were unfocused, disbelief written all over their faces.

The match had been brutal. It was supposed to be a two-player game requiring tight coordination, yet halfway through, one of the Wandering Circus players had vanished from sight. Even so, the strategist in the white shirt remained eerily calm, continuing to play at a steady, unhurried pace—until he nearly forced an early kill just by manipulating the game mechanics.

His ability to calculate… it's terrifying.

[System Alert: Players Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng have won the doubles match with an early kill, earning 6 points.]
[System Alert: Wandering Circus has accumulated a total of 8 points, achieving an early kill and advancing to the next round.]
[Celebes Team Eliminated.]

Du Sanying carefully read the next name on the slip. “[Emerald Tiger Titan]…”

……

[System Alert: Wandering Circus has accumulated a total of 8 points, achieving an early kill and advancing to the next round.]
[Emerald Tiger Titan Team Eliminated.]

……

Du Sanying reached into the cardboard box under the almost dazed and awed gaze of the people around him. He read out the name of the team on it word by word: “Storm Mansion?”

The people nearby stole a glance at Bai Liu, who was standing behind Du Sanying and watching him draw the team, and discussed cautiously in low voices:

“…Will the Wandering Circus finish the game early this time?”

“Storm Mansion was at least one of the top 100 teams in the pre-season last year! No matter what, they have to play a team match!”

“Let’s go over and take a look later. I’ll write down the number of their viewing pool. It’s 98, right?”

Viewing Pool No. 98 was packed with people, and the audience that came later seemed to have nowhere to sit, but fortunately it was only visually dense.

The viewing pools within the system are spaces that can be extended infinitely and can accommodate an unlimited number of spectators.

Everyone in the audience was discussing:

“Too strong, he killed all the players ahead of time…”

“Last year’s killer sequence was only able to kill the game early in the singles competition, the doubles competition was not that strong…”

“This team is mostly made up of newcomers, right?! Why are they so strong?!”

The audience was startled, and the moment they turned their heads, they gasped: “Red Hearts, the Queen of Hearts!”

Hearts smiled and waved her hand at them to say hello: “Hello.”

One audience member was so excited that his face flushed, his eyes sparkled, and he was so excited that he spoke incoherently: “I’m your fan, Queen, I love you very much! I’ve put all my points on the King’s Guild!”

Hearts smiled with her eyebrows curved: “Really? Thank you for your love, but boys still have to save some money for themselves to be married.”

The audience member nodded shyly and obediently, stammering, “I, I will, Empress!”

“Why is the Queen here to watch the game?” the audience asked cautiously, “Shouldn’t you be preparing for the mid-season game?”

Hearts looked at the screen in the middle of the viewing pool, resting her chin on her hand and whispering, “There is no King’s Guild match today, so I slipped out to watch other people’s matches, but I still have to go back later.”

“There is a Killer Sequence competition today.”

The audience member visibly wilted, and said in a frustrated voice: “Empress, are you going back to watch Spades’ game?”

Hearts smiled and said, “Yes.”

This audience member looked like he was about to cry, he liked Hearts, but it was an open secret in the game that Hearts was chasing Spades, and Hearts mentioning Spades in person obviously hurt the heart of this “husband fan”.

Seeing that the audience member was about to burst into tears, the audience next to him quickly changed the subject: “What’s the matter with the Queen just saying that the new team of the Wandering Circus is so strong because of the tactician?”

“I thought these newcomers were very strong.” The audience glanced at Liu Jiayi who was sitting next to Bai Liu, “…such as the little witch.”

Hearts’ eyes fell lightly on the little witch’s back: “Jiayi is indeed very strong, but she is also the most unstable in the team. I have spent a lot of effort but it is still difficult to balance her instability.”

“All newcomers have this problem, so in the game, newcomers are like a time bomb, and mistakes will occur from time to time to detonate the game.”

Hearts’ gaze shifted to Bai Liu’s back: “This is something that only a tactician can do, balancing the instability of the team members.”

“The stronger the newcomers are, the harder it is to balance the instability. The tacticians of the Wandering Circus can absorb the instability of so many newcomers. This is a very impressive thing.”

Hearts exchanged her hands supporting her chin, her posture was leisurely and lazy, and her eyes were filled with a layer of misty light:

“I like men who are good with whips. If I hadn’t met Spades first, I would have liked him too.”

The fans and spectators nearby were indignant: “But he used a shady trick to snatch away your little witch, Queen!”

Hearts’ wine-red eyes turned and glanced at the audience out of the corner of her eye.

The audience fell silent subconsciously after seeing Hearts' look.

Hearts shifted her gaze to the big screen again and said in a light tone:

"Jiayi wasn't taken away by anyone."

"Jiayi chose to go with him, and I failed to keep her. I came here today to see Jiayi's performance. Don't treat Jiayi as an object in front of me. I don't like it."

A nearby audience member crossed his arms and scoffed. "Queen of Hearts, after all this time, are you still incapable of judging tacticians by the same standards as men?"

"Does being good-looking or handling a whip well automatically make someone superior in your eyes?"

Hearts lazily lifted her gaze, studying him for a moment before finally reacting. "Ah… You're the tactician of the Fanatic Lambs, aren't you?"

The man sneered and said complacently: "It seems that the Queen still remembers me. Have I caught the Queen's eye?"

Hearts smiled gently: "Actually, I don't remember much. I don't remember the ugly men who lost to me."

The man stood up in a rage, but the next second he forced himself to sit down again, and said sarcastically with a twisted look, "Hearts, don't be so complacent. After I successfully breakthrough in this pre-season, you bitch, will have a hard time."

"Is that so?" Hearts smiled nonchalantly and tilted her head, her long wine-red hair falling down. "Why don't you beat Bai Liu once and let me see?"

"Bai Liu?" The man looked extremely disdainful. "Only people like you who are deceived by appearances would think that Bai Liu has tactics. In my opinion, this person is just killing the goose that lays the golden eggs and trying to attract attention. He is the lowest level of tactician."

Hearts picked up on the conversation with a hint of interest. "Bai Liu won all the way to the competition."

"That's where Bai Liu is so wrong." The man snorted. "I don't need to tell you how fatal the instability of newcomers is, right, Hearts?"

"Instead of playing a few more structured games early in the pre-season to iron out the team's inconsistencies, Bai Liu wasted opportunity after opportunity. He focused on ending games early for notoriety instead of refining his team's coordination."

He let out a mocking laugh. "Short-sighted fools."

"You'll see—when Bai Liu plays a group game later on, he's going to run into real trouble. His tactics just don't hold up."

As they spoke, the screen in the middle of the viewing pool flickered.

[System Alert: Wandering Circus has 8 points, killed the game early, and advanced to the next round.]

[Stormy House team eliminated.]

The crowd erupted into a frenzy. The deafening cheers drowned out the conversation, and even the fan sitting beside Hearts barely noticed her anymore.

He jumped to his feet, waving his arms wildly, shouting the names of the Wandering Circus and Bai Liu.

In the league, winning meant everything.

Hearts withdrew her gaze. "So, your tactic of ambushing opponents in reality is working?"

Bai Liu, who had just logged out, dusted off his shirt. Across from him, the Frenzied Lamb tactician leaned back in his seat, shifting his gaze away from Bai Liu—who seemed entirely unaware of the hostility directed at him. Slowly, the man's lips curled into a sneer, his expression turning progressively darker.

"Of course."

"In a team already weak in cohesion, if one of Bai Liu's key players gets injured or slips up, they're bound to lose."

Hearts remained unfazed. "Your tactics have a fatal flaw."

The man glanced at her with mild disdain. "Little Witch, isn't it?"

"As long as I don't kill them outright, they'll still be able to enter the game, and the Little Witch can just heal them with her potions."

"Yes." Hearts leaned forward, her voice soft but cutting. A sharp playing card materialized between her fingers, the edge pressing against the man's neck. Lifting it slightly, she whispered, "And if you so much as touch the Little Witch, I can't kill you here, but I wouldn't mind using your own tactics."

"Taking you out off the field."

The man lazily raised his hands in mock surrender, as if he wasn't taking the threat seriously. "Relax. I won't touch the Little Witch. Her skill set is too rare—I'd rather recruit her when we enter the league next year."

He smirked. "She's not the one I plan to target."

"I prefer to take down jugglers." His gaze darkened as it settled on Bai Liu. "Especially the flashy ones."

After their match against Stormy House, Mu Sicheng stretched, following Bai Liu out of the viewing pool. "Are we still playing today?"

"No more matches," Bai Liu replied. "We're heading to the game pool to practice for team play."

Mu Sicheng blinked. "Huh? Why not just practice team games directly?"

"If you forfeit singles or doubles, you can just play team matches one by one, right?" Mu Sicheng asked, genuinely puzzled. "Why go to the game pool when there's no real opponent?"

Bai Liu answered lightly, "Who said there's no opponent? Your opponent is Captain Tang."

Mu Sicheng stiffened. "Tang Erda???"

"Yes," Wang Shun confirmed with a nod. "President Bai and I discussed this at length and settled on this method."

"God Mu, you, Liu Jiayi, and Muke are all new to the league. You've never played at this level before, which means there's a lot of instability in your coordination. Especially in team games, where poor synchronization can disrupt both attack and defense rhythms."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Wouldn't it be better to practice during pre-season?"

"No. Pre-season games expose too much information." Wang Shun shook his head. "That's one issue. The other is that your pre-season opponents—well, you saw them today. Do you really think playing against them is going to help you improve?"

Mu Sicheng fell silent.

To be honest, today's opponent had been so weak that it almost gave him a false sense of confidence. The league? That's it?

Wang Shun sighed. "You're feeling it, aren't you? They're so weak it's pointless."

"For strong newcomers like you, using teams like these as a grindstone will only get you accustomed to a low-level playstyle."

"But soon, you'll be up against top guilds. The sudden spike in difficulty will throw you off. That's why using these weak teams for training isn't something Bai Liu and I agree with."

Mu Sicheng scratched the back of his neck, frustrated. "But Bai Liu and I already work well together. Do we really need all this extra training?"

Wang Shun let out another weary sigh. "It's not that you and Bai Liu work well together. It's that Bai Liu works well with you."

"Bai Liu can work well with anyone, not just you. That includes Captain Tang—he's an experienced starter and can compensate for your mistakes to some extent."

"The real issue is you three working with each other. Bai Liu and Captain Tang are fine. Bai Liu doesn't need to be in your training group."

Mu Sicheng jabbed a finger at Bai Liu in protest. "But this guy is a newcomer too! Why isn't he training with us?"

Liu Jiayi rolled her eyes. "Do you seriously think we're on the same level as Bai Liu, that freak of nature?"

Muke nodded solemnly. "I'll train."

Bai Liu smiled. "I need to train too—just not in your group."

Muke hesitated, glancing between Bai Liu and Tang Erda. His eyes widened as realization dawned, and he swallowed nervously. "Wait… Bai Liu is going to…"

"Yes," Bai Liu confirmed, smiling. "I'll be on Captain Tang's side."

"You three will be one team. Your opponents will be me and Captain Tang."

Behind Bai Liu, Tang Erda approached with a stern expression, arms crossed. His sharp gaze flickered over them, void of any mercy.

Bai Liu's smile remained friendly. "With me and Captain Tang together, I think we'll be more than enough to polish out your instability."

Mu Sicheng, Liu Jiayi, Muke: "……"

Wang Shun turned to Bai Liu. "Today's game pool was auctioned off by our guild, so you can visit it anytime, except..."

Bai Liu glanced at Wang Shun. "Is there something else?"

Wang Shun hesitated for a moment before replying, "There's a killer sequence match today against last year's 27th-ranked team, [Skeleton Legion]. It's about to start. Do you want to watch it before heading over?"

Bai Liu paused briefly. "Let's go."

Killer Sequence Race Viewing Pool

This massive viewing pool was probably ten times more crowded than Bai Liu's previous pool, No. 98.

Bai Liu stood at the far end of the pool, his gaze fixed downward as he watched the killings unfold on the large screen at the center.

There was also a host in front of the screen, excitedly commentating with a microphone.

"What you're seeing now is our strongest player in the Slayer Sequence, [Spades], facing off against a member of the Skeleton Legion, [Disciples], who also performed well in last year's single-player tournament..."

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but complain, "This guy is so annoying."

Wang Shun explained in a whisper, "Popular matches have commentators. You'll have to get used to it, but you won't hear them during the game."

The host suddenly raised his voice, "Spades! Our Spades has the whip around his opponent's neck! Is he trying to end the match early?"

On the big screen, Spades knelt on one knee over another player's shoulder, his expression cold as he held the whip in one hand, strangling his opponent. The other player's face turned purple before he collapsed, bringing Spades down with him.

Spades smoothly flipped and seemed to grab something from the [Disciple], and then the screen went black.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Spades for collecting all the key items.]

[System Alert: Player Spades kills the match early and wins the single-player match with 2 points.]

The room fell silent for a moment, then erupted in cheers.

The host's loud voice cut through the noise, "The game is over in 5 dimensional minutes! A new record for a single mid-season match! And this is the first match of the killer sequence!"

"This team of last year's champions has returned stronger than ever!"

Spades logged out of the game in full view of the crowd, walking straight back to his seat without even glancing around.

He nodded with a bemused expression, his eyes lowered as he wrapped bandages around his hands and the handle of his whip.

The crowd's frenzied attention was solely focused on Spades, but he never looked at them. The cheers and screams of the onlookers seemed irrelevant to him, as if he were a god long worshipped, powerful to the point of being a stranger.

Soon, the pairs race began.

[System Alert: Double Race about to start.]

[Bai Yi, Bai Jiamu vs. Centurion, Bone Shield Rider, Skeleton Legionnaire.]

The host droned on, excitedly commentating, "The pairs competition was always a weakness in the killer sequence last year. I wonder what's changed this year..."

Mu Sicheng, watching the big screen, observed Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu's flawless counter-attacks, gradually pressing their opponents into submission. His face grew darker.

Bai Liu asked calmly, "What do you see?"

Mu Sicheng ground his teeth. "Do these two share a brain?"

"The coordination is insane," Liu Jiayi added, her expression tightening. "When one moves, the other responds instantly, as if they're one person, and all their actions flow seamlessly together."

"And I didn't see any sign of communication," Muke remarked, taking a deep breath. "How?"

The four men on the big screen were tangled in a small space.

Just as Bai Yi was about to be struck from behind by a skeleton's bony claws, Bai Jiamu swooped in with a sharp eye, opening a scalpel without missing a beat.

Meanwhile, Bai Jiamu's opponent was sent flying by a backhand from Bai Yi, deflecting the attack with precision.

In such a confined space, these two didn't so much as graze each other while executing their moves, and everything seemed to be in perfect sync, even though they exchanged not a single word.

Step by step, the opponents were pushed into a corner and eventually lost.

[System Alert: Player Bai Yi, Bai Jiamu kills the match early and wins the single-player match with 6 points.]

[System Alert: Killer Sequence has accumulated 8 points in this match, ending the game early.]

[The Skeleton Legion has 0 points for the game.]

The room was buzzing with excitement.

The crowd cheered wildly for the Killer Sequence and Spades, some even dancing in their seats as if the winner had already been decided.

Wang Shun watched with mixed emotions. "This is the beauty of top guild competitions."

"Compared to last year's killer sequence, this year's has matured a lot," Liu Jiayi analyzed calmly. "That tactician must be the one who trained this team so well."

Bai Liu watched for a moment before turning around. "Alright, let's get to training. We're nowhere near their level yet."

After the Game, Killer Sequence Lounge

Reverse God clutched his head, eyes dull, muttering to himself, "What do we do? The next game is against the eighth-ranked team. They're strong. We can't kill the game early. We'll have to play a group match..."

The others didn't seem anxious. After all, the game had been killed early today, and Bai Yi was excitedly circling Reverse God.

Only Liao Ke looked at Reverse God with sympathy. "Has it gotten that bad?"

Reverse God nodded gravely. "Yes."

Bai Yi, curious, sat beside him. "Didn't we kill the game early today? What's so grim about it?"

Reverse God sighed. "I didn't kill the game early just for show. I did it to avoid a group match."

"Our group games are immature, and we'll get crushed by those big guilds that have honed their strategies."

"You're the culprit!" Reverse God glared resentfully at Spades, who appeared to be dozing on the couch.

Spades rolled over and went back to sleep.

Reverse God sighed in exasperation. "Forget it, it's useless to scold you now. Anyway, it means we're in a dangerous position and need more practice for group matches."

He turned to Liao Ke. "Did we rent today's game pool?"

Liao Ke shrugged. "No, we were late. The one who rented the game pool today was the Wandering Circus. This team also killed the game in advance all the way today."

"I guess it's similar to our situation," Reverse God mused. "Team competition is their weakness, so they rented the game pool to practice."

He glanced at Spades, still lounging on the sofa, and raised his voice intentionally. "Wandering Circus, their tactician is Bai Liu, right?"

Spades, who had been sleeping, suddenly sat up, eyes wide.

His face still marked with red imprints from sleep, he fixed his gaze on Reverse God. "Bai Liu, where is he?"

Reverse God: "..."

The Reverse God scowled. "Bai Liu is in the game pool. Do you want to go find him?"

Spades looked at the Reverse God. "Why do you want me to look for Bai Liu?"

The Reverse God hesitated. "Bai Liu bought the game pool, and I want to ask if we can use a part of it. Of course, it won't be free, but we're willing to pay."

"Don't you think that you and Bai Liu are the only ones with a good relationship here? You seem to have some pull," the Reverse God added, trying to lighten the mood.

Spades straightened his back, nodded approvingly, then stood up, his expression unchanged. "I'll take you to ask him, then."

Liao Ke, watching from the side, thought, Spades, you're so easy to fool.

Outside the game pool, the Reverse God stared at the sign reading Do not enter unless you are a member of the circus, scratched his head, and tentatively took a step inside.

An alarm bell immediately went off.

Bai Liu walked out from the pool, followed by Tang Erda, who was packing his gun.

It took a while, but Mu Sicheng, with a bruised nose, Muke, with a bloody mouth, and Liu Jiayi, who was in slightly better shape but clearly bruised, finally crawled out of the pool on their hands and knees.

Mu Sicheng slumped to the ground, spat out a mouthful of blood, and cursed in disbelief, "Bai Liu, you bastard, it was just training, but you're too cruel!"

Muke sat up, clutching his sword, panting heavily, his lips trembling as he struggled to speak.

Liu Jiayi, who had recovered a bit more, collapsed to the ground in exhaustion, took a deep breath, and began coughing. "Bai Liu, I really thought you were going to kill us for the team."

Bai Liu smiled. "Not really. I just didn't think you could handle that level of play. Better to fail here than die in a real league match."

Mu Sicheng, seething with anger, pointed at Bai Liu like a tattletale, addressing Liu Jiayi. "I told you! I said Bai Liu might try to kill us, and look—he admitted it!"

"Where are you going to find a better crew when we're dead?"

Bai Liu glanced toward the entrance of the game pool.

Mu Sicheng followed his gaze, spotting the awkward Reverse God and Spades, who was staring at Bai Liu, standing at the entrance.

"What's the Killer Sequence doing here?" Mu Sicheng stood up alertly, stepping in front of Bai Liu. "Hey, we rented the game pool for the day. Can't you see the sign? 'No Stray Circus Members Allowed'?"

Bai Liu stepped forward, looking at the Reverse God. "What can I do for you?"

The Reverse God scratched his face, avoiding eye contact. "It's a bit embarrassing, but Bai Liu, can we borrow the game pool your team rents?"

"Of course, it's not free!" Seeing the wandering circus members eyeing them, the Reverse God hurriedly waved his hand. "We'll pay, name your price!"

Bai Liu thought for a moment. "Yes."

Mu Sicheng gasped, "Bai Liu!"

Bai Liu smiled and looked at the Reverse God. "But it's not just money. I need something else, too."

The Reverse God's expression shifted. "What?"

Bai Liu grinned. "Some information I've been needing recently."

The Reverse God seemed to understand. "Ah, you mean the Mad Lamb and Russell Cemetery, right?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied with a friendly smile. "Mr. Reverse God, you're one of the few tacticians I know who has fought and won against both guilds. I'm sure you must have some key experience to share."

The Reverse God studied Bai Liu for a moment, his eyes cryptic. He rubbed his chin and then broke into a bright smile. "Of course! Tacticians should always help each other out!"

He then casually took Bai Liu by the shoulders and pushed him aside. "But that's a long story. How about I come over and talk to you alone while you let my players use the game pool?"

Bai Liu glanced at the Reverse God before turning to speak with Tang Erda. "Let them in, train first. I'll talk to the Reverse God."

Tang Erda nodded and dragged Mu Sicheng, who was reluctant and kept glancing back at Bai Liu, inside.

The killers needed to train in the game pool, but Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi were doing their best to keep Spades at bay.

Spades stood watching Bai Liu, who was talking to the Reverse God in the corner, while Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi, panting from exhaustion, struggled to carry him in.

Bai Yi was fuming. "Spades, didn't you hear the Reverse God? He told us to go in and train!"

Spades paused and replied flatly, "I don't want to go in and train."

Bai Jiamu asked, frustrated, "Then why are you here?"

Spades replied quietly, "I didn't come here for the training."

Bai Yi's brow furrowed. "So, what are you here for?"

Spades fell silent.

He had come for Bai Liu, but Bai Liu was clearly ignoring him. He wasn't looking at him or talking to him at all.

Liao Ke shouted helplessly and amusingly, "Reverse God, Spades is guarding the door and won't go in to train."

The Reverse God turned his head to see Spades staring directly at Bai Liu. He pressed his forehead in pain before glancing sharply at Bai Liu and bowing his hands. "President Bai, please do something. Ask Spades to go in and train. He doesn't listen to me much—only you."

Bai Liu observed Spades from a distance, his expression light. "He's not my main attacker. Doesn't it seem unreasonable to ask for my orders, Reverse God?"

The Reverse God chuckled. "There must be a lot of unreasonable things happening to you, President Bai. You use unreasonable things as an excuse… President Bai is so bothered by Spades that you don't even dare to say a word to him?"

Bai Liu fell silent for a moment before finally speaking. "Spades, go in and train."

Spades were silent for a moment, then gave a soft "oh" before turning and heading into the gaming pool lobby. His hand gripped his whip tightly, striking his knee with a violent fling, as if punishing himself.

The Reverse God relieved that Spades was finally complying, bowed deeply. "Thank you, President Bai."

Bai Liu gave him a sidelong glance. "You're welcome. And I hope, Mr. Reverse God, that you will provide me with satisfying information."

The Reverse God straightened up, his smile fading. "As for the intelligence on Russell Cemetery, your guild's intelligence master gathered nearly complete data. Beyond that, I have little more."

He paused before continuing. "As for how I defeated them, that involves the secrets of my skills, so I can't tell you."

He leaned against the wall with a sigh. "But my opinion is that Russell Cemetery is a team that changes players constantly. Intelligence doesn't do much; you have to face them on the field. It's a real pain."

He shifted slightly and added, "But I do have some information about the Frenzied Lamb."

The Reverse God's gaze turned serious as he looked at Bai Liu. "This team, in my opinion, is more dangerous than Russell Cemetery."

Bai Liu nodded. "I know you killed their tactician in a challenge."

The Reverse God paused. "We failed to kill him. That tactician has a golden medal of immunity from death. He is still the tactician of Fanatic Lambs."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "I've heard you're known for being a moderate, never hurting anyone, let alone killing. So why did you do it in that instance?"

The Reverse God's eyes drifted toward the empty gaming pool entrance, his gaze distant. "There are two people on that team with lethal skills."

"One is their tactician, Kong Yangxu. His skill is [Silence]. After using it, he can freeze the panels of all players on the field, including their own."

He exhaled slowly. "After the system panel was frozen, skills, systems, and stored items were all unusable. The advantages accumulated by the large guild disappeared in an instant."

He frowned, his voice growing softer. "At this time, if there is no player in the team who has a golden medal of immunity from death and is injured." The Reverse God leaned his head against the wall, and exhaled with a look of realization, "It's a nightmare."

"They will attack this player desperately, trying to kill him, because they know that if this player dies, he is really dead."

"For a guild like the Deer Hunters that has a strong sense of team spirit, this kind of behavior will destroy our mentality."

"Because the panel is frozen, I, as a tactician, can't even click on the panel to give up. I can only watch them slaughter the team members. I also have to grit my teeth and complete the game mission, because only by clearing the game can the game end."

The Reverse God said calmly: "In the end, I killed the opponent's tactician, terminated his skills, and won the game."

Bai Liu asked: "What is the other lethal skill?"

The Reverse God recalled: "It's called [paparazzi]."

"This skill is the most dangerous one." the Reverse God turned his head, "This skill is not used on the field, but off the field."

"This skill captures the real coordinates of the person you are most in contact with."

"After getting the coordinates, they will attack the person at those coordinates in reality. At the same time, they will notify you and ask you to rush over. You will witness the person being attacked."

When the Reverse God reached this point, he opened his mouth as if he wanted to say something, but in the end, nothing came out.

Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at the Reverse God who had suddenly fallen silent: "I don't like to hear people reveal their own scars."

"But if you urgently need someone to listen to your story right now, I can listen to your complaints for free without charging you any fees."

Bai Liu remained calm and said, "I'm a tight-lipped person. No one would know from me that the famous No. 1 tactician had such a tragic past."

The Reverse God couldn't help laughing: "Then shouldn't I thank you?"

Bai Liu nodded: "You're welcome."

The Reverse God laughed out loud: "You are really interesting."

He was silent for a while, and suddenly said, "The coordinates captured by the Fanatic Lambs is where my lover works."

"She was a kindergarten teacher. She had just gotten off work at that time. The kindergarten was full of children who had not yet left. The Fanatic Lambs drove their car directly into it."

The Reverse God exhaled slowly: "She pushed those children away, and was knocked away, with a big cut on her abdomen."

"Although her life was not in danger in the end…she can no longer have children."

The Reverse God slowly lowered his head: "She likes children very much."

Bai Liu didn't respond.

The Reverse God chuckled softly. "Is it awkward hearing me say this?"

Bai Liu shook his head. "It's a big deal. I haven't heard about this on the news... I wonder if—"

The Reverse God interrupted, his voice distant. "Yes, it's exactly what you think. You've met Li Gou, right? The criminal who used a point exchange prop to erase evidence of his murder?"

Bai Liu nodded slowly.

The Reverse God continued, "The people of the Frenzied Lamb do the same. After committing crimes, they exchange points for props to erase all evidence, even the memories of their victims—only the scars remain."

He looked down. "My lover doesn't remember what happened, or why she can never have children."

His eyes met Bai Liu's. "No one remembers but me."

He sighed. "I thought about killing them afterward."

He looked at Bai Liu, his voice quiet. "But there's no proof in reality. In the game, I couldn't kill him. And after the game, he can silence all skills. The cost of killing him would be too high. I don't want to risk my players' lives for that."

He smiled bitterly. "He'll die sooner or later."

Bai Liu regarded him with a steady gaze. "Have you considered using props to restore your lover's body?"

The Reverse God lowered his gaze. "I don't want to use any props related to this game on her. She's already been involved with me enough."

Bai Liu's eyes flickered. "I heard from Wang Shun that during the game, Kong Yangxu suddenly screamed at you in a frenzy, claiming no one could kill him in or out of the game."

The Reverse God nodded absently. "Oh, that one. I made a prophecy about him."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Didn't he block your skills at that time? And you still managed to prophesy?"

The Reverse God grinned. "Yeah, it was a trick, but he believed it anyway."

He turned to Bai Liu, his smile widening. "I told him, 'No matter how vilely you struggle, one day you'll die at the hands of the cruelest and best tactician in the world.'"

He chuckled. "Pretty good bluff, right?"

Bai Liu’s gaze was unreadable. "It’s alright."

Pre-season

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning : Mention of rape

Kong Xuyang woke up from a nightmare. He sat up in a cold sweat, his hands and feet shaking.

The dream was about the challenge match with the Deer Hunter.

That was his most proud time. He was the number one in the pre-season. The rumored most powerful tactician was defeated by him and tried to protect the people around him in embarrassment and pain.

But whether in reality or in the game, this rubbish called the Reverse God can't protect anything. He is a cowardly waste and I don't know how he got the false reputation of the most powerful tactician.

A moderate tactician? To be moderate in this game is stupid.

Kong Xuyang sneered with disdain.

Until the last moment, the tactician named the Reverse God seemed to have suddenly figured something out. The smile on his face disappeared, and he shed his gentle outer shell, revealing his bloody and brutal inner self.

The Reverse God used only his fists and feet to beat Kong Xuyang so hard that he crawled on the ground, and finally vomited blood, passively canceling his own skills.

After releasing the skill, the Reverse God raised his heavy sword and stabbed it fiercely into his heart. His usually smiling face was splattered with blood, and he predicted in a cold tone in Kong Xuyang's ear:

"One day, no matter how despicable your struggle is, you will die at the hands of the cruelest and best tactician in the world."

That was Kong Xuyang's nightmare that has continued to this day.

From then on, he had a kind of jealousy and hostility hidden in fear towards all outstanding tacticians, and he wanted to kill all of them, including the Reverse God who once trampled him under his feet!

Kong Xuyang touched his face, climbed up from the bed where three or four naked women were lying, put on a bathrobe, and walked directly to the balcony.

He squinted his eyes and looked down at the pastoral villa community where he had just moved in under the sunrise.

It is said that the people who live here are either rich or noble. It is not a place that Kong Xuyang, a college student from a second-tier university who has been staying at home for six or seven years after graduation and has not worked in a job for more than three months, can live in.

Kong Xuyang, male, 31 years old, has two peaks in his life. One was being admitted to a second-tier university twelve years ago, and the other was entering the gaming industry three years ago.

Twelve years ago, Kong Xuyang was one of the few college students in the local area, although it was only a second-tier university. As the first college student in his family, Kong Xuyang enjoyed enough praise and preferential treatment from his parents and relatives. Everyone would say that once you go to college, you will have everything.

Beautiful women, superior status, and a lot of money are waiting for you in the future.

But once he entered university, Kong Xuyang was instantly back to his original form.

Although the university Kong Xuyang attended was only a second-tier university, there was news that it would be upgraded to a first-tier university in the near future. So when he entered, all his classmates had one thing in common: a lot of them had connections.

These people with connections were temporarily added in after hearing the news. Their lifestyle, culture, and entertainment consumption levels are far from those of people from Kong Xuyang's small county.

Kong Xuyang immediately saw the beautiful woman, the superior status, and the large amount of money.

But none of this has anything to do with him.

When his roommate's bed was filled with shoes that cost more than two thousand yuan a pair, Kong Xuyang didn't even dare to wear his own shoes that cost more than a hundred yuan a pair.

Kong Xuyang had to wait until these people left the dormitory before he could shamefully take out the shoes he had hidden in the closet and put them on, and he had to tear off the logo.

He began to ask his parents for money in large quantities for various reasons, buying them branded belts and shoes and giving them small cans of tea. The price of a single item increased from over a hundred yuan to over a thousand yuan.

Kong Xuyang tried his best to fit in with these people, but they still looked at him and the things in his hands with contempt.

He exhausted his parents, but when he finally graduated, no one was willing to let Kong Xuyang sign the yearbook.

Those who sincerely studied thought he was vain and did not associate with him, while most of those who Kong Xuyang admired regarded him as a joke.

After graduation, Kong Xuyang found many jobs, many of which his parents thought were good, and they begged and pleaded to let him try them.

But whenever Kong Xuyang thought about how inferior these jobs were in the eyes of his classmates and how the salary he saved for several months could not cover the expenses of a banquet for these people, he would be immersed in an unspeakable resentment.

Why can these people enjoy these things, but he can't?!

It was obvious that he was the one who was supposed to have a bright future after passing the college entrance examination!

Kong Xuyang kept changing jobs. His requirements became higher and higher, his consumption became higher and higher, and more and more companies rejected him.

In the end, he couldn't find a job and would rather stay at home than go out and do what he thought were lowly, menial jobs just to make a living.

Kong Xuyang stayed at home, watching the lives of rich people on the Internet every day. He cursed them with the most vicious words out of resentment, and morbidly read through all the life details that they posted on the Internet, substituting himself into their lives.

When he saw a good-looking girl, they will make vicious comments saying that she has been fucked many times and is already a black pussy. When he saw a very successful man, he would curse at him and say that he must have a background and got to the position in an improper way.

Kong Xuyang hated the huge gap between him and [The Superior].

He even began to resent his parents for not being powerful people like those other families, and for giving birth to him in such a family that couldn't even afford a pair of shoes worth over ten thousand yuan, had never watched an NBA volleyball game, and couldn't just give away a Sri Lankan sapphire ring worth hundreds of thousands of yuan to pick up girls.

This conflict reached its peak when Kong Xuyang's father slapped him in the face, got red in the face and told him to get out and work.

It was clearly his parents' fault, but he blamed himself for being a loser.

Kong Xuyang said almost viciously that he would not let him go back.

One day, one day… he will definitely become a superior person.

Although this obsession has no basis, after all, as an ordinary person, Kong Xuyang's most commendable achievement in his life is to go to a second-tier university, but he has a strong sense of self-confidence – I am so noble, as long as I try something, success will come naturally, and you will all come to crawl at my feet.

I didn't succeed because of the unfairness of this society, I didn't succeed because of my parents' inadequate backgrounds, I didn't succeed because…

It's not my own problem anyway.

This strong desire made Kong Xuyang log into the game, and he fell into a kind of ecstasy that was justified – see, he knew this day would come!

He is indeed extraordinary!

But soon he saw those highly sought-after star players, powerful big guilds, and everything that was better and stronger than him, and Kong Xuyang immediately fell into a new round of resentment – why was there unfairness against him everywhere?

The ladder to becoming the best of the best was already in front of him, but Kong Xuyang decided to overthrow these star teammates, the big guild, and everything that oppressed him, by any means necessary.

But there was indeed a huge gap between him and these things.

Kong Xuyang quickly found the entry point and decided to start from the reality of these people.

Kong Xuyang found a player whose skill was [Paparazzi], and then he watched the reality of these star players with resentment—

——Luxury cars, beautiful women, and everything you need.

Just like his previous classmates who had connections, they were the upper class who oppressed him and made him live in poverty for so long. They all deserve to die!

Kong Xuyang teams up with some law-abiding bikers to attack his rival team.

His method worked. Kong Xuyang stepped on the screams and corpses of those who oppressed him and happily became the first place in the pre-season.

Just when Kong Xuyang felt that he was the center of the world, the protagonist of a novel, and everything was paving the way for his victory at this moment, he fell into the hands of the Reverse God.

The second time, in the crucial match that would decide whether or not Hearts would be eliminated from the mid-season tournament, Kong Xuyang used the same trick on Hearts again. He wanted to find this woman in reality and then have these speed racing teams gang-rape Hearts in order to affect Hearts' pre-match mentality.

Of course, he also knew that this was not a good approach, so Kong Xuyang gave Heart a chance. On the eve of the game, Kong Xuyang went to the King's Palace to meet with Hearts' and said kindly, "Queen, if you are willing to be my woman, I will not use my tactics, but respect you and fight you openly."

I respect my woman very much, Kong Xuyang emphasized ambiguously – Hearts, you won't suffer any loss if you follow me. In reality, after I became successful, my parents begged me to come back and found many women for me to go on blind dates, but none of them were worthy of me, so I usually only went to the point of going to bed with them, but they always liked to pester me.

Kong Xuyang waved his hands impatiently and complacently. It was so annoying. Didn't they know that they weren't worthy of me?

Then he changed the subject, looked at Hearts, and said politely – if it's you, Hearts, I can accept the stage of discussing marriage with you.

Hearts smiled and said, "Well, let's see if you can find me in reality.

Kong Xuyang made a mistake.

For some reason, the skill [Paparazzi] is ineffective against Hearts. They couldn't find the real coordinates of [Hearts]!

In the second day's game, Kong Xuyang suffered a crushing defeat and was directly eliminated from the mid-season tournament by Hearts.

Kong Xuyang was defeated by tacticians twice. He himself is also a tactician. Coupled with the prophecy of the Reverse God, Kong Xuyang's disgust and jealousy towards Bai Liu, the famous new tactician, had reached its peak.

He should be the tactician who attracts the most attention.

If this were a novel, then he, as an excellent tactician who won first place in his first league game, should be the protagonist of the novel, and the whole world should revolve around him.

Who is this Bai Liu? He is just a clown who climbed up from the bottom. How can he steal his limelight and compete with him?

Kong Xuyang's eyes were sinister. He was determined to find the coordinates of someone Bai Liu was close to in real life and then torture that person severely.

Pre-season

"The pre-season is nearing its end."

Wang Shun stood by the panel, looking relieved. "Now that you're performing well in the team competition, it’s clear President Bai and Captain Tang have trained you well."

"It’s been a lot of hard work for you all—training intensely while competing just as hard every day."

Mu Sicheng slouched back in his chair, Liu Jiayi had her head resting on the table, and Muke was dozing off, his head propped up on his hands, eyes squinting.

Wang Shun couldn’t help but chuckle. "That was the toughest part. The next phase will be easier, now that you’re in the pre-season top circle, and the frequency of games has dropped to about three or four a day."

"Next, let's go over the individual popularity rankings."

"Bai Liu: 179."

"Liu Jiayi: 186."

"Tang Erda: 194."

"Mu Sicheng: 236."

"Muke: 261."

Wang Shun tapped the system panel. "Everyone's rankings will be rising more slowly from now on, as we approach the mid-season popularity circle."

"There are 32 teams in the mid-season, and each has five main players. So, the top 160 are where most of the popularity is concentrated, meaning you’ll have an overwhelming advantage over the pre-season teams. But it will be harder to move up."

"Especially this mid-season—there are a lot of newcomers who have quickly gained popularity and are now firmly in the front row."

"Joker, who I mentioned before, is currently ranked 79 and has already cracked the top 100—the highest of the newcomers."

"Following him are Armand from Golden Dawn and Sister Phoebe from King's Crown, ranked 93 and 102 respectively."

"These newcomers have the guild's backing, so their popularity rises quickly and, as long as they continue performing well, they'll stay in the upper circle. This means the competition for rankings will be fierce this year."

Wang Shun looked around the room. "Now, let's move on to the top five in the rankings."

"First, Thundering Spades."

"Second, Queen of Hearts."

"Third, Georgia."

"Fourth, the Inquisitor of the Reverse God."

"Fifth, the Executioner, the President of the Deer Hunter's Guild—the person I want to focus on today."

Wang Shun tapped the system panel, zooming in on the floating information.

"This guildmaster was previously a main attacker but switched to tactician after the departure of the Reverse God last year. This is his first year as a tactician, and judging by the roster so far, he's doing very well."

"It's worth noting that this guild president wasn't even in the top 50 of last year's popularity rankings until the end of the league, with his highest ranking being 59."

Mu Sicheng, half-awake and surprised, exclaimed, "No way? He's the president of a major guild and still ranked so low? That's crazy!"

Wang Shun laughed. "The popularity ranking isn't just based on strength—it also takes into account personal style, performance, and appearance."

"While the President of the Deer Hunters is strong, his personal style doesn't stand out. He's not very flashy, and his appearance doesn't help him stand out either..."

Wang Shun hesitated for a moment before clicking on the panel to play a short video. "You should watch it for yourselves."

The video showed the man thrusting his hand violently into his right eye, stretching it as though it were alive, his features contorting and shifting erratically. He appeared to search within his own eye before slowly pulling his hand out. Through the entire process, his face remained a bloodied blur, impossible to make out clearly.

Wang Shun paused the video. "Now you see? This Executioner's personal style is so gruesome that it's hard to even look at him, which is why he's never been very popular."

"But this year, his popularity has skyrocketed, even pushing the veteran tactician, the Inquisitor of the Reverse God, out of the top rankings."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Why?"

Wang Shun took a moment before responding. "I think the departure of the Reverse God had a lot to do with it."

"As you saw in the video, the Executioner's style is brutal and aggressive. On the field, he's a very forceful main attacker, using aggressive and strong tactics, excelling at eliminating his opponents."

"But when Reverse God was around, being a more moderate tactician, the Executioner held back. He couldn't fully unleash his strengths and had a harder time appealing to the audience."

"With Reverse God gone this year, the Executioner has partnered with Joker, a newcomer who fits his style better. The tactics they've developed together are extreme, and on the field, you can see the Executioner's previously restrained aggression finally unleashed."

Wang Shun clicked again, and a new video played. "Here's a recent match from the Deer Hunters, a performance against the rowing 19, Moon Serpent Riparian."

The Executioner, drenched in blood and wearing a coat, extended his bloodied hand and grabbed the neck of a writhing serpent. Kneeling beside it casually, his arm rippled with veins and sinew as he savagely slammed the serpent's head into the ground.

The serpent struggled, spasmed, and then its body burst apart, splattering blood as its human form emerged, screaming, "It hurts! It hurts! I surrender! Abort!" But before it could reach out to signal forfeiture, it collapsed, its eyes frozen and tearfully staring.

The Executioner slowly stood, dropped his blood-soaked jacket over the defeated man's head, pulled out a cigarette, and lit it from the twisted, bloodied lips of his face. He exhaled a plume of smoke.

"When you break the law and hurt others," he said coldly, "you deserve to be tortured. Pain is just the easiest part of the punishment you get."

At this point in the mini-video, Wang Shun pauses, zooms in on the video, and points to the executioner's middle finger, where a cigarette is clamped, saying, "See? There's a silver ring here."

Mu Sicheng squints and spots a silver ring at the base of the executioner's bloodstained middle finger. "See it."

"This ring is his skill weapon, called the [Ring of Death]."

Wang Shun explains, "[The Ring of Death] was given to the executioner by Herod, the ancient legendary saint who was fair, just, and kind to all men."

"It is said that the executioner was afraid when he hanged a powerful rival king. To ease his fear, King Herod gave the executioner this ring, telling him that he was only putting sinners to death and had no reason to fear."

"From then on, King Herod granted the executioner the right to execute those who had sinned, including kings, and this ring became known as [the Ring of Death]."

"The exact mechanism of the [Ring of Death] is unclear, but it is said that anyone touched by the executioner's hand while wearing the ring will experience excruciating pain, as if they've been tortured countless times until they die from the agony."

"I've tried to gather information about those who were touched by the executioner. Generally, the more intense the pain, the more likely they had committed some crime in real life," Wang Shun continues. "But that's not always the case. Some players who were sanctioned by the executioner seemed like they might break the law soon, but they hadn't actually done anything wrong when they were touched. They experienced unbearable pain."

"If it weren't for the Reverse God intervening, those players would probably have died from the executioner's torture."

"So, in my personal judgment, the torturer's criteria for punishment aren't objective—they're subjective. You're tortured as much as the torturer feels you deserve."

"The Reverse God's departure is like unshackling the executioner, which is bad news for us." Wang Bolin says solemnly, "On one hand, it means the executioner can now unleash his full power and dominate the popularity rankings. On the other, it means he can execute us without restraint."

"Let's hope we can make a good impression on the executioner."

Wang Shun laughs bitterly. "I only told you all that because I didn't want to report on the teams playing tomorrow."

"We only have one game tomorrow, and our opponents are—"

Wang Shun takes a deep breath. "Frenzied Lamb."

In the ornamental pool lobby, Bai Liu, having just exited the disbanded ornamental pool, is followed by a man sneaking up behind him.

The man, holding a fist-sized camera, carefully blends into the crowd, searching for the right angle to photograph Bai Liu. He looks like a seasoned paparazzi reporter who has spent years capturing the private lives of celebrities.

Bai Liu talks naturally to those around him, seemingly unaware of the man following him.

The paparazzo smiles wryly, adjusts the angle, and when he finally has a clear shot of Bai Liu's upper body, he presses the button. The camera clicks twice and spits out a photo.

The man takes the photo, scans it, and eagerly clicks on the system panel to send an email.

The photo shows a dazed Du Sanying sitting across from Bai Liu, sucking on a large mouthful of noodles, with a line of twelve-digit realistic coordinates clearly printed below. Reality.

Du Sanying is holding Bai Liu's packaged beef noodles and drinking the soup. After finishing, he looks curiously at Bai Liu, who is lounging on the sofa, watching TV.

Usually, Bai Liu would be in bed at this hour, but today he’s still watching TV.

Du Sanying glances confusedly at the garden babies on the TV. Does Mr. Bai Liu like this?

Bai Liu doesn't really care for such shows, but his TV hasn't paid the aperture fee for a while, so he’s only able to watch basic channels. Eventually, he stops at the children's channel.

Du Sanying asks, "Mr. Bai Liu, don’t you want to take a shower and rest early? We have an important match tomorrow, don’t we?"

Bai Liu responds calmly, "No need to wash up yet. Someone will be looking for us later, and I need to take you out for a trip."

Du Sanying suddenly says, "No wonder you asked God Mu to leave his motorbike downstairs when he left. This is the right time to use it."

Du Sanying scratches his head shyly. "God Mu’s motorbike looks so cool. I don’t know how to ride, but it’s nice to have a ride."

Bai Liu gives him a knowing look. "I don’t know how to ride either."

Du Sanying breathes a sigh of relief and laughs. "Mr. Bai Liu wouldn’t either…"

After a moment, Du Sanying suddenly looks horrified. "Wait, Mr. Bai Liu, neither of us knows how to drive! Who’s going to drive the bike?"

The sound of a motorbike revving beneath the windowsill is heard, the engine roaring, and bright high beams flood into Bai Liu's window, casting a halo of light over his face.

Bai Liu smiles. "Here it comes."

Du Sanying is in shock. "What’s coming?!"

Bai Liu turns off the TV with the remote, unbuttons his shirt for ease of movement, flips his sleeve up, and looks at Du Sanying. "The bikers who ambushed us are here. Let’s go downstairs and ride the motorbike."

Du Sanying howls, "But Mr. Bai Liu, neither you nor I know how to drive!"

Bai Liu nods. "It’s okay. It’s fine with you. Let’s go."

Bai Liu grabs the helmet hanging on the back of the door and tosses one to Du Sanying before putting on his own. He then opens the shoe cupboard and retrieves a rusty baseball bat.

Bai Liu turns to Du Sanying. "Ready?"

Du Sanying fumbles with his helmet while raising his hand. "Ready!"

Bai Liu extends his hand. "Come over when you're ready."

Du Sanying looks at Bai Liu’s hand and then at Bai Liu’s indifferent expression. He takes a deep breath and clenches his fists. It will be fine. His misfortune won't affect Mr. Bai Liu!

Du Sanying jerked his hand toward Bai Liu, who grasped his wrist and looked up at the door.

Outside, the clanging of metal sticks echoed through the hallway, accompanied by the sound of someone knocking with a stick and knife on the fence by the stairs. Footsteps thudded up the stairs and eventually stopped right in front of Bai Liu's door.

Bai Liu walked slowly to the door and whispered, "When I open the door, close your eyes. You’ll be fine."

Du Sanying swallowed hard and nodded.

The door slammed open, and vicious curses flooded the room.

"Bai Liu, get out here!"

"You dare to offend Brother Kong? Let's see if I don’t break your legs today!"

Bai Liu opened the door with an emotionless expression on his face. "Close your eyes."

As knives, fists, and sticks rushed toward him, Du Sanying instinctively closed his eyes. Bai Liu, however, kept Du Sanying in front of him, unfazed.

Just as the attackers were about to strike Du Sanying, the door to Bai Liu's room unexpectedly swung outward, crashing into the menacing group.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu used the door as cover, backhanding two baseball bats into the attackers.

Blood splattered, hitting Bai Liu's face and staining his shirt.

Bai Liu yanked Du Sanying by the wrist and stomped on the door, turning around as the shouting crowd continued up the stairs. Bai Liu glanced down at the scene, blood dripping from his bat onto the floor.

Du Sanying's voice trembled, but he kept his eyes shut. "Mr. Bai Liu, are you—are you all right?"

Bai Liu's expression remained unchanged. "I'm fine. No matter what happens later, don't open your eyes."

Du Sanying nodded quickly, his body shaking.

Bai Liu guided Du Sanying down the stairs, holding him by the shoulders in front of the thugs armed with knives and iron bars, then gently pushed him forward.

Du Sanying froze in midair. "Mr. Bai Liu...?" He had been pushed off the stairs!

Just as the knife and iron bar were about to strike, the old iron fence beside the stairs creaked and collapsed.

A group of men, holding onto the fence, fell into a heap as it collapsed, knives and sticks plunging into their own bodies.

Screams rang out.

"Ah! Old Wang, your knife! It's in my kidney!"

"Who had the PVC pipe?! Damn, it's in my hand! Take it out, it hurts!"

Bai Liu made a couple of quick, light jumps, landing next to a large man who had collapsed with a bloody head.

Du Sanying, still disoriented, had landed on top of the large man, but he was unharmed. He looked terrified, on the verge of tears, shivering but still keeping his eyes closed. "Mr. Bai Liu, can I open my eyes now?"

Bai Liu glanced at the large man Du Sanying was lying on.

The man glared at Bai Liu, attempting to get up and stab him with a knife.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu lifted his hand and struck the man with a dry stick.

The man collapsed, blood spurting from his head as he lost consciousness.

Bai Liu tugged Du Sanying's wrist and pulled him down the stairs. "You can open your eyes now."

Du Sanying slowly, cautiously opened his eyes and screamed in shock.

The narrow stairway was filled with groaning thugs, the railing blocking their movement. The floor was littered with concrete debris and pools of blood from the iron bars.

Bai Liu's face was also splattered with blood, and his emotionless expression made him look especially... frightening.

Du Sanying swallowed nervously. "All these people... did Mr. Bai Liu take care of them?"

Bai Liu gave him a sidelong glance. "No, I was just helping you out."

Du Sanying was confused. "......????"

"Did I do all this?" Du Sanying, always a law-abiding citizen, hesitated, then realized the truth with horror. He broke down and shouted, "So, am I breaking the law?!"

Bai Liu turned his gaze away. "Not really. I checked. It's self-defense."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu walked over to the body lying on the stairs, holding the blood-stained baseball bat in one hand and holding Du Sanying's wrist with the other and walked out.

Du Sanying trembled: "Mr. Bai Liu, where else are we going?"

"I don't know." The moment Bai Liu walked out of the narrow building entrance, the pale moonlight fell on his calm face, "Anyway, someone doesn't want us to stay here."

Motorcycles were whizzing around the entrance of the building. The drivers were tall and ferocious, and it was obvious that they were up to no good. The people on several of the motorcycles roared, turned the front of the motorcycles, and rushed towards Bai Liu who was walking out of the stairs.

Bai Liu turned his wrist to block Du Sanying, who had not yet recovered from his shock, in front of him: "Close your eyes."

Du Sanying closed his eyes nervously.

The oncoming motorcycle passed through a pool of dirty vegetable oil on the ground, miraculously brushed past Du Sanying from both sides and crashed into the wall behind Bai Liu, making a loud noise like an explosion.

The man on the motorcycle was covered in dust and dirt. He exhaled a puff of black smoke sluggishly and fell to the ground motionless.

Bai Liu didn't even bother to glance at Du Sanying, and patted him on the shoulder: "Open your eyes."

Bai Liu straddled Mu Sicheng's heavy motorcycle, and Du Sanying hurriedly sat on the back seat.

Without knowing what was going to happen, Du Sanying was already scared to tears. He held onto Bai Liu's waist tightly and said, "Mr. Bai Liu, what on earth are they going to do? What are we going to do?"

Bai Liu inserted Mu Sicheng's motorcycle key and turned it a few times. The motorcycle started with a loud roar.

“They are here to surround and kill us.” Bai Liu said.

Du Sanying kept crying: “What about us?”

Bai Liu smiled faintly: “Of course, we are here to surround and kill them.”

The next second, Bai Liu stepped on the accelerator of the motorcycle to the bottom, and the motorcycle shot out like an arrow.

Du Sanying was caught off guard and opened his mouth wide to let out an unbelievable and terrible cry, so loud that the uvula in his throat could be seen.

As the motorcycle was speeding, Du Sanying’s lips were shaking from the wind, and his voice was trembling: “Mr. Bai Liu, don’t you know how to drive?”

Bai Liu looked straight ahead: “Put down the baffle next to your mouth, so you don’t catch the wind.”

Du Sanying: “Oh——”

He lowered the baffle obediently and spoke fluently, but he still couldn’t hide his fear: “Mr. Bai Liu, don’t you not know how to drive a motorcycle?”

“Yeah.” Bai Liu replied calmly, “But I have driven a Hello Trolley before, so it should feel similar.”

Du Sanying choked up and burst into tears: “How can they be similar! One is a shared electric bicycle, and the other is a heavy-duty motorcycle. There is a huge difference, Mr. Bai Liu!”

“If you want to deal with these people, Mr. Bai Liu can borrow Captain Tang’s car! Why borrow God Mu’s heavy motorcycle?”

Bai Liu said with a smile: “Don’t you think heavy motorcycles are cool?”

Du Sanying burst into tears: “But it’s not safe! It’s safer for Mr. Bai Liu to have an outsourced car!”

He himself would not easily get into trouble, but Mr. Bai Liu was very unlucky! Who knows what will happen when driving a dangerous vehicle like a heavy motorcycle!

Bai Liu paused: “I can’t drive.”

Du Sanying was shocked: “Hasn’t Mr. Bai Liu ever passed the driving test?!”

Bai Liu said calmly: “The tuition is too expensive. I ride a shared electric bike to get on and off the bus every day. It’s a waste of money to learn how to drive a car that I can’t use.”

“I can’t afford a car.”

Du Sanying was speechless—it was actually for this reason!

Bai Liu drove Mu Sicheng’s heavy motorcycle and took the lead, circling through various remote and unpopular roads. The group of people behind him on motorcycles were chasing him closely, and they were about to hit Bai Liu’s vehicle several times.

Du Sanying looked back from time to time to see the people chasing him, and he was terrified.

These people are really crazy! They don’t care about the lives of pedestrians at all!

Bai Liu was clearly deliberately taking a detour to an area with fewer people, but this group of people didn’t care about turns and some of them just rushed straight past. If Bai Liu hadn’t reacted quickly a few times and taken a detour to an area with people at the intersection, these people would have already killed several people!

No wonder Bai Liu wanted to leave the place where he lived and didn’t drive. There was a lot of population flow in that place. This group of speeding riders who didn’t take human life seriously could easily hurt other people by mistake. If they drove, they would have to go to the highway, where the population flow would be even greater.

But now… what to do?

If we let this group of speedsters hang out outside, something will happen sooner or later, but we can’t let Bai Liu keep them hanging around forever!

Du Sanying was extremely anxious: “Mr. Bai Liu, can we enter the game?”

Bai Liu stared ahead through his helmet: “After you solve the problem, go in. Don’t leave any trouble for the future. Otherwise, they will come to block you next time you come out.”

Du Sanying was startled, then slowly came back to his senses and asked, “How do we deal with them?”

“There’s a driving practice field on the edge of town, and there’s no one there right now.” Bai Liu said calmly, “Let’s go there.”

On the edge of the city, there is a driving training ground.

Mu Sicheng was squatting on the ground bored, next to him was Tang Erda, who was walking back and forth with a serious face and frowned eyebrows.

Mu Sicheng was dizzy after being beaten away by Tang Erda: “Can you be quiet for a minute?”

Tang Erda beat him up: “Where did Bai Liu and the others go?”

Mu Sicheng raised two fingers speechlessly: “You have asked this question almost twenty times. Don’t worry, Bai Liu will be fine even if something happens to him.”

“He may be a bit erratic in his behavior, but he’s still pretty reliable. Otherwise, I wouldn’t have lent him my motorcycle.”

Tang Erda finally sat down next to Mu Sicheng. He looked at the densely packed nails that Bai Liu had asked them to place on the ground and asked intently, “Are these nails really useful?”

Mu Sicheng rolled his eyes and said, “I guarantee you, it will definitely work. Motorcycle tires are very fragile when traveling at high speeds. If a tiny nail gets stuck in the tires and deflates the tires, the front of the motorcycle will swing in an instant, and the people on the motorcycle will be thrown far away.”

“But what surprised me more was…” Mu Sicheng leaned over and held his face, yawning with an inexplicable smile on his face, “Bai Liu was actually willing to choose such a faraway training ground and use such a roundabout method in order to reduce the possible casualties he might cause.”

“Originally, Bai Liu could have used Du Sanying to get rid of these idiots at his doorstep, but then the residents around Bai Liu would probably suffer casualties."

Tang Erda frowned: "Protecting others is what we should do…"

Mu Sicheng glanced at Tang Erda and said, "But it's okay if we don't protect them. It's not like Bai Liu took the initiative to kill them."

Tang Erda said coldly: "You didn't kill Senior, but Senior died because of you. Don't you feel guilty?"

Mu Sicheng was silent for a moment, he turned his eyes away, and said in a low and calm tone: "I may feel guilty, but Bai Liu certainly won't."

"He chose to do this just to make those of us who have a guilty conscience feel at peace."

Mu Sicheng sneered: "As a tactician, you have to accommodate us players."

Tang Erda also fell silent.

Mu Sicheng was right. If it wasn't for the need to appease them, Bai Liu wouldn't have gone through so much trouble to deal with a bunch of little hooligans.

In the distance, a large number of roaring motorcycles appeared on the horizon. The man riding the first one was wearing a white shirt and suit pants that were incompatible with the heavy motorcycle. The shirt and trouser legs were swaying in the cold night wind. He lowered his body with a calm look and quickly approached this side.

Mu Sicheng stood up suddenly and said in shock: "Damn! Why did Bai Liu drive at the highest speed? Is he crazy?!"

"No." Tang Erda rejected it. "Bai Liu wouldn't do anything impulsive. Something must have happened."

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes, and then his pupils shrank: "There's someone tied up in the car behind!"

Lu Yizhan was tied up with his hands and feet and pressed on the back seat of one of the motorcycles, unconscious. There was also a young woman with a red bow on her head and messy hair, also tied to the back of another motorcycle, in the same sleepy state.

The drivers of the two motorcycles laughed arrogantly and whistled:

“Bai Liu, what do you think? You didn’t expect us to capture not only you and the high school student but also another person and his girlfriend. We split into two groups to catch them.”

“You guys were kidnapped here together and just reunited. How was it? In the photos taken by the paparazzi, you were obediently eating the food that this woman made for you, and sitting happily with this policeman, just like a family. You must have a good relationship with both of them, right?”

“How about if you surrender and let us drive the car over you, and we’ll let you go?”

“If you don’t compromise, it only means that these two people don’t have a good relationship with you.”

The man shrugged with a look of regret and said loudly: “Then they are useless. We have no choice but to throw them off the motorcycle and let them smash to pieces on the ground.”

Du Sanying really burst into tears: “Bai Liu, what should we do? Who did they kidnap? What does it have to do with you?”

“I have a very good relationship with them.”

There was no trace of emotion in Bai Liu’s pure black eyes, but he still did not slow down, instead he rushed forward at full speed.

Du Sanying said in panic: “Bai Liu, there is a nail road ahead. We will be fine if we drive straight through it, but Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian will be thrown off their motorcycles!”

Bai Liu had a calm look in his eyes and drove directly into the nail road. Then, at the last minute, he turned over in the motorcycle desperately, letting Du Sanying sit in the driver’s seat, and he sat in the back seat with his back to Du Sanying.

Du Sanying was at a loss and uttered a high note: “Bai Liu!! I don’t know how to drive!”

The motorcycles behind suddenly became a mess. After a few spins, the motorcycles with their front ends flailing around couldn’t keep up with the speed. They kept banging around and crashing into each other. The people in the motorcycles fell heavily to the ground, and nails pierced their flesh, causing them to scream in agony.

Du Sanying screamed “Ah ah ah” with tears streaming down his face and hit the front of the motorcycles, but miraculously he managed to avoid every nail on the ground and every motorcycle that was about to hit him head-on.

Bai Liu’s shirt was blown and inflated by the wind, and his eyes were staring at the two motorcycles with Lu Yizhang and Fang Dian lying on the back seat with cold eyes. When the two motorcycles were completely out of control and were about to crash into the ground, Bai Liu pulled out a white bone whip with a cold gaze and drew a distorted space on the ground that was similar to a crack.

Lu Yizhang and Fang Dian, who were about to hit the ground, were cushioned by the distorted space. Bai Liu, who ran over, knelt on one knee and caught them in his arms.

The two motorcycles collided with other cars that were parked randomly, and a huge fire exploded into the sky.

The people lying on the ground were trembling and howling. There were many nails stuck in their bodies and faces. Some people’s eyeballs were directly pierced out. There were broken parts and debris of motorcycles everywhere.

Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng ran to Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng was shocked and asked, “What happened?!”

Bai Liu lowered his head, then slowly raised it and glanced at Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda.

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda both felt their blood run cold at this look.

Bai Liu stuffed the two people in his arms: Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda, raised his hand to wipe the blood on his face, and said to the two people: “Help me keep an eye on Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian, don’t let them wake up.”

Bai Liu turned to look at Tang Erda: “You brought a gun, right? Give me the gun.”

Tang Erda was captivated by Bai Liu’s gaze, but he still refused subconsciously: “I didn’t…”

Bai Liu looked him straight in the eye: “I won’t do anything illegal.”

Tang Erda paused for a moment, but finally took out the gun and gave it to Bai Liu.

After Bai Liu took the gun, he stood up and walked towards the pile of burning motorcycles.

“What?!” Mu Sicheng received the person in bewilderment, and turned his head to look at Bai Liu who was walking towards the explosion center, “What are you going to do, Bai Liu!”

Bai Liu didn’t say anything. All that could be seen was his conspicuous white shirt swaying in the night wind.

He walked to the pile of motorcycles and dragged two people out from them. They were the two people who had kidnapped Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian, dragged them to the scene, and used this as an excuse to threaten Bai Liu with arrogant laughter.

When the two men collided with the car, they were cushioned by the space created by Bai Liu’s whip, so their injuries were not serious, but there were many burns and nail holes on their faces.

They looked at Bai Liu who had pulled them out with viciousness and fear. When they noticed the gun in Bai Liu’s hand, they subconsciously took two steps back and shouted in fear: “It’s illegal for you to kill us! If you break the law, you will be hunted down in the real world!”

“Your best friend is a policeman! He won’t allow you to do such a thing!”

Bai Liu’s eyes were calm and still: “I can do what you do, use tools to erase everything after killing someone, then no one will remember it, right?”

The two men were terrified: “Don’t you feel guilty?”

Most of the players they can harm are still law-abiding in real life.

The Fanatic Lambs will do a rough investigation before harming these players. Some players release all kinds of desires and kill at will in the game, but in reality they restrain themselves, care about every little thing in reality, and never do anything illegal or criminal.

This type of player separates reality from games and cares about everything in reality. In their minds, killing people in reality and killing people in games are two different things.

Killing people in a distorted game world and killing ordinary people in reality, although there is not much difference in essence between the two things, the difference in feeling is particularly great.

These players cannot accept that they have committed crimes in real life, because they are so extreme in the game just to return to reality and be normal and happy ordinary people.

The psychological crime cost of this type of player is very high, and they rarely turn around and attack the Fanatic Lambs, so most of them will just endure it.

The Fanatic Lambs had investigated Bai Liu before. They believed that Bai Liu was a typical player of this type. He was very successful in the game, but in real life he did not even have a single violation record and was still fired by the company.

Kong Xuyang sneered and said that Bai Liu was a typical wimp, who attacked hard in the game but was timid in real life. Let them come on boldly and run over his face on their motorcycles.

It is difficult for someone who has never killed anyone in real life to commit a crime.

But Bai Liu seems to be a special case.

Bai Liu calmly raised his gun at the two men. The two men cried and tried to log into the game subconsciously, but found that their login devices had been taken away by Bai Liu long ago.

“Don’t kill us!” The two men squatted on the ground and cried, “You have never killed anyone in real life, you will suffer!”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the two men. The fingers of Lu Yizhan, who was being guarded by Mu Sicheng, twitched slightly.

“Who said I want to kill you?” Bai Liu casually threw the gun at the two men, “The gun is for you.”

“Come and kill me.” Bai Liu said with a smile.

The two men took the gun and were completely stunned.

Madman! This man is a madman!

After realizing that Bai Liu was serious, the two men scrambled for the only gun.

Finally, one of them grabbed it and raised the gun to Bai Liu, panting. His hands were shaking a little because of the injury, but holding the powerful gun gave him great confidence. He laughed nervously: “Bai Liu, you don’t dare to kill people, do you think we don’t dare to kill people either!”

“I’m telling you, I once crushed a woman’s belly on a motorcycle and I could see her intestines pouring out.”

The man chuckled twice: “Although the woman didn’t seem to die in the end, I felt great at the time. She screamed in pain. I have a clear conscience for killing people. I am a natural-born killer.”

The smile on Bai Liu’s face did not change at all: “Really?”

The man seemed to be offended by Bai Liu’s cheeky smile, and screamed and pulled the trigger: “Go to hell!!”

But no bullet was fired.

The man was stunned.

Bai Liu backhandedly hit the man hard on the forehead with a baseball bat.

He calmly beat the man, especially in the stomach, until the man began to vomit bile, his intestines leaked from his anus, and he begged for death in agony.

The man next to him was completely dumbfounded. After Bai Liu glanced at him during a break in his beating, he was so scared that he took two steps back and finally rammed his head against the wall, screaming, “I hit myself! I hit myself! No need to bother with that!”

When Bai Liu was about to beat the man to death, a hand stretched out from the side: “That’s enough, Bai Liu.”

A woman who was about the same height as Bai Liu looked at Bai Liu with smiling eyes and handed him a stack of wet wipes.

Bai Liu’s face was splattered with blood from his jaw to the corners of his eyes. He lowered his eyes and glanced at the stack of wet wipes.

Finally, he threw away the baseball bat that was splattered with unknown liquid and took the wet wipes handed to him by the woman.

The woman glanced at the man who was about to be beaten to death by Bai Liu, squatted down approached the man's bloody face, and looked at him curiously: "Bai Liu, Old Lu (Lu Yizhan) is good. He taught you well. Now you can even find loopholes in the law."

"If you give the other person a gun and let him attack you first, then you are forced to fight back when your life is seriously threatened. This is a legitimate self-defense, and it is legal to kill the other person."

Bai Liu paused while wiping his face. He looked away and hummed vaguely, "Sister Dian, why are you awake?"

Fang Dian looked at Bai Liu with a smile: "Don't worry, Lu Yizhan is not awake yet."

"When he wakes up later, I will tell him that two bad guys attacked you with guns and you were forced to fight back. But because you are kind-hearted and have learned to behave properly under his guidance over the years, you still held back and did not kill them."

Fang Dian kicked the two people who were lying limp on the ground and said hesitantly, "They should not be dead, right?"

"It's the old rule from high school. If you do something bad, we'll give you a good confession." Fang Dian gave a thumbs up, and a brilliant smile with eight teeth appeared on his dirty face. "I won't let the big policeman Old Lu find out what we did."

After simply cleaning up the scene, Fang Dian called the police. Afterwards, she and Bai Liu borrowed Mu Sicheng's heavy-duty motorcycle, put the unconscious Lu Yizhan on the back of the bike and put on her helmet. She then took a step forward with her long legs, waved her hand, and prepared to ride back.

Du Sanying looked at the injuries on Fang Dian and Lu Yizhan from a distance, and reminded them fearfully: "Well, how about asking Mr. Bai Liu to call a taxi for you? Don't ride a motorcycle, it's not safe…"

Bai Liu glanced at the motorcycle expressionlessly, then looked at Fang Dian: "When did you learn to ride a heavy motorcycle?"

Fang Dian turned around to put a helmet on Lu Yizhan who was lying on the back seat. Hearing this, she looked up and laughed, "I haven't learned it, but I often ride a Hello Bike to work, so it should be similar!"

Bai Liu refused calmly: "It's a long way off, get down here."

Du Sanying's face cracked, and he screamed madly in his heart – Mr. Bai Liu, why do you have the nerve to say that about others!!

Isn't this exactly the same as what you said before?

Fang Dian sighed with regret and stared at Bai Liu for a while. After making sure that Bai Liu would not let her ride, she got off the motorcycle with a feeling of regret. After getting off, she touched the motorcycle and said, "If I hadn't been caught this time, I wouldn't have had the chance to see the racing scenes in the movies. It's so cool to drive a heavily-armored motorcycle…"

Bai Liu said, "I'll lend it to you when I have the chance."

Fang Dian's eyes lit up: "It's a deal!"

"I'll call a car to pick you and Lu Yizhan up later." Bai Liu said, "Send me a text message to let me know you're safe after you get back."

Fang Dian made an OK gesture, then helped Lu Yizhan to the side and waited.

Bai Liu paused and said, “Don’t you want to know why you were arrested? It has something to do with me.”

“I can see that. I’m not stupid.” Fang Dian leaned on the motorcycle with her legs crossed, tilted her head and smiled. “But you didn’t seem to want to say it, so I didn’t ask.”

Bai Liu was silent for a moment: “I’m sorry…”

Fang Dian raised her hand to interrupt Bai Liu: “Hey hey hey! No need!”

She smiled as generously as always: “It’s still the same old rule. You implicated me once, so you owe me a favor. I’ll use the motorcycle you lent me to pay it off. There’s no need to apologize. We can just settle the debt between us.”

Fang Dian smiled brightly: “Are you busy with some team competition recently? I haven’t seen you here for a long time.”

Mu Sicheng and Tang Erda’s expressions changed, and they subconsciously glanced at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu’s expression remained calm: “How did you guess that?”

Fang Dian touched his chin and said, “You usually work for money, and you are short of money after being laid off. Old Lu will not let you do anything illegal. The fastest way to make money legally in the short term, apart from gambling, is generally through various competitive games.”

“And…” Fang Dian pointed at the people around Bai Liu, crossed her arms and smiled, “These are all unfamiliar faces. I haven’t seen them before. Are they your teammates?”

Bai Liu hummed.

Fang Dian still smiled: “It seems that you get along well with them. Bring them to my house for dinner sometime.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes for a long time and agreed.

The taxi that Fang Dian called arrived quickly. Fang Dian supported Lu Yizhan, who was not yet fully awake, waved goodbye to Bai Liu then got in the car and left.

As soon as Fang Dian left, Mu Sicheng couldn't help but ask, "Is she a game player?"

"No." Bai Liu looked at the taxi's back as it drove away.

Mu Sicheng was puzzled: "But what she said just now was too accurate?"

Bai Liu retracted his gaze: "She guessed it."

Mu Sicheng couldn't believe it: "If she wasn't a player, she just met us once, how could she guess so accurately?"

Bai Liu was silent for a while and then said, "When we were in high school, Lu Yizhan and I played Gobang, various competitive games, and horror games with her. We never beat her once in three years."

"So far, I have never won a game against her."

Inside the taxi.

Fang Dian leaned against the car window, yawned lazily, stretched out her foot, and kicked Lu Yizhan next to her: "Okay, stop pretending, Bai Liu can't see it, open your eyes."

Lu Yizhan slowly opened his eyes and leaned back in his seat in silence.

Fang Dian didn't look at him, her eyes fell far away outside the window: "Bai Liu has changed a lot. When he was in high school, he was so lonely and could only play with you and me. Now he has so many new friends and can play games with him…"

"Hopefully he'll have fun."

Fang Dian smiled, she turned around and rubbed Lu Yizhan's head vigorously, smiling brightly: "Of course, Old Lu, you too."

"Y'all gotta have fun!"

Lu Yizhan slowly opened his arms, tightly hugged Fang Dian's waist, and buried his face in them.

Fang Dian gently pushed aside Lu Yizhan's hair and kissed his injured forehead: "Whether it's you or Bai Liu, it's not worth it to be sad because of something like a game that is supposed to make people happy."

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath and hummed muffledly.

The taxi drove along the remote and desolate road towards the bustling city center, and there was no one in the empty driving training ground behind it.

In-game.

Bai Liu took Mu Sicheng and the others to log into the game, went to the gathering place of the Wandering Circus Guild first, and went straight to the lounge.

MuKe, Liu Jiayi, and Wang Shun were already waiting there.

“The result of the last game of the Fanatic Lambs is out.” Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu and exhaled, “They won, and their betting pool has expanded again. Just now, your viewing pool was recalculated, and the result is number 9.”

“Your match with the Fanatic Lambs will be held at Viewing Pool No. 9.”

Bai Liu nodded: “I understand, let’s go now.”

Viewing Pool No. 9.

Kong Xuyang sat on the edge of his seat with a gloomy face. Next to him stood a few injured bikers who didn’t dare to look up.

“You said that your sneak attack on Bai Liu failed?”

Kong Xuyang folded his hands on his knees, trying to put on an air of authority, but the shame of failure made his face twisted, and he asked with a ferocious look:

“We have successfully ambushed the best tacticians in this game. Bai Liu is just a laid-off worker who was fired by the company at the age of 24. He is a loser. How could you lose to him in real life?!”

Kong Xuyang kicked a biker on the knee and shouted angrily: “Waste, a bunch of waste!”

“I brought you into the game, supported you in a life of luxury, and used props to clean up your messes, and this is how you repay me?!”

“I told you to split up into two groups, and not a single one of you succeeded?!”

These speedsters stood there as if they were walking on thin ice, not daring even to breathe.

Kong Xuyang was about to kick again when he saw that he could no longer control his temper. Bai Liu came over with his teammates and took their seats. He looked at Kong Xuyang, nodded, and greeted him, as calmly as if nothing had happened.

Just like the tricks Kong Xuyang had played before, Bai Liu didn’t care at all, and it didn’t have any effect on him. Everything Kong Xuyang did was like a clown, not worth mentioning in front of Bai Liu.

Bai Liu’s calmness completely angered Kong Xuyang.

Kong Xuyang stood up suddenly, but he finally controlled himself. He sat down with a distorted face, staring at Bai Liu with sinister eyes. Then, as if he suddenly thought of something, his expression softened a lot, revealing a sinister smile, and he mouthed: “Bai Liu, you can outrun the first day, but not the fifteenth.”

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows slightly.

More and more people gathered in the viewing pool, and everyone’s eyes were focused on the large TV screen in the center. The screen slowly lit up, and a line of words appeared on it:

[System Alert: Singles competition is about to begin.]

[System Alert: Wandering circus member (Rose Hunter) vs. Fanatic Lamb member (Hairy Fish)]

When the list came out, the audience was shocked:

“What’s going on? Isn’t it Kong Xuyang?”

“Hasn’t he always been fixed in the singles position?”

“Who is this hairy fish? I’ve never seen it before?”

Wang Shun was also surprised: “In order to increase his exposure, Kong Xuyang has always been fixed in the singles position. Playing singles is the easiest position for the audience to remember and the easiest to become a star player.”

“He actually gave this position to Hairy Fish, a reserve player who has never played? Why not let the regular players play?”

Wang Shun frowned in confusion: “What does Kong Xuyang want to do?”

“Send him out for sacrifice.” Bai Liu stared at the big screen intently. “Kong Xuyang should know that I will let Captain Tang compete in the singles match, so he knows that he will most likely not win the singles match. Even if he has the skill of [Silent] to freeze the panel, Captain Tang’s physical fitness is also very good.”

“That’s right.” Wang Shun pondered, “Captain Tang can beat Kong Xuyang to quit the game with just his bare hands.”

“There is no one on his team who can beat Captain Tang, so he just uses a reserve player for this position.” Bai Liu glanced at Kong Xuyang’s face, “It seems that he is going to play a doubles match.”

Wang Shun was startled: “Our doubles competition has always been you and God Mu.”

Bai Liu hummed calmly: “He probably just wants to take the initiative to confront me.”

Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu with concern: “Bai Liu, Kong Xuyang’s tactical style is very cruel. He likes to freeze the opponent’s panel and then torture and tease the opponent slowly. Can you do that?”

Bai Liu looked at Kong Xuyang across from him and said, “I’ve experienced it, and I think it’s just average.”

[System Alert: Wandering Circus member (Rose Hunter) won the singles match, finished the game in advance, and accumulated 2 points]

After Tang Erda logged out, he sat next to Bai Liu. A new line of words appeared on the big screen in the middle of the viewing pool, and Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng stood up.

[System prompt: Doubles match is about to begin.]

[System prompt: Wandering Circus member Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng vs. Fanatic Lambs member Kong Xuyang and Silent Lamb]

The whole audience erupted in huge cheers. This was a doubles match that brought together popular tacticians from both sides.

Before logging into the game, Kong Xuyang hypocritically walked up to Bai Liu and shook hands with him, saying with a fake smile: “Bai Liu, do you know why my team is called [Fanatic Lambs]?”

Bai Liu smiled and shook hands with him, then asked, “Is there any story behind this?”

Kong Xuyang couldn’t help but grin, “Because our team’s trump card is a lamb.”

Bai Liu said with a long tone, “Is it [Fanatic Lambs]? I remember this player died unfortunately in last year’s mid-season tournament.”

Kong Xuyang’s face twisted for a moment, then he smiled again: “No, it’s a brand new [Lamb], [The Silence of the Lambs].”

Bai Liu shifted his gaze to the team member standing behind Kong Xuyang.

The man looked young, about twenty-five or twenty-six. He was wearing a motorcycle helmet and staring at Bai Liu. There were scars on his face. His eyes and face were round. The hair on his temples grew lushly all the way to below his ears. His nose and lips were protruding, and his cheekbones were retracted, like a lamb.

Judging from the wounds and the motorcycle helmet, this man obviously participated in the previous siege of Bai Liu, but Bai Liu couldn’t remember where this man had appeared in an instant.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and saw what this lamb-like team member was holding in his hand.

——A white and red fabric bow hair tie.

This is something square.

Kong Xuyang laughed sinisterly: “Do you feel that this person did something very wrong to you, but you can’t remember who he is?”

“Because his skill is to make you forget who you are.”

“Just wait for me to torture you, Bai Liu. You will regret having the guts to confront me. But it’s too late to tell you this now.”

After Kong Xuyang finished speaking, he smiled, withdrew his hand, turned around, and walked towards the login point.

Bai Liu looked at the Lamb team member following Kong Xuyang, retracted his gaze, turned around, and walked towards their login point with Mu Sicheng.

[Silence] + [Silence of the Lambs]…

That can indeed be considered a killer weapon.

[System Alert: Players Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng have logged into the game (Yinshan Village)]

Bai Liu opened his eyes.

Before his eyes was a desolate hillside of shrubs. Dense trees and bamboo forests shaded the dirt road. All around were fields where rice had just been planted. The green rice and swaying weeds on the ridges were so green that they were eye-catching.

There was an abandoned pond and a well filled with emerald green duckweed ahead. Bai Liu looked up and saw houses built on the hills. Smoke rose from the chimneys. Green mountains were in the distance and there was a light rain. It was quite peaceful, like a paradise.

[System Alert: It rains heavily during the Qingming Festival, and pedestrians on the road are heartbroken]

[Player's identity: You are a local gangster on your way back to your hometown, Yinshan Village. You haven't been back for many years, but not long ago you received a notice from a national archaeological team saying that your village had unearthed a century-old tomb that is unique and has great mining value, and it is right below your home.]

[The archaeological team wanted to excavate the ancient tombs under the houses, so they had to demolish the houses in the village, and they needed the consent of the household owners. But it happened that the few elderly people left in the village accidentally fell from the mountain when they climbed the mountain to worship their ancestors three days ago during the Qingming Festival, and they fell into the pond and drowned.]

[Your grandmother happened to be among the elderly people who drowned. All of your grandmother's other relatives are gone, so the ownership of the house naturally fell to you, the grandson who has not returned to his hometown to worship his ancestors for decades.]

[Your ostensible purpose for returning to Yinshan Village this time was to pack up your things, keep vigil for Grandma on the seventh day after her death, and take over the house, but secretly, you had some ulterior motives.]

[The main quest of “Yinshan Village” is activated: survive until the archaeological team arrives to take over the ancient tomb.]

[“Yinshan Village” side quest activated: Explore “your” purpose.]

Bai Liu took a step forward and there was a strange sound under his feet, like paper breaking. He looked down and saw that it was a white, round piece of money for the afterlife with a square hole.

Bai Liu paused, then turned his head and looked back along the paper money.

The paper money floated all the way from here, from the abandoned pond, all the way to Bai Liu’s way home up the mountain. The pieces of paper were faintly trampled into the mud. If Bai Liu hadn’t paid special attention, he would not have noticed the paper money that had been soaked and softened by the rain.

Bai Liu looked up at the dilapidated village swaying in the mountain rain and saw the smoke rising from every household.

“Ahhhhh——” A trembling male voice came from far behind Bai Liu.

Bai Liu turned around and saw Mu Sicheng running towards him with tears streaming down his face as if his butt was on fire. Then he grabbed Bai Liu’s arm tightly and didn’t move. He was gasping for breath, and his face was pale with fear.

“Bai, Bai Liu…” Mu Sicheng’s voice trembled as he collapsed and screamed, “This is actually a Chinese horror game! I’m freaking afraid of Chinese horror games!”

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow: “Are you afraid of ghosts?”

“I’m not afraid of ghosts!” Mu Sicheng retorted in a timid tone, “I’m afraid of Chinese horror games. Don’t you think Chinese horror games are much scarier than those zombies and monsters?”

Bai Liu saw that Mu Sicheng was really frightened, so he changed the subject: “Did you find anything?”

When Mu Sicheng heard Bai Liu ask this, he swallowed nervously and said stiffly: “…Look behind you, look at my footprints.”

Mu Sicheng was wearing a pair of sneakers. The footprints left on the muddy road after the rain were very obvious. Even the size and brand on the soles of his feet could be seen. A series of footprints on the road clearly connected from the vicinity of the pond to Mu Sicheng’s feet.

Bai Liu looked at the footprints and said, “I see.”

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes, and the hand holding Bai Liu’s arm trembled slightly: “…Look carefully.”

Bai Liu looked more carefully this time. He stared at the shoe prints for a while and then found something wrong.

Behind each of Mu Sicheng’s shoe prints there was a small inverted triangle footprint, very light, as if something was holding Mu Sicheng’s shoulders, standing on tiptoe and following him step by step.

Moreover, the size of the footprints is wrong. It is not the size of a human footprint at all. It looks more like… the footprints of a paper man buried with the dead.

“I always felt like something was following me…” Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, “Then when I turned around, I saw a paper bride’s face smiling strangely. Then my footprints were wrong. There was one more.”

Bai Liu retracted his gaze: “Have your health and spirit values decreased?”

Mu Sicheng shook his head.

“Then don’t worry about it for now.” Bai Liu looked at the village from afar, “Let’s go into the village first.”

Mu Sicheng only took a glance at the village, his face turned pale again, he tightly grasped Bai Liu, and slowly turned his head to look at Bai Liu: “…Wait.”

“You’ve read the player identity introduction, right?” Mu Sicheng pointed at the faint smoke still rising from the village, his face darkening, “Yinshan Village is already a dead village. The last few elderly people alive were drowned three days ago. There’s no way anyone would light a fire and cook in this village.”

“What’s with all this smoke?”

Bai Liu looked over and said, “I noticed it, but I have to go over to find out who is making the fire and cooking, right?”

“I guess it’s made for the paper figurine that follows you as a burial object.”

“You’re still fucking scaring me!” Mu Sicheng couldn’t hold it back and almost burst into tears, “Are you really not afraid at all?”

Bai Liu smiled: “It’s okay.”

The other end.

Kong Xuyang and Lamb landed steadily after logging into Yinshan Village. They took a look at the game map and the player identity introduction on the system panel. They couldn't help but smile proudly: "Great, this is God's help. The two-player dungeon randomly selected by the system is Yinshan Village."

The lamb next to him also showed a strange smile on his face: "Brother Kong, this is a copy we have played before."

Kong Xuyang's eyes flashed with a sinister light: "It seems that God wants us to deal with Bai Liu."

"Let's scout the location first. When we get there, listen to me. I'll let you use your skills first." Kong Xuyang looked back at the pond, his face frightened, and warned in a vigilant tone, "Xiao Yang, remember? In this game, you must not pass by the pond at night."

[Silence of the Lambs]'s real name is Yang Zhi. In the game, Kong Xuyang usually calls him Xiao Yang, which has the same accent as [Little Lamb], so the audience can't tell his real name.

After hearing Kong Xuyang's reminder, Yang Zhi glanced at the pond filled with dark green duckweed and couldn't help rubbing his arms. He nodded with a chill on the back of his neck, "I know, Brother Kong. Last time, we almost lost in this game because we walked along the road next to the pond."

Kong Xuyang withdrew his gaze from the weir pond and said, "If I hadn't walked through it before, I wouldn't dare to activate my skill [Silent] in this game, because after activating it, not only Bai Liu and the others, but also our panel will be frozen, and we won't be able to use skills or items even if we exit the game. We can only rush forward."

"Fortunately, we already know what happened."

Yang Zhi nodded repeatedly to agree with Kong Xuyang and said with lingering fear: “This ‘Yinshan Village’ is the most difficult puzzle-solving dungeon we have encountered in the game pool. If I hadn’t gone through it once, I really wouldn’t dare to let you, Brother Kong, use your skills casually. It’s too easy to die.”

“But this is the good thing about decryption dungeons.” Kong Xuyang walked slowly towards Yinshan Village. “There is not much fighting involved. The lack of a system panel doesn’t matter to the two of us who already know the answer to the mystery.”

Kong Xuyang sneered maliciously: “But for our opponents, that may not be the case.”

“Brother Kong.” Yang Zhi pulled Kong Xuyang’s sleeve and leaned close to Kong Xuyang’s ear carefully, “I don’t know if there is something wrong with my memory. You also know that my memory skill is sometimes confusing. I always feel that I have seen this Bai Liu before.”

Kong Xuyang rolled his eyes: “Aren’t you talking nonsense? You participated in the attack on him tonight. Didn’t you just see this idiot?”

Yang Zhi stammered and said in a low voice: “Brother Kong, that’s not what I meant. I think I have seen Bai Liu before.”

“Speak louder. The audience can’t hear you at this volume. What are you afraid of?” Kong Xuyang frowned, “What did you just say?

“In fact, it’s not just Bai Liu. I also felt like I saw the other woman who was attacked last night.” Yang Zhi took out a faded red bow hair tie from his pocket and handed it to Yang Zhi. “This hair tie has been in the bathroom of my house for two years. I don’t know who left it there, but I saw it on that woman’s head last night.”

Yang Zhi paused: “Boss, I always feel that we have attacked Bai Liu and this woman before.”

“How is that possible?” Kong Xuyang denied without hesitation, “All the photos taken by the paparazzi are kept. There are no photos of these two people at all.”

“But…” Yang Zhi said hesitantly, “I always feel like there’s something wrong. Tonight a biker said that he attacked a woman two years ago and crushed her until her intestines came out. I remember this woman, but I don’t remember her face.”

Yang Zhi raised his head and looked at Kong Xuyang: “I have a memory skill, and it’s hard for me to forget someone’s face. Brother Kong, I wonder if someone has tampered with the memory of all of us?”

Kong Xuyang waved his hand impatiently to interrupt him: “Impossible, tampering with everyone’s memory? Are you kidding? If anyone has this skill, he is no longer a player, but a god.”

“Stop talking about this and that, and go to the village first.”

After Kong Xu finished speaking, he pulled Yang Zhi onto the muddy road covered with paper money and headed towards the mountain village where smoke was curling up from cooking fires.

Suddenly, a cold wind blew, and a burst of strange laughter that sounded like crying and laughing came from somewhere.

The two sets of footprints left by Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi on the muddy road slowly formed a small inverted triangle footprint from their heels. It seemed that something was following them, following their footprints one by one.

The pond filled with duckweed beside the dirt road after the rain suddenly shook twice, a few bubbles popped out, and another twisted laugh came from the bottom of the water.

The bright red wedding gown and white funeral clothes were swaying faintly in the water.

The other party.

Bai Liu dragged Mu Sicheng, who had fallen on his arm, along the muddy mountain road to the gate of Yinshan Village.

The dirt road was covered with white paper money for the afterlife, and it became denser as one got closer to the village entrance. In the end, the entire yellow dirt road was covered white with paper money.

Bai Liu looked up at the village. The village was shrouded in a hazy white mist and the sky was extremely dark. It was impossible to see anything in the distance at a glance. The only things that could be seen clearly were seven or eight houses nearby.

The doors of these seven or eight houses were all wide open. It was dark inside the houses and it seemed as if there were shadows swaying and footsteps from time to time, but when Bai Liu looked carefully, there was nothing.

Opposite the door, or next to it, there is a pile of fruits and vegetables neatly arranged, and a bowl of water. Next to the bowl of water is a pile of yellow paper money that has not been burned completely, and in the bowl of water there are two red candles that have not been completely lit.

The melted tears of the red candle dripped into the bowl of water, condensing into a layer of dark red wax on the surface of the bowl, with some black paper money ash floating on it.

There were a lot of firecrackers hung on the trees in the small courtyard right opposite the door. Because of this, the ground was littered with red barrels of firecrackers after they exploded. Now, after the rain, they had been soaked and softened and melted into the ground. A rich, greasy smell of sesame oil was floating in the air.

At first glance, it is the scene after a large number of sacrifices.

After taking a look, Bai Liu walked into Yinshan Village.

After entering Yinshan Village, Mu Sicheng stuck close to Bai Liu and did not leave his side.

Bai Liu walked past a house, and the open door of the house was suddenly slammed shut, followed by the wide-open windows that were quickly closed one by one.

Bai Liu's entry into the village was like giving the village a signal. As he walked in, every time he passed a house, the family would quickly close their open doors and windows.

The loud banging sounds of doors and windows slamming could be heard continuously, and you could also hear the sound of someone running around the room closing doors and windows.

Soon, lights came on in the dark rooms with closed doors and windows. The dim light shone through the windows, casting the shadows of the people inside on the windows.

Mu Sicheng glanced over and almost cried out the moment he saw the figure, but Bai Liu quickly covered his mouth.

Mu Sicheng looked at the figures dimly reflected on the white paper windows with rapid breathing.

Some of these figures leaning against the windows had only half a head, some had a big hole in the middle of their chest, and some had no hands or feet.

The shadow was reflected motionlessly on the window as if it was observing Bai Liu and the others coming in. The incomplete head would move slightly and stiffly as Bai Liu walked.

The candle in the bowl of water next to the door suddenly stood up and lit up as Bai Liu walked by. The candlelight flickered and had a faint purple-bluish tint.

The pile of paper money began to emit rekindled red sparks, and white money for the afterlife began to float down from the foggy sky, slowly landing on the shoulders of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng.

The further he went inside, the clearer the figures by the window became. Mu Sicheng could even see the bloody handprints left on the paper windows.

These figures followed Bai Liu into the village and kept approaching the window.

Once, Mu Sicheng saw a blood-red eye staring at him and Bai Liu through the broken paper window.

“Bai Liu～” Mu Sicheng was so scared that his voice was shaking. He pulled Bai Liu’s arm down twice, “It seems that they don’t welcome us～”

Bai Liu hummed calmly: “It’s obvious that they are all closed to visitors.”

“They didn’t attack us. This isn’t a monster-killing dungeon. It should be a puzzle dungeon.”

Bai Liu looked around at the people and said, “What we need most in the decryption game is information. Let’s find a house and take a look.”

Mu Sicheng’s hair stood on end: “Now?”

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng calmly and said, “I was just kidding.

Seeing how scared you are, I'll try to calm you down."

Mu Sicheng: "…"

This person really has character issues.

At this time, someone patted Mu Sicheng on the shoulder. Mu Sicheng was frightened and turned around to attack people with his monkey claws, but was stopped by Bai Liu.

Standing in front of them was a man with a pale face and a haggard look, holding a flashlight. "You're the youngsters who came back to the village to take care of the matter of the ancestral graves, aren't you? I'm He Daniu, from a nearby village, and the archaeology team has bothered me to wait here for you."

Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu's system panels popped up prompts at the same time:

[System Alert: Players trigger NPC He Daniu and can receive the side quest – Guarding the Yizhuang]

As soon as He Daniu appeared, the lights in the rooms dimmed instantly, and the figures returned to the darkness, and nothing could be seen.

He seemed to have not noticed the figures in the room at all. He turned around and waved slowly to Bai Liu and the others, and said in a long tone: "Come with me, let's go to the charity cemetery first. Your grandparents are waiting for you there."

After saying this, He Daniu walked forward holding up the old flashlight that flickered unsteadily, muttering to himself as he walked: "I was also guarding Yizhuang in the next village. There was no one in your village, so I came to help guard it. Now that you are back, you are your own ancestors, so it's time for you to guard it yourselves."

"How can a person from another village like me guard the Yinshan Village ancestral hall?"

Bai Liu followed He Daniu and asked, "Why can't someone from outside the village guard it?"

He Daniu paused and said, "For a hundred years, Yinshan Village has never allowed outsiders to guard the village. We do everything by ourselves. Our ancestors have taken root here and lived here. The native Yinshan villagers do not go outside, nor do they allow outsiders to enter the village.”

“So, after all these years, this place is still very old and underdeveloped. It looks the same as it did a hundred years ago.”

“Outsiders are not welcome here. If outsiders mistakenly enter here, they will be driven away.”

He Daniu coughed twice and continued, “It means that your grandparents, the last group of people who were born and raised in Yinshan Village, have all died. Otherwise, it wouldn’t be my turn as an outsider to help guard the bodies.”

"But I'll only keep watch for at most two more days, and if you don't come back, I'm leaving."

Mu Sicheng asked: “Why?”

He Daniu slowly turned his head and looked at Mu Sicheng with old, decayed eyes: “Why? It will be the seventh day in two days. Once [they] come back, I, a foreigner, can’t stay.”

Yinshan Village

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“During the first seven days after a person dies, people from Yinshan Village are required to guard it,” said He Daniu. He walked up a mountain road as he spoke, then rested on his knees and muttered, “If outsiders like us guard it, something strange will happen sooner or later.”

Bai Liu stepped forward to support He Daniu: “What strange thing will happen?”

He Daniu was silent again, and after a long while, he waved his hand and said, “Forget it. Now that everyone is dead, you are the only remaining few in Yinshan Village. It doesn’t matter if I tell you – there’s nothing to hide.”

“This Yinshan Village is not only xenophobic but also has many strange customs. I am not from here, but I have heard a lot about them because they are so bizarre.”

He Daniu looked at the mountain road covered with paper money and fell into memories:

“No one in Yinshan Village has a good end. They died in many strange ways, such as being hit by falling bricks and tiles, choking on bones while eating, and so on. But the most common one was drowning – several people have drowned in ponds outside every year.”

“That’s not even the most bizarre thing. The most bizarre thing is the burial customs of Yinshan Village.”

“When someone drowns, Yinshan Village will bury and shroud them in a coffin-like normal. If the person is not drowned and is an unmarried woman, Yinshan Village will dress the dead woman in a wedding gown and bury her in a wedding sedan chair with great fanfare – beating gongs and blowing oboes.”

“They also like to bury people together as husband and wife, that is, people who died together around the same time will be buried on the same day. If someone drowned and an unmarried girl also died around the same period, then the wedding sedan and coffin will be sent out together, and both red and white events will be held together."

"How could they do that…" He Daniu shook his head repeatedly, "When a newlywed is buried, the Five Reds are present: red face, red clothes, red sedan chair, red shoes, and red rouge. When a person is buried by drowning, the Five Whites are present: white water, white clothes, white pants, white shoes, and white paper money. When these two things collide, it will become evil, and the buried people will never be reborn."

He Daniu sighed, "This is how the ancestors of Yinshan Village have been buried. I wonder how many resentful souls have been buried in this land."

"But that's just my superstition." He Daniu turned his head and looked at Bai Liu, "You, young people shouldn't believe in this, right?"

He Daniu didn't wait for Bai Liu to answer and continued: "It's okay if you don't believe it. If you don't, you won't be able to communicate with ghosts and gods nor be able to see them."

"But if you believe in them, don't be afraid when you see these things. Just don't offend them. They won't easily take the initiative to hurt people."

He Daniu looked at Bai Liu deeply and said, "If you harbor evil intentions and insist on offending them, then you will never be able to escape from Yinshan Village even if you go to heaven or hell."

"This land is filled with evil spirits that have been trapped for hundreds of years. I advise young people like you, who don't know your place, to be careful."

After saying that, He Daniu didn't even look at Bai Liu's expression. He pushed away Bai Liu's hand that was supporting him and continued to limp up the mountain with his hands behind his back.

"Come with me." He Daniu said without turning his head, "We are about to reach the place where your ancestors left their bodies."

Bai Liu looked into the distance along the mountain road that He Daniu was walking on and saw a temple covered with white cloth not far away. When he got closer, he realized it was a Taoist temple.

There were seven or eight wreaths placed at the temple's entrance, with two long funeral couplets hanging on both sides of the wreaths. Walking further in, there was a statue of Sanqing Yuanshi Tianzun enshrined in the center of the temple. The statue looked very old, but there was no dust or paint peeling off from it, and there were many signs of restoration showing that it was well cared for.

At that moment, the statue was holding a dustpan and had its eyes slightly narrowed, as if it was looking at Bai Liu and his group who were walking in.

The temple was filled with the pungent scent of incense oil as the burning of candles and incense sticks wafted into the air. Seven coffins were lined up outside the incense stand in front of the statue, each supported by two wooden benches.

As soon as He Daniu came in, he lit three incense sticks, bowed three times respectfully to the statue, and then set them on the censer.

“Gods three, ghosts four.” After lighting the incense, He Daniu turned around and looked at Bai Liu, “Remember this, don’t burn the incense wrong when you burn it for the Taoist master. Otherwise, if something happens, the Taoist master will not bless nor protect you little bastards who have forgotten your ancestors.”

Mu Sicheng leaned close to Bai Liu’s ear and whispered, “What does gods three, ghost four mean?”

Bai Liu explained softly, “It’s a common setting in Chinese horror games. Burn three incense sticks to the gods and kowtow three times. Burn four incense sticks to the ghosts and kowtow four times.”

Mu Sicheng asked solemnly, “What if I burn it incorrectly?”

Bai Liu’s eyes flickered across the seven coffins, “I guess it’s time to wake up the things in these coffins and start a chase.”

Mu Sicheng had a horrified look on his face, and he quickly muttered a few words in a low voice, “Gods three, ghosts four.”

“Come here.” He Daniu waved to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu pulled Mu Sicheng, who was saying in horror, “Fuck, my name has a four in it, what do I do??” and walked over.

He Daniu saw Bai Liu coming over and patted the coffin, “Look at this.”

Bai Liu lowered his head and looked at the surface of the coffin. There were four bells tied to the four corners of the black lacquered coffin. The four bells were strung together by several thin red lines, one horizontally and one vertically across the surface of the coffin.

A talisman was pasted at the place where the red lines crossed with patterns drawn on it in a flamboyant manner using cinnabar, three large characters were written in wild handwriting at the top – [Ansha Curse].

He Daniu raised his head and looked at Bai Liu, “Do you see the yellow talisman on the cross red line? This is the [Ansha Curse] drawn by a Taoist priest with profound Taoism nearby. It is used to suppress the water corpse in the coffin. Under no circumstances should you take it off.”

Bai Liu glanced at the talisman and asked, “What will happen if I take it off?”

He Daniu looked at Bai Liu steadily and said, “The people in these coffins are all your ancestors. They all died at a ripe old age. Logically, this is a happy funeral. Even if there is an evil spirit, they’re still related to you by blood – they shouldn’t make things difficult for you.”

“But the bad thing is that they fell into the water and died while worshipping their ancestors during the Qingming Festival.”

He Daniu looked at the coffin and said, “There are resentful souls trapped in Yinshan Village for who knows how many years. The Qingming Festival is when they come out to roam. Your ancestors were stained with a lot of resentment from the previous resentful souls, and they died by drowning. Water is associated with Yin, and water ghosts like to find substitutes.”

“What do you think will happen if you remove this tailsman?”

He Daniu’s pale face revealed a creepy smile, “Of course, you would be dragged by your dear grandfathers and grandmothers to be a substitute.”

Mu Sicheng shuddered at the laughter and subconsciously took half a step back.

Bai Liu was as steady as a rock, and asked calmly, “Do you have more of these [Ansha Curses]?”

He Daniu turned around and bowed to the statues of the Three Pure Ones in the temple. Without even turning his head, he replied to Bai Liu, “No.”

“Now, apart from our older generation, who still believes in this? Few are willing to pay for a Taoist priest. Only the people of Yinshan Village still believed in this. Before, temples were popular and incense burned strongly; there were even several small shops selling yellow talismans and cinnabar.”

“But later, the number of people in Yinshan Village decreased, and these small shops closed down a long time ago. These talismans were left in the village by the Taoist priest before he left.”

He Daniu turned around tremblingly and said faintly:

“That Taoist said Yinshan Village would be in chaos in the coming years, so he left these [Ansha Curses], saying that although they cannot resolve the chaos, they can at least delay it for a while. He also came to our village and told us not to get close to Yinshan Village in the near future, as it is easy to cause trouble.”

“Not long after that Taoist left, something happened to your grandparents, and these [Ansha Curses] came in handy.”

He Daniu stared at Bai Liu intently, “The talismans left by the Taoist priest are exactly seven, not one more, not one less. And the number of your dead ancestors is also exactly seven, not one more nor less.”

“Seven talismans, seven coffins, the first seven souls to return after the seventh day…”

“In Taoism, seven represents the extreme of yin and yang, and the number of repetitions. It means that the yin and yang energies of things converge at this number and allow past events to return.” He Daniu looked at the statue of the Three Pure Ones with a gloomy expression and shook his head. “What happened in the past will happen again, and human power cannot stop it.”

“If you hear the bells on the four corners of the coffin ringing, don’t run around. It’s more dangerous outside. If you stay here, the Taoist may be able to save your life.”

As he spoke, He Daniu looked up at the sky outside, then walked outside with a flashlight in hand, “It’s getting late, I have to go. If it gets any later, I won’t be able to leave.”

Mu Sicheng wanted to reach out and grab He Daniu, the NPC who looked very useful, to stop him from leaving, but he only grabbed the fluttering corner of He Daniu's clothes.

"Don't keep people who shouldn't stay, they can't be kept, just like people who shouldn't leave, can't leave…" He Daniu said in a vague voice as he walked out with a staggering step. His movements seemed slow, but his back figure quickly disappeared in the mist and ashes.

"If you have any problems, please ask the Taoist for help. It's dark now. Don't go through the dam. It's not safe…"

As soon as He Daniu left, the bright lights in the temple flickered, a cold breeze blew through, and the brightness was reduced by several degrees.

Mu Sicheng asked quietly, "Bai Liu, how credible do you think what He Daniu said is?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the talisman on the coffin, "You can trust him completely."

Mu Sicheng was startled, "Why? What is the identity of this He Daniu?"

"He should be that Taoist priest." Bai Liu said flatly, "This is a very obvious Chinese horror instance that uses Taoism to fight against ghosts and Gods. The NPC given at the beginning is so familiar with Taoist information and also gives a lot of friendly hints in the directions — which is typically indicative of a character designed as a reclusive expert."

"The only reclusive master we know of so far is the one he calls the Taoist Master, so my biggest guess is that He Daniu is that Taoist Master."

Mu Sicheng stood beside the statue, far away from the coffin, and asked, "I feel like this He Daniu wants to help us, and he's a Taoist master, so why did he leave?"

Bai Liu raised his eyes to look at the statue behind Mu Sicheng: "Because he can't handle the upcoming situation."

"Animals flee when faced with danger—humans even more so."

Mu Sicheng felt a chill run down his spine at Bai Liu's words and instinctively stepped away from the coffin.

"But it's not entirely hopeless." Bai Liu withdrew his gaze and looked at Mu Sicheng. "He left us a clue. Check behind the statue—there might be something hidden there."

Mu Sicheng agreed, and his human turned into a monkey's paw. He took a deep breath and reached behind the statue to dig.

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who had been hiding behind the statue, heard Bai Liu have Mu Sicheng come over, and they both smiled smugly at the same time.

Because they had played this game before, they took a shortcut down the back mountain and did not go through the main gate to trigger the NPC He Daniu to follow the plot. Therefore, they arrived at the temple earlier than Bai Liu and the others and hid behind the statue earlier.

Yang Zhi gave Kong Xuyang a thumbs up and sincerely mouthed praises to Kong Xuyang for his incredible foresight.

Kong Xuyang looked at the "Maoshan Talisman" in his hand and raised one corner of his mouth insidiously.

Bai Liu was quite smart. His guesses about the game setting and the plot weren't off at all, all were completely right.

That He Daniu was indeed an old Taoist priest. He stayed here to guard the coffin because he was afraid that the people returning here would be harmed by the vengeful spirits, so he stayed around specifically to warn them.

However, since He Daniu himself was also under the surveillance of the vengeful spirits, he dared not give tips openly. He could only rely on the protection of the temple to covertly provide players with some self-defense items.

Among the self-defense items that He Daniu left for the players, the most valuable one is the book "Maoshan Talismans" hidden under the statue.

With this book, even if a player has no skills or props, they can survive safely in this high-difficulty puzzle game.

But sorry, he already got the book.

This book was one of the important supports for Kong Xuyang to carry out his next plan because after he activates the skill [Silence], neither Bai Liu nor he will be able to open the system panel.

Without this book, he wouldn't be able to survive and complete this instance.

Kong Xuyang turned his head, glanced at Yang Zhi again, and mouthed, "Are you clear on what to do next? You use your skills first, and then I'll use mine. Got it?"

Yang Zhi nodded solemnly.

Kong Xuyang's eyes were fixed, and he made a one-handed gesture and mouthed, "One, two-"

"Three! Go!" Kong Xuyang shouted, they both jumped out from behind the statue at the same time and appeared in front of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng.

[System Alert: Player Silent Lamb uses his personal skill (Memory-Eating Lamb) on Players Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, which allows (Silent Lamb) to eat all of Player Bai Liu and Player Mu Sicheng's memories in this game, making the other party forget who they are, their memory will be restored after leaving the game.]

[System Alert: Player Kong Xuyang uses his personal skill (Silent), the system panels of all players are frozen and cannot be used.]

A wave of white light radiated, the system panel floating in front of Mu Sicheng quickly turned gray and froze, then shattered and disappeared. The game controller in front of him became gray, like an ordinary coin.

The moment Mu Sicheng noticed two people jumping out from behind the statue, he turned around and wanted to run toward Bai Liu almost as a conditioned reflex.

But before he could run over, the wave-like white light swept across the back of Mu Sicheng's head. His eyes involuntarily became blank and his movements suddenly stopped.

The white light flashed across Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu's brains, then turned into a ring-shaped halo and was sucked back into Yang Zhi's mouth. Yang Zhi's belly instantly swelled up, and he burped with his bloated belly.

Mu Sicheng stared at his hands blankly, frowned, and touched the back of his head before raising it to look around in confusion, “Where… is this place?”

“Why am I here…?”

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi looked at each other and smiled knowingly, stepping forward to support Mu Sicheng, who was staggering in place due to dizziness caused by the use of skills, “You’re an outdoor live streamer, specializing in shooting supernatural videos of seeing ghosts!”

Mu Sicheng looked over blankly, “What the hell?”

Kong Xuyang pretended to be angry and patted the bag on Mu Sicheng’s shoulder, “Hey! How come you forgot who you are after drinking? Open the bag yourself and take a look.”

Mu Sicheng opened his backpack dizzily and took a look.

There were several cameras, a foldable tripod, two microphones, and two professional-grade cameras neatly placed in the backpack. In the small pocket was Mu Sicheng’s work ID, which clearly read [Supernatural Live Streamer signed by xx Livestreaming Platform].

Mu Sicheng was startled. He raised his work ID in disbelief, looked at the photo of himself at work, frowned, and asked, “Am I really a… supernatural livestreamer?”

Kong Xuyang beside him smiled diabolically: “Yes, this is your [identity].”

The most sinister thing about the game “Yinshan Village” is that it gives every player who comes in a particularly suicidal [identity] setting. Players must play this identity setting in the game. If they act contrary to this identity setting, the difficulty of the game will rise sharply, making it easy to encounter resentful ghosts and be killed during their actions.

The last time Kong Xuyang entered this game instance, there were six people. One of the identities was set as a [supernatural live streamer who came to Yinshan Village]. The side quest of this identity was to [take pictures of the most terrifying ghosts].

As soon as Kong Xuyang saw Mu Sicheng carrying a big bag, he knew that Mu Sicheng had obtained this identity setting.

But the most difficult identity setting was still…

Kong Xuyang turned his head with ill intent and looked at Bai Liu who was lying next to the coffin.

Bai Liu, Bai Liu, you are worthy of having a luck value of 0. You immediately drew the most difficult character identity in this instance that I have completed before.

Mu Sicheng seemed to have noticed that an unconscious person was lying there. He stood up suddenly and subconsciously rushed over to help Bai Liu up. He shook him anxiously twice, “Hey! Hey! What’s wrong?!”

After shaking, Mu Sicheng paused strangely.

What’s going on… Why is he so worried about this person he doesn’t even know? He didn’t seem to be the type of person who becomes very close with strangers, so why did he feel like this towards this person…

It’s as if they’ve already known each other for a long time?

But before Mu Sicheng could figure it out, Bai Liu had already woken up.

Bai Liu stood up naturally, as if he had never fainted, supporting himself with Mu Sicheng’s shoulder. Mu Sicheng also naturally reached out to help Bai Liu up, and put a small stool for Bai Liu to sit on and rest.

After helping him, Mu Sicheng paused again, and he slowly realized that something was wrong.

Why is he so used to doing this kind of servant-like actions towards this person…

After Bai Liu woke up, Kong Xuyang didn’t get the chance to give him any deliberate reminders. He took the initiative to open his backpack and look for something, then nodded in understanding.

This overly normal behavior made Kong Xuyang look at Yang Zhi in doubt, questioning with his eyes, Are you sure you ate Bai Liu’s memory?

Upon seeing Bai Liu’s normal, relaxed movements, Yang Zhi was also utterly stunned.

Yang Zhi patted his belly in confusion. After confirming that the memory he was digesting in his belly was indeed Bai Liu's, he opened his eyes wide and raised three fingers to assure Kong Xuyang, that he really ate Bai Liu's memory.

The memories that Yang Zhi ate entered his stomach and intestines in the form of [meat] and were digested. If the digestion was fast, Yang Zhi could still see something from the memory after digestion. This was also the reason why Yang Zhi often had confusing memories.

But if all of a person's memories are devoured, it would be like eating a whole cow for Yang Zhi. A game is far from enough time for Yang Zhi to digest it.

Therefore, Kong Xuyang only uses Yang Zhi's skill to confuse the opponent and cannot be used as a skill to pry for information.

But Yang Zhi was aware of the memories he had eaten. He said that he was digesting Bai Liu's memories, which proved that Bai Liu's memories were indeed eaten and he was a blank person with no memories.

Kong Xuyang retracted his gaze and took two tentative steps towards Bai Liu: "Bai Liu? Are you okay? Did you drink too much just now?"

Bai Liu looked up at Kong Xuyang, "I'm fine."

Kong Xuyang sat next to Bai Liu and comforted him with a look of pity, "Our grandparents are both dead. We are all returning to our hometown to pay respects to our ancestors. We are in the same boat. Don't be sad."

"I'm not sad." Bai Liu took a book out of his bag, held it up, and smiled, "Because I seem to have come back to do bad things."

There were seven sloppy brush-written characters on the book that Bai Liu took out, which clearly read "Maoshan Evil Art Handbook".

> In China, red is the color of marriages, and white is the color of funerals.
> The Five Reds refer to the red face (a blushing face), red clothes

(red wedding clothes in Chinese customs), red sedan chair (to carry the bride), red shoes, and red rouge (lip makeup). On the other hand, the Five Whites refer to white water (pure, clean water), white clothes, white pants (in Chinese culture, the dead wear white), white shoes, and white paper money (money burned for the dead).

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Kong Xuyang was delighted, but looked surprised and asked, “What are you doing with this book?”

“Using it to make money.” Bai Liu said lightly.

Bai Liu opened the book, and several slips of paper of different sizes slipped out. He bent down to pick them up, patted them, and steadily lined them up neither fast nor slow on the book.

These notes were all IOUs, with the amounts owed ranging from a few thousand to over a hundred thousand. The repayment date on each note was circled heavily in red and had two exclamation marks drawn on it, showing the fear of the parties involved and their eagerness to repay the debt.

Bai Liu touched his chin as if he had realized something: “I seem to owe others a lot of money.”

Kong Xuyang looked over and couldn’t help but laugh contemptuously in his heart, secretly saying “Poor bastard”.

The character that Bai Liu got really fits his identity. He was an unemployed vagrant both inside and outside the game, and a short-lived ghost who was short on money.

Bai Liu played a thug who dropped out of junior high school and had been hanging around in society ever since. He had been to jail two or three times for committing crimes. Due to his generosity, he made friends with all kinds of people, but because of this generosity he also owed a lot of debt.

At this time, the man already owed a lot of money, and the banker who loaned him the money started to pressure him. Threatening that if he couldn’t pay back the money, he would break his legs and make him crawl on the ground for the rest of his life.

The man was frightened and desperately sought help from a shady Taoist priest he knew, asking him if there was any way he could make an easy fortune.

The Taoist said, “If you are really short of money, you can find an extremely yin place to borrow some yin wealth. The heavier the yin energy, the more windfall you will get.”

When the fool heard this, he happened to encounter the archaeological team that notified him to return home. He thought about it and became ecstatic – was there any place in the world more dense with yin energy than his hometown? A place where ancient tombs were dug out, full of gloominess and filth?

If he could borrow yin wealth from a place like this, wouldn’t he be rich?!

But fearing that something bad would happen after he takes advantage of ill-gotten wealth, the man remained cautious and carefully asked the Taoist, “Will nothing bad happen if I borrow ill-gotten wealth like this?”

When the shady Taoist heard that he wanted to return to his hometown to borrow yin wealth, he told him, “Borrowing money from ancestors is immoral but not a big deal. You would suffer a little misfortune, but there would be no fatal disaster because you are a descendant of this village after all.“

But this Taoist probably didn’t expect that this person’s village was actually Yinshan Village, a small village with strange funeral customs.

Generally speaking, it wouldn’t be a big deal if the younger generation borrows the yin wealth of their ancestors. Even if your ancestors were angry with you for not living up to their expectations, they’d wait until you arrived at the underworld to settle accounts with you and teach you a lesson for being an unfilial descendant. They couldn’t easily do it while you’re alive; after all, you were their blood relative, and they still expect you to burn incense and offer sacrifices.

But what if your ancestors never went to the underworld, and were trapped in this small village day and night, wandering around with resentment?

If you borrowed wealth at this time, it was hard to say what would happen.

Kong Xuyang retracted his malicious gaze from Bai Liu, replaced it with a worried look, and said hesitantly: “Seeking wealth through evil practices is against the will of heaven and earth, and there is bound to be retribution… It’s not good, right?”

Bai Liu's eyes were still on the book, not looking at Kong Xuyang, and he calmly asked, "Isn't all wealth that can be quickly obtained harmful and immoral to the world?"

Kong Xuyang was stunned and subconsciously retorted: "How could that be?"

Bai Liu finally let go and glanced at him lightly: "If there is a kind of evil practice that allows you to run a company where you can exploit your employees without them resisting, or predict the stock market trend in advance and cut off a large number of investors, or lend money at high interest rates with just one advertisement that makes others unable to resist borrowing from you."

"Even when playing games or competing, you can use evil practices to kill opponents with more competitive strength first, without leaving any traces, and finally winning the prize money."

"You can accumulate a lot of wealth with this, but according to you, isn't it all ill-gotten wealth obtained through evil practices?"

"Does that mean those who do these things should be punished?"

Kong Xuyang was startled by Bai Liu's nonchalant glance.

Kong Xuyang had done all these things before, leaving no trace behind by using props exchanged from game points. How could Bai Liu know?!

Didn't he forget everything?

Kong Xuyang looked at Yang Zhi with shock and doubt. Yang Zhi patted his belly in confusion, indicating that he was really digesting Bai Liu's memory. Kong Xuyang reluctantly sat down again with an uncertain mind: "What were you talking about, Bai Liu…"

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze calmly: "I was imagining what I might do if I got the evil practices. These ways make money the fastest."

"I really want this kind of ill-gotten wealth."

Kong Xuyang pretended to be amused and patted Bai Liu on the shoulder: "You are joking again, Bai Liu. You just said that doing these things will bring retribution."

Bai Liu glanced at Kong Xuyang and said, "No, I don't think there will be retribution for doing this."

"All immoral wealth is merely split into either the legal or illegal category. The illegal ones will indeed definitely face retribution but the legal ones most likely won't."

Kong Xuyang tried his best to force a smile: "There are still legal ways to gain wealth immorally?"

Bai Liu raised the book in his hand, his eyes sincere: "I was just thinking, the law will protect the rights of the living, so exploiting the money of the living by all means is illegal, but it seems that exploiting the money of the dead is not included in the scope of legal considerations, so it is legal."

"So borrowing yin wealth is a legal act."

Kong Xuyang: "…"

He felt like something was wrong, but he couldn't put his finger on it.

Bai Liu opened the "Maoshan Evil Art Handbook", and found that some pages were wrinkled from being turned over, showing that it was read frequently. There were even detailed notes on one of the pages.

At the beginning of this page are three big characters: "發陰財".

Mu Sicheng, who was standing behind Bai Liu, quickly accepted his role as a supernatural anchor. He picked up his camera and started taking pictures. He saw Bai Liu looking down at the book. He held the camera and took a closer look, reading as he read:

"… 'Acquiring Yin Wealth'", wow, this is in traditional Chinese, so hard to read, let me see what it says…"

"Find a new grave for burial, with a tombstone, name, and gender, and bury the deceased no more than 100 days later. Prepare food… select three sacrificial animals (cow, sheep, pig), and on the fifth day of Gui, at the fifth yin hour (5 pm to 7 pm), bring a piece of longevity paper money… and proceed to perform the ritual."

"First, light four incense sticks. Place one in the back courtyard. Hold three incense sticks in your right hand facing west and draw them in the air. Pray to the wandering gods of day and night and yin and yang, and then chant the incantation—"

Mu Sicheng gradually became absorbed in watching, and his tone became dazed:

“Thundering command, swift as a shooting star, instantly heard in the ten directions and three realms, rotating years and months, rotating day and night. Received by Gongcao , day and night, yin and yang, gods wanders, communicating with the five directions-“

The incense burning in the temple flickered, and the cold wind whistled through the hall, making a strange echo that was similar to a woman’s laughter.

The Three Pure Ones statues behind Mu Sicheng changed from their original dignified expressions to glares, holding up their whisks and grinning, as if they were going to insult and beat Mu Sicheng, the Taoist disciple who performed evil practices in front of him.

The crisp ringing of bells was heard along with the sound of wind.

The red cross that was pressed on the coffin swayed, causing the bells on the four corners to start shaking as well. The three candles on the three incense sticks lit by He Daniu in front of the statue swayed twice in the cold wind and went out.

The lights in the temple dimmed, leaving only a faint yellow light from the swinging overhead electric lamps shining on the statues. Both the statues and people looked hideous under such dim lights.

The seven kind-faced old men in the black-and-white photos placed on the temporary altar opposite the seven coffins also became inexplicably eerie. In the photos, they stared straight at the four people in the lobby, and the originally friendly smiles on their faces became weird.

When Mu Sicheng met the eyes of the old man in the black-and-white photo facing him, he was startled and suddenly woke up.

He subconsciously looked at Bai Liu, who shook his head calmly: “It’s okay, you would have to recite this spell sooner or later, it’s better to see the effect beforehand.”

Mu Sicheng breathed a sigh of relief for some unknown reason.

Bai Liu’s eyes swept across the mourning hall, which had become much dimmer. Suddenly, his gaze stopped on two coffins.

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi had been standing far away, both of them with tense expressions on their faces.

Even if you have played this game once, you would know that there are small traps and pitfalls everywhere. Just now, Mu Sicheng suddenly chanted a spell, and if they hadn't dodged quickly, they would have almost fallen into the trap!

The old man in the black-and-white photos placed on the altar facing the two coffins had kind eyes and a friendly smile, and he looked like a good person at first glance. But what made people feel cold was that these two photos, which were originally supposed to be individual photos, had unknowingly become photos of two people in the chaos just now.

In these two black-and-white photos, one of the old men was clutching Mu Sicheng's shoulder, who was holding a camera and seemed to have not yet come to his senses; The other clutched Bai Liu's shoulder with a calm expression, his face marred with corpse-like spots and greenish, and his nails had become darkish green and sharp, as he looked out of the photo with a strangely joyful expression.

Bai Liu's gaze paused for a moment on the old man's hand clutching his shoulder, then he withdrew his gaze from the photo and looked at the yellow talismans on the two coffins.

The cinnabar on the yellow talisman was dull and the edges and corners were damaged. It was obvious that it would not last long.

Bai Liu turned to look at Mu Sicheng: "Take off your shirt."

Mu Sicheng was confused, but still took it off subconsciously.

Bai Liu's gaze stopped on Mu Sicheng's shoulder – there were shocking blue-black and red finger marks there, which had just been grasped.

Mu Sicheng was so frightened when he saw the handprint that he let out a curse.

Bai Liu touched his shoulder. He felt a little pain in that place now. He unbuttoned two buttons of his shirt, turned his head and saw a concave handprint on his shoulder.

Because it was so cold, there wasn't even any pain.

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng: "You were filming all the time, right?

Let me see."

Mu Sicheng handed over the camera.

Bai Liu stared intently at the palm-sized screen of the camera, pressing the back button on the camera, and his eyes quickly searched for something in the rewinding footage.

Mu Sicheng leaned over, a little afraid to look at the camera screen, and only dared to ask Bai Liu: "What are you looking for?"

Bai Liu's finger that was pressing the back button finally stopped, and he pressed the play button: "Finding something to verify my guess."

The images in the camera began to play normally, and Bai Liu watched intently.

Mu Sicheng swallowed and looked over.

The lights flickered in the shaking camera footage. Mu Sicheng could hear the hazy sound of himself chanting the incantation at the end, followed by the piercing sound of cold wind. The moment the incense in front of the statue went out, the whole screen darkened and then lit up again.

In the moment of darkness and light, something seemed to appear beside Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, and then quickly disappeared.

Bai Liu played this scene again in reverse and slowed down. This time, Mu Sicheng finally saw what happened clearly and his blood ran cold.

Two faces that were completely swollen, distorted, and full of maggots appeared on the screen. Their faces were covered with green duckweed. The two bodies had blue-black fingernails grasping Bai Liu and the others' shoulders.

Then the two old men stared at the flashing camera with a sinister look, leaned on Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng's shoulders, and let out a strange laugh. Their swollen flesh cracked as they laughed, revealing pale flesh underneath.

The next second, the dim light of the electric lamp came on, and the two faces behind their ears disappeared.

Bai Liu handed the camera to Mu Sicheng, who was already frightened out of consciousness and turned to walk toward the coffin. He stared at the yellow talisman on it for a second or two, then stretched out his hand as if to uncover it.

Kong Xuyang sternly stopped him, “What are you doing?! This talisman is the [Ansha Curse] that suppresses corpses! If you tear it off the coffin, the corpse won’t be suppressed anymore! Everyone will be in trouble!”

Bai Liu didn’t care what Kong Xuyang said and tore off the yellow talisman without hesitation.

The yellow talisman was turned over, and there was actually another talisman drawn on the back!

Bai Liu opened his “Maoshan Evil Art Handbook” and searched through it several times, and soon found the talisman corresponding to the talisman at the back.

“[Corpse Preserving Talisman].” Bai Liu said calmly, “So this is how it was. On the surface, this is indeed an [Ansha Curse], but it has been tampered with. There was also an evil [Corpse Preserving Talisman] on the back that turned drowned corpses into Yin corpses to increase the evil spirit. Moreover, the [Corpse Preserving Talisman] on the back is facing the coffin, making the talisman more effective.”

“Sticking this talisman won’t have any suppressive effect at all. It will only make these corpses turn into Yin corpses faster and come out to wreak havoc on the world.”

Mu Sicheng was startled and asked, “How did you know there was something wrong with this talisman?!”

Bai Liu glanced at him and said, “Because everything inside could come out and take pictures with us, this talisman has no suppressive effect at all.”

After Bai Liu finished speaking, he walked forward, raised his hand, and directly tore off the talismans on the seven coffins.

Suddenly, a strong wind blew, the hanging bells rang urgently, and the coffin lids on the seven coffins shook incessantly as if they would push the red line open at any time.

A hand with black nails suddenly stretched out from the edge of the coffin in front of Bai Liu, slowly pushing the coffin open.

Yin wealth: Potential wealth, career, and luck that a person has Gongcao : A messenger of the heavens

An unintelligible roar came from the coffin—as if it were the roar of some country beast—and from within, something banged heavily against the lid, threatening to escape.

Pale, shriveled hands stretched out from the crack of the shaking coffin, dark nails leaving deep sawdust marks on the hard surface of the coffin. One can imagine how sharp these nails were; if they were to scratch a person's skin, the skin would probably peel off directly.

Mu Sicheng was frightened to death. He pulled Bai Liu's hand and subconsciously wanted to run away, but was held back by Bai Liu.

Not only did Bai Liu not run away, but he walked forward, turned the talisman he had just torn off over, and pasted it back on the red line.

A strange thing happened. The coffin, which had been shaking incessantly just now, suddenly came to a halt.

The moment the talisman fell, a golden light flashed from the red line. The hands of the corpses that were attempting to break free from the coffins gave off bursts of white smoke upon touching the red line as if they were being burned. Indistinct wails came from within the coffin, and after shaking twice as if unwillingly, it finally returned to tranquility.

Kong Xuyang narrowed his eyes when he saw this scene and clicked his tongue impatiently in his heart.

He was originally prepared to see this coward Bai Liu rushing out of the temple in fear, but he didn't expect Bai Liu to come up with a solution so quickly.

However, Kong Xuyang quickly adjusted his expression and hugged Yang Zhi with horror, just like an ordinary person, but the viciousness in his eyes still lingered as he stared at Bai Liu.

Indeed, when the talisman is turned over, it turns out to be the [Ansha Curse], which can hold out for a while.

Although they could avoid the first day, they could not escape the seventh, the talisman would not last till the seventh day. The orthodox Maoshan talisman techniques and the yellow paper were in his hands. When the seventh day arrived, with no protective talismans and only holding a book of evil techniques, he wanted to see what Bai Liu would do.

Mu Sicheng stood stiffly like a wooden stick in front of Bai Liu, his chest heaving violently, and his face pale as he faced the eight coffins. He looked terrified at the sight.

He actually wanted to run away, but for some reason, Mu Sicheng felt that if he left Bai Liu here alone, facing Bai Liu in the future would be more terrifying than facing these eight coffins.

There wasn't the slightest bit of fear on Bai Liu's face. He patted Mu Sicheng on the shoulder and instructed him in a casual manner, "Go light the incense. Light three sticks and bow three times. Don't make it four. Avoid the altars."

Mu Sicheng's mind was still dizzy. After hearing Bai Liu's instructions, he let out an, "Oh" and walked forward weakly.

As a result, while Mu Sicheng was halfway through picking up the incense to prepare for the ceremony, fear lingering in his eyes as he glanced at the eight altars placed in a row on the table in front of the statue, he suddenly froze in place, stuck like a machine that had jammed..

Eight… altars?

Mu Sicheng turned around slowly, his face drained of blood. His fingers trembled faintly as he pointed at the coffin beside him "Bai-Bai Liu, there's one- one more coffin."

Bai Liu was already kneeling on one knee beside the extra coffin and was carefully touching the edges and corners of the coffin with his fingers. Hearing this, he hummed without even looking up, "I see."

At first glance under the dim light, this extra coffin seemed to be of similar specifications, size, color, and material to the rest of the coffins. It had a black lacquered top, a red string wrapped around the middle, and bells hanging on the four corners. However, after careful observation, Bai Liu discovered something strange about this coffin.

Bai Liu looked at the fingertips that had just touched the coffin — a thin layer of yellow soil was on them.

This was a coffin that had been used for burial.

Not only had the burial taken place, but it seemed to have been done many years ago. The bells hanging from the four corners were made of brass, with an old-fashioned design. Judging by the style, they likely dated back over a century to the end of the previous dynasty.

The red string was new, just like the ones used on the other coffins. The coffin seemed to have been freshly painted, hiding any signs of wood decay, yet the smell of damp, rotting wood lingered.

Although the exterior was repainted, it had probably never been opened, as a layer of untouched yellow soil could be felt along the edge of the coffin.

Additionally, there was no yellow talisman on the coffin, which screamed danger to the onlookers.

Mu Sicheng's hands were shaking as if he wanted to cry but had no tears, "Bai Liu, how come there is suddenly an extra coffin?!"

"What I'm more interested in now is why there is this extra coffin." Bai Liu stood up and walked past Mu Sicheng to the altar where an extra shrine had suddenly appeared. He looked at it for a while, and said thoughtfully, "I see."

Mu Sicheng carefully peeked over Bai Liu's shoulder. With Bai Liu as a cover, he vigilantly raised the video camera as if facing a powerful enemy and began to film the shrine.

It's a bit embarrassing to say, but after he counted out one more shrine, he didn't dare to look at it again out of fear. Now, with the double protection of Bai Liu and the camera, he dared to take a glimpse.

Mu Sicheng looked at the shrine on the small screen of the video recorder for a while. The more he looked, the more he felt something was wrong. His expression changed from confusion at first, to disbelief, and then to confusion again.

"This shrine…" Mu Sicheng said in confusion, "Why is it from 1884?!"

The dates of birth and death written on the shrine were clearly [1884-1900], and the gender and name were written very simply, with only one sentence: " A girl from the Li family."

Mu Sicheng began to doubt himself and took out his phone to take a look, "We are in modern society, how can this coffin be more than a hundred years old?"

"After a woman gets married, she will be buried with her husband's surname, and referred to by her maiden name." Bai Liu focused his eyes on the coffin, "The person in this coffin is a 16-year-old unmarried girl. She probably died while getting married."

Mu Sicheng was confused again, "Why did she die while getting married?"

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng lightly, and Mu Sicheng inexplicably saw a hint of disdain in his glance.

Bai Liu turned to look at the coffin and explained, "After a woman gets married, she takes her husband's surname. If a woman from the Li family marries a man named Zhang and dies, she should be buried under the name of [Zhang Li] within the Zhang family's ancestral tomb."

"Yet the girl in this coffin was buried under the name of [the girl from the Li family]."

Bai Liu said flatly, "This is very interesting. Unmarried women in that era were not allowed to be buried in coffins or ancestral tombs. However, the size of this coffin shows that this woman was most likely buried in the ancestral tomb in the end."

"For an unmarried woman to be buried in the ancestral tomb, I can think of two most likely scenarios. The first is that this woman has made a great contribution to the family, or the second is that this girl died on the way to get married."

"But this girl has no surname or name, so I am more inclined to the second possibility."

Mu Sicheng suddenly came to a realization and said, "Then why is the coffin from a hundred years ago?"

Bai Liu replied calmly, "We must have found an ancient tomb. This is quite common in a small, isolated village."

Kong Xuyang gritted his teeth as he listened nearby.

He had erased all the basic information that the old Taoist He Daniu had told Bai Liu and the others, but Bai Liu was able to figure it out again on his own.

Just what kind of monster is Bai Liu?!

"…Does this mean there's a hundred-year-old female corpse in this coffin?!" Mu Sicheng realized what was in the coffin belatedly. He shuddered and took two steps back, looking horrified. "How terrifying."

Kong Xuyang walked forward with a fake smile and patted Mu Sicheng on the shoulder, "Hey! Is what Bai Liu's saying true? Maybe he's just guessing and saying that to scare you?"

Mu Sicheng retorted without hesitation, "Even if Bai Liu just made a random guess, he would still be right."

Bai Liu looked past Mu Sicheng, towards Kong Xuyang, and nodded in agreement, "Indeed, all of this is just my guess and may not be accurate."

Kong Xuyang was stunned by what Bai Liu said.

"Practice is the only criteria for testing truth." Bai Liu stepped forward, put his hands on the top of the coffin, and pushed it down with both hands. "If we open it, we'll know who is inside, right?"

Kong Xuyang had no time to stop him and could only watch Bai Liu push open the coffin lid.

He and Yang Zhi, both of whom had played this instance before, were stunned and watched in astonishment as Bai Liu released one of the strongest monsters in the Yinshan Village instance.

Mu Sicheng was now completely out of service. He stood in front of the coffin that had suddenly been opened with a blank expression, still holding the camera in his left hand.

The coffin lid fell heavily to the ground, shaking the floor and causing a cloud of dust and dirt to rise.

Amidst the filth, Bai Liu brushed the dust off his hands and covered his mouth and nose with his sleeve. He held up the flashlight of his cell phone, took a step forward, and approached the edge of the coffin.

The hazy fog brought by the dust gradually dissipated. Bai Liu waved his hand to disperse the dust in front of him, then looked into the coffin with the help of the dim lighting and the flashlight.

This coffin was just as Bai Liu had speculated. The outside of it had been painted, but the inside had never been opened. Once it was opened, a smell of moldy rotten wood hit the air.

Water was dripping from the dark, soft interior of the coffin. The wood was rotting and cracking, and a corpse wearing a lotus-embroidered cheongsam-style wedding gown lay peacefully at the bottom.

The bride was not tall. She wore a hair crown on her head and her clothes were covered with a thick layer of dust. Her hands were folded below her chest with her thumbs raised. Inside her clasped hands was a scale rod about an inch long that was enclosed in a pouch woven with red thread.

A foggy bronze mirror was embedded inside the top of the coffin, reflecting the bride's feet wearing black boots. Her face was covered with a satin veil with a pattern of mandarin ducks symbolizing double happiness. The tassels on her bridal veil hung dirty and limp over her shoulders, obscuring her features.

Bai Liu's gaze moved to the bride's hands folded below her chest and paused slightly.

The hands had plump skin and round nails, like jade carvings or wax sculptures. Not only were there no signs of dryness or decay, they even looked fresher than the corpse next to them that had just died two days ago.

Not to mention, the entire body was straight and upright, with the knees slightly bent, and the clothes did not age at all from decay.

——Just like a living person.

Bai Liu's eyes scanned the entire corpse and then returned to the scale bar that the corpse was holding with both hands. He reached out his hand without any fear and used a little force to pull the scale bar out of the bride's hands.

Although the wooden scale bar was covered in dust, one could still tell it was exquisitely crafted, with a carving of a dragon and a phoenix intertwining. It was clearly a wedding bar used to lift the bride's veil.

Kong Xuyang's eyes widened with uncontrollable fear as he watched Bai Liu pull out the wedding rod without a second thought. Unable to stop himself, he blurted out, warning, "Don't move!"

The coffin was originally foggy, with only the vague reflection of the bride's feet in the bronze mirror. However, the moment the wedding rod was pulled out, it suddenly swung to the side and clearly reflected a face with makeup and rouge on it, which was obviously the face of the bride.

The face of the bride in the coffin was still covered by the veil, obstructing the view. However, the bride in the mirror laughed tenderly and turned her head 360 degrees. She stared at Bai Liu holding the wedding pole with her creepy eyes, singing miserably and charmingly.

"Husband, come back and chat…"

"Even in death, as your bones drift by the river, you are the one I see beside me on our wedding night!"

The bride in the bronze mirror had a head but no body, red lips, a pale face, a smiling expression and a crying voice, singing in a babbling childish manner.

“My dear husband, lift my veil and look at my face.”

“In Yinshan Village, girls marry at the age of 16 and then go to the grave.”

“My dear husband, push open my coffin and look at my bones.”

“In Yinshan Village, the elderly enter the water at 82 and then go to the grave.”

The voice of the bride in the mirror became more and more resentful. Her eyes rolled around as she stared at Bai Liu. The corpse in the coffin opened its clasped hands and slowly raised them as if trying to tear off its veil.

The bride continued singing,

“A Taoist priest came and said the old man’s death was justified and the young woman’s death was well deserved.”

“Thus, the people of Yinshan Village died like this, generation after generation.”

Kong Xuyang shouted sharply, “Don’t let her tear off the veil, or we will all die!”

After saying that, Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi rushed forward carrying the coffin lid, pushing Bai Liu aside. Bai Liu quickly reached for the bottom of the coffin and seemed to have grabbed something out. However, Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang, who were in a state of panic, didn’t notice it at all. They forcefully closed the coffin lid.

There was a rustling sound of silk fabrics rubbing against each other in the coffin, the sound of the bronze mirror coming out vaguely, turning into a distorted and eerie tune, like a man with a deep voice scolding,

“Those who turn their backs on their hometown, forget their ancestors, or show no respect for their forebears, engaging in petty crimes like the tricks of a rooster’s cry or a dog’s theft—”

“For eternity, you will never leave Yinshan Village alive!”

Kong Xuyang broke out in a cold sweat. He used half of his body to press down the still-shaking coffin lid. Just as he was about to bite his finger to draw the [Ansha Curse], Kong Xuyang’s face turned pale and he froze.

Oh no!

To draw the talisman, one needs red cinnabar or human blood; moreover, it must be the blood of a boy with sufficient yang energy. The last time he came to this instance, he hadn’t slept with a woman yet, but now he’s no longer a virgin!

His blood can no longer be used to draw talismans!

Kong Xuyang quickly turned his gaze to Yang Zhi, but his face became gloomy again.

Yang Zhi had also indulged in the same, making his blood unusable as well!

The voice in the coffin sounded like a man or a woman singing softly, and the coffin was shaking more and more violently. It seemed that the thing inside was about to break free and run out.

Kong Xuyang was so anxious that his veins popped out. He turned around, asking Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, “Have you two ever slept with a woman?!”

Several question marks suddenly appeared on Mu Sicheng’s frightened expression, “HAH?!”

Kong Xuyang roared, “Don’t fucking ‘hah’ me! Have you ever slept with anyone? Whether one of you two is a virgin can save four of our lives!”

Mu Sicheng who was also angry, “How should I know! I don’t remember anything!”

Kong Xuyang: “…”

Yang Zhi: “…”

Fuck, I forgot these two idiots' memories were swallowed.

Seeing Kong Xuyang reddening with anxiety, Mu Sicheng touched his chin and tried to recall, "I don't think I am one, right? After all, I'm so handsome…"

Kong Xuyang: "…"

Yang Zhi: "…"

No matter whether Mu Sicheng was telling the truth or lying, Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang felt uneasy anyway.

They risked their lives playing the game just to finally lose their virginity! But this fucking bastard managed it just by relying on his looks!

Bai Liu picked up a piece of porcelain from somewhere, slashed his palm, and blood gushed out. He walked forward and stretched out his bloody hand in front of Kong Xuyang.

Kong Xuyang was confused and overjoyed, "…You're a virgin?"

Bai Liu pondered for a moment and said, "I probably have never slept with a woman."

Kong Xuyang breathed a sigh of relief, raised his hand, and dipped it in Bai Liu's blood to draw the talisman, and then he heard Bai Liu slowly add, "But I'm not sure if I have slept with a man."

Bai Liu looked at Kong Xuyang, who had a dull face, with sincere eyes, "Can my blood still be used after sleeping with a man?"

Kong Xuyang took two deep breaths, then roared, "No!!! You are filthy!!!"

Kong Xuyang was so angry that his eyes turned red. He felt that if Bai Liu said a few more words, he'd be so aggrieved that he would cry on the spot.

Fuck!! What kind of people are these?

Kong Xuyang has never hated himself so much for not being a virgin in his life, otherwise he would not be here being controlled by Bai Liu!

But there was no way. Things had come to this point. Bai Liu might not be dirty, but he himself was already as dirty as could be. His blood certainly could not be used.

Kong Xuyang suppressed the heart attack, reached out his hand to touch the blood on Bai Liu's palm, and drew a successful talisman on the coffin in a flamboyant manner. Then he held his breath and waited with a solemn expression. His hands trembled slightly and sweat appeared on his temples.

Yang Zhi couldn't help but close his eyes and pray with his hands –

——Bai Liu, please don't have slept with a man, Bai Liu, please don't have slept with a man! Merciful Bodhisattva, savior of those in distress, please let Bai Liu still be a virgin!

Perhaps the Bodhisattva really heard Yang Zhi's sincere prayers. The shaking of the coffin gradually stopped, and the talisman on it faintly emitted a soft golden light.

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who were sweating profusely, let out a long breath and slid to the ground in exhaustion.

Bai Liu was stroking his chin beside them, with a look of enlightenment on his face, as if he had gained new information, "It turns out that I have never slept with a man."

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who were supporting each other to stand up, were so shocked when they heard this that they almost fell to their knees again.

Why do you say this in such a surprised tone?!

How the fuck do you not even know whether you've slept with a man or not?!

Kong Xuyang took a deep breath, turned around, and sternly warned Bai Liu, "If you want to wait until the seventh day, don't fucking touch these coffins!"

"I can leave these coffins alone." Bai Liu said sincerely, "But in exchange, what can you give me to keep these coffins alone?"

Kong Xuyang was stunned for a moment. He looked at Bai Liu in disbelief, "Are you fucking threatening me with these coffins?!"

Bai Liu smiled, "How can you say it's a threat? We are all from the same hometown. When fellow villagers meet, their eyes are filled with tears. I am making a deal with you, my fellow villager. I would not make such a deal with ordinary people. This is called keeping the wealth within the family."

Kong Xuyang was truly angered to the point his eyes were filled with tears. His eyes were red and his shoulders were shaking. He pointed at Bai Liu and said with gritted teeth, "Fuck your mom! You're using these coffins as hostages to threaten me…"

Bai Liu corrected Kong Xuyang's statement slowly, "It's corpse matter."

Kong Xuyang's shoulders shook, from his shoulders to his wrists, then his hands, and finally his fingers were shaking with anger, "You are awesome, you are capable, Bai Liu, if you have the ability, just keep moving, and then we will all die together!"

Bai Liu smiled amicably, "If I can get something valuable in return, I don't mind dying."

After saying that, Bai Liu walked towards the coffin that had just been suppressed by Kong Xuyang.

Seeing Bai Liu really walking towards the coffin without hesitation, Kong Xuyang got really angry. He grabbed Mu Sicheng and held a piece of broken porcelain against Mu Sicheng's throat viciously, shouting hoarsely, "Bai Liu, if you take another step forward, I will kill your good teammate!"

"You don't want to see your teammate die in front of you, do you?!"

Bai Liu stopped and looked at Mu Sicheng for a while, then suddenly realized, "So he and I are teammates?"

Then, Bai Liu turned around and waved his hand indifferently, "Let go."

Kong Xuyang asked anxiously, "He is your bound teammate, do you not care?!"

Bai Liu said without even turning his head, "He doesn't look very smart, and he is bound to me. I don't like having teammates like this. If you don't do it, I'll do it myself later."

Kong Xuyang: "…"

Mu Sicheng: “…”

Yinshan Village

Kong Xuyang sat on a long bench with a sullen face, his cheeks twitching slightly. Yang Zhi stood beside him, patting his back to help him calm down.

Bai Liu sat calmly on the bench opposite Kong Xuyang. Despite seeing Kong Xuyang so angry, he smiled at him very amicably.

Kong Xuyang was so angry that he almost took off from the spot. He glared at Bai Liu in an attempt to intimidate him. He hit his knee hard, but unexpectedly, it triggered his knee-jerk reflex, and he kicked Bai Liu very delicately.

Bai Liu smiled again, “My friend, you are so cute, playing like this.”

Yang Zhi turned his head and bit his lower lip firmly to prevent himself from laughing out loud.

Kong Xuyang: “…”

It doesn’t matter, Bai Liu’s life will pass soon.

Bai Liu considerately changed the subject, “My fellow countryman, you are willing to trade with me, and you didn’t kill my teammate. You are a kind person, so I won’t blackmail you. You can definitely give me what I want to trade with you.”

When Kong Xuyang heard Bai Liu calling him a “kind person”, his face twitched twice, and then he asked cautiously, “What is that?”

“I just want to chat with my fellow countryman for a while.” Bai Liu looked at Kong Xuyang with a smile and chuckled. “Although I was born in Yinshan Village, I don’t seem to remember anything. I hope you can guide me.”

Kong Xuyang’s eyebrows were twisted into knots, “You went through so much trouble just to let me take you?”

Bai Liu nodded as if he was serious, “I’m unfamiliar with the place and I’m scared to walk alone.”

Kong Xuyang glanced at Mu Sicheng, who was huddled beside the statue, far away from the coffin and still shivering, and then slowly shifted his gaze back to the urn that Bai Liu used as a footstool.

Kong Xuyang: "…"

What do you mean by scared? Bai Liu, look back at your teammate's performance and then give me a perfunctory answer.

Bai Liu didn't seem to worry at all that Kong Xuyang would abandon him. After reaching a simple verbal agreement, he began to chat with him with a smile. "What are Brother Kong and Brother Yang doing back in the village this time?"

Yang Zhi, Kong Xuyang: "…"

Calling us "brother" already? You're really not holding back.

Yang Zhi looked at Kong Xuyang for instructions, and after getting his approval, he explained mysteriously, "We came back to do a cultural relic business."

Bai Liu suddenly realized, "Oh, Brother Yang and Brother Kong are back to rob the tomb?"

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi paused at the same time.

That's right, the roles they play are two tomb robbers. The main purpose of their return this time is to steal a burial object in the main tomb chamber of the excavated ancient tomb. This was also the side quest of their identities.

Kong Xuyang had not originally intended to hide his identity from Bai Liu, because the tomb they were going to was right below Bai Liu's ancestral home, and without the guidance of Bai Liu, the "descendant", they could not enter.

Bai Liu fell into deep thought.

The lyrics sung by the bride in the coffin just now mentioned three types of people who will never be able to leave Yinshan Village alive.

One was those who showed no respect for their forebears, which obviously referred to the supernatural live streamer Mu Sicheng.

Second, were the people who engaged in petty crimes like the tricks of a rooster's cry or a dog's theft. Unsurprisingly, they were Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang.

The remaining type were people who turned their backs on their hometown and forgot their ancestors.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and looked at the “Maoshan Evil Art Handbook” in his arms—this was referring to him.

The people of Yinshan Village revered Taoism and believed in Taoists for generations, being very devout in their beliefs. However, Bai Liu actually came back with a kind of dark ritual and used it to borrow yin wealth to pay off his debts. He was completely unfaithful, unrighteous, and unfilial.

Judging from the current situation, his identity should be the most dangerous and the riskiest.

But the higher the risk, the greater the reward. Although Bai Liu doesn’t remember anything, he didn’t reject this identity and was happy to continue according to the setting of this identity.

For example, guarding the first seven days well.

Bai Liu looked at the shrine facing him. The photo placed on it was a black and white photo of a kind-faced old lady holding his shoulders.

In the black and white photo, Bai Liu had a strange smile on his face.

The next morning.

When Bai Liu woke up, he and Mu Sicheng were the only ones in the temple. Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi had gone somewhere unknown. Bai Liu woke up Mu Sicheng who was still sleeping, walked to the temple door, looked down, and paused.

Mu Sicheng followed Bai Liu to the temple gate with sleepy eyes, looked down, and was completely awakened by shock. “Fuck, what is this!”

The wreaths placed in the temple were in a mess and scattered on the ground, as if someone had picked them up and smashed them to pieces. The ground was littered with tiny pieces of white paper flowers.

But these were not what was most terrifying. The most terrifying thing was the densely packed and neat rows of small footprints at the entrance of the temple.

The footprints were only half the size of a child’s palm, in a triangular shape, with only the front soles of the feet. It seemed as if a group of people were tiptoeing back and forth in front of the temple entrance in a certain pattern, as if they wanted to come in but couldn't find the entrance, and were finally forced to leave.

Bai Liu looked at the footprints for a while, then lowered his head and followed the leaving footprints out.

"Hey!" Mu Sicheng got anxious when he saw Bai Liu leaving. He looked at the strange footprints with fear a few times, before stamping his feet and gritting his teeth, finally deciding to follow him, "You aren't afraid either?"

Bai Liu walked forward like he had heard nothing.

These groups of footprints went around the temple as if trying to find its entrance. After circling several times, they returned empty-handed and finally went to the village.

Mu Sicheng held up his camera to take pictures. He rubbed his arms and looked at these strange footprints with chattering teeth.

These footprints were like a group of people walking together on their tiptoes, with their steps almost the same size. The distance between each footprint looked the same to the naked eye until they reached the village's main road, where this regular and dense string of footprints began to disperse.

These footprints went from the main road one by one to the houses in the village, before disappearing in front of the doors seemingly returning home.

Mu Sicheng was about to breathe a sigh of relief when he got to this point, but Bai Liu soon gave him the final blow.

Bai Liu followed the footprints to the front of the door where they disappeared on a piece of mud. Bai Liu squatted down and brushed aside the wood debris covering the mud. Mu Sicheng saw clearly the place where the footprints ended, revealing a sight that froze the blood in his veins.

The heel of the tiptoeing footprint suddenly touched the ground, turning it into a complete footprint. Two hand prints also appeared, and the fingers of these two hand prints were inverted.

It seemed that here, the "person" who returned home put down his heels and hands on the ground and began to crawl into the house on all fours with twisted limbs.

Mu Sicheng's hair stood on end, "What the hell is this!"

Bai Liu stood up and looked at the door that had a faint gap, "Let's go in and take a look."

After saying that, Bai Liu pushed open the door.

The old wooden door made a distant creaking sound and then slowly opened.

Dust was floating in the house. Although it was daytime, the light was still extremely dim to the point only the outlines of some furniture could be vaguely seen. Bai Liu turned on the flashlight on his mobile phone and walked inside.

Mu Sicheng swallowed his saliva, held up the camera with trembling hands, and walked in.

Upon walking into the house, he understood why it was so dark inside. The whole house was sealed shut, with only two translucent tiles on the ceiling acting as skylights to let in light. An old electric lamp hung on the beam, and spider webs covered the wires.

There was a stove with firewood piled up in the corner. On the stove was a large rusty iron pot and a few chipped ceramic jars on the edge, which seemed to be used for seasonings.

Mu Sicheng tried to turn on the light but failed. He waved away the dust in the air, coughed, and said to Bai Liu who was walking in front of him, "I don't know how long people have lived here, but the lights are out of power."

"That's not necessarily true." Bai Liu raised the flashlight and shone it on the wall. "Didn't we just follow someone in? Maybe it lives here."

Mu Sicheng's scalp tingled. "Don't joke like that…"

His voice stopped abruptly as he looked at the wall illuminated by Bai Liu's flashlight.

The light was too dim just now, and Mu Sicheng had been looking at the camera screen, so he didn't notice that the entire house, the ground, the walls, and even the beams were covered with the same four-limb mud handprints and footprints that they had just seen outside the house.

The wall that Bai Liu was illuminating now was covered entirely with muddy handprints and footprints, painting the wall gray-yellow. If you didn't look carefully, you would think that this wall was just a mud wall.

But after a closer look…

These handprints and footprints were distorted in all kinds of ways as if a person's arms and feet were chopped off and printed on the wall with mud. Mu Sicheng simply couldn't imagine such limbs growing on the same person.

Bai Liu acted as if he didn't see the handprints and footprints, and continued walking inside calmly with the flashlight in hand.

Mu Sicheng didn't want to follow several times, but he didn't dare to go out alone, so he had to follow.

Passing through a main room with a few burnt candles in the corner, Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng arrived at the bedroom of the room.

There were two lofted wooden beds with mosquito nets hanging around them in the bedroom. Opposite them was an FM TV that was at least twenty years old, and next to it was an electric fan covered with spider webs.

Mu Sicheng didn't dare to look around, fixing his eyes on the camera's screen. The only person captured on the small screen was Bai Liu.

Bai Liu lifted the mosquito net hanging on the wooden bed. He stepped on the edge of the bed and leaned in to take a look. His figure was half-hidden by the white gauze mosquito net.

Mu Sicheng was filming intently, and then he suddenly screamed in fear.

Bai Liu turned around and asked, "What's wrong?"

Mu Sicheng's face turned pale with fright. He pointed tremblingly at the bed that Bai Liu had stuck his head into, "Just now, a crooked head stuck out from under the bed!"

Bai Liu knelt on the ground and looked under the bed without hesitation.

Mu Sicheng almost flung Bai Liu back to stop him from looking under the bed, his voice nearly cracked with fear. “What are you still looking at?! Let’s go out first! Would I lie to you?! There really was a pale head sticking out and looking at you with a crooked look!”

Bai Liu pulled Mu Sicheng over, held his chin, and asked him to look under the bed. He said calmly, “Look for yourself to see if there is a head.”

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes at first, and after a while, he carefully opened one eye and said in a daze, “T-there isn’t—”

“But I really saw it just now!” Mu Sicheng held up the camera and handed it to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu said calmly, “If you really saw it, and it’s not under the bed now, it should most likely be on the bed.”

Mu Sicheng was playing the video in reverse when he seemed to suddenly realize something, his face completely froze. He carefully handed the camera to Bai Liu, and without even breathing, he moved the finger that was pressing the reverse button to the selfie button.

The camera’s lens switched from video recording to selfie-taking, and the screen’s perspective changed, revealing the heads of Bai Liu, and Mu Sicheng.

But that’s not all, a third head appears on the screen.

A pale, tilted head was stretching down from the bed, with both hands holding the edge of the bed. Then, through the cover of the mosquito net, it looked under the bed alongside Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng.

The head seemed to notice the gazes of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng. It turned around very slowly, coming face to face with Mu Sicheng who was standing next to it.

Mu Sicheng covered his mouth tightly to prevent himself from screaming.

The head was white as snow, its features strangely connected into one piece, like the rough outline of a plaster sculpture. Only some vague indentations and protrusions could be seen on the face, but no distinct facial features such as eyes, ears, nose or mouth.

Just when Mu Sicheng thought that this thing had no eyes, nose or mouth, a bloody cut appeared at the mouth of the head, as if someone had cut it with a knife. The cut went all the way behind the ear, revealing sharp fangs inside. A strong bloody and foul smell hit his face.

It stretched out its barbed tongue as if preparing to lick Mu Sicheng.

Bai Liu quickly pulled Mu Sicheng back and hid under the bed, preventing the thing from licking his head.

The thing tilted its head and slowly crawled down from under the bed, revealing its body with four limbs growing on an extremely twisted, wavy spine. It crawled outside the bed, and with its face, which had no facial features but only a mouth, it tilted its head and quietly looked at the two people huddled in the corner under the bed.

Mu Sicheng tightly grasped Bai Liu's hand, he was so scared that he had already broken out in a cold sweat.

"This thing has no eyes, nose or ears." Mu Sicheng whispered to Bai Liu in a very low voice, almost a whisper, "Can it find us? We can sneak around later…"

Bai Liu did not answer Mu Sicheng's words but stared at the head without facial features. He slowly reached out and picked up a small stone from under the bed, raised his hand, and threw it out, hitting the thing in the face. The thing outside the bed suddenly opened its eye, its eye sockets splitting open like gaping mouths, revealing two bloody slits. Its eyeballs rolled around inside them, before fixing straight on Bai Liu beneath the bed.

Mu Sicheng was almost scared to death, “What are you doing?!”

Bai Liu said calmly, “Proving to you that it has eyes — it’s not very likely for you to be able to sneak away in front of it.”

“This thing is a kind of ghost.”

Mu Sicheng looked at the thing outside in horror, “A ghost?”

Bai Liu explained calmly, “Have you heard the story of being an accomplice to a tiger? To put it simply, a person who is killed by a certain creature becomes a ghost, but will help the creature find prey.”

“So many people have drowned in Yinshan Village. These drowned people will turn into water ghosts, and the water ghosts will look for substitutes.”

“Normally, water ghosts will be reincarnated after finding a substitute, but the water ghosts in Yinshan Village cannot be reincarnated even if they find a substitute. They are still trapped here. As a result, these water ghosts cannot become human no matter how many people they kill and eat. Those whose substitutes are eaten by water ghosts will also become ghosts. People who are alive will be afraid of the people who killed them, and ghosts who died will be afraid of the ghosts who killed them when they were alive. Therefore, these ghosts will be driven by water ghosts.”

“Those who eat people but are not human are called tigers, and those who assist the tiger after death become ghosts who are called accomplices.”

“I suspect this thing was an innocent passerby captured by the water ghosts who turned into a ghost after the death of the people in Yinshan Village and used as a substitute, turning into a ghost.”

Bai Liu looked at the thing outside the bed, “When the passers-by die and forget their human form, they will become neither human nor ghost. But when they are accomplices of the tiger, they need to pretend to be human to lure passersby into the mountains, so these accomplices will imitate human beings, like now.”

The twisted humanoid monster outside the bed suddenly contorted its neck and moved the moment it opened its eyes and saw the two people under the bed. Its twisted spine made a creaking sound, and its twisted limbs straightened out. It slowly stood up while deforming itself.

Mu Sicheng could only see a pair of bent calves slowly changing from being turned outward to being turned inward, turning into a pair of normal calves. Its toes turned from facing away from the bed to face them, gently standing on tiptoe, leaving behind the triangular footprints with only the forefoot that Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu had seen outside the house.

A pair of pale hands gently grasped the edge of the bed, and a smiling woman's face bent over, appearing from under the bed. She waved to Mu Sicheng under the bed tenderly and amiably, with an eerie smile on her face. "Come out."

"Why are you hiding under the bed when you're a guest at my house? Come out."

The woman had a normal face with all the right facial features. Her voice was very friendly as if she was an ordinary woman who was genuinely welcoming her neighbors. The strange thing was that her eyes had only whites.

Mu Sicheng got goosebumps. "It transformed from a ghost into a human right in front of me to trick me! Why does it think I would be fooled?"

"Maybe they think you're not very smart and easily fooled," Bai Liu said.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu speechlessly, "How do you know she is a ghost?"

Bai Liu replied, "It is recorded in the Maoshan Evil Art Handbook."

Mu Sicheng also felt something was wrong now. He glanced at the ghost outside the bed that had not come in, and asked curiously, "How do you know she won't go under the bed? She crawled out from under the bed."

"Because I saw this." Bai Liu moved aside to let Mu Sicheng look behind him.

A collapsed earth hole under the bed was revealed, which was roughly big enough for an adult to enter and exit. Next to it was a folded plastic coordinate with [7] written on it and [Left by the Archaeological Team of xxx University] written on the bottom.

Mu Sicheng looked at the hole in astonishment, “What is this?”

Bai Liu held up the coordinates and looked into the dark and gloomy pit, “This should be one of the coordinate points where the archaeological team excavated the ancient tomb. The tomb is below.”

The woman outside the bed was still walking back and forth on tiptoe, bending down from time to time to look at them with her empty eyes yet she never came under.

Bai Liu looked outside the bed, “This ghost should have crawled out of this hole, which means the tiger it feeds lives inside. Ghosts are generally afraid of tigers, so they dare not come in.”

“So, we are already in the tiger’s mouth!” Mu Sicheng wanted to cry but had no tears, “We are already in the tiger’s mouth, there is no need for her to catch us!”

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze, lay down, and prepared to enter the pit.

Mu Sicheng held Bai Liu’s shoulders tightly. He looked at the dark pit. The stale smell coming out of it made him shiver. “…Do you really intend on going down?”

Bai Liu turned around and saw Mu Sicheng huddled up in fear. He reassuringly patted his shoulder and said, “If you are really scared, you can go over there.”

Bai Liu pointed outside the bed. The woman just happened to be looking down at them. She had a strange inhuman smile on her face, and her voice was soft, “Come out and be my guest, little brother.”

Mu Sicheng: “…”

Mu Sicheng followed Bai Liu into the pit with tears in his eyes.

The pit was very narrow. While a skinny person like Bai Liu could slowly pass through by supporting himself with his elbows, a big person like Mu Sicheng could only roll and wriggle his way inside.

The further he moved, the more dead and desolate Mu Sicheng’s face looked.

This passage was way too small. If something happens in the tomb later, he won’t be able to escape and will be stuck in this passage!

Bai Liu held up a flashlight and shone it inside. The corridor extending into the pit seemed to have no bottom. Mu Sicheng felt that they had been crawling inside for a while yet there was no obvious change in the surroundings except that it became increasingly humid and a little more spacious.

“Mu Sicheng.” Bai Liu, who was crawling in front, turned around and said, “You go ahead. My phone is running low on battery. I’ll need some light when we get out later. Let’s use the night mode on your camera to explore the way.”

The passage was now wide enough for Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng to pass through.

Mu Sicheng shuddered when he turned on the night mode and aimed it at the depths of the tunnel.

The camera’s night mode produced a fluorescent green screen. When all the dark and unknown things around him were captured on a small green screen, Mu Sicheng felt even more unsettled for some reason.

Mu Sicheng asked in a trembling voice, “Bai Liu, how long have we been crawling?”

Bai Liu glanced at his phone and said, “It’s been almost an hour. It’s past ten now. We need to get out quickly, otherwise it will be more dangerous when it gets dark.”

Mu Sicheng was frightened, and muttered quietly, “Are normal archaeological corridors this long….?”

But even though he was muttering, because he didn’t want to face the evil spirit outside the bed, Mu Sicheng braced himself and went forward with his camera in hand. He stared at the scene in the camera and suddenly paused.

“Bai Liu…” Mu Sicheng turned his head stiffly, “The passage just moved.”

On the green screen of the camera, Mu Sicheng clearly saw the passage swaying left and right as if something was crawling on both sides.

Bai Liu was unmoved, “Yeah, I saw it earlier.”

After Mu Sicheng realized that Bai Liu didn’t take this change seriously at all, he continued to crawl inside heartbroken.

The passage in the camera was shaking more and more frequently. Mu Sicheng could feel that the things crawling around were getting closer and closer to them. He could even hear the sounds.

Thump thump thump… Thump thump thump…

Mu Sicheng was familiar with this sound. He had just heard it last night. It was the sound of someone pounding on the coffin lid inside the coffin.

The width of the passage was now wide enough for Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng to crawl side by side. Bai Liu glanced at the camera held by Mu Sicheng, then suddenly covered Mu Sicheng's mouth and nose, turning them to one side of the passage.

Bai Liu warned coldly, "Don't move, something is crawling out."

Mu Sicheng was like an ice sculpture, holding the camera motionlessly.

From afar, there was a rustling sound of someone digging the soil with their hands and feet. Mu Sicheng held his breath and held up the screen. He stared at the green screen. Suddenly, in the darkness, an arm with the palm and back of the hand completely reversed appeared and stretched into the camera screen.

A face with unclear facial features appeared in the camera. The head was tilted at a strange angle, the spine was on the belly, and the back was soft flesh. It swayed as it crawled, with its knees completely bent inward, and it crawled past him in a posture that Mu Sicheng was completely unable to describe in words.

When Mu Sicheng was just about to breathe a sigh of relief after the evil spirit had completely passed by, his pupils suddenly shrank.

This evil ghost was dragging a coffin behind him!

The coffin was dragged out by the ghost, and a constant "thump thump thump, thump thump thump" sound came from inside.

The moment they passed by Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, the thumping sound suddenly stopped.

The lid of the coffin lifted, and a pair of pale, delicate hands stretched out from the edge. The nails were painted a brilliant shade of peach.

The woman—like the bride in the coffin inside the temple—was veiled, her upper body slightly raised. Though the cover obscured her face, Mu Sicheng had the unsettling feeling that she was staring directly at him and the pit.

She tapped the coffin lid twice more with her fingers, producing a hollow thump.

In response, the ghost dragging the coffin ahead of them seemed to receive some kind of command. It slowly turned its head back, its face splitting open—eyes and mouth stretching into gaping slits. Its bloodshot gaze locked onto Mu Sicheng, who was barely ten centimeters away. Then, with a sickening crack, its bones began twisting and contorting.

"We've been spotted—run!" Bai Liu shouted without hesitation, darting forward on his belly.

At his command, both Mu Sicheng and the ghosts surged into motion —some flying, some crawling.

Panicked, Mu Sicheng let out a cry and scrambled after Bai Liu. Fortunately, the tunnel was wide enough for them to move in a half-crouch, allowing them to advance much faster than before.

Behind them, the pale, distorted form of the ghost lunged forward, its body twisting like soft clay being reshaped.

Mu Sicheng risked a glance back—and instantly regretted it. His breath caught in his throat, his body moving on sheer terror alone.

But the narrow passageway limited his speed. The ghosts, moving on all fours, were gaining on him. Just as the exit came into view, a sharp pain shot through his ankle—teeth sinking into his flesh.

Mu Sicheng barely had time to make a sound before he was yanked backward, dragged into the darkness.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu turned and grabbed his outstretched hand. He bit the tip of his tongue, dipping his finger into the blood before tracing a talisman onto Mu Sicheng's wrist. His voice was calm as he chanted:

"Thundering order, like star fire… Yin soul covers the body, Yin soul entangles the road, Yin and Yang are separated. Break!"

Mu Sicheng's mind went blank. On instinct, he pressed his hand—still marked with Bai Liu's talisman—against the ghost pinning him down.

The talisman pulsed. A ripple of invisible force erupted from Mu Sicheng's hand, instantly severing the connection between him and the ghost.

The creature let out an ear-piercing wail and lunged forward again—but then, it abruptly froze. Its head twisted a full 360 degrees, the slits of its eyes and mouth slowly vanishing, as if erased.

It could no longer see them.

Mu Sicheng pressed himself against the tunnel wall, barely daring to breathe.

The ghost sniffed at the air, shifting back and forth as though separated from them by an invisible barrier. Unable to locate its prey, it finally retreated.

Mu Sicheng collapsed to the ground, panting heavily. In a daze, he raised his camera. "G-go… let's go…."

Bai Liu took the camera from him, then crouched down, using the dim light to inspect Mu Sicheng's injured ankle. He tore a strip from Mu Sicheng's clothing and began wrapping the wound. His fingers briefly paused.

The ghost's teeth didn't look very clean… could Mu Sicheng get rabies from this?

Rabies, as far as Bai Liu recalled, had a fatality rate of nearly 100% if untreated within 24 hours…

Mu Sicheng exhaled shakily, wiping the cold sweat from his face. "What was that just now? What did you use to keep the ghosts away?"

Bai Liu met his gaze. "A talisman—[Yin and Yang Road Separation Talisman]. It divides the yin and yang worlds, creating a space in between so that anything on either side can't touch each other."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "If you had something that useful, why didn't you use it earlier? We wouldn't have had to run like stray dogs—"

Bai Liu paused before replying. "There are two types of [Yin and Yang Road Separation Talismans]. The orthodox kind is used for protection—it places the user in the Yang world, forcing evil entities back into the Yin world."

Mu Sicheng's face grew stiff. "Yours isn't…?"

Bai Liu looked at him with something almost like pity. "No. Mine is unorthodox. It's used to release evil things—to push them into the Yang world. The person who performs the ritual… is the one trapped in the Netherworld."

A beat of silence.

"So now…" Bai Liu exhaled. "We're stuck in the underworld."

Mu Sicheng whipped his head around to where he had just used the talisman. He shone his camera over the ground and, sure enough, a faint trail—like a road—had been left behind.

That ghost from earlier hadn't been able to cross it.

Still unconvinced, Mu Sicheng limped over and attempted to step across.

But no matter how hard he tried, he remained stuck in place—just like the ghost.

For the first time in his life, he wished he and that damn ghost were standing on the same side.

Mu Sicheng stared grimly at the other end of the path, then turned back to Bai Liu with tears welling up in his eyes.

"…How do I break this [Yin and Yang Separation Talisman]?"

Bai Liu patted his shoulder in what was supposed to be a reassuring gesture. "Don't worry, it's easy to break."

"We just have to wait until midnight. When yin and yang naturally meet, the path will lose its effect, and we'll be able to return to the yang world."

Mu Sicheng glanced at the time and let out a hollow, almost tearful laugh.

"…Great. Just twelve more hours to go."

"If we can survive that long, we'll be free when night falls."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered for a brief moment.

They say the first twelve hours after being bitten by a rabid animal is the best window for vaccination…

Let’s just hope that ghost wasn’t carrying anything.

The tunnel gradually widened until it was tall enough for Bai Liu to walk upright. Mu Sicheng, however, still had to keep his head slightly lowered.

He glanced at the back of Bai Liu’s head as he walked ahead and muttered under his breath, "…I really thought you weren’t going to save me."

Bai Liu never stopped moving. He hadn't even turned around once.

"I wasn’t planning to." His voice was matter-of-fact. Then, he finally glanced at Mu Sicheng. "But you saved me first, didn’t you? I only got bitten because you pulled me out of the way."

Mu Sicheng huffed, shivering for some reason. "Fine, count that as your conscience."

Bai Liu looked away. "I wouldn’t call it conscience. I just keep my promises."

As they walked, the muddy tunnel walls slowly revealed a more structured form. The dried earth on the walls crumbled, and the damp ground beneath them turned into a sticky, sludge-like texture that squelched under their steps.

The once irregularly shaped passage had become a rectangular corridor, about a meter wide and two meters high. Though it was slightly more spacious than before, it was still narrow enough that two people walking side by side would feel cramped.

Bai Liu tilted his head, examining the space. He stretched out his arms in front of him, measuring.

"This is about the right size for a coffin to stand up and pass through."

A shiver ran down Mu Sicheng's spine. "Can you use literally any other unit of measurement?"

Bai Liu paused, considering. "This passage could fit about one and a half people walking side by side."

Mu Sicheng: "…"

Thanks, that's so much more comforting.

After nearly three hours of walking, the exit of the passage finally appeared before them.

It was a dark, double-opened stone tomb door, with a cross-eyed, open-eyed, clawed statue of the San Qing Heavenly Father standing on one side. The door was not fully closed but had a gap wide enough for one person to pass through.

Bai Liu turned on his flashlight and shone it on the stone door. "There are no signs of it being broken open forcibly from the outside, nor any visible damage. It must have opened naturally."

Mu Sicheng, holding his camera up to the tomb door, frowned. "Shouldn't such an ancient tomb door be sealed shut? Can they really open on their own?"

Bai Liu slid through the tomb door, holding his flashlight high. He glanced at the sides of the door. "It opens from the inside."

There were two lifting buttons, one on the left and one on the right of the door's interior. Attached to each button was a string leading to the stone door—a very simple mechanism that was clearly designed to open the door with just a press.

Mu Sicheng's heart skipped a beat as he watched, and he swallowed hard. "…What the hell? Why would there be a button to open the tomb door from the inside? The tomb is full of dead bodies! How could it open by itself?"

Bai Liu casually scanned the area and replied, "That can only mean the person who built the tomb knew that the bodies inside would one day be able to open the door themselves and walk out."

After surveying the area, Bai Liu pulled two red candles, two candlesticks, and a box of matches from his backpack—items he had picked up from the temple's altar earlier that morning.

He fixed the candles into the candlesticks, handed one to Mu Sicheng, and lit it with a match.

Mu Sicheng slung his camera around his neck, took the candlestick, and looked at Bai Liu in confusion. "Are we using candles now? It's not like it's very well-lit in here."

Bai Liu held up his own candlestick, the flickering flame casting an eerie greenish hue. "It's not just about the lighting," he said flatly.

"Do you remember where we are?"

Mu Sicheng looked around at the cramped surroundings. "In the tomb?"

Bai Liu scanned him with a serious look. "Not just in the tomb. We're on the road to the underworld."

"In the underworld, fireless light can't distinguish between the living and the dead. This means that with a torch, you can't tell whether someone is human or a ghost. Only firelight, like that from a candle, can make the distinction."

"So here, the candle that casts a shadow belongs to a human, and the one without a shadow is a ghost."

Mu Sicheng's heart raced. "Wait, aren't we the only ones here? Why do we need a candle to tell us apart?"

Bai Liu held up the candle, its light illuminating his face in a way that made him seem unnaturally still—there was no visible sign of life. "What if I'm not actually me?"

Mu Sicheng, startled, instinctively stepped back, raising his candle to shine a light on Bai Liu. He let out a relieved sigh when he saw Bai Liu's shadow on the wall and snapped, "Don't mess with me!"

Bai Liu turned his head and walked forward without a word. "I'm not messing with you. Ghosts can take on human forms. If you meet a ghost that looks like me, how would you identify it without a candle?"

"Also, there's the [Mountain Ghosts Blow Out Lamps] rule. If your lamp goes out in the tomb, don't go further. It means either a ghost blew out your candle, or the air around you has become too thin to keep it burning."

Mu Sicheng shivered. "What if the candle does go out?"

"No." Bai Liu's voice was calm. "This is the underworld—the land of ghosts. If we last even a little longer, we've done our part. What else can we do?"

"If a ghost blows out your candle, just go with it and try to hold on as long as you can..."

Before Bai Liu could finish his sentence, Mu Sicheng clearly saw a pair of small hands—made of greaseproof paper—resting on Bai Liu's shoulders. A paper-mâché face peeked out of the shadows behind them.

The figure was ghostly pale, with two bright red blushes on its cheeks the size of a child's fists. It wore a red onyx melon cap and a long green-and-black coat, its face drawn with a wide, cheerful smile.

Mu Sicheng could almost hear the eerie sound of paper creaking as the figure leaned over Bai Liu's shoulder and blew out the candle he was holding.

At the same time, Mu Sicheng felt something cold cover his eyes, followed by the sound of sharp laughter—something had climbed onto his shoulder.

Soon, the candle in Mu Sicheng's hand was extinguished.

The tomb plunged into an impenetrable darkness.

Mu Sicheng shouted in the darkness with a trembling voice, “Bai Liu?”

Then, he heard four or five voices of “Bai Liu” answering him in different tones.

“Hmm.”

“Hmm.”

“What?”

“I’m here.”

“Bai Liu’s” emotionless voice echoed in the tomb. Mu Sicheng’s hair stood on end. He took a step back, raised the camera to the front, and turned on the night vision mode.

On the green screen, Mu Sicheng saw a scene that made his hair stand on end.

In the tomb’s narrow passage, Bai Liu stood in the middle, observing him while four or five twisting and deforming ghosts crept closer to him. They stared at Bai Liu with their blood-red eyes and used their slit-like noses to smell the scent on him.

Their limbs and bodies looked like white plasticine being molded. Their heads protruded from under their armpits and their feet were folded behind their heads, posing in various twisted and flexible postures. But judging from the protrusion of the skin, they indeed had bones.

Judging from the postures they were posing… Mu Sicheng couldn’t imagine how a creature with bones could pose like that.

Then gradually, these ghosts became exactly like Bai Liu.

They stood in a row on tiptoe with their heads lowered beside Bai Liu. If he didn’t look into their eyes, Mu Sicheng could hardly tell who was the real Bai Liu.

The five ghosts suddenly looked up and stared at him with their heads tilted, a black iris slowly fell into their pure white eyes. They smiled at Mu Sicheng who was standing opposite them then turned their heads abruptly and moved closer.

Mu Sicheng was so scared that he almost flung his camera away.

He subconsciously turned the camera to look around him, but what was shown clearly on camera the next second made him so scared he shrieked with fright.

Around Mu Sicheng, several ghosts were also transforming.

It seemed that these phantoms were preparing to transform into the appearance of Mu Sicheng — showing a “Mu Sicheng” face with distorted features, laughing at him with their teeth chattering.

In the chaos, a slender hand stretched out from the pale and wrapped body of the ghost, with a match gently held in its fingers.

A calm voice came from afar, “On the road to the underworld, follow the ghosts. When you cross the ghost bridge, hold your breath and wait for me to find you.”

This was Bai Liu’s voice!

Cha–!

The match was ignited, and the candlestick in front of Mu Sicheng, who was curled up in a ball, was lit.

The moment the fire lit up, all the ghosts and monsters around Mu Sicheng disappeared, leaving only Bai Liu holding a match to light the candlestick for him, looking at him quietly.

Mu Sicheng raised the candlestick and was about to breathe a sigh of relief, when he suddenly remembered the words he had just heard in the dark, “Wait for me to find you.”

He subconsciously raised the candlestick and shone it on Bai Liu in front of him.

The green firelight was reflected on Bai Liu’s indifferent face, and no shadow was shown on the ground or the wall.

Mu Sicheng’s back slowly tensed up. He held the candlestick and moved it before him, trying to keep his voice steady, “Where are we going now?”

“Bai Liu” walked forward and looked back at Mu Sicheng. The smile on his face looked like it was painted with a strange paper texture.

“Going to the tomb, to find a coffin and carry it back to the human world.”

On the other end.

Bai Liu was holding the candlestick, and there was no one around him.

Upon entering the tomb, Bai Liu stepped on a flip trap door on the ground and stood on it to keep his balance without moving, waiting until the ghosts appeared and chaos ensued. Bai Liu moved his foot and stepped on one side of the trap door then slid directly from the trap door through a passage and fell down a level.

Before the phantoms could react, Bai Liu disappeared.

Bai Liu stood up, brushed the dust off his trousers, and looked up at the place where he fell.

This was a square tomb chamber, not very big. Bai Liu estimated that the length, width, and height were about three meters by three meters by two meters. The walls were covered with thick dust.

However, these were not what Bai Liu was concerned about. He looked around and finally set his sights on the hinged door where he fell – this was the only exit of this square tomb.

This was a sealed tomb.

And that’s not all.

Bai Liu lowered the candlestick, the light from the candlestick flickering as if it would go out at any time, but the faint light was enough for Bai Liu to see clearly what was placed on the tomb’s floor.

The floor of the tomb was filled with many wine jars neatly and densely stacked. The jars were sealed with square red paper and had red strings around their necks. The character “奠” was written on red paper using black ink, with two old copper bells hung at the end of the red strings.

Red string, bells, red paper, this is obviously the same packaging as the coffin that Bai Liu had kept watch over before.

The “things” in the wine jar probably aren’t something that Bai Liu wants to see right now.

In such a small tomb, Bai Liu roughly counted and found that there were about a hundred such wine jars, occupying most of the space in the tomb. It can be said that only the place where Bai Liu had just landed was empty, while the rest of the ground was filled with wine jars.

Bai Liu could probably reach the hinged door by stepping on the wine jars, but the jars were only sealed with a thin layer of paper, which would likely break if Bai Liu stood on it, and the cover of the jar would open. Before he knew what was in the jar, Bai Liu was not going to act so rashly.

In addition, the hinged door was shaking, so even if Bai Liu stepped on the jars and reached the door, he couldn’t get out.

The situation seemed to be at a stalemate for a moment, but Bai Liu was not too distressed. He vaguely felt that there should be a solution to everything here.

Bai Liu held up the candlestick and shone it around, this time he looked more carefully.

There seemed to be something painted on the mud and rock wall. Bai Liu held the candlestick and moved closer to take a look. He kept his body balanced so as not to touch the wine jars placed close to the wall. He wrapped his hands with clothes and wiped away the dust and mud on the wall.

The dust on the wall fell off, revealing a mural with faded painted patterns that looked extremely old. Many parts were so blurry that it was impossible to make out what was painted on them. However, from the inscriptions next to it, one could roughly understand the meaning of the mural.

Wall paintings in tombs are generally used to record some important events in the tomb owner’s life. Judging from the murals, the tomb that Bai Liu entered should be the collective cemetery of Yinshan Village, commonly known as the ancestral tomb. It was not built for a certain person but for a clan.

There were many little red figures on the mural. They were neatly dressed, building tombs, worshipping the Three Pure Ones, and praying for good weather and a bountiful harvest.

Judging from the painting, Yinshan Village at that time did not have those strange joint burial customs. Most villagers died of natural causes and were placed in coffins and buried in the ancestral tomb.

Bai Liu paid attention to the age of the inscription at this time — about two hundred years ago.

That is to say, two hundred years ago, Yinshan Village was just an ordinary village. No villagers drowned, and there was no custom of putting unmarried women in wedding sedans and burying them together with the drowned people.

Bai Liu turned around, holding up the red candle to look at the second wall.

The little figures on this wall are divided into men, and women, old and young, standing at the village's entrance with miserable faces. The strong men had been picked out and seemed to be dragged away by something black. The place where these men were about to go was painted with mountains of knives and seas of fire, guillotines, and steel guns, just like the eighteen levels of hell.

The men being pulled by the dark, ghost-like creatures struggled to remain in Yinshan Village; but despite their vehement unwillingness to leave, they were still dragged into hell.

They fell into a sea of fire and a mountain of swords and were cut into pieces by guillotines and steel guns. The men screamed in agony. Even though it was just a simple and faded mural, Bai Liu could see the pain and misery of these men.

Next to the mural of the men falling into hell was an inscription that read: [You will never die a good death, and will never be reborn!]

Only women, old people, and children were left in Yinshan Village. They stood at the entrance of the village, wearing mourning clothes, looking at the men who had fallen into hell from afar, covering their faces and crying.

Bai Liu turned and looked at the third wall. The fire in the candlestick became dimmer and emitted a bluish-white light. The wine jars around Bai Liu also turned silently as he turned to look at the next painting.

But Bai Liu didn't seem to notice this and continued watching unmoved.

A Taoist with long eyebrows appeared on the mural on the third wall.

The Taoist had long black eyebrows, a snow-white beard, and a golden cap on his head. He looked like an immortal and had a sense of a celestial being. He sat on a cloud holding a horsehair brush, overlooking the world with a worried look on his face. On the ground were the people of Yinshan Village, dressed in mourning, bowing down to the Taoist.

The villagers of Yinshan Village begged and prayed sincerely, and it seemed that they finally moved the Taoist into heaven.

The Taoist priest, holding his whisk, descended from the mortal world step by step down the clouds and landed at the gate of Yinshan Village. People were kneeling on the ground at the entrance of the village, holding up the fattest of three kinds of livestock and rice wine in the village to offer as sacrifices to the Taoist priest who had descended to the mortal world.

The Taoist accepted them.

Bai Liu turned to the mural on the fourth wall. The jars under his feet were getting closer and closer to him, from being at a distance to being right next to his legs, as if to intentionally trap him.

The Taoist priest on the fourth wall suddenly changed from an ethereal appearance to a person with a green face and fangs, frowning eyes, sharp blue-black nails, and all kinds of yellow talismans stuck on his body. He looked like a suppressed demon.

The Taoist held up his whisk and beat the people of Yinshan Village with it like a whip.

The people of Yinshan Village were forced by him to jump into the water and drown, turning into water ghosts. He put unmarried girls into wedding sedans and buried them alive in a cemetery where they would suffocate to death.

The Taoist seemed to be planning some important ceremony. He dug the girl who had been suffocated to death out of her grave, dressed her in formal wedding clothes, put her in a coffin, and buried her in the ancestral tomb.

The bodies of the drowned men were fished out of the pond by him, and the Taoist stuffed the swollen bodies into a shroud, bound them with straw mats, and buried them by the roadside.

Innocent passers-by were constantly dragged into the pond and drowned by the bodies of water ghosts buried on the roadside. They became substitutes and turned into ghosts for the Taoist to control.

When the bodies of the drowned people had filled the pond and no new passers-by could drown in the pond, the Taoist finally appeared again.

His face became increasingly darker and drier with sunken eyes resembling those of a deer and ears that were pointed. His three senses-eyes, nose, mouth-had turned purple, his fingers were like steel, and he sniffed as he walked. He did not look like a living person at all, but a complete zombie.

The zombie Taoist dug out the corpses from the pond and threw them to the back mountain. He also dug out the remains of the Yinshan villagers that had been buried on the roadside. At this time, the corpses were almost rotten, with only some decaying meat and bones left. The Taoist collected these dry bones in wine jars, sealed them with red paper, red thread, and bells, and placed them in a side tomb chamber of the ancestral tomb.

This Taoist seemed to be using the tomb and these bones to set up a formation.

Some of the murals in the middle have become blurred, leaving only the last one, a painting of the closing of the ancestral tomb.

The Taoist was lying in the main tomb chamber with talismans all over his body, and more than a dozen bridal coffins were standing around him to serve him. The rest of the side tomb chambers were filled with various ghosts and wine jars.

The burial objects in a normal tomb were gold, silver, and jewelry. This Taoist occupied someone else's ancestral tomb and used extremely overbearing things like the Red and White Evil Spirits as burial objects.

Using the bodies of people's ancestors who were tortured to death as burial objects and building a temple under their ancestral home, such heavy yin energy was enough to affect the descendants living there.

This Taoist wanted to refine all the people in Yinshan Village into red and white evil spirits from generation to generation and continue to serve as his burial objects.

No wonder the villagers of Yinshan Village later died miserable deaths. This Taoist priest had cast such a spell a hundred years ago to trap the people of Yinshan Village. How could the people here have a good end?

The techniques used by this Taoist were extremely evil in Taoism, and extremely detrimental to one's virtue. This technique lasted for more than a hundred years, until the last few villagers left in Yinshan Village were forced to drown by this magic trick, but he still did not stop and even summoned back Bai Liu and other remaining descendants of Yinshan Village to continue to torture them to death.

Bai Liu's gaze stopped on the face of the Taoist lying in the main tomb chamber on the mural.

If they hadn't died, this Taoist would probably have to wake up if he didn't get what he wanted.

Over a hundred years, countless people have died tragically, and the resentful evil spirits have created zombies. What will happen when they all wake up?

Bai Liu looked up at the last mural on the ceiling.

This last mural was a long painting with a blood-red background. Despite being relatively blurry, it seemed to connect the things that appeared in the previous paintings.

The bride in the coffin jumped out, wearing a veil on her head and riding on the shoulders of some dark-faced people. Ghosts with distorted faces crawled on the ground beside the bride, while her wedding veil swayed as she walked to her destination. Bai Liu looked back and saw some bamboo racks lifted high by the ghosts, on which were piled many wine jars like the one under Bai Liu's feet.

The wine jars seemed to be opened with white arms clinging to several of them.

Some of the pictures in the middle were blurry, making it hard to tell what was drawn. All he could see was the inscription next to the picture: […In the Gengzi year, Renchen month, and Guichou day [1], everything was unfavorable. The Night Wandering God brought his night patrol officers to kill anyone who entered the village…]

Next to it was a line of small characters that said: [Specific matters are listed in the village calendar.]

The last one was the Taoist zombie. In his left hand, a peach wood sword pointed towards the sky while his right elbow rested on the dust. Half of his face was that of a compassionate Taoist who pitied all living beings yet the other half seemed to be an intimidating zombie with a ferocious appearance.

It sat upright on the altar while countless wronged souls and evil spirits writhed below it. These resentful ghosts twisted and roared in the black smoke, and their swollen and drowned faces emerged, pushing the altar forward towards the village entrance.

Countless people were standing vaguely at the entrance of the village, holding swords, axes, chisels, oil pans, torture instruments, and dragging iron chains. They wore strange round-top hats on their heads and short black boots in the style of cow and sheep feet. They looked more like devils escaping from the eighteenth level of hell than human beings with their hideous faces grinning brightly.

Judging from their appearance, these little ghosts were the same ones who had previously taken the men from Yinshan Village away.

Upon rushing straight towards Yinshan Village, the little ghosts met the zombie Taoist priest coming out of the village entrance. The zombie Taoist priest glared at them and raised his sword to slash. The ghost bride and her servants also rushed forward and held down those little ghosts.

The two groups of “people” seemed to have engaged in a fierce fight at the entrance of the village.

The rear painting was blurry again, making Bai Liu look at the very end of the mural.

The entrance to the village was filled with blood, corpses, and bones scattered everywhere, leaving only the Taoist priest, who had turned into a zombie. He supported his body with a sword and stood in the middle of the village with a vicious and ferocious face. Black hair grew on his hands and feet, his fangs were bared, and his mouth was covered in blood.

The inscription beside it read [The descendants of Yinshan Village abandoned their ancestral tomb and built this tomb for the (—??) Taoist priest and ancestors.]

When Bai Liu finished looking at the last mural, there was no place for him to stand. The wine jar pressed tightly against Bai Liu’s calf, as long as he made one move, he could knock it down.

The wine jar had a narrow mouth and a thick body, the paper used to seal it was extremely thin. It had been left here for so long that if it fell to the ground, the paper would probably tear, allowing the contents of the wine jar would crawl out.

A secret room, surrounded by a bunch of wine jars – it seemed there was no way out.

Holding the candlestick, Bai Liu looked around calmly before suddenly stepping on a wine jar.

The wine jars that surrounded him shook a few times and gathered in the middle. After colliding with each other, the wine jars seemed to sense that Bai Liu had disappeared from among them, so they stopped moving.

Bai Liu also stood there without moving, but after a while, a human face appeared on the sealing paper of the wine jar.

The nose of the human face on the paper was moving as if sniffing Bai Liu's scent, and then the wine jars slowly moved towards the one where Bai Liu was standing.

Bai Liu waited until these wine jars came close to the jar he was standing on again, then he changed to another jar and continued to stand. He looked at these wine jars calmly and said to himself, "As expected."

These wine jars contained the bones of the people who drowned, which were the "bodies" of those ghosts. Those who ran away were ghostly spirits while their real bodies were still here.

According to Taoist theory, after the soul leaves the body, the corpse is just a corpse and will not change into another form to do evil. In short, it is safe.

As soon as Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng entered the tomb, they encountered many ghosts near the hinged door. That means there must be many wine jars in the tomb that are "empty", that is, the wine jars after the ghosts leave their bodies.

In other words, these wine jars will not move.

Bai Liu selected the moving wine jars and stood on the ones that did not move. It did not matter even if he stepped on the sealing paper of the wine jar and broke it, because there was only a dead body without a soul inside. The red string of the sealing paper trapped the moving wine jars. According to Taoist theory, these things were yin objects and needed the help of a living person's yang energy to break the mouth of the jar and see the light of day again. Therefore, they tried to use Bai Liu, a living person, to break the jar or the sealing paper.

If an ordinary person were to enter this side tomb chamber and move around, those wine jars would subconsciously block their way and be kicked over. As long as the jars fall over, the contents inside would spill out as desired.

As a result, in order to avoid the escaped spirit, the people who entered would cause havoc, causing more wine jars to be broken.

After the person's yang energy becomes exhausted, they would be consumed to death by the ghosts and become a wine jar as well.

In other words, once you enter this tomb, you cannot move.

Unfortunately, Bai Liu was a weirdo. Upon entering, he looked at the murals for more than half an hour. No matter how the wine jars moved around, he didn't move his feet at all. Only after Bai Liu had basically seen all the wine jars that had been moving in the tomb, did he calmly choose one of them and leisurely step on it.

Moving left and right would result in bumping into wine jars, but moving up and down would not.

Now Bai Liu moved on a higher level as these wine jars chased him. The more these wine jars moved, the more conspicuous those wine jars that could not move became.

Bai Liu remembered that when he entered the tomb and the candle went out, five ghosts imitating him appeared, as well as 5 ghosts imitating Mu Sicheng.

Assuming that these ten ghosts are all left from this side tomb chamber, it can be inferred that there are about ten jars in this tomb chamber that were safe.

Bai Liu glanced at the immovable jars in the tomb chamber, there were exactly ten of them.

However, he did not rule out the possibility that his inference could be wrong; if one of the jars was just unwilling to move, Bai Liu would be "instantly dead" if he stepped on it. Yet, Bai Liu discerned that he did not seem to care about the risks when doing things. He always moved in the direction of the highest possibility and maximum benefit — not even caring if he died halfway.

Bai Liu felt like he was a result-oriented person.

He glanced at the ten jars, visualized them connected in a line, and then paused.

Upon connecting the ten jars, the Chinese character "出" was formed, but this character "出" was missing a stroke, so there was no head.

The stroke was in the southeast direction, and moving jars kept "walking" back and forth at the location of that stroke.

This felt like a mechanism that required a jar in each place, but there were only ten immovable jars, and one was missing.

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows slightly – was this forcing him to step on a jar with something in it?

As if aware that Bai Liu was stepping on the jars, the moveable jars became more and more restless. Deformed human faces kept appearing on the sealing paper, with their mouths wide open and roaring silently.

A chilly wind blew back and forth in the sealed tomb, and a sickening odor of rotting corpses began to emanate from the jar.

Bai Liu took another step and moved to a new jar.

The wine jar Bai Liu had stepped on before was pushed by other moving wine jars. The moment he raised his foot, the seal was broken, revealing a twisted corpse curled up in the water.

The corpse was lying face up, its face so rotten that only a pair of eyes were intact. The eyeballs were misty as if covered by a layer of gauze, and its swollen, pale lids were open, staring outside with its eyes staring out in its death. [2] These should be the corpses of those evil spirits.

The power of the ghosts would be doubled when there is a corpse. If these ghosts were to get out of the jar with the corpse…

After imagining the scene, Bai Liu estimated the fighting power of the ghosts. He objectively felt that he would most likely die here.

Bai Liu kept switching jars while being chased by the wine jars. The seals of the immovable jars were damaged one after another. Bai Liu finally approached the southeast corner of the last missing stroke of the [出] character.

The wine jars were like a school of fish that had smelled the bait, almost filling up the direction of the last point of the exit.

Bai Liu stood calmly on the wine jar that was the final stroke of the [出] and looked around, looking for a way to escape.

If he stepped on a moveable wine jar and no exit appeared while the spirits trapped in the wine jar crawled out, Bai Liu needed to pay attention to the direction in which he was being chased to avoid knocking down the other wine jars.

Bai Liu stared at the wine jars that were shaking constantly in the southeast corner of the room. He quickly stepped on a jar, turned around, and stood on a jar in the corner, with his back pressed against the two walls.

The jar that was just stepped on shook twice before coming to a halt; it gradually began to tilt strangely in one direction. Five pallid fingers slowly stretched out from the torn red sealing paper and grasped the edge of the jar.

A head appeared, bent at a 90-degree angle and stuck horizontally in the mouth of the jar. The head seemed to be completely separated from the body as a sinister smile was plastered on its deathly pale face and long wet hair protruded from the mouth of the jar. Its body casually pulled out of the mouth of the jar with its limbs twisted in a weird angle.

Bai Liu could hear the sound of bones creaking and deforming even when he was standing diagonally from it. He glanced at the four walls and sighed with regret in his heart.

It seemed that he guessed wrong.

At least for now, there is no mechanism in this side tomb, which means there is room for Bai Liu to have a door.

Bai Liu didn't think he had guessed the meaning of "出" wrongly, the hint was quite obvious.

But there seemed to be no [way out] now, unless… something is missing. Standing on the jar, Bai Liu looked up at the ceiling where the hinged door lay, making a clanging sound.

Pale faces popped out from behind the hinged door, and ghosts crawled in on all fours from outside.

Bai Liu clicked his tongue and thought to himself, as expected.

These eleven jars must specifically contain ghosts in order to be opened. So, not long after he stepped on one jar and broke the seal, the ghost would return.

These returning ghosts were originally preparing to crawl toward Bai Liu; however, not long after they came in, they seemed to smell something. Bloody cuts appeared on their faces as they revealed a strange smile, before changing directions and crawling towards the jars that Bai Liu had stepped on.

Then, the ten jars that were stepped open by Bai Liu stretched out their pale arms and feet one after another and slapped the vermilion jars, and the twisting heads in the jars made a creaking sound of bones interlocking.

The eyes on the rotten face of the drowned corpse were staring straight at Bai Liu who was standing in the middle, and the smiles at the corners of their mouths were getting bigger and bigger.

When all ten ghosts returned to their respective wine jars, the side tomb where Bai Liu was located finally made a sound of twisting mechanisms. The bottom floor of the tomb suddenly sank, and after a few loud rumbling noises, smoke and dust came out of the cracks in the tomb.

The light of the candle in Bai Liu's hand suddenly dimmed.

The entire surrounding was wrapped in thick smoke. Bai Liu heard the sound of jars rolling around on the ground. Some of them hit his feet, fell over and broke, making crackling sounds.

Now Bai Liu guessed that all the ghosts in the side tomb had been released.

The ghost corpses, or more precisely, the spirits were crawling in the thick smoke. From time to time, a face without facial features would poke out from the smoke and move its nose to sniff around.

Some of the minions had two blood-red slits instead of eyes; while some had bloodshot eyeballs rolling around in their sockets as if they were looking for Bai Liu in the smoke and darkness. Then they crawled towards places where light shone.

Bai Liu exhaled and blew out the candlestick in his hand. Everything fell into darkness and nothing could be seen.

He could feel that the tomb was still slowly sinking, and he didn't know when it would stop. Occasionally, wet hair, hands and feet brushed past Bai Liu's back and ankles. He could hear the sniffling of breath and the sound of a tongue licking something wet and sticky.

The cold feeling kept approaching Bai Liu, and it seemed that the ghost corpses were about to find Bai Liu hiding in the darkness by smelling him.

Bai Liu took two steps back, leaning against the wall before calmly taking his coat off and dipping it in the corpse water flowing on the ground. He proceeded to wrap his lower body with the coat soaked in corpse water, put an empty wine jar that a ghost had crawled out of on his head, then huddled in a corner with his breath held.

The strong stench of corpses covered up Bai Liu's smell, resulting in the sound of the ghosts sniffing around to be more sporadic. Correspondingly, the sound of their crawling became more and more frequent. Bai Liu could hear the sound of jars and broken tiles being dug from time to time.

The tomb chamber seemed to be about to sink to a fixed position, and began to make creaking sounds.

Bai Liu could feel a few ghosts approaching him, sniffing twice near the mouth of the jar and then leaving.

Of course, there were also some that did not leave.

Bai Liu looked down through the mouth of the wine jar. From his narrow field of vision, he could vaguely see a pair of wet, pale feet standing on the ground very close in front of him, still oozing water.

Bai Liu slowly turned the wine jar on his head towards the wall, trying to avoid the corpse standing in front of him, but as he turned, the feet slowly tiptoed and walked in the direction Bai Liu was turning.

In the end, the toes of these feet were facing Bai Liu, who was holding the wine jar, and they were getting closer.

Bai Liu paused subtly, recalling the explanation of toes facing forward in "Maoshan Evil Art Handbook".

When a ghost points its toes towards you, it means it wants to possess you, or follow you home and live with you. That's why there is a saying that you should not put your shoes with the toes facing the bed when you sleep at night, because the ghost will step on your shoes, get on your bed, and sleep with you.

There are so many ghosts here, but only this one is persistently guarding Bai Liu.

Could it be that it wanted to live with him… Bai Liu took a look at the wine jar he was using.

The pair of legs standing in front of Bai Liu slowly bent down and squatted in front of Bai Liu.

Bai Liu could see the position below its shoulders. This thing hugged its knees with both hands and remained quiet for a while. Then its joints began to deform and its head twisted 120 degrees. Its entire head tilted and looked down at the bottom of the jar at Bai Liu who was looking up from inside. Its eyeballs were completely black.

It pointed at the jar on Bai Liu's head and made a strange gurgling sound in its throat, like a person talking in water:

"This is my… jar. Where's your jar?"

The tomb finally sank to the bottom. After a severe earthquake, the tomb fell to a new place. The main door opened and a dark corridor appeared.

Bai Liu quickly removed the wine jar from his head and covered the head of the ghost in front of him with it, "Just borrowed it for a moment, returning it to you now."

After saying that, Bai Liu turned around and rushed into the corridor without looking back.

Those ghosts discovered Bai Liu, the running human, and screamed — crawling on the wall to chase after him.

The zombies behind were also crawling very fast. If there was light, Bai Liu could see the afterimages of the zombies' hands and feet when he looked back.

At the moment when the ghosts were about to catch up with Bai Liu, he took off his undershirt and threw it forward — abruptly turning sideways and entering a passage next to the corridor.

The ghosts behind were chasing him relentlessly, but it seemed that in the darkness, these ghosts relied on their sense of smell to chase living people. Bai Liu hid in the side corridor and felt those ghosts running past him and heading towards the undershirt that had his scent.

Bai Liu breathed lightly as he looked at the corpses that were piled up in a white mass where his clothes were, their teeth clattering.

Soon the sound of clothes being shredded was heard in the corridor.

The piled up zombies dispersed, and one held up a wine jar. They seemed to have put the scattered pieces of clothes into the jar as if they were the remains of Bai Liu's body. They sealed it using red paper with the character “奠” written on it and then turned around, crawling back with the jar.

It was obvious that they thought they had turned Bai Liu into the next ghost and were going to take him back to feed the [tiger].

Bai Liu raised his eyebrows slightly.

The actions of these ghost minions were so coordinated that they could tear up the “human flesh” that came into their mouths and put it into the jar. They didn’t seem like mindless ghosts, but rather like they were intentionally trained by living people.

But in this tomb full of ghosts and monsters, in Yinshan Village where the last descendant was drowned, apart from the four of them who returned home, are there any living people left?

Bai Liu was just about to stick his head out to see where these ghosts were going to send the jar of wine containing “him”, when a pitch-black hand suddenly stretched out from the side, covering his mouth and nose tightly.

“Don’t look back!” Someone warned hoarsely, “Something is coming to clean up the place!”

Bai Liu obediently stopped moving.

Soon, several paper figures that were only half as tall as Bai Liu appeared. These paper figures were giggling, with smiling faces made of ink on their faces. They held paper brooms in their hands and swept back and forth a few times around the place where Bai Liu’s clothes were torn. Their movements were stiff and rigid, and then they disappeared again.

After the paper man left, the person who covered Bai Liu’s mouth and nose breathed a sigh of relief, but still held Bai Liu’s throat without moving, his body very tense.

Bai Liu calmly took out a match, lit the candlestick and held it up to illuminate the person. “Mu Sicheng, why are you here?”

Mu Sicheng’s face was dirty and covered with traces of mud; there was blood at the corners of his mouth and around his eyes. His body was also covered with wounds — it was obvious that he had just experienced a fierce battle. He stared at Bai Liu for a while then lowered his gaze and looked at Bai Liu’s shadow on the ground before he finally breathed a sigh of relief. He released the hand that was strangling Bai Liu's throat and leaned limply against the wall without moving.

"It really is you, Bai Liu." Mu Sicheng's chest rose and fell violently, and his eyes were blurred. "…I thought I had saved another ghost."

Bai Liu looked Mu Sicheng up and down and asked, "What happened to you?"

"Don't mention it." Mu Sicheng was depressed and scared. He squatted on the ground and said, "I don't know where you went. I followed that fake Bai Liu to carry the coffin. On the way, we crossed a bridge. The fake Bai Liu asked me to cross it."

"But that bridge was made of paper!"

"The bridge was full of ghosts carrying coffins, some strange paper figures, and some translucent things that I could only vaguely see the shapes of. The water was pitch black, with duckweed, black hair and paper money floating on it. It was obvious that if you fell in, you would not be able to get out."

Mu Sicheng's face darkened. "I did as you said and held my breath. I almost suffocated to death but at least I made it through. Then I wandered around and got dizzy. I ended up in a secondary tomb chamber that was connected to the main tomb chamber."

"This time the tomb was filled with coffins, standing upright. There were more than thirty of them, tied with red satin, and arranged in the middle in some kind of formation. I can't remember exactly what it was."

Mu Sicheng frowned and recalled, "That fake Bai Liu asked me to choose a coffin to carry out. Didn't you tell me to follow the ghost's lead? So I chose one that I could carry."

"I just carried the coffin out of the secondary tomb. The coffin was a little slippery and fell down. I bounced up a bit, but I was afraid of offending the body in the coffin so I said 'Sorry, this is my first time carrying a coffin. Please forgive me.' As soon as I finished speaking, a woman's laughter came from the coffin behind me, and then the coffin was knocked twice."

Bai Liu recalled, "That seems to mean giving orders to the ghosts, right?"

“Yes!” Mu Sicheng stood up angrily and asked Bai Liu to look at the big red satin flower hanging on his waist. “After the coffin made two noises, a bunch of ghosts suddenly appeared together with the fake Bai Liu and they pressed my head and put a big red flower on me, forcing me to marry the bride in the coffin!”

Bai Liu half smiled and said, “Are you married?”

Mu Sicheng shook his head fiercely, “No! When those ghosts were setting up the wedding hall, I beat them up in the chaos and then ran away.”

“So you ran away from the marriage?” Bai Liu nodded as if he had understood something and smiled. “The other party really liked you and chose you as her ideal husband, but you ran away without even rejecting her doesn’t seem very right, does it?”

“No, okay!” Mu Sicheng roared, “She doesn’t really want to marry me because she loves me!”

Mu Sicheng clenched his fists, his hands shaking with anger, “You don’t understand at all. I wasn’t just going to marry the bride I carried on my back, I was supposed to marry all the brides in this entire tomb — all those 30 or so brides!!”

Bai Liu stroked his chin and thought momentarily, “This isn’t good, it’s a crime of polygamy.”

Mu Sicheng was furious, “You only thought of this?! Do you know how much effort it took me to escape? I was forced to bow to heaven and earth with them!”

Bai Liu’s eyes indicated, “Did you get these injuries when you escaped and got beaten?”

“Not only that.” Mu Sicheng was furious when he said this, “I had almost escaped but when I turned around, I saw you being captured and marrying the more than 30 brides. I panicked and turned back to save you.”

Mu Sicheng became angrier and angrier as he thought about it. He raised his hand and slammed the wall viciously. “In the end, what I fucking rescued was a ghost. It bit me twice when I was crossing the ghost bridge with it. I couldn’t hold my breath, then almost fell off the paper ghost bridge and drowned!”

Bai Liu took a quick look and found that there were indeed two teeth marks and blood stains on Mu Sicheng’s shoulder.

“Didn’t you use the candlestick to shine on the other person?” Bai Liu asked.

Mu Sicheng glanced at Bai Liu with resentment: “When I was getting married, all my belongings were confiscated and the candlesticks were also taken away.”

“Although the person you saved wasn’t me.” Bai Liu smiled tactfully, “It wasn’t very wise to turn around and save someone during that situation but thank you anyway.”

Mu Sicheng: “…”

Why… did he feel like Bai Liu was implying he was stupid…

Mu Sicheng muttered, “… What if it was you? If you die, I’ll be alone in this place. I don’t know how to get out.”

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng out of the corner of his eye, “You think you have to rely on me to get out, which means that you think I am better at handling this kind of situation than you. Then why do you think I will be trapped when you can get out?"

Mu Sicheng, "…"

Damn, yeah!

Mu Sicheng scratched his face in annoyance. "This is the first time I've encountered such a situation. I was scared stupid…"

"It's okay. The first time is new, the second time is familiar. You will be able to handle it if you go again." Bai Liu walked in holding the candlestick.

Mu Sicheng was stunned for a moment and followed, "… Bai Liu, what do you mean?! You are not going to…"

Bai Liu hummed calmly, "I want to go again."

Mu Sicheng collapsed. He hurriedly stopped Bai Liu who was walking forward and said, "I told you there are a lot of ghosts over there. It's very dangerous. Why are you going there?!"

Bai Liu held up the candlestick and looked at Mu Sicheng quietly, "Because I want to find Mu Sicheng."

Mu Sicheng was startled, "What finding Mu Sicheng? I'm right here…"

Mu Sicheng's unfinished words were paused in Bai Liu's calm gaze.

The facial features on his face gradually flattened and disappeared, his skin turned pale blue, and the sound he made became buzzing and dull as if someone was talking underwater.

The faint candlelight flickered back and forth between "Mu Sicheng" and Bai Liu.

The candlelight cast two shadows on the wall. Bai Liu's shadow was clearly visible, but Mu Sicheng's shadow was layered and blurry, with many double shadows flashing as if it would disappear at any time.

"How could this happen…" Mu Sicheng blankly touched his face, which only had vague outlines of his facial features, "Am I a ghost? But I have a shadow…"

Bai Liu held the candlestick close to Mu Sicheng, turned his wrist upward, and placed it in front of Mu Sicheng. Mu Sicheng's nose twitched twice subconsciously. He seemed to smell the scent of a living person on Bai Liu and couldn't help but inhale twice.

As the vitality from Bai Liu entered Mu Sicheng's nostrils, the originally blurred features on Mu Sicheng's face became clear again.

Mu Sicheng realized what he was doing only after he had sucked the life out of Bai Liu. He froze momentarily and took two steps back in panic: "Don't come over! I really am a ghost. I was just sucking the life out of you…"

Bai Liu pulled down his clothes to cover his wrists. He looked calmly at Mu Sicheng across from him who was going crazy, "You are not a ghost but you are about to become one."

"You are a disembodied soul."

Mu Sicheng was stunned, "A disembodied… soul?"

Bai Liu hummed, "In short, your body was severely damaged due to certain circumstances. It may be that you were taken away and used as a substitute, or you may be on the verge of death, causing your soul to leave your body and wander around."

"If there is no way to get your soul back to your body before we return to the world of the living at midnight then your soul will really remain on the road to the underworld and become a ghost in this underground tomb."

Bai Liu looked down at the time on his phone, "If my phone isn't broken then it should already be five in the afternoon and there are still seven hours left."

After Mu Sicheng moved away from Bai Liu, his facial features began to disappear again and his voice became muffled once more, "Seven hours should be enough."

Bai Liu moved closer to Mu Sicheng again, stretched out his hand, and let Mu Sicheng absorb some of the vitality on the back of his hand.

After being inhaled once more, Bai Liu's face turned pale: "Seven hours is the most optimistic scenario."

"You are now in a state where you are about to turn into a ghost and need to absorb the vitality of living people to maintain your soul form.

There is only one possibility—" Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng, "—that is, your body is about to die."

Mu Sicheng took two steps back and raised his hand to cover his eyes. He actually began to feel that the light from the candlestick in Bai Liu's hand was harsh. He looked at his hand blocking his eyes and felt a chill down his spine.

He didn't know when his hands became like those of the spirits, crooked and upside down, pale and creepy, and water dripping down.

Bai Liu raised the candlestick and shone it towards Mu Sicheng, whose eyes had turned bloodshot. "The most urgent thing is to help you find your body, otherwise my vitality won't be able to keep your soul form for long."

Mu Sicheng was silent for a while, then asked, "What would happen to me if I can't return before my body perishes?"

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng and said, "You will die."

"Then you will become like those ghosts, gradually forgetting you were once human; your human form would be neither mortal nor ghost with your limbs inversed, unable to distinguish between yin and yang. Your only motive in the world would be to look for a substitute, becoming an accomplice to the tiger."

"But I can use my vitality to keep your soul alive. I just need to find your body before that."

Bai Liu stretched out his wrist and handed it to Mu Sicheng so that he could absorb the vitality.

Mu Sicheng stood in the darkness without saying a word and did not come up to absorb Bai Liu's energy, but he did not leave either.

Bai Liu did not take back his hand but kept it raised calmly, waiting for Mu Sicheng to speak.

"What will happen to you if I have sucked all your vitality away and haven't found my own body yet?" Mu Sicheng finally spoke, his voice a little hoarse this time.

Bai Liu calmly replied, "Living people without the energy of life are just like walking corpses. I will become a zombie."

Mu Sicheng pursed his lips and took two steps back as if he were preparing to escape from Bai Liu.

Bai Liu laughed as if he was seeing something strange. He asked Mu Sicheng with interest, “Why do you think I would give up all my vitality and turn into a zombie for you?”

“I will only protect you under the premise of ensuring my safety. I protect you because you are useful. You are one of the few living people in Yinshan Village and you obey me very well. You are more valuable alive than dead.”

Mu Sicheng took another step back, his voice clearly wavering, “… You are so capable, you can handle these things better by yourself, right?”

Bai Liu took a step forward holding the candlestick, then extending his hand towards Mu Sicheng’s face, whose features were gradually disappearing, and said in a light voice, “Didn’t the tomb robber named Kong Xuyang say that we are bound teammates?”

“If this Yinshan Village is divided into fixed teams and various camps, is there some kind of competition going on here?”

“Suppose this is a competition…” Bai Liu raised his eyes and looked at Mu Sicheng who was hiding in the shadows, “Then before the competition started, I chose you as my teammate at that time; I believe in my choice so you should be valuable and capable of helping me win the competition.”

“I don’t like losing, so I need you to be alive.”

“You now have two choices. The first is to obey me directly and absorb the vitality I give you to preserve your soul form. The second choice is to escape and find a place to die. I will capture you and force-feed you vitality to keep you alive.”

Bai Liu took a step forward with his wrist extended out, staring at Mu Sicheng stoically, “Which one do you choose?”

This time Mu Sicheng did not retreat.

After a long time, Mu Sicheng’s face showed some features. With a ferocious and forbearing look, he moved closer to Bai Liu’s wrist, clenched his fist, and took a breath.

Bai Liu's face turned even paler. He retracted his cold wrist, rubbing it before looking at Mu Sicheng and smiling, "Thank you for your cooperation, teammate."

Mu Sicheng was about to take a deep breath but when he realized that he was just a soul and couldn't breathe, he stopped in frustration, "… How long can I absorb your vitality before you turn into a zombie?"

Bai Liu thought for a while and said, "I should be able to hold out for more than an hour. After all, I am a young, strong man. My Yang energy is still sufficient."

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu's thin shoulders and repeated doubtfully, "Young, strong man?"

Bai Liu smiled and turned around, "Any questions?"

Mu Sicheng paused before shaking his head quickly, "No!"

Bai Liu turned back and walked into the dark passage, "Okay, don't worry about my affairs here. I'm well aware of my own situation. Take care of your own affairs first. Do you remember when your soul left your body?"

Mu Sicheng hesitated for a moment, "… No."

Bai Liu wasn't surprised at all, he just nodded to show his understanding, "It's usually difficult for the person to detect when their soul leaves the body. You just feel like you're always walking – oblivious to when it ran out of your body. You think you're still alive, but in fact, at this time, as long as you look back, you will find that your body is lying in the same place, not moving at all."

"Let me ask you this in a different way." Bai Liu pondered momentarily, "Do you remember when your shadow became blurry?"

Mu Sicheng answered quickly and confidently this time, "My candlestick was taken away during the wedding ceremony. I am sure my shadow was still normal during the wedding ceremony!"

"That means your body and soul separated after the wedding ceremony." Bai Liu held up the candlestick and shone it towards the road in front of the corridor. "Then let's go back the same way. Do you still remember the way to the wedding hall?"

Mu Sicheng did not answer.

Bai Liu paused, lowering the candlestick in his hand; he shone it on the ground, the flame flickering.

A ghost with a deformed face was lying on the ground, faintly resembling Mu Sicheng. It was curled up in pain, spitting out water from his mouth and his eyeballs were completely black.

Bai Liu squatted on one knee and stretched out his wrist for Mu Sicheng to take two breaths. Mu Sicheng choked and gagged twice, and his twisted body returned to normal, with his facial features looming.

Mu Sicheng raised his head, and a thick layer of black air appeared on his face. He reluctantly answered Bai Liu's previous words: "I- I still remember some of the roads, but I can't remember some of them anymore…"

"It's normal. When you become a ghost, you will gradually forget your memories of your life." Bai Liu helped Mu Sicheng up. "The fact that your soul's yin energy is gathering so quickly means your body is in a very bad condition. We have to hurry."

Yinshan Village

After Mu Sicheng absorbed two breaths of Bai Liu's energy, he barely maintained his human form. He led Bai Liu into the depths of the tomb passage.

Although Mu Sicheng was walking in front of Bai Liu, only Bai Liu's footsteps could be heard in the dark tomb passage.

Bai Liu held up the candlestick to illuminate Mu Sicheng who was walking in front of him and glanced at Mu Sicheng's shadow cast on the wall in his peripheral vision.

Mu Sicheng's swaying shadow became fainter and fainter, like a wisp of smoke reflected on the wall.

From time to time they would come across one or two wine jars placed in the middle of the tomb passage.

Mu Sicheng carefully stood in front of Bai Liu and had him go around behind him so as not to touch the wine jar.

The wine jar seemed to be able to smell the energy of a living person. It slowly turned a half circle as Bai Liu walked. The red paper sealing it slightly arched twice, then slowly calmed down after smelling the ghost scent of Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng breathed a sigh of relief. He looked back at the wine jar standing quietly in the middle of the road and patted his chest with lingering fear. "There were also these wine jars in the wedding hall. It would chase people. I wonder what is in it."

"That thing contains the bones of a drowned person, and it will chase after the scent of the living." Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng, "Do you remember when this wine jar stopped chasing you?"

Mu Sicheng was stunned. He frowned and thought hard for a moment, "…I don't quite remember. It seems that after I escaped, these wine jars didn't pay much attention to me."

Bai Liu pondered, "Then your body should have been lost on the way out of the wedding hall. Apart from you turning back to save me, did anything strange happen in between?"

Mu Sicheng tried hard to recall, "…I can't remember clearly, it seems that I met some paper figures carrying something…"

Suddenly a strange sound of footsteps stepping on paper scraps emitted behind Bai Liu. The footsteps stopped and started again, like something was jumping down the stairs. Every sound was the sound of two heavy feet landing on the ground. It sounded like the person was walking very slowly, but it was almost instantly close to Bai Liu's back.

The candlestick in Bai Liu's hand started to shake, and the flame suddenly turned pale. He quickly pulled Mu Sicheng into a tomb passage nearby, hid behind Mu Sicheng sideways, and put his hands together to cover the faint light of the candle.

Under the very dim candlelight, a pair of strong, pale hands with sharp black nails suddenly appeared from the damp and dark low tomb passage.

The hand jumped again, revealing the body hidden in the darkness. The person holding these hands was a middle-aged man wearing a mandarin jacket and shorts, with a yellow talisman on his forehead.

This middle-aged man's figure was tall and strong, with an abnormal purple complexion, black lips, and sunken eyes. He stared straight ahead, with two long fangs at the side of his mouth stuck in the flesh. His knees were jumping forward without bending at all, and there was an old yellow talisman stuck on his forehead, which seemed like it could fall off at any time due to the jumping.

Bai Liu squinted his eyes and looked at the yellow talisman for a while and confirmed that the talisman drawn on the yellow talisman was the Yinshi Talisman in "Maoshan Evil Art Handbook", a talisman used to refine the dead into yin corpses.

After being refined, the Yin corpses can be driven by the person who drew the talisman, but at the same time, the person who drew the talisman will also receive backlash. If the person who drew the talisman is dying, these Yin corpses would turn around and devour their master.

Through the dusty jacket, one could vaguely see a large gash on the back of the middle-aged zombie, deep enough to reveal the bone. It had been stitched up roughly but it was clear that it had been done after death and the spine could be seen at the stitching.

This big knife wound should be the fatal injury of the middle-aged man.

The zombie jumped extremely fast. In just one jump, it jumped high in front of Bai Liu, but then, a second zombie jumped out from the darkness behind.

This zombie looked about the same age as the previous one, both were young and strong, and there was a big wound on its neck.

The zombie's head was almost chopped off and was sewn back together but the skill of the person who sewed it was obviously not very good. As the zombie jumped, its neck cracked and its head fell to the side. Its black eye sockets looked straight at Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng hiding in the shadowy tomb passage.

The crooked-necked zombie's nose moved twice as if it smelled a living person. An angry look appeared on its stiff face. It turned its raised hands and jumped into the tomb passage.

Mu Sicheng stood in front of Bai Liu with a tense expression. Bai Liu hid behind Mu Sicheng's shoulder, hiding the candlestick behind his back with one hand and calmly covering his mouth and nose with the other hand.

The zombie tilted its head, opened its mouth full of fangs, and moved close to the left side of Mu Sicheng's neck with a resentful look. It sniffed twice as if it would bite hard if it smelled a living person. Mu Sicheng had never come into such close contact with a zombie before. His hair stood on end but he dared not move.

Bai Liu was hiding behind Mu Sicheng's right shoulder at this time, with his back to Mu Sicheng's back.

Zombies have poor eyesight, travel under the moon, like to eat human blood, and rely on their sense of smell to find people. They like to sniff at the places where vitality flows in the human body's seven orifices. Therefore, the "Maoshan Evil Art Handbook" records that if there are zombies in the area, you should sleep face down. This way, when the zombies sneak into the bed from house to house to sniff and bite people, they will not find you.

The zombie sniffed Mu Sicheng's face carefully, with a hint of confusion on its tilted head. It bared its fangs viciously, turned around abruptly, and reached towards Mu Sicheng's left shoulder.

Bai Liu, with his back to the zombie, seemed to be able to see the zombie's movements. He moved a step and hid behind Mu Sicheng's right shoulder again.

After this went on a few times, the zombie finally got annoyed. It seemed to curse something, poked Mu Sicheng's shoulder with its nails, and after confirming that the other party was a ghost, it turned around and walked away.

Mu Sicheng was almost exhausted. He leaned against Bai Liu and let out a long sigh, wiping the non-existent cold sweat from his face, "They're finally gone…"

"They're not all gone yet." Bai Liu's voice came softly behind Mu Sicheng, "There should be five more, a total of seven zombies."

As soon as Bai Liu finished speaking, a new zombie jumped out in front of Mu Sicheng. Like the previous zombie, this new zombie was extremely curious about Mu Sicheng, who exuded the smell of the living. It stuck out its fangs and probed him several times before leaving in boredom.

As a result, after a while, another zombie jumped out and stretched its head to sniff the living person's scent on Mu Sicheng. Bai Liu grew accustomed to it and took advantage of Mu Sicheng's agile hiding to successfully make the zombie think that Mu Sicheng was just a ghost who had died not long ago and was still emitting life energy.

The zombie bared its teeth and muttered a few threats to Mu Sicheng, then poked Mu Sicheng's shoulder with its nails and cursed him out.

Mu Sicheng couldn't understand what the zombies were saying, but based on the zombie's expressions, he inferred that the zombie was probably scolding him, telling him to get out of there.

Mu Sicheng: "…"

Although this seemed to be true, it really sounded like it was swearing at him.

This process was repeated six times in a row. Except for the first zombie who didn't come to bother Mu Sicheng, every zombie that followed came to sniff him. Some even bit Mu Sicheng before leaving in disgust; they then waited for the next zombie to repeat the process.

Mu Sicheng, who had two holes bitten on both sides of his neck and face, felt there was nothing left to live for: "…"

Are you sharks?! If you take a bite and it doesn't taste good, can't you inform each other?! Why do you have to bite me again?!

However, Mu Sicheng now discovered that being a ghost had its advantages and he wasn't so afraid of these things anymore.

After the seventh zombie passed by Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, there was no more jumping sound in the tomb passage. Mu Sicheng was just about to stick his head out to see if there was anything behind him when he was stopped by Bai Liu.

Bai Liu looked towards the dark corridor: "There's still something that hasn't left. If you hear any noise, don't go out."

Mu Sicheng held his breath and concentrated for a long time but didn't hear anything. However, his nose was sensitive and he smelled a very greasy scent of incense and candles.

Slowly, Mu Sicheng also heard a crackling sound, like the sound of someone walking on paper. It was fine and fragmented, not loud, but it echoed back and forth in the dark tomb passage and was exceptionally clear.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes and looked deep into the tomb passage. A swaying orange light was flickering and swaying unsteadily, like a ghost or a spirit. The floating lights on the river made it difficult to see the distance, but one could definitely feel that they were approaching.

From afar, the yellow fire was getting closer and closer. At last, they could see the true content hidden in the yellow fire.

Mu Sicheng saw a huge triangular copper incense burner with countless tall incense candles burning fiercely. Sparks were flying everywhere, illuminating the entire tomb passage like daylight. Carrying the incense burner forward were some paper figures that were almost deformed by the weight.

Under the huge weight of the incense burner, the bodies of these paper figures were flattened and deformed. The faces that were painted with joy were also squeezed into strange expressions with piled-up wrinkles, and the clothes on their bodies were squeezed so tightly that it was impossible to tell what was originally drawn on them.

The paper people carried the incense burner and moved forward little by little. From time to time, sparks would float down and ignite the paper people carrying the incense burner.

The bodies of the paper figures ignited by the sparks burned rapidly. In the flames that burned them into curls and deformations, Mu Sicheng could clearly hear the eerie laughter of these paper figures in the dazzling fire.

“Hehe~”

“Hehe~”

The swaying incense burner and the burning paper figurine passed in front of Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu. They were light and heavy. At the end of the team carrying the incense burner followed a paper Taoist priest.

This paper Taoist priest was the most exquisitely made one. Its face was lifelike and its facial features were delicately drawn like a real person. It had black eyebrows, a long beard, and a dignified expression. The only difference was that its eyes were without pupils and there were no eyeballs in the middle of its eye sockets.

In addition, this paper Taoist priest was covered with talisman paper. It had two fingers of one hand raised over its head, holding a golden bell, and the other hand holding a peachwood sword that was pointing at the incense burner in front of it. Its eyes, blank and made of a white ink-like texture, stared straight ahead. It took a step with its left foot then took a step with its right foot and walked straight forward. As it walked, it made the same sound of walking on paper that Mu Sicheng had heard prior.

In such a strange scene, Mu Sicheng’s courage, which had just expanded rapidly because he was a ghost, quickly shrank back. He pulled Bai Liu’s sleeve and asked in a low voice, “What… is it doing?”

Bai Liu looked at the paper Taoist priest and said, “The paper man is driving away the corpses.”

Yinshan Village

The paper Taoist priest walked slowly in front of Bai Liu. Unlike those little paper figures with stiff movements, the priest's movements were smooth and natural just like those of a real person.

The moment the paper Taoist priest walked past Bai Liu, Bai Liu pushed Mu Sicheng aside, matched the paper Taoist priest's footsteps exactly and followed closely behind.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu with a question mark on his face. He gestured and asked with his mouth, 'Why are we following it?'

Bai Liu replied with his lips, 'You have seen paper people guiding corpses before. Maybe you can find your body by following them.'

The paper Taoist strode forward with the peachwood sword in hand. It seemed to have no eyes and could not see Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng following him. After it passed through one tomb passage after another, Bai Liu heard the sound of splashing water.

After passing through the narrow tomb passage again, a river about fifty meters wide appeared in front of Bai Liu.

The water in the long river was flowing rapidly. Under the light of the incense burner held up by the paper man in front of him, Bai Liu could see the splashes of water hitting the rocks. A low white bridge spanned the long river.

The bridge was very low and narrow, its body almost touching the water surface. There were no guardrails on both sides. It felt like people on the bridge could touch the water's surface with just a hand.

Of course, there was no one on the bridge. There were only some shadows of Bai Liu, whose specific features could not be seen clearly for the time being, dragging slowly on the bridge.

The closer Bai Liu got to the long river and the bridge, the more he could smell a peculiar smell of the water. The short white bridge that looked to be made of rock from afar turned out to be just a paper bridge made of oiled facial tissue when he got closer. Coming and going on the paper bridge were some ghosts with dull faces walking on tiptoes, as well as some black translucent residual souls.

But these were not the most eye-catching things. The most eye-catching things were the women holding white oil-paper umbrellas and walking gracefully on the bridge as if they were taking a walk in the rain.

These women stood with their backs to Bai Liu, holding oil-paper umbrellas. They were wearing white funeral shrouds, barefoot and waving white handkerchiefs in their hands. They walked from the center of the bridge to the bridgehead, swaying their waists with every step. They turned around holding umbrellas, as if preparing to look back.

Mu Sicheng held his breath, waiting for these women to turn around, but these women holding umbrellas suddenly dropped their umbrellas and jumped into the river.

The bodies of the women floated face down under the paper bridge, with their long hair spreading in the water. They floated motionless under the bridge, but when they crossed the bridge, they turned face up again.

The corpses, lying face up, had resentful smiles on their dark and swollen faces, and their eyes were fixed on the “person” still walking on the bridge. They turned left and right, looking for something on the bridge. When they couldn’t find anything, the resentful smiles on the corpses’ faces became more and more distorted before slowly drifting away.

Not long after, a woman walking with an oil-paper umbrella suddenly appeared in the middle of the bridge.

Bai Liu stared at the women walking on the bridge, and soon he realized that these women seemed to be the same group, constantly floating in a cycle on the bridge and under the river, walking on the bridge, jumping off the bridge and then floating under the bridge repeatedly.

Every time they passed under the bridge, these women would stare at the bridge surface as if looking for something.

As they failed to find what they were looking for, the women looked at the passers-by on the bridge with more and more resentment and viciousness, as if they were resentful of the “people” on the bridge for blocking their search.

Mu Sicheng was frightened by this group of strange women and quickly pulled Bai Liu’s sleeve. “…What are they doing?”

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng and said, “You walked across this bridge once, and now you don’t remember anything?”

Mu Sicheng was startled and murmured, “…I don’t remember.”

Bai Liu retracted his gaze, “According to the records in Maoshan Evil Art Handbook, these women should be sacrificial bridge ghosts.”

Mu Sicheng asked, “What is a sacrificial bridge ghost?”

Bai Liu looked at the women holding paper umbrellas.”It’s said that in the past when husbands leave home, the women of the family will go to the bridge everyday, regardless of rain or shine, waiting for their husbands to return home. But if the news of their husbands returning home isn’t good news, but news of their death, some women would jump off the bridge in grief to die alongside the deceased.”

Mu Sicheng looked at these women with some sympathy at this time, “So they are looking for their husbands to return home?”

“It should be.” Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng’s sympathetic eyes, “The floating corpses that died under the bridge have strong resentment. The ghosts of the corpses will circle the bridge from generation to generation, always watching the bridge and waiting for their husbands. If they can’t find their husbands, they will drag all the men who cross the bridge into the water.”

Mu Sicheng was shocked and said, “Why drag me into water?!” I’m not her husband!”

Bai Liu nodded calmly, “Yes, they know that too. So if they find out you are not their husband after they pull you into the water, they will drown you alive out of grief because they have mistaken you for someone else and then throw you aside before continuing to wait for their own husbands.”

Mu Sicheng, “…”

“Shit!” Mu Sicheng reacted, he grabbed Bai Liu, frowning, “There are sacrificial bridge ghosts, isn’t it dangerous for you to cross this bridge?”

Bai Liu’s eyes darkened. “Yes, the Sacrificial Bridge Ghost is one of the most dangerous ghosts in the records of Maoshan Evil Art Handbook.”

“The resentment of the sacrificial bridge ghosts cannot be countered, but can only be dispelled. If we don't have a talisman that can help us disguise ourselves as their husbands, once they find out that we are just two strange men, we will definitely be dragged off the bridge together and drowned, trapped in this cycle of going up and down the bridge."

Mu Sicheng felt a chill down his spine when he heard this, "Then do you have a disguise talisman?"

Bai Liu paused, "No, that is an orthodox spell, called [False Body Talisman], which is not in my book of sorcery records."

"Then let's not cross the bridge and go back…" Before Mu Sicheng finished his words, he suddenly spasmed and trembled a few times. The black energy on his face suddenly became thicker, and his limbs deformed as he lay prone on the ground. His eyes were red and he rushed towards Bai Liu with his teeth bared!

On the other side, in the tomb.

Kong Xuyang, who had a [False Body Talisman] on his head, held up a candlestick and chatted smugly with Yang Zhi who also had a False Body Talisman on his head, "Then Bai Liu will probably die in the tomb, right?"

Yang Zhi nodded and gave Kong Xuyang a thumbs up with unconcealed praise on his face. "Of course, Brother Kong. You really did a great job, really great, you led them directly into the tomb."

Kong Xuyang pretended to be impatient and waved away Yang Zhi's hand, "What's so great about this? It's just a guide talisman to let the Yin corpse lead the way. The main thing is that Bai Liu likes to court disaster. He dared to rush into the tomb without anything. Isn't this just courting death?"

"His tactical style involves willingly taking risks even if he dies. Can I say that I am good? Isn't this all due to the opponent's foil?"

Kong Xuyang patted the lamp ash on his hands and sighed pretentiously, "Of course, I still hope that Bai Liu can struggle to live a little longer. Otherwise, there's nothing to watch, just us passing through the monsters and decrypting the puzzle. With this instance being so winnable, how can I gain popularity without the attention being hyped up?"

Yang Zhi nodded repeatedly, and said with emotion, “I watched Bai Liu compete before, and I thought he was very awesome, but I didn’t expect that he couldn’t even get through a single round in the hands of you, Brother Kong.”

Kong Xuyang sneered, “Awesome? How can a laid-off worker in real life who’s just a loser, compare with me?”

“But Bai Liu has won first place in the Rising Star Ranking and first place in the King’s Ranking by relying on his own strength.” Yang Zhi recited Bai Liu’s achievements without noticing that Kong Xuyang’s face had darkened. “I didn’t expect that he would lose so easily…”

“Are you done?” Kong Xuyang glanced at Yang Zhi sinisterly.

Yang Zhi then realized that he seemed to have hit Kong Xuyang in the foot, and quickly tried to make amends, “But he is still no match for you, Brother Kong!”

But after saying this, Yang Zhi felt a little guilty because Kong Xuyang had never been first on the King’s Ranking.

Kong Xuyang was suppressed by Hearts the year before last and by Spades last year. This year, he finally had a chance to win but it was snatched away by Bai Liu who suddenly appeared out of nowhere.

Kong Xuyang sneered, ignored Yang Zhi, and went deeper into the tomb holding the candlestick.

From time to time, there were women holding oil-paper umbrellas, ghosts crawling on the ground and brides with veils walking around them, but Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi seemed to not exist, walking among these ghosts recklessly. However, these ghosts did not harm them, and the women holding oil-paper umbrellas even came over to hold umbrellas for them.

Only after they had sent them to a new tomb chamber did the women turn around and walk away slowly, holding their umbrellas, leaving behind a trail of water-stained footprints on the floor of the tomb.

Yang Zhi looked at the women walking away and patted his chest in fear. “This [False Body Talisman] is really amazing. The sacrificial bridge ghosts directly regarded us as their husbands and even held umbrellas for us.”

“If I didn’t have this [False Body Talisman]…” Yang Zhi seemed to remember something terrible and shuddered.

Kong Xuyang also looked sympathetic, but cursed angrily, “These women are crazy insane. When I previously passed this instance, I almost died in the hands of these sacrificial bridge ghosts. Fuck, once they found out that I wasn’t their man, I became their enemy. What a bunch of bitches!”

Yang Zhi was still terrified, “Yes, and the only weakness of these sacrificial bridge ghosts is their husbands as recorded in the monster book! If you, Brother Kong hadn’t found the [False Body Talisman] in the Maoshan Evil Art Handbook in time last time, we would have all died in their hands!”

“Damn whores.” Kong Xuyang cursed sinisterly, but no one knew what he was thinking about, the expression on his face relaxed again.

Kong Xuyang sneered, “Didn’t you want to kill me last time? This time just follow me obediently and hold an umbrella for me.”

Yang Zhi rubbed his hands together obscenely and laughed twice. “Brother Kong, give me your orders, maybe these women can be good…”

In disgust, Kong Xuyang waved his hand to interrupt Yang Zhi, “Your taste is too strong!”

Yang Zhi tactfully changed the subject, “How far do you think Bai Liu and his partner can go in the tomb?”

Kong Xuyang became interested again after hearing this, “We have been to this tomb before. The most dangerous ones are the thirty or so brides in the wedding hall, the sacrificial bridge ghosts, and the zombies.”

“Of course, the scariest thing is the Taoist priest in the main tomb.” Kong Xuyang’s expression became more serious when he said this. “That thing is at least a monster with a panel value of 20,000 - 30,000. We must not let it wake up, otherwise we will all die.”

“After the seventh day, within two days, that zombie will absorb enough Yin energy from the last batch of villagers in Yinshan Village and start to awaken. After waking up, it will start to massacre the villagers. There is no way to stop it.” Kong Xuyang’s face was dark. “Last time, as soon as we logged out of the game, the Taoist priest killed all the remaining players trapped inside.”

“Many of those players are prospective members of large guilds. They had no power to resist that Taoist priest.”

Yang Zhi thought of the Taoist priest who also had an emancipated face, “It’s okay, as long as Bai Liu dies, the game will be over. They can’t survive the sacrificial bridge ghosts.”

“I hope Bai Liu and his companion can hold and let the game go on for a little longer. After all, Bai Liu is said to have a lot of fans who support him. These fans probably want to watch Bai Liu for a little longer.” Kong Xuyang shrugged with regret, but the malicious smile on his face grew bigger and bigger. “I am a person who is always willing to satisfy the audience’s wishes.”

“But if Bai Liu really can’t even beat a bunch of abandoned women who held umbrellas for me, I wonder what those audiences who support him will think when they see this scene?”

Yang Zhi understood and praised, “Why would they support Bai Liu? They are here to support you, Brother Kong!”

Yinshan Village

Viewing pool.

The audience was talking a lot as they watched Bai Liu on the screen about to walk to the Ghost Bridge, but the voices were very low and not aggressive.

When two very popular teams confront each other, at least in the viewing pool, the audience dare not say anything bad. After all, the team members who have not entered the game are sitting below. If they say something and offend the other side, it is not impossible that they will be hunted down afterward.

The precedent of the Clown killing the audience member was still there.

But it is inevitable to discuss the direction of the competition, and the current trend is clearly unfavorable to Bai Liu.

"… Tsk tsk, I think Bai Liu is finished."

"Kong Xuyang always likes to play tricks on his opponents after silencing the panel. I didn't expect that he also had a big card like devouring memory. Together, they are truly invincible."

"A skill that silenced the panel is naturally very hard to deal with. Many big guilds have fallen into this trap…"

Wang Shun turned his head back to the audience and looked at Bai Liu on the big screen with worry. "The growth rate of points in our gambling pool has slowed down a lot."

MuKe looked coldly at the Fanatic Lambs players on the opposite side. "The Fanatic Lamb gambling pool's points growth rate has tripled."

"The growth rate of the gambling pool points depends on the momentum of the game. Once it slows down, it will be difficult to increase it." Wang Shun became more and more worried. "The lower the growth rate of the betting pool, the fewer viewers are optimistic about you. This also means that the possibility of getting a golden medal of immunity from death in the later stage is smaller."

"This match is one of the most watched matches in recent times. Kong Xuyang is also a very talked-about contestant. Although I don't think Bai Liu will lose to Kong Xuyang…" Wang Shun sighed, "I'm worried that if Bai Liu doesn't win beautifully and excitingly in this match, his popularity won't increase."

Wang Shun paused for a moment and said, "You will soon meet the Russell Cemetery Team. They are not going to come down from the field alive. They are using a suicidal strategy. If you don't get the popularity bonus in this game, it will be difficult to get it in the next one."

"Without the golden medal of immunity from death, it will be a tough battle with Russell Cemetery." Wang Shun smiled bitterly.

Liu Jiayi was surprisingly very calm, "Can the gambling pool be rigged?"

[Pool Rigging] was a tacit cheating method between teams. The extremely fast-growing pool will be displayed on a vertical TV screen next to the game login entrance. This screen is also called the [Team Points Growth Rate List]. Teams on this list will be quickly noticed by the audience.

If the gambling pool is growing rapidly, it means that the team that owns this gambling pool has a very good momentum and is currently performing well.

Similar to stocks and funds, a rapidly rising betting pool will have many viewers placing blind bets. They will rush in without asking any questions and place bets on the players and teams, thereby rapidly expanding the gambling pool and increasing the popularity of the players. After placing bets, these viewers will turn their attention to the team.

The concept [Pool Rigging] is that one's own team puts in a large number of points first, allowing one's own betting pool to rush to the [team points growth rate list], attracting a large number of viewers to place blind bets. This practice is also called [dealer rigging], which is used when the team is in a slump and attempts to make a last gamble. Simply put, it is to lure people in first.

If this approach fails, that is, if the players lose, they will be scolded for "taking a few others with them when they die", and the team usually has no way back and will be directly besieged by the audience who lost points and disbanded.

If this approach is successful, the quick, high-yield gains will quickly make the audience who have tasted the sweetness addicted and thus, become more loyal to the team. They will place more bets in the next game and wildly increase the player's popularity value to give him a golden medal of immunity. This is a typical [gambler's mentality].

Liu Jiayi looked at Wang Shun and said, "Our behind-the-scenes financial backer Charles made his fortune by rigging schemes. Why doesn't he come to take control of the situation now?"

"I personally don't like this way of getting to the top. The audiences it attracts are too extreme and it's easy to get into trouble. It's also not very fair to these audiences…" Wang Shun frowned and sighed, "But I did ask Charles before if he wanted to set up a scheme."

Liu Jiayi asked: "What did he say?"

Wang Shun said, "He said he would not participate in the pre-season. In the pre-season, he would not participate in any of Bai Liu's affairs except to help fund Bai Liu's training."

"Charles's original words were, 'If the dark horse can't even run ahead of him then he doesn't deserve to put in more effort.'" Wang Shun took a deep breath, "In the pre-season, Charles clearly told me that he would not give Bai Liu any help."

Liu Jiayi quickly shifted her focus, "Then do we have enough points in storage for our own guild to set up the game?"

"It's far from enough." Wang Shun shook his head. "And Bai Liu clearly said that these points cannot be moved. He said that these points are the foundation of the guild members. If they are moved, it will easily lose people's hearts."

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips and looked at Bai Liu on the screen, "What is Bai Liu's current popularity ranking?"

She actually had no doubt that Bai Liu could win the game but… how could he increase his popularity when he was in a slump, get into the top 100 in popularity before the match at Russell Cemetery, and get the golden medal of immunity from death? This was the core of the game.

"Bai Liu's popularity ranking is now 151, making it into the mid-season tournament." Wang Shun replied, "But there is still a long way to go before the top 100."

“If we really want to set up a plan to boost Bai Liu’s power, we can only hope that a high-scoring audience will suddenly appear and place large bets on him.”

Wang Shun couldn’t help but let out a bitter laugh. “But these wealthy audiences have already been bought up by various celebrity players during the cheering season. They are all playing in the betting pool of the mid-season tournament. How can they see Bai Liu, a newcomer in the pre-season tournament?”

Tang Erda looked at the team’s gambling pool on the system panel, resting his hands on his knees, and said in a deep voice, “The growth rate of our gambling pool is almost zero.”

Wang Shun was startled, and quickly opened his system panel to check, “How could it fall so badly!”

“It’s not just us. The growth rate of the gambling pool of the Fanatic Lambs has also slowed down…” Wang Shun muttered to himself as he watched, “The growth rate of the gambling pool of all teams in the entire pre-season has slowed down… What’s going on?”

Liu Jiayi responded quickly, “In the mid-season tournament that’s being played now, which 2 teams are playing against each other?”

Being reminded by Liu Jiayi, Wang Shun slapped his forehead and said regretfully, “I was so focused on our guild’s battle today that I forgot about this important matter!”

“At the same time as our match, there is also a big match in the mid-season tournament.” Wang Shun looked at the battle table displayed on the system panel with complicated eyes, “… Killer Sequence vs. King’s Guild.”

“Now all the points in the game are pouring into the gambling pools of these two guilds. This situation is most likely the result of the competition is about to be announced.” Liu Jiayi stared at the skyrocketing gambling pool points data of King‘s Guild and Killer Sequence on the system panel. “I can’t tell who will win from the data for the time being. Wang Shun, can you tell?”

Wang Shun shook his head slowly, “The growth rate is too fast, I can’t analyze it.”

Mid-season viewing pool.

Two white beams of light flashed on both sides of the huge screen. The members of Killer Sequence and King's Guild walked out in a column.

The one walking in front of Killer Sequence was the Reverse God, and the one walking in front of the King's Guild was Hearts. After they had walked out of the aisle, they passed the host who was standing in the middle with a microphone in his hand and a blank expression, and shook hands very politely.

The audience had basically the same expression as the host, blank as if they simply couldn't believe what they were seeing.

There were so many people watching the game, and yet at the most exciting moment of the game ending, no one made a sound.

The whole place was so quiet that you could hear a pin drop; it was eerily silent.

Everyone stared blankly at the two teams walking towards each other in the center of the field as if they had not yet recovered from the game and had no idea what was going on.

The Reverse God smiled and shook Heart's gloved hand, "Very brilliant tactics."

Hearts smiled charmingly, "Isn't this more suitable for you?"

"After all, you gave up a singles match." Hearth raised her eyelids and glanced at the Reverse God with a moving look, "but you shaved our heads bald."

The host seemed to have just come to his senses. He excitedly jumped up with the microphone in his hand and shouted, "Everyone!! The result of the match is that Killer Sequence beat the King's Guild 22-1!"

"This is the biggest mid-season game in history!!!"

"In the singles match, Killer Sequence forfeited, in the doubles match, Killer Sequence ended the match early, scoring 6 points, and in the team match, Killer Sequence ended the match early, scoring 16 points, earning a total score of 22 points"

"You are quite courageous. You dare to do this when you are dealing with us." Hearts casually glanced at the Killer Sequence members behind her and her eyes only paused for two seconds when she passed by Spades. "The team you are in still barely defeated me last year and this year, you dare to sacrifice my guild to pave the way for your own momentum."

The Reverse God pretended to be sincere and scratched his head with a friendly smile, "I just gave it a try, I didn't expect it to work."

Hearts was stunned for a second by the Reverse God's shamelessness.

The rules of the mid-season, pre-season, and playoffs were different. The core of the mid-season is points, the gambling pool and the immunity from death metal. Killer Sequence had undergone major roster changes this year. Although the five main players are still ranked in the top 100, the popularity rankings of the players are quite polarized.

Hearts and the Reverse God were firmly in first and third place but apart from them, Bai Yi, Bai Jiamu, and Liao Ke were hovering in the lower 70 to 90 circle. Their positions are very unstable. Once popular players start to exert their strength in the later stage, they will be squeezed out.

The reason for this phenomenon is very simple. Because Killer Sequence performed poorly in team competitions, the team's average ranking could not be improved, resulting in a ranking gap.

The same is true for Wandering Circus.

The only way to resolve this situation is a strong and highly-watched team competition.

The Reverse God made a risky move. He chose this team match as the one against the King's Guild.

"Single matches have always been your strong event. Every time, Spades can end the game early and secure two points." Hearts looked at the Reverse God, "I didn't expect you to give up Spades' single match and not let him play, postponing Spades' golden medal of immunity to the team match."

Hearts stared at the Reverse God quietly, "Spades is not good at team competitions. Your gamble was very risky."

The Reverse God smiled again. He glanced at Spades who was standing next to him and obviously distracted. “People can always change.”

Hearts let go of the Reverse God’s hand, bowed slightly, and saluted gracefully. She then stood up and looked at Spades who was standing next to the Reverse God.

She paused for a moment, looking at the black whip in Spades’ hand then took off her red gloves and extended her hand to Spades. She smiled very elegantly and said, “It was a pleasure to compete with you this time, Spades.”

Spades’ wandering eyes paused on Hearts’ face for two seconds, “Who are you?”

Hearts: “…”

The Reverse God suddenly burst into a loud choking cough. He calmly stood in front of Spades, firmly and forcefully grasped Hearts’ hand then shook it up and down twice. “Yes, Spades also enjoyed the game this time!”

“Are you so happy that you don’t even remember who I am?” Hearts pulled her hand back with a disingenuous smile. She nodded slightly to the other members of the Killer Sequence, turned around, and walked off the stage with the other members.

The Reverse God breathed a sigh of relief when he saw Hearts leave the stage. He turned around and poked Spades on the forehead with his hand in frustration and scolded him, “You have played against her twice! She was so polite to you, you should at least remember what she looks like!”

Spades recalled seriously, “We’ve fought her before?”

The Reverse God: “…”

Bai Yi: “…”

Bai Jiamu: “…”

Liao Ke: “…”

Hearts, give up this man and look for your next love. You played in the finals with him once and he didn’t even remember you. He’s really not worth it!!

Yinshan Village

Hearts came down from the stage with her teammates wearing high heels and her expression calm. Many spectators swarmed around her. They had fanatical and crazy looks on their faces, yelling at Hearts with ferocious expressions and waving their arms as if they had lost their minds because of the extreme result of the game.

“I will always support you, Queen! You will definitely continue to win in the next game! You will win back!”

“I put all my wealth on a woman like you and you actually lost! Go to hell!”

“It’s okay. If the betting pool is gone, we can raise more! I will continue to support you, Queen! Until I die!”

“Go to hell! You bitch, did you let them win on purpose because you like Spades? Die, bitch!”

The audience was kept out by the members of the King’s Guild and could not touch Hearts. In the central hall, they could not harm Hearts, but correspondingly, Hearts could not harm them.

One spectator who looked like he was going crazy had bloodshot eyes. He jumped up and spat at Hearts fiercely, cursing, “Bitch!”

The saliva didn’t land on Hearts, but the eyes of the little nun following behind Hearts darkened. She was about to look up but was held down by Hearts without even turning her head.

Hearts turned her head calmly and looked at the group of spectators following her, with a smile on her face, “In your eyes, if I win, I’m the queen, and if I lose, I’m a bitch?”

The audience member was stunned by Hearts’ eyes, and his mind became clearer. He took two steps back in fear but still said: “…You lost the game, I invested so many points for you, and they are all gone. You should be scolded!”
Hearts smiled softly and charmingly, “Do you really think you are my fan if you use this logic to judge me?”

“Fans vote for their idols for harmless entertainment, but when you vote for me, are you doing it for your own entertainment?” Hearts’ eyes were alluring, and the smile on her lips deepened. “You pinned your hopes on me in order to win more points to survive and satisfy your own desires, and I allowed you to pin your hopes on me. Our relationship is not that of a fan and an idol."

"It's the relationship between believers and gods. You bet on me not for me, but for yourself. Because you don't dare to go on the field, you put your trust in me, the god, and hope that I can win back your life, desires, and future for you on the field. Do you understand?"

The audience member took several steps back under Hearts' gaze, and finally almost fell to the ground, saying in a trembling voice, "…I understand, Queen."

Hearts retracted her gaze, turned around and left, and nonchalantly said to the member next to her, "From now on, if this person wants to bet on me, it's strictly forbidden."

"I will not allow such an incompetent person to place his desires on me."

Phoebe, who followed behind Hearts, made a cross on her heart, then touched the head of the pale man with pity. She prayed devoutly. "May God bless you to hell soon, my poor child."

After saying that, Phoebe skipped away behind Hearts.

As Hearts walked forward, the people next to her quickly reported the results of the past few days' competitions. The audience who had been chasing her to scold and praise her before did not catch up but stood far behind in awe.

"Fanatic Lambs vs. Wandering Circus?" When Hearts heard this, she raised her hand to stop the reporter from continuing. She asked, "Is the game over now?"

The reporter shook his head: "The battle is at a stalemate with Wandering Circus currently at a disadvantage."

Hearts seemed to have heard something interesting, and her red lips curved slightly, "Wandering Circus is at a disadvantage? Then go and take a look."

Under the siege of the frenzied audience, The Reverse God finally managed to escape with the Killer Sequence members. But when he turned around, Reverse God was filled with questions and asked loudly, "Where is Spades?"

Bai Yi pointed in a direction and said, “Not long after Hearts left, he ran away in the same direction as Hearts.”

“Why is Spades chasing Hearts?” The Reverse God became more and more confused.

Bai Yi stroked his chin and thought, “Maybe he was finally moved by Hearts and went to stop her from finding a second love?”

Bai Jiamu rolled his eyes speechlessly, “I think Spades will never be moved by Hearts even if he was beaten to death by Hearts.”

“What the hell.” The Reverse God waved his hand helplessly to interrupt the two people’s banter, “What else is there in the direction that Spades is going besides Hearts?”

Liao Ke handed the system panel to the Reverse God. “There is also Wandering Circus’s pre-season game.”

The Reverse God’s eyes flashed across the system panel and froze immediately: “Why is the Wandering Circus’s gambling pool increasing at 0% so slowly?”

Liao Ke shook his head. “The specific situation is unclear, but the Wandering Circus is currently at a disadvantage.”

“Count the points we earned from this gambling pool.” The Reverse God restrained his expression and ordered in a deep voice, “Go and see what’s going on.”

The viewing pond where Wandering Circus is located.

Wang Shun looked at the Wandering Circus’ gambling pool points growth rate on the system panel, with an anxious look on his face. “The match between Killer Sequence and the King’s Guild has ended, why hasn’t the growth rate increased?”

“It has gone up.” MuKe said coldly, “But it’s not us who have gone up, it’s the Fanatic Lambs. Their points have increased by nearly four times.”

Liu Jiayi also stared at the panel. “All the points that flowed back after the competition were eaten up by their gambling pool.”

Wang Shun frowned, “How could this happen? The results of the competition haven’t come out yet, the gap shouldn’t be so huge…”

“Someone dug up Kong Xuyang’s old account.” MuKe quickly read through the pages. “Killer Sequence won very gloriously this time. Their tactics were very impressive. The popularity of the Reverse God has risen a lot. Kong Xuyang, who had suffered a heavy defeat in the challenge match, was brought up.”

“The Fanatic Lambs members are making a big fuss about this old story, saying that Kong Xuyang is a more powerful tactician than the Reverse God, and that Reverse God was once beaten half to death by Kong Xuyang. Many viewers were lured into placing bets by this news.”

“Not only that.” Liu Jiayi scrolled down the system panel a few times, “They have made a big bet to rig the match.”

Liu Jiayi looked up at Wang Shun, “They probably thought they had a good chance of winning, so they rigged the game at the end of the big game and put a lot of points into their own gambling pool. Now they have rushed to third place in the [Points Growth Rate List].”

As he was speaking, Wang Shun looked up and saw a group of people from the Fanatic Lambs sitting opposite him waving at them with a grin. They first pointed at Bai Liu on the big screen and gave him a thumbs-up, then turned it over in contempt, turned it downward, and laughed in unison.

“A wandering hobo, loser, truly living up to the name.”

Tang Erda’s face darkened, wanting to stand up by supporting himself on his knees, but was held down by someone. Tang Erda turned around to see who could hold him down, but when he saw the person, he was shocked and exclaimed, “Reverse God?!”

The Reverse God greeted Tang Erda with a smile, “Long time no see.”

After saying this, the man shook hands with Tang Erda, nodded in a friendly manner to several stunned Wandering Circus members around him, and then very naturally called his team members to sit down on the side of Wandering Circus.

Wang Shun was stunned, “Reverse God, what are you doing…”

The Reverse God sat together with Wang Shun, shoulder to shoulder, looking at Fanatic Lambs opposite with an inexplicable dark look in his eyes, but with a smile on his face. He also extended his hands to greet the Fanatic Lambs opposite them. “Came to find Spades and watch the game; also to confirm my own prophecy."

The Fanatic Lambs member who was giving a thumbs-up sign to Wang Shun and the others was stunned by the smile of the Reverse God and slowly withdrew his hand.

For some reason, even though the Reverse God was smiling at them, they felt a chill running down their spines.

"To confirm my own… prophecy?" Wang Shun repeated in a daze.

The Reverse God showed his eight teeth and smiled brilliantly, "Of course, to confirm the prophecy that Kong Xuyang will die at the hands of the most cruel and outstanding tactician."

Wang Shun blankly had a question mark on his face, "?"

As the Killer Sequence took their seats with the Wandering Circus, not only were the members of the Wandering Circus stunned, but even the audience was dumbfounded. They stared wide-eyed at the Killer Sequence members who were quickly getting along intimately with the Wandering Circus. If you didn't look carefully, you would have thought the two guilds were one family, as they were sitting so close to each other.

Bai Yi casually hung his left hand around Tang Erda, and hung his right hand on MuKe, as if they were already familiar with each other. He looked at the big screen with excitement: "Wow, a Chinese horror game, my favorite! Which game is this?"

Bai Jiamu disclosed it expressionlessly, "The game you were so scared of that you quit immediately in the game pool, 'Yinshan Village.'"

Bai Yi: "… Our uncle-nephew relationship ends here!"

Tang Erda was trying to shake off Bai Yi who was stuck on his back uncomfortably. He sat straight and asked seriously, "What is your purpose in coming here?"

Liao Ke held a cup of tea that he got from somewhere and took a sip slowly. "Don't be so nervous, junior, we are just here to watch the game."

"Where's Spades?" Bai Yi poked his head in the audience, looking for someone. "He must have come earlier than us. Where is he?"

At this moment, Spades and Hearts met on a narrow path before entering the viewing pool.

Hearts looked at Spades quietly, with the team members of the King's Guild standing behind her.

Spades looked at Hearts in confusion. He didn't understand why this strange woman was blocking him and preventing him from entering the viewing pool.

Hearts suddenly smiled, "Spades, you still don't remember my face?"

Spades nodded honestly and asked, "Who are you?"

Qi Yifang, who was following Hearts, couldn't bear it anymore. He rushed forward angrily, wanting to say something, but Liu Ji pulled him by the clothes. He clenched his fists, turned his face away, and endured it.

Hearts was such a fascinating beauty that you would never forget her in your dreams if you only looked at her for a second in a crowd. But Spades had played two games, and he still doesn't remember her!

Moreover, Spades could remember Liu Ji, who had the most common face in the entire King's Guild, but he couldn't remember Hearts. Moreover, he had just seen them, so how could he not recognize Hearts now?

Spades was simply pretending not to know the Queen of Hearts and deliberately humiliating her because she liked him!

Thinking about how the aggressive audience just scolded Hearts for losing to Spades on purpose because of her feelings, Qi Yifang became angrier and glared at Spades fiercely!

A handsome man is a disaster!

Hearts was not like Qi Yifang, she didn't seem offended. Instead, she smiled and introduced herself calmly, "I'm Hearts, your opponent in the last game. Why do you always forget what I look like?"

Spades calmly looked at Hearts, "Because this is not your real face."

"I don't remember the false disguises presented to seduce or satisfy a certain desire, because each time is different, there is no need to remember."

After saying that, Spades walked past the suddenly silent Hearts and said flatly, "Excuse me for a moment. I need to go in and watch the game."

As Spades walked past Hearts, about to disappear into the viewing pool barrier, Hearts spoke abruptly. This time her voice was neither soft nor light, but rather dignified and serious, "There's someone like you, related to the spades symbol and the black whip, who is a very important person to me."

When Hearts turned around, her expression seemed to change, yet remained relatively the same. Her wine-red eyes carried a trace of a young girl's innocence, "Your name, and that black whip on your body, do you remember where they came from?"

Spades paused and said, "I don't remember." Then he walked into the viewing pool.

Qi Yifang carefully glanced at Hearts, who was unusually silent, and then at Spades, who was walking into the viewing pool. "Queen, are we going back?"

"No." Hearts raised her eyes, showing the same soft charming smile again with her gaze lingering at the viewing pool where Bai Liu was, "In this game, apart from Spades, there are more men who can use a whip."

"There must be one that is related to the person I'm looking for."

At the viewing pool.

Wang Shun was as anxious as an ant on a hot pot, “The growth rate of the gambling pool has really dropped to 0! Yet the growth rate of the Fanatic Lambs has increased sixfold!”

“Hey, don’t worry, don’t worry.” Reverse God calmly pushed Wang Shun down with a smile on his face, “Fanatic Lambs has invested a lot of money and is still pouring money into the gambling pool. It’s normal for it to increase five or six times.”

“But if they go up further, it will be difficult to fill the gap in popularity!” Wang Shun was so anxious that he almost sweated.

“No.” The Reverse God looked up at the big screen. Just as he was about to speak, Spades sat upright next to him and indifferently continued his words, “Trust Bai Liu. These people will vote for him.”

The Reverse God looked helplessly at Spades who suddenly appeared, “Where did you go just now?”

“I met a woman I didn’t know.” Spades said briefly, but his eyes were fixed on the big screen. “Bai Liu, he will definitely gain many followers.”

Spades’ words were so certain that even Wang Shun, who had been anxious, calmed down.

“Our gambling pool’s growth rate increased.” Mu Ke suddenly raised his head and looked at the Reverse God, “Someone has invested heavily in Bai Liu, a player in our gambling pool, with tens of millions of points. Is it you?”

The Reverse God raised his hands innocently, “No, I haven’t had the time yet.”

Mu Ke looked at Spades again, “Is it you?”

Spades didn’t pay any attention to Mu Ke who was looking at him. He was looking down to open the panel and settling points. Then, with no emotion, he chose Bai Liu, the tactician of Wandering Circus, and then made a heavy investment.

“En, now was me.” Spades turned his head to look at Mu Ke and replied lightly.

MuKe: “…”

The Reverse God held his forehead helplessly, “MuKe is asking whether you made the previous big investment of tens of millions of points. Even if you invest now, you can’t pretend to be someone else…”

“If it’s not Spades, nor Reverse God, who else has such financial resources…” Wang Shun turned his head sharply to look at Hearts, who was sitting far away in a small corner of the viewing pond, and cried out, “Queen!”

Hearts waved at Wang Shun with a radiant smile and lazily pointed at her panel.

The panel looked blurry as it was far by many seats, but from its general structure, it was clearly a pool betting panel.

“It’s Queen who invested heavily in Bai Liu!”

The continuous large bets made Wang Shun dizzy and confused. He asked in confusion, “Why did the Queen place a large stake in Bai Liu?!”

“Maybe she’s attracted to Bai Liu?” Bai Yi made a bold assumption. He stole a glance at Spades. “After all, it’s time to say goodbye to the first spring and look for the second spring. Bai Liu seems to be the type that Hearts likes. He’s strong and can use a whip.”

Spades turned his head expressionlessly and looked at Bai Yi, “She can’t fall for Bai Liu. Bai Liu and I have already…”

The Reverse God quickly covered Spades’ mouth, smiled politely, and raised his hand to indicate, “I think the key point now is that the Fanatic Lambs are chasing the position, and they are still betting.”

Two consecutive heavy investments pushed Wandering Circus directly to fourth place, and the gap with the third-ranked Fanatic Lambs was getting smaller and smaller.

The faces of the people on the Fanatic Lambs’ side have begun to turn purple, but they have already smashed the market to such an extent that there is no way they could stop. If they stop, once they fall, it will definitely backfire, and the growth rate will be reduced to its original state in an instant. They can only keep chasing the positions.

The Reverse God narrowed his eyes and beamed amiably, “What we have to do now is to keep adding small lines to the gambling pool — keep narrowing the gap with the Fanatic Lambs, but not surpassing them."

"Why can't we surpass them?" Bai Yi asked curiously.

Liu Jiayi glanced at the Reverse God and said, "In order to keep the Fanatic Lambs hanging, we'll force them to keep betting to increase their position, squeezing the entire Fanatic Lambs Guild dry. Once we surpass the Fanatic Lambs, they will not continue to add to their positions to maintain their momentum to suppress us."

The Reverse God groaned yet smiled, "It's not to squeeze them dry. I just hope they won't play this kind of heavy-handed game next time. It's not very friendly to ordinary audiences."

Next time they won't be able to play this type of heavy-handed game anymore, because the guild won't have any points. Isn't this just squeezing them dry…

Liu Jiayi turned her eyes away.

She felt that this Reverse God looked kind, but was actually quite ruthless and left no way out.

"It all depends on Bai Liu's performance." The Reverse God leaned back in his chair and looked at the big screen. "As long as Bai Liu can turn the tables, the Fanatic Lambs will not be able to hold a large position."

On the big screen, Bai Liu was pressing down on the back of Mu Sicheng's neck as he lunged towards him. With a cold expression, he stretched out his hand and let Mu Sicheng absorb his vitality.

The abnormal pale color on Mu Sicheng's face gradually faded while his struggling and roaring stopped.

Bai Liu's face turned even gaunter, and under the flickering candlelight, his blue veins were almost vivid through his skin.

Mu Sicheng came back to his senses, gasping for breath. He knelt on the ground and vomited several mouthfuls of black water with a strong fishy smell. He wiped his mouth and clenched his fists.

"… If I become a ghost, will I attack you first since I sucked your energy?" Mu Sicheng asked hoarsely, "Then you might as well…"

“En.” Bai Liu helped Mu Sicheng up and indifferently blocked Mu Sicheng’s subsequent words, “So before that, we have to find your body.”

“… My body is probably on the other side of the bridge.” Mu Sicheng looked at the paper bridge getting closer and closer, his face solemn, “But there are so many sacrificial bridge ghosts on the bridge…”

On the bridge, women in white clothes who were holding white umbrellas were getting closer and closer to them. Mu Sicheng felt a heavy chill emanating from these women.

These women were tall and slender. They walked on the bridge in a regular pattern with their backs to Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng. They walked slowly at first, but the closer Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng got, the faster these women walked.

On several occasions, Mu Sicheng even sensed several women glaring at them through their umbrellas, a mix of resentment and expectation, before leaping under the bridge with strange grins on their faces.

A fishy taste rose up in Mu Sicheng’s throat, and he felt an instinctive fear, “Didn’t you say there’s no way to deal with the sacrificial bridge ghosts? How are we going to get through?”

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng and said, “You shouldn’t be asking me this. I should be asking you.”

Mu Sicheng was confused, “Ask me?”

“Yes, because you have already crossed the bridge once.” Bai Liu said.

Mu Sicheng answered subconsciously, “You were the one who guided me and taught me how to cross the ghost bridge! You told me to hold my breath and cross the ghost bridge!”

Bai Liu shook his head slightly. “I did guess that there was a paper ghost bridge in the tomb for burial, and I told you how to cross the ghost bridge by holding your breath, but that is based on the premise that there are no sacrificial bridge ghosts. If there are sacrificial bridge ghosts, they will follow the body even if you hold your breath.”

Mu Sicheng asked, “What is following the body?”

Bai Liu explained, “When you go up the bridge, the sacrificial bridge ghost will think you are her husband. They will come to hold an umbrella for you, follow behind you, and escort you home. This is called following the body."

Mu Sicheng felt a chill on his back, "… What if she finds out later that I'm not her husband?"

Bai Liu said calmly, "If you were her real husband, she would hold an umbrella and walk down the bridge with you to go home, but if you were not, she would drag you off the bridge with resentment and hatred, and die with you on the bridge."

"… Is it possible that the bridge-sacrificing ghost has stayed on the bridge for too long and has forgotten what her husband looks like? She can't tell whether I am her husband, and thus allowing me to sneak across the bridge?" Mu Sicheng hoped for a lucky break.

Bai Liu rejected it, "It's unlikely. Ghosts recognize people by their yang energy, not their appearance. Apart from the [False Body Talisman] that can change the yang energy of living people, nothing can deceive them."

"Then how did I cross the bridge?" Mu Sicheng was also confused, "I can't remember."

"No need to remember." Bai Liu helped Mu Sicheng up and walked towards the paper bridge with a calm expression, "Let's get on the bridge first. You could cross the bridge last time, so you can do it this time."

Mu Sicheng was shocked, "Why?! Wouldn't the sacrificial bridge ghost follow our bodies?"

"Don't worry about them." Bai Liu smiled, "They won't follow us."

Mu Sicheng was full of doubt,, "Why won't it follow us? Didn't you say that any man with Yang energy will be followed?"

"Because we are not worthy of being followed." Bai Liu looked at the paper Taoist priest walking in front, "Their husbands are back."

"The real husband…" Mu Sicheng turned his head and looked at the bridge. "You mean…"

Before Mu Sicheng finished his words, the first zombie driven by the Paper Taoist jumped onto the bridge. The paper bridge shook slightly from the zombie's force. The women who were walking forward with umbrellas paused, turned around, and walked towards the bridge.

The umbrellas covered the women's faces, so their appearances could not be seen clearly. One could only see the hems of their clothes hanging on the ground being constantly kicked up by their quick steps, revealing a pair of small feet that were deformed by being wrapped, with their bones tightly wrinkled into a ball, or "three-cun (10 cm) golden lotus".

The women walked quickly to the front of the zombies, raised their umbrellas slightly, and held them up. As the zombies jumped, their little feet moved forward, their steps were silent and drifted away, and their upper bodies holding the umbrellas did not move at all.

Bai Liu watched the strange scene of women on the bridge coming over one by one to hold umbrellas for the zombies. "You said before that you vaguely remembered seeing paper figures carrying incense burners on the bridge. I guessed that you followed these paper figures to cross the bridge. Since you were able to cross the bridge successfully, and these sacrificial bridge ghosts did not follow you, that can only mean one thing."

"They followed someone else's body." Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng, "These zombies are their real husbands."

Mu Sicheng suddenly had a eureka moment and angrily said, "You knew it a long time ago, didn't you?! That's why you followed Paper Taoist directly!"

"You knew it but you didn't tell me! You think it's fun to scare me?" Mu Sicheng condemned bitterly.

Bai Liu answered honestly, "Yes, I have only scared people before but never scared ghosts. It was quite fun."

The ghost Mu Sicheng: "…"

Yinshan Village

After a moment of helpless rage, Mu Sicheng reluctantly gave in to Bai Liu's twisted sense of humor.

What else could he do? If Bai Liu hadn't told him, he wouldn't have even realized he was being played. So be it.

Mu Sicheng dragged Bai Liu along and followed closely behind the Paper Taoist. Not far ahead, seven women holding umbrellas walked side by side with seven zombies, moving forward in eerie unison.

Even with a paper Taoist priest standing between them, the sight sent shivers down Mu Sicheng's spine. He couldn't shake the fear that one of them might suddenly turn around.

Halfway across the bridge, he couldn't bear to look at the unsettling scene any longer. He took two deep breaths and turned his gaze to Bai Liu beside him.

Bai Liu held his breath, his expression calm as he walked forward without glancing around. Seeing Bai Liu so composed, Mu Sicheng felt an inexplicable sense of relief.

Just as he was about to look away, he suddenly caught sight of a pale, dripping hand emerging from the water beneath the bridge behind them. The hand braced itself on the bridge's edge, then began to climb.

A moment later, the figure of a woman in white pulled herself onto the bridge. Her hair, soaked and heavy, clung to her face as water dripped from her body. Her shoulders twisted unnaturally from side to side, her movements eerily distorted, as if her bones were rotating freely in their sockets to support her body.

Slowly, she rose to her feet, her umbrella tilting forward to conceal the upper half of her face.

Despite taking small, mincing steps, her toes pointed unnervingly upward as she rushed forward. In the blink of an eye, she was directly behind Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng. A bone-chilling cold radiated from her, freezing them in place.

She took another two steps before leaning against Bai Liu's shoulder.

Mu Sicheng saw it clearly—when she drew close, the lower half of her face curled into a grotesque smile. Her slightly parted lips were filled with black mud and tangled water plants, which oozed from her mouth, turning into filthy sewage that dribbled down her chin.

Mu Sicheng was so startled that he instinctively tightened his grip on Bai Liu's wrist. The oppressive aura from the woman behind them made him too afraid to speak.

Bai Liu halted, unmoving. The woman pressed against his shoulder, her head lowered, equally motionless.

Droplets of water dripped from her soaked hair, sliding down to Bai Liu's neck. The chill emanating from her body intensified, a frost-like mist forming with each breath Bai Liu exhaled.

Mu Sicheng stood stiffly, his gaze locked ahead. He watched as the Paper Taoist continued shaking his bell, moving farther away. Yet, he didn't dare to follow.

His instincts screamed at him—if he and Bai Liu bolted off the bridge now, Bai Liu would be seized by the sacrificial bridge ghost and drowned.

There were supposed to be only seven ghosts who had died on this bridge. As long as they followed the Paper Taoist, the seven zombies would be enough for them to cross safely. Mu Sicheng himself had already done so once.

So why—when it was Bai Liu's turn—had an extra ghost crawled out from beneath the bridge?!

Mu Sicheng discreetly rolled his eyes before sneaking a glance at the woman clinging to Bai Liu. Just as he shifted his gaze, she slowly tilted her umbrella toward Bai Liu.

The lower half of her face was strikingly well-defined, her skin ghastly pale, lips curled into a haunting smile. Black mud oozed ceaselessly from her mouth and nose. Her fingers, clutching the umbrella, were caked with dirt—evidence of her desperate struggle, clawing and choking at the bottom of the river before she drowned.

Then, the upper half of her face was revealed—

Mu Sicheng gasped.

The woman's upper face was gone. Her skull had been crushed so violently that most of it had caved in. What remained was a jagged cross-section just above the bridge of her nose. The exposed white bone, riddled with holes, was packed with sand and mud, which seeped down her ruined face like a funnel—spilling from her mouth and nostrils in thick, black sludge. The filth stained Bai Liu's pristine white shirt.

Yet even as he came face-to-face with the half-headed sacrificial bridge ghost, Bai Liu remained unmoved. Calmly, he continued walking toward the bridgehead, the woman still leaning against his shoulder.

Mu Sicheng watched in disbelief, frustration bubbling up inside him. He wanted to shout a warning but bit his tongue, afraid of drawing attention from the ghosts and zombies both ahead and behind them. Instead, he frantically gestured at Bai Liu, mouthing his words:

"You'll be dragged off the bridge if you reach the bridgehead!"

Mu Sicheng was trembling. His stomach twisted when he glanced at the ghost girl's disfigured face.

"If she pulls you off the bridge and your head hits the pier, you'll die like her!"

Mu Sicheng himself wasn't alive. He had no real body—falling off the bridge wouldn't matter for him. But Bai Liu was still living. If he died here, he would truly die.

Teeth clenched, Mu Sicheng made a decision. He reached out to grab the woman beside Bai Liu.

But before he could touch her, Bai Liu swiftly caught his wrist. Without a word, Bai Liu lifted the woman's umbrella, tilting it slightly to reveal the underside.

A brand-new yellow talisman was pasted inside the canopy.

The words "Body Binding Talisman" were written across it.

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened. "Who put that there?"

At the Other End

"Brother Kong, you're really thorough." Yang Zhi adjusted the flashlight on his head and sighed. "Honestly, I thought Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng would die the moment they entered this tomb. But you still went ahead and set up all these talismans and traps at every key point…"

Kong Xuyang shot him a glance. "What do you know? Winning without a fight isn't a good show. If they die because of the tomb's mechanisms, does that even count as me defeating them?"

He sneered. "That would mean the game itself killed them, not me. And if that happens, how am I supposed to steal Bai Liu's audience and get his supporters to switch to me?"

"Bai Liu must die." Kong Xuyang's eyes darkened. "And he must die by my hands. Only with this victory can I enter the top 100 in popularity and earn the gold medal of immunity from death."

"Otherwise, when we face Russell Cemetery later…"

At the mention of that name, Kong Xuyang's face twitched, his expression turning even grimmer. "That guild is unsettling. They might have someone who can counter our abilities. And they don't care about dying. Without the gold medal of immunity, beating them would be nearly impossible."

Yang Zhi chuckled. "That's why you're the one who thinks ahead, Brother Kong. I wouldn't have even thought of using the [Body-Binding Talisman] on one of the sacrificial bridge ghosts while crossing the ghost bridge. Trapping her there instead of letting her cross with us was genius."

"You've completely blocked Bai Liu's escape route."

Kong Xuyang smirked, a trace of pride in his eyes.

"There's another way across the bridge aside from using the [False Body Talisman] like we did—you can follow the Paper Taoist. That thing leads the seven zombie husbands of the sacrificial bridge ghosts across. Since the bridge can only hold seven sacrificial ghosts at most, once each ghost finds her husband, they stop chasing the living. That's how people can safely cross."

"So, when I crossed, I used the [Binding Talisman] to trap a ghost beneath the bridge—a woman who had sacrificed herself. That created an eighth sacrificial bridge ghost."

"This extra ghost will search for her husband among the other seven. And just as he's about to leave the bridge, she'll climb up." Kong Xuyang's lips curled into a cruel smile. "No matter what Bai Liu tries, he'll have to face the ghost I prepared just for him."

"He'll be dragged off the bridge," he said with satisfaction, "and there won't be much left of his head."

Bai Liu walked at an unhurried pace, and the woman beside him, holding an umbrella over his head, followed in step.

But the closer they got to the bridge, the more her expression changed. At first, she had a soft smile. Then her lips pressed into a firm line. Now, the corners of her mouth turned downward in an unmistakable frown.

She tilted her head slightly, turning toward Bai Liu, as if looking directly at him.

It was as if she had realized—Bai Liu wasn't her husband.

Resentment twisted her expression into something dark and menacing.

The umbrella, which had only covered Bai Liu's head at first, slowly tilted, as if trying to envelop his entire body.

As it did, deep crimson stains spread across the fabric—dark splashes, like the blood left behind when someone jumps off a bridge, clutching an umbrella.

A rancid stench of corpses, water, and blood filled the air.

Bai Liu, undeterred, peeked out from under the umbrella and mouthed to Mu Sicheng: Wait. Listen to my plan.

Before he could finish, the woman's face suddenly appeared behind him, her lips brushing against his ear. Her mouth moved rapidly, as if whispering, but no words came out—only a sharp, unsettling clicking sound, like the grinding of disjointed bones.

She spoke faster and faster. The chattering of her joints sent chills down the spine. Even with only half of her face visible, the sheer hatred twisting her features was unmistakable.

Mud, dirt, and blood seeped from between her lips.

Bai Liu calmly pulled his head back under the umbrella.

For a moment, the clicking stopped.

Then Mu Sicheng, from outside the umbrella, saw the woman's shadow pressing against Bai Liu's ear. Her jaw unhinged—slowly, impossibly wide—before snapping open with a hideous, frenzied clack-clack-clack.

Mu Sicheng—who had already experienced the terror of a sacrificial bridge ghost attaching itself to his body—felt a cold sweat break out.

But Bai Liu wasn't a ghost. He was human.

How the hell was he going to get out of this?

The Paper Taoist continued leading the zombies and bridge ghosts forward, one by one. Mu Sicheng's eyes flickered ahead. The bridgehead was right there!

But the shadow under the umbrella—it was changing.

At first, the woman's silhouette only showed half a head. But as they neared the bridgehead, Mu Sicheng watched, horrified, as it twisted and grew.

The blood on the umbrella began to peel away, floating toward the shadow.

The shadow absorbed the blood. It quivered. Then it shifted—shaping itself into the upper half of a face.

Mu Sicheng's stomach dropped.

That wasn't blood at all. It was fragments of flesh, splintered bone, and brain matter—pieces of the woman's shattered skull from when she had jumped.

These fragments had been stuck to the umbrella's fabric.

And now, as they approached the bridgehead, they were returning to her.

As if time itself was reversing.

The woman's face, torn apart in death, was being restored. Piece by piece.

The sacrificial bridge ghost always repeated the cycle of her death.

Her journey from beneath the bridge to the bridge itself reflected her corpse's state after death.

But walking from the bridge to the bridgehead—that was the moment before her fall.

And in this moment, she was regaining the appearance she had in life.

Finally, standing before Bai Liu, she was whole again.

Her pale face bore a melancholic expression while she held the umbrella for Bai Liu with hazy eyes. The clicking sound of her joints turned into a faint female voice, “You are not him.”

The next moment, the woman turned her head to look at the other side of the bridge, then returned her gaze to Bai Liu. Her expression was chilling, “I’ve waited for so many people, but none of them were him.”

The bridgehead was right in front of them.

The woman’s feet paused, and she looked towards the bridge with red eyes. Her body was soaked with muddy river water, dripping down her clothes. The umbrella turned inward and pulled Bai Liu towards the bridge as if she was ready to jump off the bridge with him at any time.

Mu Sicheng finally couldn’t bear it anymore, so he tried to pull Bai Liu out.

Bai Liu took the initiative to get out of the umbrella and coldly ordered, “Jump!”

Mu Sicheng was stunned for a moment but soon realized that Bai Liu wanted him to jump into the river. He looked at the river’s surface in horror and disbelief.

Many corpses were floating on the river with their faces facing down and dressed in white with their hair disheveled. It seemed that these corpses had heard Bai Liu’s words and slowly turned over, revealing a swollen and rotten face, smiling at them with their mouths wide open.

Fuck, there are so many dead bodies under the bridge, wouldn’t it be suicide to jump down?!

Before Mu Sicheng had time to prepare himself mentally, Bai Liu grabbed his hand and jumped down without hesitation.

Mu Sicheng and the ghost who died on the bridge were both stunned for a few seconds. They probably didn’t expect Bai Liu to be so self-aware that he would jump into the river before she dragged him down.

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng fell into the dark, fishy water, which poured into Mu Sicheng's mouth and nose. As a conditioned reflex, he choked and coughed a few times. Behind him came the heartbreaking cry of a woman, "… Give it back to me!"

Mu Sicheng was so panicked by the roar that he took the time to look back. He was shocked to find that Bai Liu had snatched the umbrella of the sacrificial bridge ghost before jumping off the bridge!

The woman had no umbrella in her hand. She was wearing white clothes, her eyes dripping with blood and tears. She looked at Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng who jumped into the river with extreme resentment, then turned around and jumped towards the bridge pier without hesitation.

Flesh and blood flew everywhere, bones shattered, and the woman hit the bridge pier violently then her face returned to its bloody incomplete appearance. She opened her huge black mouth filled with mud and sand before chasing after Bai Liu in the water with an extremely ferocious look.

At this moment, it was not only her, but all of the floating corpses in the water were like sharks that smelled blood. Their swollen and eroded bodies were swimming strangely as they rushed towards Bai Liu from underwater!

"Fuck!" Mu Sicheng turned his head and swam forward holding Bai Liu's wrist, "Run!"

"Don't run. You can't get away." Bai Liu threaded through the water, his head floating on the surface, looking at the two banks of the river with a pale face, "There are things guarding the shore. We can't get up even if we run."

Mu Sicheng looked towards the shore.

The Paper Taoist rang the golden bell, driving the zombies and the sacrificial bridge ghosts who held umbrellas for them off the bridge. Then the zombies jumped and landed on the other side of the river.

The Paper Taoist put a talisman on the foreheads of the zombies that were standing still, before walking away shaking its head while ringing a bell.

As the Paper Taoist walked, it came to the entrance of the main tomb chamber opposite the bridge. It was as if a spark from a distance fell on its body and it suddenly caught fire.

A raging fire burned on its body, and in a few breaths, this lifelike paper man turned into smoke and disappeared.

At this moment, under the faint light of the Paper Taoist's burning fire, Mu Sicheng saw many burly and motionless zombie corpses hidden in the darkness on the other side of the bridge.

These zombies all looked like middle-aged men, with a yellow talisman of suppression stuck on their heads. They stood unmoving at the riverside at a certain distance with sacrificial bridge ghosts standing next to them, holding umbrellas to shield their faces.

They seemed to have been specially arranged like this to guard the tomb. There were some bones and backpacks under their feet, as well as some corpses with as well as some corpses with their eyes open, still bearing grievances from life, and not yet completely decayed.

These corpses had their mouths wide open in fear, their faces were black, and there were two huge bloody holes in their necks.

Judging from their clothes, these corpses should be passers-by of Yinshan Village, somehow entering the tomb by mistake. Upon encountering the sacrificial bridge ghosts, they jumped into the river in fear and tried to escape. As a result, they tried to escape death by reaching the shore, but before they could even breathe a sigh of relief, they were bitten to death by the zombies guarding the shore.

Under the bright orange-yellow flames of the Paper Taoist burning, the zombies did not move but looked ferocious. Their three white eyes rolled as they stared at the Bai Liu floating on the river; their expression revealing dried yellow bloodstains on their fangs.

We can't get to this shore anymore!

What about turning back? Go up from the bridge first and avoid this disaster!

Mu Sicheng dragged Bai Liu and swam frantically while turning to look at the other side of the bridge. He widened his eyes in shock, "Why is the way that we came from gone?!"

On the other side of the bridge was an illusionary darkness. They could not see any real scene or the path they came. They could only see specks of blue-green ghost fires hovering around. In the distance, they left the darkness, floating towards the bridge and turning into paper figures of ghosts.

Bai Liu choked twice when he fell into the water, making his face more pallid, “There is no turning back in the underworld, don’t even think about going back,” he retorted, “We can’t go ashore, and we can’t turn back, so where should we go now?”

After speaking, he looked back at the floating corpses that were chasing him and cursed angrily, “These ghost things swim pretty fast.”

Bai Liu breathed in Yin energy and choked on the Yin water. As a living person, his Yang energy was greatly reduced and he felt much weaker. After entering the water, he was completely supported by Mu Sicheng as he swam downstream while holding his shoulders.

Fortunately, Mu Sicheng was in good physical condition and Bai Liu was not heavy, so Mu Sicheng was still able to swim very fast while dragging him for a long distance. But even so, the floating corpses behind them were getting closer and closer.

Bai Liu adjusted his breathing, raised his wet eyelashes, and looked at the bridge, “Let’s swim around and go back under the bridge.”

Mu Sicheng was stunned, “HA??!”

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng and said, “With your speed, you should be able to lead these floating corpses around and swim back to the bridge.”

Mu Sicheng asked from the bottom of his heart, “No, we just risked our lives to jump off the bridge, why do we have to go back under the bridge?!”

There are so many ghosts on the bridge. If Bai Liu goes back now, he’d be courting death!

Bai Liu’s choice was so bizarre that Mu Sicheng was utterly stunned. But before he could say anything, the floating corpse behind him suddenly caught up.

Mu Sicheng felt his feet step on the slippery back of a body covered with cloth.

Several pale faces of drowned people vaguely emerged under the swaying water around them. Then, Bai Liu, who was held up by Mu Sicheng, suddenly sank, as if something grabbed his ankle and dragged him down.

“Fuck!” Mu Sicheng cursed angrily and leaned back, exerting force with his arms then kicked and pulled at the thing pulling at Bai Liu’s calves before pulling Bai Liu out of the water.

Bai Liu returned to the surface of the water. His complexion was even paler than before, his eyes were closed, and his wet hair stuck to his forehead with water droplets sliding down.

“Bai Liu!” Mu Sicheng swam while roaring and shaking Bai Liu wildly. He even slapped Bai Liu in the face, but Bai Liu still didn’t wake up.

Mu Sicheng’s palm was scratched by something. He paused, then slowly looked at Bai Liu’s sickly lips.

Two blue fangs were exposed at the corners of Bai Liu’s lips as if they had not been properly kept. It was this thing that had scratched Mu Sicheng’s palm just now.

[A living person without vitality is a walking corpse. If you absorb too much vitality, I will probably become a walking corpse or a zombie.]

“Fuck you!!!” Mu Sicheng completely collapsed. “Bai Liu, didn’t you say you knew your limits and wouldn’t let me suck your yang energy to this extent? Didn’t you fucking say you were still a young and strong man and could have your yang energy sucked away for more than an hour?!”

“It’s only been a short time! You are so incompetent!”

Now he didn’t know when Bai Liu would wake up, and he didn’t know what to do. He could only try to do what Bai Liu told him before he fell unconscious!

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and pushed Bai Liu’s legs quickly, starting to circle around with the floating corpses behind him. The corpses floated up and down in the water, and from time to time a pair of eyes appeared on the water’s surface, staring at Bai Liu with a greedy, ghostly gaze, like a crocodile on the hunt.

In the later stage of the dragging, Mu Sicheng’s hands began to feel sore and weak. He looked up at the bridge in front of him with his teeth gritted and pushed forward with all his might, pushing Bai Liu under the bridge.

The floating corpses behind him were left trailing at a distance and would not catch up with him for the time being, but Mu Sicheng did not dare to relax at all, because these things would catch up with him sooner or later!

The question is, what the hell is he supposed to do now?! Bai Liu didn't tell him what to do after he got under the bridge!

Mu Sicheng hung Bai Liu's collar on a bridge hook so that Bai Liu was suspended out of the water and could breathe smoothly. Then he turned around and guarded Bai Liu wholeheartedly.

He was extremely panicked, but still tried to remain calm, turning around and standing in front of Bai Liu. He took a deep breath and looked at the floating corpses in white that were getting closer and closer.

Bai Liu was a very methodical person. Bai Liu knew that he was going to turn into a zombie, so he would definitely give him some hints on how to wake up or deal with the zombies before that!

Mu Sicheng's mind was working so quickly that he felt he had never thought so fast in his life.

Bai Liu said that zombies drink blood and worship the moon to survive, meaning human blood can stimulate zombies!

But there are dead bodies everywhere, including Mu Sicheng himself. Where can we get human blood?!

Mu Sicheng was thinking so hard that he was dizzy, but still couldn't figure out how to wake Bai Liu up. Unfortunately, the floating corpses had already swam over. Mu Sicheng collected his thoughts and looked over with a brutal look.

He himself is now a ghost and has a natural advantage over dead creatures with strong yin energy like floating corpses, which is that he is not afraid of death.

He kicked away the floating corpses in white one by one and kicked away a pair of them one by one. Mu Sicheng was so angry that he broke the necks of several floating corpses that approached him with red eyes, throwing their heads onto the shore.

Go ashore and look for it yourself, damn ghost thing!

This group of floating corpses will not die after their heads are twisted off, but losing their heads will make them lose their direction. Hence, they would go look for their heads, prolonging the time it takes them to return and fight Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng was out of breath as he fought, but as the fight continued, he gradually discovered that his hands and feet began to rotate and deform. His facial features also gradually disappeared.

He had begun turning into a ghost after being affected by the yin energy emitting from the corpses.

Yinshan Village

Mu Sicheng's head became increasingly dizzy, and everything in front of his eyes began to double.

Another floating corpse swerved around, approaching Bai Liu. Mu Sicheng subconsciously aimed to slap it, but the floating corpse dodged, resulting in the slap landing on Bai Liu's face. Bai Liu tilted his head down a little, his lip sliced by his fangs.

A line of blood oozed out from the corner of his mouth, dripped onto his fangs, and melted into Bai Liu's lips.

Mu Sicheng persisted in struggling with these stubborn floating corpses. His face seemed to be covered with a thick layer of plaster putty, and even his facial features could not be seen. His hands and feet were turned over, with his wrists and elbows facing inwards.

The greasy white bodies of the corpses floating on the water's surface piled up in front of Mu Sicheng. The corpses under the water swayed and tugged at Mu Sicheng's ankles. Some of the floating corpses took the opportunity to bypass Mu Sicheng and snuck towards Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, who was hanging under the bridge, was yanked by several floating corpses that slipped past, and his shirt was almost torn.

The blood on Bai Liu's lips dripped into the water, and he slowly opened his eyes.

Mu Sicheng was still being dragged below with only half of his head exposed above the water. He was suddenly grabbed by the collar and pulled to the side. An intense golden light exploded from behind him, covering all the floating corpses and the woman in white in front of him.

The golden light was so bright and dazzling that people dared not look directly at it. Mu Sicheng, who was pulled aside, felt as if he was being sucked in.

Bai Liu opened a tattered umbrella and stood in front of Mu Sicheng. Golden light burst out from inside the umbrella, trapping the floating corpses and sacrificial bridge ghosts during the chase. The floating corpses and the ghosts contorted their faces revealing hideous expressions. They stretched out their limbs and struggled miserably, trying to get out of the white paper umbrella. But they were like small pieces of iron attracted by a magnet, firmly fixed in Bai Liu's open umbrella, unable to move.

Bai Liu hung the umbrella on the hook under the bridge, circled around the floating corpses and ghosts under the water, and then floated out. With a pale face, he stretched out his wrist to let Mu Sicheng suck some vitality, who was dumbfoundedly standing by.

After Mu Sicheng recovered his facial features, Bai Liu immediately gave a calm order, "Take me to the bridge and run. We will be safe once we get off the bridge."

Upon hearing this, Mu Sicheng climbed onto the bridge. After getting on, he quickly turned around and pulled Bai Liu up by his arms; he held Bai Liu's shoulder and ran off the bridge without looking back.

However, he heard the sound of small feet chasing behind him. Mu Sicheng turned around and saw the woman with half her face missing running after them with a resentful look. Her mouth was huge, and her upper and lower teeth clicked as if she were talking. Through her mouth, he could see the mud and sand in it, along with the rotten bones on the back of her neck.

Mu Sicheng raised his voice, "She's chasing us!"

"Don't look back." Bai Liu, laid on Mu Sicheng's shoulder, reminding him softly. He looked very haggard, but his tone still held composure, "She can't chase down the bridge."

Bai Liu's calmness set Mu Sicheng more at ease. Mu Sicheng used up almost all his strength and ran down the bridge half-carrying Bai Liu on his back. He sprinted all the way to the entrance of the main tomb chamber before he dared to put Bai Liu down from his shoulders. He then collapsed and sat on the ground, gasping for breath.

Although logically speaking, Mu Sicheng was already a ghost and didn't need to breathe, the intense situation just now still triggered his physiological reactions as a human being.

Mu Sicheng propped himself up with his hands on the ground, looking up with his chest heaving violently. His eyes were unfocused as he asked, "… They didn't chase after us?"

Bai Liu leaned against the dirt wall and looked towards the other side of the bridge, "They didn't."

The sacrificial bridge ghost was wandering back and forth on the bridge in white clothes. From afar, the upper half of her face had grown back and she seemed to be staring at Bai Liu. But after a while, she turned around quietly and walked towards the bridge step by step in a graceful manner before spreading her arms and then jumping down.

The spreading darkness gradually swallowed up the bridge. All that could be seen was some floating green fluorescence and the sound of sad women sobbing,

“Why haven’t you returned yet? I’ve been left alone watching the bridge day and night…”

Mu Sicheng finally breathed a sigh of relief, and said in a trance, “It’s finally quiet.”

“How do you know they won’t chase us off the bridge?” Mu Sicheng recovered and turned to ask Bai Liu curiously, “And that umbrella, why did it suddenly emit golden light?”

Bai Liu propped himself up, dusted off his hands, and looked down at Mu Sicheng who was still sitting on the ground, “Do you remember when I showed you the yellow talisman stuck inside the umbrella?”

Mu Sicheng thought for a moment and said, “I remember.”

“That talisman is called the [Binding Talisman], and its function is to trap ghosts in the place where they died tragically. It can be said to be a formation to trap evil spirits, and it is one of the Maoshan orthodox techniques.”

“The effect of this talisman is mentioned in my Maoshan Evil Art Handbook, but there is no drawing method for this spell. Using this talisman on the sacrificial bridge ghost on this bridge is obviously to prevent people from crossing the bridge. It is to kill us two who have mistakenly entered the tomb.”

Mu Sicheng asked cautiously, “Do you know who?”

“This talisman is very new, and it was drawn no more than a day ago.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes, “If there are no other strangers in Yinshan Village, then it is most likely that Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi made it.”

Mu Sicheng cursed, “Those two fucking bitches.”

“But it’s not entirely a bad thing that they are willing to draw talismans to backstab us.” Bai Liu slowly pulled out a wet but still intact talisman from his sleeve. It was the [Binding Talisman].

Bai Liu smiled and said, “We are just in need of orthodox talismans.”

Mu Sicheng was shocked and exclaimed, “You tore the talisman off the umbrella!”

“Well, because there was more than one talisman in the umbrella, Kong Xuyang seemed to have pasted three talismans inside the umbrella of the sacrificial bridge ghost to ensure that his plan would not go wrong and that the person crossing the bridge would be trapped.” Bai Liu put away the talismans and looked at Mu Sicheng. “I tore off one, pasted one on the sacrificial bridge ghost, and left the other in the umbrella.”

Mu Sicheng finally reacted, “Those floating corpses died in the river under the bridge. So you had me go back to the bridge, and then shine the umbrella with the [Binding Talisman] on them because the talisman will trap them at the place where they died!”

Bai Liu nodded, “That indeed was my plan, but there was a little accident during the execution.”

Mu Sicheng noticed the two small fangs on Bai Liu’s lips, and stood up angrily, pointing at Bai Liu before scolding, “You call this a small accident! You fucking fainted! You almost turned into a zombie! Your plan almost turned us all into ghosts, okay?!”

Bai Liu sighed regretfully, “How could I know that you were so useless? I got the umbrella to clear the ghost bridge. I also told you the route to get under the bridge. All you had to do was open the umbrella.”

“But you actually went to fight these floating corpses.” Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng quietly, then retracted his gaze and shook his head gently, “… Forget it, I can’t blame you. I was also wrong to choose you as a teammate.”

Mu Sicheng, “…”

… After Bai Liu said this, it seemed like it was really his fault from the beginning to the end…

How could he be so stupid? Yes, why didn’t he think of opening the umbrella at that time?!

Mu Sicheng began to reflect seriously and painfully on his own stupidity and mistakes, his head even drooping listlessly.

Bai Liu, who had kept his plan to himself, lost consciousness halfway through and then shifted the blame onto his teammate afterward. He glanced at Mu Sicheng calmly, patted his shoulder with an air of tolerance, and said, “It’s okay, just pay attention next time. Let’s go.”

Mu Sicheng glanced at Bai Liu’s sharp teeth sticking out of his lips and felt more and more guilty. He asked awkwardly, “… Are your zombie fangs okay?”

“They’re okay.” Bai Liu waved his hand to indicate it was not a big problem. “Real zombies have teeth that are more than an inch long. At most, I just have too much Yin energy.”

Mu Sicheng frowned and inquired, “Is it just too much Yin energy? Then why couldn’t you wake up before?”

“The Yin energy, Yin Water, and the Underworld Bridge had a great impact on a living person like me, causing my consciousness to become blurred for a while.” Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng, “I may also fall into this state of blurred consciousness later, but there is a way to wake me up.”

Mu Sicheng listened carefully, “What way?”

Bai Liu touched the blood stain on his fangs and said, “It’s this, human blood, Sucking human blood can wake me up.”

Mu Sicheng was stunned, “This tomb is full of ghosts from the underworld, where does the blood of living people come from…”

“I am.” Bai Liu smiled. “Although I have a lot of Yin energy, I am still a living person. My blood is useful. You hit my teeth before and made me bleed. I will wake up by myself when I taste it.”

Mu Sicheng was silent for a while, “Thanks, brother.”

He knew that Bai Liu did this just to save his life.

Bai Liu smiled and said, “I have always felt that your life should have been mine for a long time. It’s natural for me to protect my things. No need to thank me.”

As they talked, they walked toward the main tomb chamber. Soon, they arrived at the place where the Paper Taoist had burned before. There were ashes on the ground. They took another step inside, into the passage of the main tomb.

The passage was extremely dark with no light to be seen, but one could smell a nauseatingly strong scent of incense, candles, and ointments, mixed with the greasy sweet aroma of rotten fruits and wedding candies.

Moreover, unlike the coldness of the ghost bridge before, the closer Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng got to the main tomb, the higher the temperature became. Heat waves surged from inside, the scent of rotten fruits and wedding candies became fresh, and the smell of incense, candles, and ointments became pleasant.

Faintly there could be the sounds of clinking wine cups, people congratulating each other, footsteps of people coming and going, and the scolding of playful children. These sounds were transmitted through the tomb passage and turned into extremely long and ethereal echoes, changing the atmosphere from joyous to eerie.

“It’s very lively inside this tomb.” Bai Liu looked towards the main tomb passage as if he had realized something, “It sounds like a big banquet is being held.”

Mu Sicheng rubbed his arms, and he got goosebumps all over his body, “Are there not a lot of ghosts in here?”

“Not sure if it’s a lot.” Bai Liu’s eyes were calm, “Either way, it’s not little, otherwise there wouldn’t be a feast.”

He walked inside, stepping over the ashes of the burning paper Taoist priest, and into the main tomb passage.

The dark passage suddenly lit up with red lanterns from the outside to the inside. On the red lanterns, a “囍” character was pasted in white. They were hung from the outside all the way to the inside where Bai Liu couldn’t see. The bright red light shining through the lanterns made the passage seem like it was bleeding.

The originally vague sound in the tomb passage suddenly became clear and sharp, “A guest has come to congratulate us!”

Yinshan Village

Red lanterns were hung on the inner wall of the low tomb passage, swaying left and right with the hot humid wind blowing out from inside. The bright scarlet light swayed back and forth on the damp wall with the lanterns, casting many shadows of different heights on the wall, just like a shadow play.

The shadows moved stiffly and they stretched their heads and ears to each other as if they were talking. They made the distant and blurry sounds of words and footsteps Bai Liu had just heard. As the light swayed and changed their positions, they walked into the main tomb chamber.

On both sides of the main tomb chamber entrance, illuminated by lanterns, stood two shadows, bending respectfully, one on the left and one on the right, as if welcoming guests. The dark eyes of these two shadows were empty, yet within the shadows' faces, something shifted and swirled as if looking at the people, or shadows at the entrance.

The shadow's lips slowly opened, and the strange strident voice came out from the wall again,

"Two guests are here to congratulate us. Please enter the main hall!"

There were many shadows on the wall, but there was no one in the tomb passage. There was only dim red light swaying. Between the light and darkness, the shadows kept changing their shapes and movements. They were moving inside, becoming clearer and clearer on the wall.

After being urged twice by the two welcoming shadows at the entrance, Bai Liu still did not move. Their eyes, which were smiling in crescent shapes, rose and then sank. Their originally laughing mouths also disappeared, leaving only two red hole-like eyes staring at Bai Liu.

The shadow's foot, which was originally standing on the wall, sank halfway and bent strangely to the ground, getting closer and closer to where Bai Liu was standing. It urged for the third time in a shrill voice,

"Two guests, please come in."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and walked inside with Mu Sicheng following closely behind.

The two shadows guarding the entrance clasped their hands, bent their bodies, and turned their eyes to watch Bai Liu enter the tomb passage. A huge arc slowly opened at their mouths, “Distinguished guests have arrived, host and guests welcome the visitors!”

As soon as Bai Liu walked into the tomb passage, the shadows on both sides of the passage stopped their steps and noisy conversations instantly. These shadows stilled and silently stared at Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng who came in with their eyes reflecting red light.

These shadows were of different sizes and shapes. There was a woman with a bun holding a little girl with two braids, a hunchbacked old man with a cane, and a middle-aged man in a short jacket. They all stood silently on the wall, staring at Bai Liu as he slowly walked towards the main tomb chamber.

Mu Sicheng’s scalp tingled. He moved closer to Bai Liu and asked in a low voice, “What are these shadows? Didn’t you say that only living people have shadows in the underworld?”

“Living people can cast shadows in the underworld, but they are also not the only ones who can cast shadows in the underworld.” Bai Liu walked towards the main tomb chamber without looking around.

“A shadow is an image formed by the gathering of a person’s three souls and seven spirits then imprinted on a physical object by light. The essence of a shadow is the same as our reflection in a mirror. Therefore, both folk and Taoist sayings say that ghosts have no shadows and cannot imprint on mirrors, because ghosts’ three souls and seven spirits are incomplete.”

“Things with form but no shadow are transformed into souls, and things with shadow but no form are transformed into spirits.”

Bai Liu glanced at the shadows on the wall and said, “These shadows should be the spirits of the people from Yinshan Village who died but are trapped here forever and cannot be reborn.”

Mu Sicheng looked around at the shadows and shuddered, “… So these shadows are just spirits. Compared to the sacrificial bridge ghosts transformed into souls outside, they are not as harmful, right?”

Bai Liu retracted his gaze, “The Maoshan Sorcery describes that a person’s soul is good but the spirit is evil, a person’s soul is intelligent but the spirit is ignorant… If the soul is there, the person exists; if the soul is gone, then he is not the same person.”

“The moving corpses and shadows of the world are all caused by the souls. Only those who have the Tao can control the souls.”

Mu Sicheng swallowed his saliva, “… What do you mean by that?”

Bai Liu explained simply, “It means that the soul is kind and the spirit is evil. The soul is intelligent, and the spirit is ignorant.”

“As long as the soul is there, the ghost can still be called a human being. But once the soul completely dissipates, the ghost will not even have a trace of humanity. The most powerful ghosts in this world are all spirits. Only people with profound Taoism can punish spirits.”

Mu Sicheng couldn’t help but complain, “No way?! Those sacrificial bridge ghost souls outside can be considered kind and humane?!”

Bai Liu calmly replied, “Compared to spirits, they are.”

The red light of the lanterns in the tomb passage became brighter and brighter. At some point, Mu Sicheng discovered that the shadows on both sides began to move slowly. Their eyes illuminated by the red light stared at Bai Liu without moving, their steps ethereal and unreal.

The shadows’ mouths were split into red cracks of varying sizes, and they whispered to each other. The sound of their voices was very vague as if they were listening to the whispers of their neighbors through a wall, secretive and noisy.

Mu Sicheng couldn’t hear clearly what they were saying, but it was definitely not good, because the look these shadows gave them made Mu Sicheng feel a lingering malice.

Just as Mu Sicheng felt a chill on the back of his neck as he watched these shadows, he frowned and asked absentmindedly, “Are these shadows getting shorter and shorter?”

Bai Liu pulled Mu Sicheng and had him walk right behind him.

“Watch your step.” Bai Liu faintly reminded, “These souls are trapped in the wall as shadows. Although they’re not attacking us now, their shadows can touch our shadows; however, they shouldn’t be able to break away from the wall and actively attack us.

Mu Sicheng subconsciously lowered his head and was horrified to find that at some point, the feet of these shadows had slowly slid down the wall to the ground, and were getting closer and closer to their shadows.

No wonder he just saw these shadows getting shorter and shorter!!

The shadows on the wall appeared to understand that their approaching conspiracy had been discovered, and they all grinned. Almost identical smiling faces and red mouths appeared in different silhouettes of men, women, young and old, and at the same time, laughter in different voices came from the wall.

Mu Sicheng was so frightened that he immediately started marching in a straight line behind Bai Liu, trying to keep his shadow in the center and away from these spirits.

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng's shadow on the ground with the corner of his eye. It was so faint that it was almost invisible.

The absence of a shadow meant that Mu Sicheng's soul was almost separated from his body, which is why he cannot cast a shadow.

The Mu Sicheng here has humanity but no shadow, so he was the soul. The thing left in Mu Sicheng's body is, needless to say, the spirit.

The spirit has no humanity, only evil.

Things became a little bit troublesome. Only orthodox Taoist techniques could subdue the soul, but Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng had no orthodox techniques, only unorthodox ones.

They could only take one step at a time and see what happens.

Bai Liu walked to the end of the tomb passage and pushed open a narrow, faded red double wooden door.

The shadows on the wall looked at Bai Liu with an avaricious look that made one's scalp tingle. They complimented each other and entered the wooden door, laughing.

Bai Liu also led Mu Sicheng into the wooden door.

As soon as they enter the wooden door, the low tomb scene suddenly becomes much brighter. The height of the tomb roof had increased several times compared to before, and it looked like it was two or three floors high. The decoration of the main tomb chamber was imitated from the main hall of an old mansion. Red and white candles along with lanterns were lit everywhere. It could almost be said to be blinding.

The shadows that came in one after another wandered around the wall, on which were painted many scenes of banqueting guests. The sounds of the shadows chattering, laughing and playing responded appropriately. Of course, if these shadows were not blatantly staring at Bai Liu, he would have blessed this lively banquet more sincerely.

Opposite the wooden door, there were seven old fashioned square tables seating eight placed in a certain pattern. The tables were covered in thick dust, but the Eight Trigrams patterns on the tables could be vaguely seen. The legs of the tables were nailed to the ground with golden nails and could not be moved.

What was placed around the table were not tables, chairs or benches, but coffins standing upright. All of the coffins were open, leaving only an empty coffin box. Coffin lids were piled up randomly on the ground, with seven standing and eight lying down, and red strings wrapped around the coffins.

The interiors of the coffins were badly decayed and were still dripping water. A bronze mirror was inlaid at the head — similar to the bride's coffin that Bai Liu had seen in the temple before.

Bai Liu walked forward, circled the coffins then squatted down and carefully stroked the red line on the coffin lid, "There is not much dust on the broken end, it was just torn apart, the corpses inside should not have gone far."

Then Bai Liu stood up and walked around the coffins one by one, counting quietly, "1, 2… 33."

"There are only 33 empty coffins." Bai Liu looked around, "16 are missing."

Mu Sicheng stood far away. He was frightened when he saw the coffins and didn't want to get close at all, "How do you know there are 16 missing?"

"This should be a formation with seven as the maximum number." Bai Liu pointed at the seven tables with eight seats each. "The zombies driven by paper figures, the sacrificial bridge ghosts, and the coffins we watched in the temple are all seven. According to this rule, each table here should also correspond to seven coffins."

"We can tell from the dust on the ground." Bai Liu gestured to Mu Sicheng to look at the ground. "The dust in these places is not heavy, and there are traces of dragging. Coffins should have been placed there originally."

"These 16 coffins must have been carried away by the ghosts we met on the road."

Bai Liu said in thought, "But these ghosts were originally formed because of the tomb owner. They should only listen to the orders of the tomb owner alone, and this formation should have been set up a hundred years ago."

"Why would the tomb owner allow these ghosts to move the bride's coffins out of the tomb a hundred years later and destroy the formation he painstakingly set up a hundred years ago?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and rubbed the dust off his hands, "Obviously, he was only one step away from gathering the Yin energy and training himself into a peerless Yin corpse and emerging into the world."

Yinshan Village

The shadows of the seven or eight Eight Immortals tables were cast upon the six walls of the crypt, multiplying into forty-two shadow tables. At these phantom tables, the silhouettes of men, women, and children sat, laughing and chatting as if they were guests at an ordinary country banquet.

From time to time, these 'guests' stole glances at Bai Liu, yet something more terrifying seemed to restrain them. Though their gazes lingered on him with longing, they dared not rise from their seats, as if held in place by an unseen force that prevented them from pursuing his shadow.

Bai Liu turned his attention to the main wall facing the tomb passage. In its corners, two red candles flickered, their wax pooling beside the charred remains of paper money and incense ash.

Among the many shadowed tables reflected on the wall, one stood out —the foremost Eight Immortals table. Something was off about it.

Mu Sicheng, noticing the same anomaly, murmured, "...Who are those two vacant seats for?"

"This is a wedding banquet." Bai Liu's eyes swept over the twin wedding candles. "The central seats at the main table, facing east, are reserved for the bride and groom."

Mu Sicheng's brow furrowed. His gaze lingered on the shadowy octagonal table as if it stirred a memory just out of reach. "A wedding...? Why does this setup feel so familiar…?"

Before he could finish his thought, a sharp voice echoed from afar, cutting through the silence.

"—The guest of honor is invited to take their seat!"

At once, the murmuring shadows fell silent.

Near the main table, two new shadows appeared around the Eight Immortals table. They strode forward with a deliberate, ritualistic air.

One of them, poised and veiled in what must have been a traditional wedding dress, nodded and bowed before settling into her seat at the head of the table.

The other—a tall figure in a trendy tracksuit, with monkey-ear headphones resting around his neck—lounged back casually in his chair. One arm draped over the back of the bride's seat as he shot a slow, wicked grin at Mu Sicheng, the smirk stretching across the wall as if whispering directly into his ear.

The instant these two figures took their places, the surrounding shadows bowed their heads in deference. None dared to look toward Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng anymore.

Mu Sicheng's eyes widened in shock. He pointed at the wall, his voice cracking. "Shit! That shadow—it's me, isn't it?!"

Bai Liu studied the barely discernible shadow with an understanding nod. "It's you."

Mu Sicheng reeled back, staring at the shadow. "Why the hell is my shadow sitting in the main seat?"

"You must have paid your respects here before," Bai Liu replied coolly. "That makes you one of the newlyweds, giving you the right to sit at the main table." His gaze lingered on the shadowy Mu Sicheng seated at the banquet. "That shadow is your prana. You need to reclaim it before it fully separates from you."

Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng, his voice calm but firm. "Or you're done for."

Mu Sicheng stammered in disbelief. "What!?"

The eunuch-like shrill voice rang out once more:

"—The honored guest shall now host a private banquet for their esteemed guests!"

The two newly seated shadows rose again.

Mu Sicheng's shadow turned to face him, its eerie grin widening. Its lips were blood-red against the deep blackness of its form, and its hollow eyes oozed darkness.

With a mocking gesture, it beckoned Mu Sicheng to follow before striding away.

The bride's shadow moved with small, deliberate steps beside it. Though she did not appear to be walking fast, she remained impossibly close, her veiled head tilted unnaturally low. With every step she took, water dripped from beneath her veil, seeping into the ground like ink bleeding into paper.

"Follow," Bai Liu ordered, pursuing the shadows without hesitation.

The two figures moved swiftly, and in the blink of an eye, they reached the crypt's back door.

As if expecting them, the door creaked open on its own. The shadows paused, turning their faceless gazes toward Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, as if ensuring they were following, before vanishing beyond the wooden threshold.

Bai Liu chased after them without hesitation. Mu Sicheng, running alongside him, panted, "How do I fuse with my shadow?"

"Find your body and enter it," Bai Liu instructed, never breaking stride. "You and your shadow are both spirits of the same body. The spirit controls the vessel—once you re-enter it, your prana will be forced to merge back with you."

Mu Sicheng exhaled in relief. "That actually sounds pretty easy."

"It's not." Bai Liu retorted flatly. "It's the hardest part."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Why? Isn't it just a matter of finding my body?"

"In theory, yes." Bai Liu finally spared him a glance, his expression unreadable. "But do you know where your prana has hidden your body?"

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched. A horrible realization dawned on him.

"You mean..." His voice wavered. "It's already hidden my body—inside the main tomb—with the other ghosts?!"

"Hmm." Bai Liu nodded. "It knows that once you enter the body, it will be forced to inhale and merge with you, ultimately disappearing. Since it's an [evil spirit] that craves independence, of course, it would try to prevent you from finding your body."

"One more thing—while your [soul] didn't actually perform the three rites of heaven and earth with those brides, your prana still made it to the main seat. That makes you the guest of honor here."

Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng. "This can only mean one thing: after you were stripped of your body, it remained inside and manipulated it to complete the three rites—marrying some ghost bride, or perhaps multiple ghosts here. It's already half-owner of this tomb."

"All the ghosts and evil spirits here are under its command. Finding your body will only get harder."

Bai Liu glanced at his phone. "Once the clock strikes midnight and the road to the underworld closes, if you haven't returned to the yang world with a complete human body..." He turned back to Mu Sicheng. "Then you'll truly become a ghost, and your body—along with whatever spirit is left inside—will turn into a zombie."

"It's almost ten o'clock."

Mu Sicheng's expression darkened. "Two hours left."

Bai Liu looked ahead, his gaze settling on the flickering shadow of a bride around the corner. "Still, I don't think all hope is lost."

Mu Sicheng struggled to keep his composure. "What do you mean?"

Bai Liu, ever composed, quirked an eyebrow. "If my [prana] were trying to take my body at this moment, I'd probably be confirming with you the exact amount of money to burn for me on Qingming Festival."

Even now, he could still joke with a straight face.

"There's no need to struggle. My [prana] would simply wait in silence, lurking for two hours before taking my body back in ghost form."

Mu Sicheng clenched his fists. "But my [prana] didn't lurk. It came out in the open—because it was confident, wasn't it?"

Bai Liu shook his head, rubbing his chin. "No, I think it's just not very smart."

"After all, it's your [prana]. It still lacks human reasoning. I'd call it stupid—but that might just be our breakthrough."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

His eye twitched. "I'm being serious! Stop undermining me!"

"I am being serious." Bai Liu patted Mu Sicheng's shoulder, speaking without missing a beat. "Think about it. If you were your [prana], and you had two hours to fully take over a powerful body, would you go around announcing your presence? Would you parade yourself like the guest of honor at a grand wedding banquet? Would you personally invite your opponent over?"

Mu Sicheng's brows furrowed. "……No, that'd be stupid. Why would he do that?"

"That's for you to answer—it's your [prana]." Bai Liu watched Mu Sicheng quietly. "Under what circumstances would you do something like that?"

Mu Sicheng frowned deeper, his hands unconsciously tugging at his hair. "……I can't remember a lot of things……"

Bai Liu slowed his tone, pressing a hand against Mu Sicheng's tense spine. "Let's try a different approach. If you did this, what would your reason be?"

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes, inhaling sharply. "If I did this... it would be for the sake of..." His eyes opened, dark with realization. "Showing off. Or fun? I've done this kind of thing before—stealing from people, then flaunting it in front of them..."

His voice dropped into a low murmur. "I liked watching people struggle to find something that was right under their noses."

A pause.

"Why would I enjoy something so mean-spirited...?"

"It is mean-spirited." Bai Liu commented honestly, but his lips curled into a small smile. "But in this place, your childish nastiness might just be our greatest asset."

Mu Sicheng turned his head toward Bai Liu, suspicious.

Bai Liu smiled. "I think I know exactly what [you] plan to do."

After passing through several winding corridors, the shadowy figure of the bride disappeared into an unlit chamber. Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng followed.

The room was lower and narrower than the previous hall. It was a bedroom. A massive carved mahogany bed stood in the center, draped in a thick red canopy with a satin coverlet embroidered with mandarin ducks and the double happiness symbol. At each of the four bedposts, white lanterns hung—each one affixed with a red double happiness character, glowing with a faint, eerie light.

A thick layer of dust coated everything.

There were no shoes by the bedside. Instead, three dozen damp footprints of varying sizes were scattered densely around the bed—most of them small, cloth-shoe imprints. Only one stood out: the unmistakable mark of a sneaker.

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng, who nodded. "That's my footprint."

A sudden gust of wind swept through the room, lifting the heavy red veil.

From beneath the bed, a pair of powder-blue embroidered shoes emerged—standing upright at the edge of the mahogany frame.

The shoes were still dripping. Water seeped down, staining the wood.

Mu Sicheng instinctively took a step back, only for Bai Liu to press a steadying hand on his shoulder.

Calmly, Bai Liu stepped forward. His gaze remained fixed on the embroidered shoes before he reached out and lifted the red veil completely—pulling it aside with both hands.

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched as he took in the sight before him.

Yinshan Village

A red veil draped over the high bed, and dozens of figures stood in a row, their backs to Bai Liu outside the bed tent, as if posing for a group photo.

The brides, clad in various styles of red dresses and trousers, stood motionless like wax figures. Their heads were covered by heavy red veils embroidered with dragons and phoenixes, their feet encased in embroidered shoes. The veils appeared waterlogged, dripping from the yellowed willow fringes, each drop falling onto the bedding with a soft patter.

Water seeped from beneath the bed, slowly spreading across the chamber. The air was thick with the stench of dampness and blood.

But the most unsettling sight was the brides themselves. Though their backs faced Bai Liu, their embroidered shoes pointed in the opposite direction—heels forward, toes backward—as if their heads had been twisted 180 degrees.

A chill crawled up Bai Liu’s spine.

He lowered his gaze, searching through the bridal procession.

In the bottom right corner of the group, Bai Liu’s eyes landed on a bride wearing black sneakers. Her hands—long, broad, and pale blue with distinct veins—stood out from the rest.

They were a man's hands.

Blackened, elongated nails curled at the tips, droplets of water slipping from them.

Mu Sicheng followed Bai Liu’s gaze, holding his breath. Carefully, he mouthed, That’s my sneaker… Just like you guessed, this thing is really showing us my body!

Bai Liu’s gaze remained fixed on the sneaker-wearing "bride."

By Mu Sicheng’s own account, his evil spirit was mischievous and arrogant, never bothering to properly hide what it stole but instead flaunting it, luring others into taking it back—like dangling bait in front of a bear.

And what was the most effective way to tempt them into grabbing it?

Naturally, by placing it in the most dangerous prana in the room.

Aside from the zombie Taoist, the most dangerous presence here was undoubtedly the newlywed brides—women who had died on their way to their weddings, their grievances powerful enough to linger.

Bai Liu bent his knee, placing one foot on the bedframe.

Then, with a push, he leapt onto the bed.

Mu Sicheng let out a startled cry.

The wooden bed groaned under the weight of more than thirty figures as it swayed from Bai Liu's landing.

The brides standing atop it shifted ever so slightly with the movement. Their heels—previously turned inward—began rotating, slowly aligning toward Bai Liu.

Yet their upper bodies remained perfectly still, as though their feet and torsos were disconnected.

A soft, feminine giggle floated out from beneath the veils, whispery and unsettling.

Standing at the edge of the bed, Mu Sicheng instinctively reached out to pull Bai Liu back—but stopped himself at the last moment, his expression taut with unease.

"Bai Liu, what are you doing up there?! I should be the one up there, right?" he hissed.

"Your body is among these thirty or so brides." Bai Liu was about to move forward when he glanced down at Mu Sicheng, who was gripping the hem of his shirt. Bai Liu's eyes flicked to Mu Sicheng's hand, silently telling him to let go. "Instead of holding me back, you should be preparing to find your body in the chaos and jump in."

Mu Sicheng pointed at the bride in sneakers, skeptical. "Isn't that my body? I just have to jump into it, right?"

Bai Liu gave him a bland look. "You may not be the brightest, but I doubt you'd leave something you enjoy—something you're skilled at, like stealing and hiding—just sitting out in the open."

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes. “Where the hell did you get that joystick?”

“From the coffin in the temple last night. I had a feeling it’d come in handy.” Bai Liu’s tone was casual as he continued, “This veil isn’t something we can simply lift. Otherwise, Kong Xuyang would’ve told us last night not to lift it at all rather than just warning us not to let the bride lift it herself.”

Without waiting for Mu Sicheng’s response, Bai Liu reached out and grabbed the head of the nearest bride.

He yanked.

The bride’s head tilted back unnaturally—but the veil remained perfectly in place, as if fused to her scalp.

Bai Liu released her and watched as she slowly straightened her head again, then turned back to Mu Sicheng, his expression as indifferent as ever. “As expected. That means the veil can only be lifted with a special tool or by the bride herself.”

Before Mu Sicheng could react, Bai Liu extended the joystick and, without hesitation, hooked it beneath the veil of the bride wearing sneakers.

The soaked fabric peeled away.

A tide of blood burst forth, drenching the chamber in crimson.

For a moment, both Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng stared at what lay beneath.

The bride had no head.

There was only a cross-section of raw, pale flesh at the base of her neck, still oozing blood. What had been pushing up against the veil, mimicking the shape of a skull, was nothing but a tangled mass of black hair sprouting grotesquely from the severed stump.

Mu Sicheng choked out, “What the fuck—”

Bai Liu remained composed. “It’s not your body. The sneakers were a distraction.”

“So now what?” Mu Sicheng turned to Bai Liu. “Do we just start uncovering them one by one?”

Bai Liu's gaze lowered to the bed. "I doubt your prana is going to be kind enough to let us do that."

The moment the headless bride's veil hit the ground, the laughter of the remaining brides sharpened into something high-pitched and unhinged.

Then their feet—dozens of them—began turning violently faster.

In an instant, all their toes aligned in Bai Liu's direction.

Their upper bodies jerked forward in unnatural lunges, bones cracking as they locked into place.

Then, all at once, they bolted toward Bai Liu in a rapid, broken sprint.

"Run!"

Bai Liu dove under the bed without hesitation, and the bride immediately followed. Glancing back, he grabbed Mu Sicheng and yanked him into a frantic sprint around the bed, tossing the wedding rod to him.

"You reveal it," Bai Liu said.

Mu Sicheng, fumbling to catch the rod, barely ducked in time to avoid the bride stumbling toward him with uneven steps. "Why me?" he shot back.

"One of these thirty brides is inside your body," Bai Liu replied, narrowly avoiding capture as he suddenly dove diagonally under the bed, rolling out the other side.

Emerging, he dropped to one knee and looked up at Mu Sicheng. "I can't tell them apart right now, so uncovering their heads is like opening a blind box. And if I remember correctly, my luck with these things is terrible."

Bai Liu smiled and reached for the joystick in Mu Sicheng's hands. "Unless you're too scared and need me to do it? I don't mind—though that would mean all thirty chasing after us."

Mu Sicheng instantly pulled the rod back, eyeing Bai Liu warily. With no other choice, he scrambled onto the bedframe as the bride crept closer, tiptoeing after him. Taking a deep breath, he lay back against the bed tent, then suddenly twisted around, hooking the veil off a bride's head with the rod.

"Not this one either!" Mu Sicheng groaned, his frustration mounting.

Bai Liu, entirely unbothered, idly reminded him, "You should be careful. The brides whose veils you remove seem to chase after you."

Mu Sicheng froze. "And you're telling me this now?"

Bai Liu shrugged, looking innocent. "The one I uncovered was headless. It moved irregularly, so I didn't realize it right away. But it still came after me."

Bai Liu easily dodged the headless bride lunging at him and added, his tone light yet laced with urgency, "I suggest you hurry. It's almost midnight."

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, then propelled himself up one of the chamber's wooden pillars with agile movements, locking his legs around it. Looking down at the swarm of brides below, he muttered a curse and, in one swift motion, used the rod to rip the veils off six of them.

"Damn it! Not one of these either!" Mu Sicheng growled. "That bastard Prara better not be messing with me—what if my body isn't even here?!"

Bai Liu crouched beside the bed, watching the headless bride search in circles. He glanced up at Mu Sicheng, a lazy smile tugging at his lips. "Oh, it's here."

"Which one, then?" Mu Sicheng snapped, exasperated. "This is like Tang Bohu choosing Qiu Xiang—except I'm choosing twice as many!"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "You're giving yourself too much credit. Tang Bohu got a wife after choosing Qiu Xiang. You? You're just looking for your own corpse."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

I may not be human, but Bai Liu, you're truly inhuman.

"But you have the rod," Bai Liu continued, resting his chin in his hand. "You're more skilled than your 'prey.' Just get on with it—the body's still yours. It's no match for you."

Muttering under his breath, Mu Sicheng begrudgingly bent down to hook another veil.

Bai Liu, meanwhile, kept his eyes trained on the brides below. As Mu Sicheng's rod descended, one of them subtly lifted her fingers—an instinctive "hooking" motion, a movement thieves often made when reaching for something they coveted. It was exactly how Mu Sicheng moved when he stole.

Bai Liu's smile deepened.

It seemed that, under his provocation, a certain restless "bride" wanted to steal the rod.

Speaking quickly, Bai Liu instructed, "Mu Sicheng—third one at nine o'clock."

Mu Sicheng reacted instantly, his reflexes honed to perfection. Without thinking, he flicked the rod, lifting the veil in a blur too fast for the naked eye.

The cover flew off, revealing—

A grotesque "Mu Sicheng." His face twisted in a malicious snarl, black eyes gleaming, mouth bared with sharp one-inch fangs. His knees tensed, ready to pounce.

Mu Sicheng instinctively braced himself to counterattack—

"Don't fight back. Let him pounce," Bai Liu ordered coldly.

Mu Sicheng hesitated for a fraction of a second but obeyed.

The monstrous "Mu Sicheng" lunged forward, sinking his teeth into Mu Sicheng's neck—not drinking blood, but stealing his soul. Mu Sicheng's face contorted in agony, his form fading, until finally—

He disappeared from the pillar completely.

Yinshan Village

Mu Sicheng stopped resisting as he was grabbed by the flesh of his neck by the flying "Mu Sicheng." But instead of blood being sucked, it was his soul. The pain contorted his face into a hideous mask, almost as if it were a shadow. Finally, he disappeared completely from the pillar.

The "Mu Sicheng" zombie, now having absorbed the soul, stretched his shoulders in satisfaction and jumped down from the pillar. His expression twisted into something brutal as he strode toward Bai Liu.

However, Bai Liu kept his head down, seemingly unaware of Mu Sicheng approaching him.

As Mu Sicheng drew closer, just before he could open his mouth to bite, his face dropped to his knees. His features seemed to merge as if two faces were struggling to become one, and his body began to twitch uncontrollably.

Bai Liu slowly raised his gaze. "Mu Sicheng, it will take some time for you to fully merge with your soul. Can you control this zombie body?"

Mu Sicheng's soul twisted out from his face and responded in a hoarse voice, "Barely... I can!"

"It's almost midnight—when yin and yang converge and yang pours in, it's when yin is at its weakest." Bai Liu jumped off the bed, calmly continuing, "Now that the paths of yin and yang are aligned, we can return to the path of yang. This is our best chance to escape."

"But there's a problem." Bai Liu turned his head, eyeing the bride standing motionless, her head covered, staring at Mu Sicheng. "Your body is now one of their husbands and the owner of this tomb. With the host and guest fleeing, the shades in this tomb will surely pursue you."

"I need you to avoid completely devouring the prana, so you can maintain control of your zombie body and retain enough of your sanity to fight them off."

Mu Sicheng exhaled heavily. "So, you let the prana consume me, did you?"

Bai Liu nodded.

Mu Sicheng's face darkened, his fangs bared, and his claws dug into the ground. He exhaled a deep breath. "...I'll try."

"Then wait for me to count: one, two..." Bai Liu paused and glanced at his watch, then crouched down and grabbed Mu Sicheng by the shoulders, his gaze firm as he ordered, "Three, run!"

Mu Sicheng shot off like a stray arrow.

The lanterns in the house behind them flickered as the wind kicked up from Mu Sicheng's swift motion, and when the flames steadied, all the brides in the room had disappeared.

Bai Liu knelt on one knee, steadying himself on Mu Sicheng's back as he scampered around the shadowy chamber on all fours.

As they turned a corner, a headless bride emerged in front of them, about to close in. But Mu Sicheng swerved sharply, his fingers gripping the side wall of the tomb as he sprinted past the bride with ease.

Just as the bride turned, another one appeared. Bai Liu was quick enough to block her with a wedding pole, lifting the cover just in time.

A complete reversal—what had been a masked bride now revealed a playful, white-faced, red-lipped head looking down at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu pressed down on the back of Mu Sicheng's neck, and Mu Sicheng leapt off the wall, scuttling low to the ground to avoid the bride's line of sight.

The shadows, who had been talking and laughing, suddenly stopped when Mu Sicheng rushed in with Bai Liu on his back. Their eyes shifted, no longer hiding the malice within.

Standing outside the door were two welcoming guests, wearing melon caps. They bowed, kicking their hands, and flashed smiles like crescent moons. Their voices, sharp as eunuchs, rang out: "The guest of honor greets the guest!"

Mu Sicheng didn't slow down and led Bai Liu straight out the front door.

The welcoming guests' smiles vanished, replaced by stern shouts, "The guest is robbing the bride—an uninvited guest! Kill the guest to welcome the honored guest!"

The shadows seemed to have been waiting for this command. Their eerie hissing voices rose from within the walls, their mouths splitting into grotesque, blood-red arcs. Their eyes gleamed with malicious amusement.

The moment Mu Sicheng bolted out the front door, the shadows twisted into thin black lines, darting off with remarkable speed.

Mu Sicheng looked back, his face shifting between two expressions, schizophrenic in tone—one moment malicious, the next wary.

"They’re catching up—what do we do?" he hissed.

"Die here, Bai Liu!" he snarled, then growled again, "It’s fast!"

"You can’t outrun these prana," he added grimly.

Mu Sicheng tore through the tomb’s passage, the red lanterns lining the walls casting ominous shadows. They seemed to slither like bloodthirsty black snakes, hunting down their prey.

"It’s true that in the underworld, we can’t do much against these evil spirits." Bai Liu’s gaze was flat. "But it’s twelve o’clock now, and yin and yang have met."

"In the yang world, there is neither fire nor light, nor soul nor spirit," Bai Liu continued.

He steadied himself and leaned forward, his hand snapping to his joystick. With a quick motion, he hooked one of the lanterns from the wall. As the lanterns extinguished, a puff of smoke escaped, and the red light vanished, plunging the tomb into darkness.

Deprived of light, the prana reflected on the walls was swallowed up, leaving only silence behind.

Mu Sicheng leapt off the wall and out of the tomb, the paper bridge that had been swallowed by darkness now reappearing before him.

On the bridge, a ghost with an umbrella glared at Mu Sicheng and the others approaching. Beneath it, countless bodies rose and fell, undisturbed.

Mu Sicheng leaped onto the bridge's abutment, his face set in fierce determination. With several swift strides, he cleared the ghost, jumping over it with ease.

Bai Liu turned around, watching as the ghost struggled to catch up. The ghost, still clutching its umbrella, was soon left behind by Mu Sicheng's rapid pace, trapped on the bridge with resentment in its eyes.

"It's one minute past twelve," Bai Liu murmured, leaning over Mu Sicheng's back. "We need to be back on land by twelve fifteen. The meeting of yin and yang lasts only a quarter of an hour. Run as fast as you can."

"As fast as we can!" Mu Sicheng grinned, pushing himself harder. His tongue hung out, and he was panting, but he managed to speak, "At this speed, we'll be safe!"

As he spoke, his face contorted with a snarl. He grabbed a ghost that had crawled out from an altar and, with one swift motion, sank his fangs into its neck, flinging its head aside with brutal force.

Bai Liu heard the crack of bones and patted Mu Sicheng on the head. "Don't drink the ghosts' blood," he said. "Too much Yin is bad for you."

"And the blood of a water ghost corpse isn't good either," Bai Liu added.

Mu Sicheng spat out the neck of the accomplice he'd bitten, grimacing in disgust. "Ugh, you should've told me sooner. It's all watery and fishy!"

"You were the one who rushed in too fast," Bai Liu replied, his eyes narrowing as he glanced toward the altars rolling in from the darkened tomb passage. Ghosts with twisted bodies crawled out from them. "These altars weren't originally here; they were in a side chamber where I fell."

"Someone moved these altars to make things harder for us."

Mu Sicheng tilted his head, sniffing the air as he crawled forward on his hands. He frowned. "This smells so messy. Who's behind this?"

Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes. "It's got to be Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi. They're trying to make us lose, hoping we'll die in the catacombs while they stand at the exit."

At the tomb's entrance, Kong Xuyang, holding half of a [Yin-Yang

Road Separation Talisman], tossed it to Yang Zhi with a sneer. "Bai Liu actually used the Yin-Yang Road Separation Talisman in a place like this. What a way to get himself killed."

Yang Zhi gave a small, unremarkable compliment. "That's what you do when you're pushed to the limit."

Kong Xuyang smirked, looking toward the trapdoor at the entrance to the tomb. "I'd say it's rather unkind of us to just stand by and watch without helping him out, especially in this snowstorm."

Yang Zhi looked toward the door, his eyes glinting with memory. "I remember falling through here and landing in a side chamber filled with altars."

Kong Xuyang nodded solemnly. "Yes, that side chamber is full of altar water ghosts. If you touch one, it'll double and trap you."

"I remember, Brother Kong," Yang Zhi said, recalling the past. "When you first played Yinshan Village, you used that side chamber to screw over two players and take their things. How'd you manage that?"

Kong Xuyang rolled his eyes. "You're still using your memory-based skills? You can't remember anything."

Yang Zhi smiled, fawning. "Brother Kong, you're the master of traps. You use so many tricks, in and out of the game, that even I can't keep track."

Kong Xuyang tilted his neck back in a triumphant laugh, waving Yang Zhi away. "If you know so much, get out of the way."

"With the Yin-Yang Road Separation Talisman, as long as they don't return to the Yang world before midnight, they'll be trapped in the netherworld," Yang Zhi said, his eyes gleaming with malicious pleasure as he looked at the altar beneath the trapdoor. "And the altar ghost, though weak, is the hardest ghost in Yinshan Village. It's perfect for stalling."

"All it takes is a little [driving charm]," Kong Xuyang said, pulling out a yellow talisman. He dipped his pen in vermilion and drew a stroke on the talisman before sticking it to the trapdoor. "This will guide the ghost and block anyone from escaping the tomb."

As the yellow talisman glowed, a red light burst from it. The altar beneath shook violently, rolling toward a certain direction as if summoned by some unseen force.

Yang Zhi grinned. "Brother Kong, your traps are as wicked as ever."

"No poison, no husband," Kong Xuyang said, his smile still wicked. But before he could say more, a violent gust of wind erupted from the trapdoor, spinning and eventually exploding.

Two figures appeared in the dusty air.

Before Yang Zhi could even see who they were, a ghost with a limp neck smashed into both him and Kong Xuyang, sending them flying into the door, coughing up blood.

As the dust settled, the two figures revealed themselves.

Mu Sicheng lay on the ground, his face bruised and his fangs stained with blood. He spat out a mouthful of ghost blood, glaring at Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang as they stumbled toward him.

Bai Liu knelt on top of Mu Sicheng, blood staining his face and shirt. His face was pale, but he wore a smile that was so friendly it made one's skin crawl.

Bai Liu grinned at the two men, who were still choking and coughing on the ground. "Well, well, old friends. We meet again."

Kong Xuyang's eyes widened, and he was about to speak when Yang Zhi exclaimed in astonishment, "How did you manage to escape the tomb?!"

"I won't go into the details, old man." Bai Liu smiled warmly, his eyes drifting to the yellow talismans in Kong Xuyang's hands. His smile deepened. "I get the feeling you didn't want me out of there any more than anyone else, did you?"

"Cut the crap." Kong Xuyang backhanded a drive charm onto the trapdoor, cursing with a malicious laugh. "You think you can just escape and be safe? I've got some tricks up my sleeve."

"Heaven and Earth, Divine Warrior Dao, Thundering Orders, Urgent as Starfire... Borrowing the Military Text!"

A violent gust of wind erupted from beneath the trapdoor, so strong that it nearly lifted the three people standing nearby.

Kong Xuyang stood unfazed, not even his hair swaying. His smile became even more sinister. "From the moment I entered this tomb, I set traps everywhere, including, of course, the most important exit point."

"I've laid two traps in this location—one for entry." Kong Xuyang looked down at the stone door with a faded yellow talisman on the side. "Step on this, and you'll fall into the side-chamber trap."

He then turned his grim expression to Bai Liu. "You're lucky you didn't die after stepping in it."

"But you can avoid the first day, not the fifteenth." Kong Xuyang's gloomy expression faded into an evil grin. "I've linked all the traps I've set in this tomb into a single talisman."

Holding a yellow talisman of mixed gold and red between his fingers, he stuck it to the tomb door and shouted, "Ten percent of the three worlds will hear from afar, and the evil spirits will be bound in a spell!"

As soon as the charm stuck, the entire tomb shook. All light disappeared, and faint sounds of paper footsteps, lanterns rattling, and women moving forward with broken steps echoed from the pitch-black tomb tunnel.

The altar beneath the loose-leaf door attached to the wall stirred, and two ghastly white hands emerged from within, grabbing the wall and slowly crawling upward. The altar's top was crowned with a yellow talisman, and the body inside writhed and slithered into the tomb passage.

At the same time, red lanterns floated slowly through the darkened tomb, casting eerie shadows of men, women, and children that swayed along.

While the walls were lined with figures of normal height, the tomb passage was filled with short, jumping paper figures.

These paper figures were no taller than half an adult's height, with yellowed, thin paper covered in heavy white paint. Their cheerful, false smiles contrasted with their hollow eyes, and they carried red-and-white lanterns marked with the character "Xi." Their lanterns illuminated the new bride walking ahead of them, dressed in a wedding gown, head covered, arms crossed in front.

As the shadowy figures blinked, they began to approach Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, swirling and laughing in chaotic circles, their colorful faces drawing nearer.

Mu Sicheng bit down on two ghosts crawling from the ground but froze as a woman's laughter came from behind. When he turned around, a new bride had appeared on his shoulder, calling out, "Groom～"

Mu Sicheng jerked his head back to look at Bai Liu, only to see another bride appear in front of him.

The situation was even worse for Bai Liu, surrounded by paper figures who held lanterns in his face, running around him mischievously. One by one, they pasted themselves onto his body from his feet, gradually covering his entire form, until his face was almost obscured.

The mouths on the paper figures opened and closed, their smiles growing more intense, as if sucking on something. Their faces reddened, eventually bulging out of their flattened sheets, their eyebrows growing into full, fleshy faces. From their mouths came a shrill, childish laugh.

Behind Bai Liu stood a headless bride, silently resting her severed head on his shoulder. Her sharp green-and-white hands clutched tightly at his shoulders, preventing him from escaping the paper figures' grasp—the same ghost Bai Liu had earlier removed from his head.

The child-turned-paper-figure giggled with increasing delight.

Mu Sicheng noticed that Bai Liu's body was becoming thinner as the paper figures clung to him. His exposed hand turned deathly pale and slender, like paper.

"Bai Liu!" Mu Sicheng, panicked, rushed toward Bai Liu but found himself unable to move freely with a dozen brides clinging to his shoulders.

A dozen brides were piled together, their dizzying laughter echoing through the tomb passage, while the red glow of twin lanterns floated around them. The light reflected eerily on their faces, hidden beneath their veils.

The figures on the walls swayed back and forth, their laughter growing louder. Their bloodshot eyes slid down the walls and swirled greedily around the shadows of Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu. It was as though they were vultures, ready to descend upon their prey, tearing apart their souls and devouring them.

Kong Xuyang laughed loudly. "It's nice to be surrounded by so many 'cunts,' isn't it, Bai Liu?"

He raised his eyebrows triumphantly. "In this tomb, we have the secret treasure of the Daoist zombie, and all the yin energy here is mine to command."

At the tomb entrance, Kong Xuyang waved a hand mockingly at Bai Liu, who was heavily besieged by the netherworld creatures. He deliberately mimicked Bai Liu's tone when addressing him. "But, old man, it's a rare blessing for someone like you to die in a tomb of this grand scale."

After saying this, Kong Xuyang paused for a moment, enjoying the sight of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng quickly being ensnared by the powerful nether forces. He grimaced with disdain, then turned and opened the tomb door. He waved for Yang Zhi to leave with him, adding casually, "With just a minute until twelve-thirty, I think the show worked out quite well—watching you two, trapped in the underworld, tangled with these monstrous spirits."

He turned back to flash a fake benevolent smile at Bai Liu. "Your audience must love how I prepared your death. I'll take your popularity as a bonus."

With that, Kong Xuyang left without looking back, the tomb door slamming shut behind him, leaving only the faint sounds of scraping limbs, women and children's laughter, and bones being chewed from within.

Kong Xuyang continued in a chipper mood, not even glancing over his shoulder as he strode toward the exit. "It won't be long now, this game's almost over."

He sighed as he walked, "It was probably the fastest race we've ever had in the high stakes." Then, with a trace of mock sorrow, he added, "But it wasn't unexpected—Bai Liu's just a former employee, after all. It's normal for someone like him to fall so quickly."

Yang Zhi, however, glanced back at the closed tomb door, feeling uneasy.

"Brother Kong," Yang Zhi said, walking quickly to catch up with Kong Xuyang. "I think something's wrong."

Kong Xuyang, clearly irritated, waved a dismissive hand without breaking his stride. "You're thinking too much. Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu have no memories or skills. There's no way they could kill the monsters in this Yinshan Village tomb on their own."

He snorted, an air of satisfaction on his face. "The only way Mu Sicheng could kill a ghost here is if he's zombified—if that's the case, he's not far from death. I've prepared a trap with such dense Yin Qi that it won't be long before that foolish monkey turns into a zombie and is completely out of the game."

Yang Zhi's face lit up with realization. "So that's it."

Despite this, an uneasy feeling lingered in Yang Zhi's mind. His half-formed memories of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng kept surfacing—memories of their extreme personalities that were hard to suppress.

Every so often, he would glance back at the tomb entrance and ask cautiously, "Brother Kong, are you really sure you can trap them? These two don't stay pinned down easily, and the backlash... it seems quite powerful."

Kong Xuyang shot him a sideways glance. "What, you doubt my ability to set traps?"

Yang Zhi shook his head. "No, of course not. I'm just...," he trailed off, unable to pinpoint why the situation felt so wrong. There was an invisible tension in the air that unsettled him, despite the seemingly easy victory ahead.

He knew in his gut that Kong Xuyang was one of the best at laying traps—both in and out of the game. His traps had caused many high-ranking teams to suffer great losses. The tomb was set up with all kinds of talismans to summon Yin creatures as a final defense, ensuring the defeat of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng.

Even though Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng had memories and abilities, Yang Zhi was certain that they wouldn't be able to escape Kong Xuyang's trap.

Yet, Yang Zhi couldn't shake the feeling that something was off. Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng were not the type to rest on their laurels.

On a deeper level, Yang Zhi realized it wasn't just Kong Xuyang who was seeking a counterattack—Bai Liu was too.

Bai Liu had frequently used the [Jedi Counterattack] to leap from rookie to No. 1 on the Rising Stars list, then to the top of the King's list, eventually reaching the same status as the veteran teams. He was a master at turning the tables.

Though Yang Zhi had the feeling Kong Xuyang would win, there was a vague foreboding in his chest.

He knew, deep down, that this trap wasn't meant for Bai Liu by Kong Xuyang—it was from Bai Liu to Kong Xuyang.

As the tomb door closed, leaving only a narrow crack, Bai Liu's calm voice suddenly pierced the silence, accompanied by the flutter of a yellow talisman.

Jedi Counterattack: A character, despite being in a seemingly losing situation, manages to turn the tables on their adversaries through unexpected intelligence, tactics, or sheer willpower. It plays off the idea of the "underdog" making a dramatic comeback.

Yinshan Village

The yellow talisman passed by Kong Xuyang's side. He turned slightly, catching it between his fingers. After swiping the runes on the talisman, he sneered, "A low-level Yin Corpse talisman?"

"Bai Liu is dreaming more and more absurdly," Kong Xuyang continued with a cold, contemptuous smile. "He thinks he can break free from my trap with a mere corpse charm? He believes he can turn things around and control the yin creature I've summoned?"

With a flick of his fingers, the two yellow talismans in his hands ignited without wind, flames of blue and purple licking the edges before the talismans turned to ash. He sneered again, "This paltry amount of Yin energy is far too weak to feed the ghosts."

More yellow talismans kept flying out from the cracks in the tomb door, but Kong Xuyang intercepted and burned each one before they could do anything.

The disdain and amusement on Kong Xuyang's face grew more evident. "Dying for nothing—it's almost a quarter to twelve."

"Isn't Bai Liu going to be trapped in the underworld forever?" Yang Zhi stared at the gap in the tomb door. He should have felt relief, but for some reason, an uneasy tension gripped him. Cold sweat gathered at the corners of his forehead, his lips dry and pale. "Brother Kong, is there really no way to counter the Yin and Yang charm?"

Kong Xuyang shot Yang Zhi a strange look. "You've played Yinshan Village too, haven't you? Don't you know that the Daoist elements in this copy are based on Taoism and karma?"

He continued, his tone growing more dismissive, "According to this game's setting, the Yin-Yang Crossing Talisman is an evil spell. If it's used, you can either be lucky enough to escape at the exact moment the charm expires, but we're guarding the tomb door, and Bai Liu is trapped by my trap. He won't get far."

"Or, an extremely skilled Taoist might reverse the spell, but such a person doesn't exist at this stage in the game. And, according to the Taoist rules, anyone who uses the evil spell is bound to be reversed, like Bai Liu. Right now, he's already being reversed."

"We're about to win. What are you so nervous about?"

Yang Zhi forced a smile, wiping the cold sweat from his forehead. "You're right."

Although Yang Zhi knew deep down that Kong Xuyang was correct, an uneasy feeling gnawed at him, growing stronger with each passing moment.

Kong Xuyang, casual as ever, watched with amusement as more corpse charms shot out from the tomb doorway. He didn't even bother to stop them, glancing down at his watch. With a grin, he began counting down slowly: "Ten."

"Nine."

Yang Zhi, feeling increasingly flustered, interrupted Kong Xuyang's countdown. "Brother Kong, why don't we leave first, just in case Bai Liu—"

"What if, what if?" Kong Xuyang rolled his eyes in annoyance. "I don't understand why you're so worried. Bai Liu won't turn things around unless a highly skilled Taoist priest helps him—"

At that moment, Bai Liu's calm voice came from the tomb doorway. "Eight."

Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang paused, slowly turning their heads toward the tomb door.

Bai Liu continued the countdown, clearly and without haste. "Seven."

Yang Zhi took a step back, horror spreading across his face as he pointed at the tomb door. "Brother Kong, Bai Liu is counting down too!"

Kong Xuyang, his expression dark, grabbed Yang Zhi's shoulders to stop him from backing away and stared fiercely at the gap in the tomb door. "Let's see what he's up to. Four."

Bai Liu's voice remained calm. "Three."

"Two." Kong Xuyang scoffed, his tone grim. "Don't worry, we'll win. Just wait."

Bai Liu's voice came again, faint but steady. "One."

As the final countdown echoed, and the time reached a quarter past twelve, a gray, gloomy color spread rapidly from both sides of the tomb passage. The eerie laughter of the paper figures and the soft giggles of the bride grew louder, almost piercing, as if coming from far away, through the tomb door.

"Treat your guests to the road to the underworld, live in a house of the underworld, and become a household of the underworld!"

These shadowy creatures seemed to be dragging Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng further into the tomb, their clothes rustling and the sound of their shoes stomping against the ground.

Mu Sicheng struggled, shouting, "Get out! Let go of me and Bai Liu!!!"

Kong Xuyang was ecstatic. "It’s done!"

Yang Zhi let out a long, relieved sigh, his joy overflowing. "Brother Kong, we won..."

Before Yang Zhi could finish the word "win," a red light suddenly erupted from the tomb door, followed by a deafening sound that shook the air.

The sound bounced through the air, causing the ground to vibrate violently, as though a massive object was repeatedly slamming onto it, crushing the underground catacombs and shaking the earth from side to side.

Kong Xuyang and the others staggered under the shaking. Kong Xuyang managed to steady himself by grabbing the wall, but Yang Zhi was thrown off balance and fell onto his backside. What the hell is this? Is there such a thing in a tomb?

The grim grey that had obscured the tomb door flickered and faded. Inside, the paper figures and the bride let out frightened whispers, followed by the sound of paper tearing as if they were fleeing.

Kong Xuyang's expression turned pale. "What's happening? How did the Yin-Yang Roadmap talisman activate? There's no way Bai Liu could have triggered it!"

"No living person in Yinshan Village can break the Maoshan evil spell!" Kong Xuyang's mind raced, and he took a few steps back in front of the tomb door, which was now cracked. "The only NPC who could have used his body to undo the evil spell was driven away by me in the opening chapter! What went wrong?!"

The tomb door creaked open further with each shake, and a blinding red light cracked through it. From within, a hoarse, guttural roar, almost like a beast awakening, echoed. With it came a chilling gust that made the hairs on the back of their necks stand up.

As the tomb door shattered open, Bai Liu's pale face emerged from the shadows, his lips curling into a smirk. "You made a great trap, but you're right about one thing—there are no living Daoists here who can undo the evil spell."

"But," Bai Liu grinned, "there are Taoist ghosts that can."

He glanced around, his eyes gleaming with mischief. "Have you forgotten who this tomb was meant to bury?"

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi fell silent, their faces frozen in disbelief. Slowly, they turned their gazes toward Bai Liu.

Bai Liu raised the Yin Corpse spell, which Kong Xuyang had mocked earlier, and smiled. "This little Yin ghost may be small, but it's enough to awaken the master here."

Kong Xuyang's eyes widened in disbelief as he watched the approaching zombie dressed as a Taoist priest. It grew taller with every leap, its long, thick black nails scraping the air.

The zombie's face was covered with freshly drawn yellow talismans, leaving only its dark eyes visible, surrounded by wrinkled, dry skin. Those talismans were none other than a nether corpse spell.

Kong Xuyang instantly recognized it as the most dangerous monster in the entire Yinshan Village copy—the 100-year-old Zombie Daoist.

The tomb, filled with countless burial sites, had claimed the lives of so many villagers, their souls trapped in limbo, all to gather enough Yin Qi to create this one terrifying zombie.

Yang Zhi panicked first. "Bai Liu, are you insane?! If you wake it up, we're all dead!"

"I know," Bai Liu shrugged with a smile that didn't reach his eyes. "But I'm going to die anyway. Might as well drag you all to my funeral while I'm here."

The paper figures, symbols of the underworld's gloom, scattered as the red-glowing Zombie Daoist leaped forward. Just before it reached the tomb door, an invisible path crossed its jump, halting it mid-air.

Kong Xuyang's heart skipped a beat. "The Yin-Yang partition charm... it's working!"

"Trap it!" Yang Zhi cried, her face pale with fear as she prayed that Bai Liu's talisman would hold the zombie boss at bay.

If this thing was truly unleashed, they had no chance. Running would be useless—death was inevitable.

The Zombie Daoist, with its face covered in talismans, exhaled a visible puff of white air, then lowered its head. Its black and purple eyes scanned the path below, its finger twisting slightly as it seemed to draw talismans in the air.

"How... how does it remember all these Taoist techniques even though it's dead?!" Yang Zhi gasped in shock.

"The Dao is profound," Bai Liu observed thoughtfully, stroking his chin, "and it's familiar with these feats. Looks like it's just what's needed to undo the charm."

The watery barrier on the path shattered after a final flick of the Zombie Daoist's nails. The creature sniffed the air, then moved straight toward Kong Xuyang without hesitation.

"Shit!" Kong Xuyang swore, tossing yellow talismans behind him as he ran, frantically placing them on himself. "Bai Liu, even if you summoned it, you have no way of defending yourself! You'll be the first to die in a chase, not me!"

"I'll make it through just the same when you're dead! Either I survive, or I win!" Bai Liu's grin widened, his voice calm but cold. "Is that so?"

Without another word, the zombie ignored Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng at the door, leaping straight at Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who were already fleeing.

Yang Zhi, hearing the sound of the zombie jumping behind her, turned to look. "The vampire's not after Bai Liu and the others! It's coming after us!"

Kong Xuyang looked back in horror and screamed, tossing more yellow talismans as the zombie neared. "How could this happen?!"

The yellow talismans disintegrated instantly under the Zombie Daoist's power. It continued to pursue them relentlessly.

Watching the distant figures of Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi as they fled, Mu Sicheng felt a sense of confusion mixed with relief.

He looked down at himself, fully restored now that the Yin-Yang Roadmap had failed. Turning to Bai Liu, he asked, "If the Zombie Daoist is after the living to kill Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, why isn't it after us? We're alive, yet it's ignoring us."

"This Daoist zombie doesn't hunt the living," Bai Liu said coolly, watching the zombie's retreating figure. "It hunts outsiders."

Mu Sicheng's confusion deepened. "Outsiders? You mean people who aren't from Yinshan Village? But if Kong Xuyang and the others are considered outsiders, then aren't we, too?"

"We were outsiders, too," Bai Liu smiled, his eyes softening as he lovingly patted Mu Sicheng's head. "But after you took over thirty wives from Yinshan Village, we're no longer outsiders."

Mu Sicheng blinked in disbelief. "Wait, according to that logic, you didn't marry anyone from Yinshan Village, right? You're an outsider too! So why didn't the zombie chase you?"

Bai Liu's smile grew even warmer. "What are you talking about, silly child? I officiated your wedding, ate at your banquet, and haunted your bridal chamber. Of course, I'm considered an elder in your family now. How could I be an outsider?"

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Mu Sicheng swallowed his irritation, holding back the words, "That's fucking fine," as he took a deep breath and changed the subject. "What's next? Is that zombie Daoist going to keep us safe?"

Bai Liu shook his head. "According to the mural, the zombie Daoist will go berserk later on. Not only will it kill outsiders, but it will also refine the people in the village. I think it'll hurt us, too."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Then what? Do you know when this zombie Daoist will go berserk?"

Bai Liu thought for a moment. "It should happen on the seventh day of the old men's heads in the temple when the darkness is strongest."

Mu Sicheng paused. "So, we don't have much time left?"

"Right." Bai Liu nodded, stepping outside. "Based on the information we've gathered so far, and from Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi's reactions, we're likely in some kind of competitive game. We're playing roles, and the first to pass—or kill the other person in this role-play—wins."

Bai Liu glanced down at the footprints left by Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang, as they scurried away. "If I'm right, they've played this game before, but they're not familiar with this tomb."

Mu Sicheng clenched his fists, his hostility clear. "Fuck that. I'm sick of people who've been through the game and abused it to cheat others."

"But the next part of the game should be new to them, too." Bai Liu looked up, his smile charming. "I like a fair game, so now we're on the same page again."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Haven't they played before? How can it be strange for them?"

Bai Liu smiled knowingly. "There are different storylines in the game, leading to different endings. From the way they were so afraid of the Daoist zombies and went out of their way to avoid them in the tomb, it's clear they didn't take this storyline last time. Otherwise, they would have known how to deal with the Daoist zombies."

"Simply put, last time, they must have taken the 'normal' route, and that's what they got."

Bai Liu sidled closer, his smile pleasant. "But I've chosen the 'true end' route this time. In this branch of the game, there's an information gap between us and them. It's up to each of us to make the most of it."

With that, Bai Liu turned and walked outside, his expression unreadable.

Mu Sicheng hesitated for a moment. He opened his mouth to ask something, but in the end, said nothing and followed Bai Liu in silence.

If triggering this so-called "true end" line had been Bai Liu's goal from the start, then everything that had happened since they entered the tomb made sense. From the ghost trap that separated them to Mu Sicheng crossing the ghost bridge alone, his soul trapped and married to over thirty brides, to Bai Liu risking his life to save him—everything seemed orchestrated.

The accidental-seeming traps laid by Kong Xuyang allowed them to avoid danger and, strangely, benefited Bai Liu. Because Bai Liu gave his life to save Mu Sicheng, Mu Sicheng was now deeply devoted to him. Because Mu Sicheng married his bride, they managed to avoid the Daoist vampire. And because Kong Xuyang had set up a trap that gathered Yin energy, Bai Liu had managed to awaken the Daoist vampire...

It seemed like, from the very beginning, everything and everyone in this game had been arranged by Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng was nothing more than a puppet in Bai Liu's hands, following the path Bai Liu had laid out and finding it all strangely interesting. Unaware of being used, he gave everything and still felt a strange gratitude.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu's slender back as he walked ahead, holding the candlestick, the light casting a warm glow on his face. But there was no warmth in his eyes, only a coldness that sent a chill down Mu Sicheng's spine.

Bai Liu turned his head and cast a questioning glance, his expression open and unguarded. "What's wrong?"

Mu Sicheng noticed the two sharp teeth peeking from Bai Liu's lips.

The cold feeling in his heart dissipated, and his expression softened. He scratched his head awkwardly. "Nothing... I was just wondering, all this... didn't it make you angry?"

Bai Liu smiled casually. "It's fine. It'll take time to recover. Don't worry about me."

Mu Sicheng sighed in relief, but guilt gnawed at him. His conspiracy theories and malicious assumptions about Bai Liu had been misplaced.

How could someone who had meticulously planned everything and used others so coldly be the same Bai Liu who had nearly died to save him?

Bai Liu held the candlestick, the warm orange light reflecting off his face as his smile remained friendly, though his eyes betrayed no emotion. "We're teammates. It's only right that we help each other."

Mu Sicheng nodded, his tone earnest. "Of course. That's natural."

The Other End

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, both wearing several protective amulets, crouched in the shadow of the bushes, careful not to make a sound as they watched the Daoist vampire standing motionless at the entrance to Yinshan Village in the dead of night.

The zombie's figure was enormous, appearing almost two meters tall in the darkness. It wore a yellow-bottomed black Daoist robe, a yellow crown made of gold and jade, thick-soled black and white cloud boots, and carried a long peach wood sword. A blood-red aura swirled around it, sending an unsettling chill through the air.

Its fangs, long enough to reach its cheeks, were stained with old, rusty blood. Its eyes were ebony and its nose a dark purple on its forehead. Every now and then, a low rumbling sound emanated from its throat, while its fingers twitched slightly, like a warning from a predatory beast.

"Brother Kong..." Yang Zhi whispered, drenched in cold sweat. "Is there anything in your Maoshan Daoist teachings that can control it?"

Kong Xuyang muttered in frustration, "If I had any idea, do you think I'd still be hiding here with you?"

Yang Zhi's legs buckled, and he sank to his knees. "But it's a zombie! There must be some way to stop or slow it down using proper Daoist arts!"

"I do have some spells in this book that can restrain a zombie," Kong Xuyang admitted grimly. "But none of them work on this one. Not only is it a Daoist who's been transformed into a zombie, but it also has the ability to break these spells on its own."

"This thing has golden light around it, meaning it performed many good deeds in its life, and people prayed for its safety after death. It's a heavenly-blessed ghost, making it immune to regular spells."

"What?!" Yang Zhi exclaimed, his confusion clear. "You and I both know this creature was created by a Daoist to live forever. He sacrificed hundreds of people from Yinshan Village to make himself into this ageless, immortal monster. How could there be any golden light around it?"

Kong Xuyang's face darkened. "That Daoist used a twisted form of alchemy—blood sacrifices, forcing his own daughter to die on the way to her wedding, and his elderly father to drown in a weir, all to refine this beast."

"Right," Yang Zhi said, nodding rapidly. "This zombie has been feeding on the resentment of Yinshan Village's descendants, leading to the village's extinction. After a century, it finally regained its full form when its Yin energy was complete."

"Zombies feed on blood, and we've got the blood of Yinshan's descendants in us. This Daoist zombie has been fed by their anger for so long that it instinctively seeks people with a similar scent..."

Yang Zhi shuddered and muttered, "Last game, during the first seven nights, I felt something rush out of the tomb. A player beside me was drained dry, his blood sucked out so fast that in ten seconds, he turned into a mere husk. If we hadn't run, we would have—"

Kong Xuyang cut him off sharply, "Stop it."

The two men fell silent. All that could be heard in the bushes was the chirping of cicadas, the occasional buzz of crickets, and the low, guttural growls from the zombie's throat, mixed with the tense, ragged breathing of Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang.

Sweat dripped from their jaws, their anxiety palpable.

"Damn it," Kong Xuyang cursed through clenched teeth. "I've played so many games, but I've never seen such an evil monster!"

"It kills players with no warning, no major moves, no conditions—it's basically immune to all attacks, with insane attack and defense stats," Yang Zhi added, shaking his head, near tears. "As soon as it's released, there's no time to find its weaknesses. It just kills."

"At least it’s not fully berserk yet," Kong Xuyang said, trying to calm down. "If we can just survive until then, we've been through this once before. It’s not that hard..."

Yang Zhi eyed the zombie nervously. "But Brother Kong, if it's been released, we can't take the [normal end] path we took last time. If we try, we'll be killed in the chase before we even get a chance."

"We have to take the [true end] path, the one that involves deciphering this zombie’s background." Yang Zhi smiled weakly. "First, we need to figure out its weakness to control it."

"But that’s a path we haven't taken yet, and it's dangerous. It’s better than trying to follow Bai Liu, though. He’s already explored the tomb and somehow hasn’t been attacked by this zombie. He has the advantage..."

Kong Xuyang stood still for a moment, his face turning red with anger. He kicked the tree in front of him, trying to vent, but just as he was about to strike, the zombie turned and faced him.

Kong Xuyang immediately shrank back, paralyzed with fear. He didn’t dare to move. After a long moment, once he was sure the zombie wasn’t looking their way, he muttered a quiet curse, "...bitch Bai..."

Before he could finish the word "Liu," the zombie suddenly spun around, baring its fangs and letting out an angry roar as it leaped toward him.

Kong Xuyang, terrified and furious, stumbled over his words in his panic. "Bai Liu isn’t a slut! I’m the slut! I’m the slut, okay, it’s fine!"

The zombie, upon hearing this, seemed to calm slightly, nodding as if satisfied. It turned back toward the village, its eyes dull and lifeless, retreating into a state of madness and ignoring the two men hiding outside.

Yang Zhi: "..."

Kong Xuyang: "..."

Kong Xuyang’s eyes burned with rage, his teeth grinding. "Damn it, why does every zombie keep turning toward Bai Liu?"

Yinshan Village

Seeing Kong Xuyang on the verge of losing control again, Yang Zhi quickly shifted the subject.

"Brother Kong, we still have an advantage. We figured out how to collect the clues for the true ending path during the last round."

Kong Xuyang's eyes were bloodshot, but he forced himself to focus, exhaling deeply. "The Yinshan Village yearbook. The missing sections of the mural are in the village calendar. If we find the yearbook from a hundred years ago, we can piece together the backstory of this Daoist vampire."

"And that's how we find its weakness," Yang Zhi said, patting Kong Xuyang's shoulder to ease his tension. "A player found a page of the calendar in the game last time. Do you remember where they found it?"

Kong Xuyang's eyes shifted toward the hill and the weir hidden in the darkness. He spoke slowly, his voice low, "The mass grave behind the weir."

In the Tomb Passage.

The entrance to the tomb, which had been narrowing steadily, was now broken open with brute force. The walls were marked with deep claw scratches from the zombie.

Bai Liu held up a candlestick, illuminating the area. "These claw marks... they're from the zombie trying to break free."

"That strength is terrifying," Mu Sicheng remarked, comparing the claw marks to his own hand. They were at least two sizes larger, and dug deep into the stone. His scalp tingled. "If this zombie goes berserk, it wouldn't take much to scratch us to death."

"We need to finish this before that happens," Bai Liu said calmly.

Bai Liu approached the entrance where they had crawled in. Stepping on Mu Sicheng's shoulder, he vaulted upwards.

The entrance to the tomb was under a bed. As Mu Sicheng was about to crawl out from underneath it, Bai Liu grabbed him by the shoulders.

Bai Liu looked beyond the bed, his voice steady. "There's light. Someone's outside."

Mu Sicheng then noticed the faint flickering of silvery-white and grey-black light on the floor beneath the bed, accompanied by the soft sound of electricity crackling and multiple voices speaking intermittently.

The voices, at times rough and at times delicate, seemed distant, as though separated by a layer of something. They didn't sound like real people speaking.

"...These devils will freeze us, starve us, kill us. But as long as we have breath, we'll hold this place and keep outsiders from taking it..."

"But with all the men gone, leaving only the old and sick, where can we keep them? We can't keep them..."

"When are the men coming back? The daughters-in-law should go to the bridge at the village entrance again! Don't forget the umbrella, it's been raining a lot lately... almost Ching Ming..."

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng exchanged a glance and immediately understood the source of the voices.

"The sound of a TV," Mu Sicheng murmured. "Someone's watching television."

Bai Liu gestured for him to go first, then deftly slipped out from beside the bed. He knelt in the shadows, his form hidden from the TV's glow, and silently observed the scene, as if confirming something.

Once certain, Bai Liu made a quiet "shh" gesture, signaling for Mu Sicheng to come out more quietly.

Relieved, Mu Sicheng crawled out from under the bed. But when he stood and turned around, he froze, gasping in horror. He quickly ducked down next to Bai Liu, whispering in shock, "What the hell?!"

By the bed at the entrance sat two elderly men with their backs to them, their white hair stark against the dark room. The old men faced an old wooden cabinet with rotting edges, inside which sat a small, square, outdated FM television, no more than 12 or 13 inches.

The picture on the screen was black and white, flickering and blurring intermittently, but the two men seemed transfixed, leaning forward, their backs rigid as they stared intently at the screen.

The light from the TV illuminated their faces vaguely. Dark spots surrounded their cloudy eyes, and something was wriggling in their mouths and noses as if trying to crawl out. White dots, resembling worms, stretched and contracted in their ears. Despite this, their faces remained fixed in wooden smiles, their lips moving rapidly, as though speaking.

Mu Sicheng held his breath but didn't hear any sound from the two old men's throats. Soon, however, he realized where their voices were coming from.

The movements of their mouths matched the voices coming from the TV.

Bai Liu glanced at the TV set. "They're dubbing the people on the TV."

The flickering black-and-white images on the screen appeared to be old archival footage. Several plain, old-fashioned women sat by the door of Yinshan Village, wearing small boots and traditional clothing, kneeling beside a coffin. They waved white handkerchiefs and covered their faces with long tears, with unfolded white umbrellas at their sides.

Mu Sicheng whispered, "These women are dressed like the martyred bridge ghosts. Are they living martyred bridge ghosts?"

Bai Liu nodded slightly. "I think so."

The eerie-looking old men continued to open and close their mouths, their voices in sync with the TV.

"Men are dead, too many to fit in the grave..."

"…torn to pieces by those ghost things, can't even get into the ancestral graves, can't see their ancestors..."

"Put them in a coffin and bury them at the mountain at the other end of the bridge, so they can rest properly."

"O, my ingrate! You died a horrible death! How am I supposed to live with this?"

The women sobbed as they clung to the coffin, unwilling to let go, on the verge of fainting. Eventually, they followed the men carrying the coffin across the weir and onto the bridge.

Their faces were streaked with dried tears. They held umbrellas to shield the coffins, trying to prevent the mutilated bodies and souls from being damaged by the sun.

But as they crossed the bridge, these women, having lost their husbands, looked at the long rows of coffins falling into the mountains. While carrying the coffins beneath their umbrellas, they suddenly folded them up and, without a second thought, jumped off the bridge, holding the umbrellas tightly.

Below the bridge, a shallow stream awaited them. The women crashed into the piers, their heads broken and bleeding.

They clutched their umbrellas in death, staring longingly at the distant coffins on the bridge with sad, forlorn expressions.

The moment the coffins were out of sight, they slowly closed their eyes and collapsed into the water, motionless. Their blood stained their traditional clothes, umbrellas, and the clear water below.

Mu Sicheng felt a chill run down his spine, but Bai Liu stared at the image intently, as though searching for something.

Mu Sicheng, feeling more and more uncomfortable, asked, "Who are you looking for, Bai Liu? There can't be anyone you know in there, can there?"

"Maybe," Bai Liu replied, his gaze still fixed on the screen.

Mu Sicheng was startled but quickly regained his composure. "No, Bai Liu, you don’t have a memory. There are only a few people you know —me, Kong Xuyang, Yang Zhi. I know them all."

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng briefly. "I’m looking for someone outside the picture."

"Off-screen…" Mu Sicheng was confused. "What does that mean?"

Bai Liu answered calmly, "Neither you nor I know the person in the image, but there may be someone outside the frame who looks familiar to both of us."

Mu Sicheng's confusion deepened. "It was a hundred years ago. Who could we have known?"

"You missed one person—the one who took this picture," Bai Liu said, still staring at the image. "If I'm right, this person is someone you'll recognize the first time you see them."

Curiosity outweighed his fear. Mu Sicheng clutched his chest, frowning as he stared at the edge of the frame, trying to spot the person holding the camera.

Soon, Mu Sicheng saw the figure adjusting the camera, making his face visible.

As soon as the cameraman's face entered the frame, Mu Sicheng turned to Bai Liu in shock. "Why does he look like that?"

Bai Liu remained calm. "What else? What do you think he'd look like?"

Mu Sicheng, pointing at the flickering cameraman on the screen, was on the verge of jumping up and down. "He looks just like me!"

The cameraman on the black-and-white TV was dressed in an old-fashioned, modern style—wearing a three-piece Little Ma suit and leather shoes. He had a mourning hat on his head and a tear-stained face. He was adjusting the camera while writing something in a yearbook with a quill pen.

Bai Liu observed the man. "He's probably the village calendarist."

The village calendarist recorded the village's fortunes, big and small, and also documented the missing information on the mural.

"How do you know he'll look like me?" Mu Sicheng asked, his curiosity piqued. He came closer to Bai Liu, eager for an explanation.

Bai Liu glanced at Mu Sicheng and the camera hanging around his neck, which had been recording, and spoke up.

"I'm just guessing. We're in a game where we play four roles, and all four characters are descendants of Yinshan Village."

"From the props and quests we've obtained, the four roles are a grave robber, a decent warlock, a villainous warlock, and a cameraman."

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng. "Don't you think it makes more sense to move this setting forward a hundred years?"

Mu Sicheng’s eyes widened as he began to understand. "So, you think it’s not the role we’re playing now, but the role we’ll play a hundred years from now?"

"Exactly," Bai Liu said. "To be precise, we’re playing the roles of the descendants." He tapped eight times on the floor, connecting the dots. "If this is a well-designed game with tight logic, and you’re the cameraman—the recorder of paranormal events—and now we have a cameraman in front of us, someone who uses a chronological calendar to record misfortunes and fortunes, with tasks overlapping by up to 80%, then I personally think there’s a strong chance you’re a descendant of him."

"If I were designing this game, I’d adjust your appearance to remind you of that."

Mu Sicheng finally understood. "So, you're saying he looks like me!"

Mu Sicheng stroked his chin, about to ask for more details, when the sudden sound of a bench shifting in front of him startled him.

The two old men sitting ahead of them stood up stiffly and hurried to turn off the TV, pressing the FM button. However, the old TV with its faulty connections didn't seem to respond very well.

Mu Sicheng was about to inquire about what was going on when Bai Liu tapped him on the shoulder and gestured for him to look under the cupboard.

There, lying quietly, was the plug of the TV—completely unplugged.

An unplugged TV with artificially dubbed voices...

Mu Sicheng slowly turned to look at Bai Liu, cold sweat starting to bead on his forehead. He muttered, his voice shaky, "So this isn't a TV broadcast at all..."

"It's the actual picture," Bai Liu replied calmly.

The images on the TV flickered and jerked, freezing into place.

Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng appeared on the black-and-white screen, cowering in a corner.

Around them, a circle of women with their heads hanging low stood, dressed in birthday attire, holding birthday handkerchiefs. Two open coffins were placed directly in front of them.

From behind the tiny television, a pair of green and black hands slowly emerged, followed by a cracked black head, its features twisted into grotesque shapes, squinting at Bai Liu and the others.

The old man, whose back had been turned to them, twisted his head a full 180 degrees. His previously loving expression was now a hateful grimace, his teeth bared as his voice echoed from the television.

"You descendants have finally returned. Drag them to the mass grave and put them to rest!"

Without hesitation, Bai Liu grabbed Mu Sicheng, still dazed, and yanked him toward the two coffins, leaping over them and running for their lives.

The ghosts behind them were like black, spider-like shadows, crawling in all directions toward the wall. Their faces were twisted with grim determination as they pursued Bai Liu and the two old men. Their heads turned backward as they laughed maniacally, waving their arms and legs in a grotesque display while chasing after them.

The two old men moved quickly, walking backward but with unnatural speed. In the blink of an eye, they were almost upon Mu Sicheng, their green and white faces twisted in joy, their fangs bared and mouths dripping.

“Shit!” Mu Sicheng snapped back to reality, recoiling in fear. He grabbed Bai Liu’s arm, and they ran wildly, barely escaping.

They burst out of the house, with the terrifying figures hot on their heels. The dark, mist-covered village seemed to stretch endlessly, and Mu Sicheng aimed for the temple ahead, hoping it would be their safest bet.

As they neared the temple, Mu Sicheng noticed the lights flickering at the entrance. In the flashing light, five figures stood by a wreath at the temple's door, waving slowly and shakily at them, as though beckoning them to come closer.

Mu Sicheng hesitated but stepped forward, his heart pounding. He saw five old men in birthday attire, their faces a sickly shade of green, black, and purple, their smiles twisted but affectionate. They waved at them with long, black fingernails—each nail more than an inch long.

Inside the temple were seven open coffins.

“Five here, two inside the house—exactly seven,” Bai Liu observed quickly. “At this point, the Yin energy is too strong. These seven old men have all escaped their coffins, and there’s no way they’re going back inside the temple now.”

Mu Sicheng, running desperately, asked urgently, “So where do we go now?!”

Bai Liu made a swift decision. “Nowhere’s safe at this hour. We’re heading to the mass grave at the bridge.”

“Huh?!” Mu Sicheng was stunned. “Why go there?!”

“To dig graves,” Bai Liu replied nonchalantly.

Mu Sicheng shuddered. “Digging graves? Why?!”

“The village calendar keeper records the village’s events—happiness, funerals, marriages... At funerals, he writes the biography of the deceased and buries it with the village calendar for that day,” Bai Liu explained quickly, still running. “The mass grave was built later and only contains certain bodies—most people from Yinshan Village are not buried there.”

Mu Sicheng’s eyes widened in realization. “Are you saying that what happened to those men when they died over a hundred years ago was written down in the almanac by the chronicler and buried with their coffins on the mountain?”

“Exactly,” Bai Liu nodded. “And it's not just that. Remember the catacombs, when we met the paper dodger crossing the ghost bridge to chase away the zombies? I think those zombies are the men buried on the other side of the hill who died there.”

Mu Sicheng suddenly understood. “Yes, those zombies were torn apart and then sewn back together, just like on TV. They’re like the husbands of those martyred bridge ghosts...”

“Yes!” Mu Sicheng finally realized, fully grasping the connection.

Bai Liu sprinted towards the village entrance, breathing heavily but speaking quickly. "The paper Daoist is the incarnation of the zombie Daoist. On one hand, it led these zombie men over the bridge from the hill to the village, and on the other, it manipulated the ghosts of the helpers to move the bride coffins out of the tomb and into the village, ultimately draining the anger from the last seven descendants of the village."

"By the time the extreme number of the seventh day of the first month converges, the Yin Qi gathered from these heavy accumulations of Yin grievances, combined with this evil art of corpse refining that has lasted for a hundred years, will be enough for this zombie Daoist to take form, appear in the world, and go on a killing spree."

Bai Liu reached the entrance of the village and finally stopped.

The ghosts behind him hissed in fear from a distance, as if they were scared of something nearby and didn’t dare approach. In front of Bai Liu, next to the village pagoda, stood a tall, flat-faced Taoist zombie.

Its hands were raised, its face covered in yellow talismans, yet it stood still, unmoving.

Bai Liu stared at the zombie for a while before suddenly walking up and tearing the two Yin Corpse Talismans off its face.

Once the talismans were removed, the zombie's face was partially revealed.

In contrast to its tall, imposing figure, the zombie's closed eyes were surrounded by dark shadows, with clear, handsome brows and a dead white complexion.

Mu Sicheng glanced back, his eyes flickering between Bai Liu's face and the zombie's, then looked almost confused. "…Bai Liu, this zombie looks just like you!"

Yes, aside from its height, the zombie bore a striking resemblance to Bai Liu, who had been working late all week.

Bai Liu remained calm. "I use evil magic, and this zombie Daoist also uses evil magic. I must be his descendant; it makes sense that I look like him."

"You knew this zombie looked like you, which is why you used so many Yin Corpse Talismans to cover its face, so Kong Xuyang and the others wouldn't recognize it when you released it." Mu Sicheng suddenly realized something. "This zombie isn't chasing you because you're its descendant, is it?"

Bai Liu answered casually, "I suppose so."

"…Strange…" Mu Sicheng rubbed his chin. "Didn't you say Kong Xuyang and the others played a game? They're terrified of this zombie, so they must have seen it before. Given that this zombie's face resembles one of the players around them, why didn't they notice the role-playing setting of descendants?"

"I've thought about that too," Bai Liu replied thoughtfully. "But from their last reaction, I think Kong Xuyang was very fearful and avoided this zombie's close presence. He crawled furiously on the ground with his head lowered as soon as it came near him. I have a feeling he wouldn't have faced this zombie directly."

"And Yang Zhi keeps turning to look at this zombie. I think he's seen its face before."

"That's strange," Mu Sicheng said, frowning. "Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang both should have played the game before, but Yang Zhi seems completely unaware of many things, just like us. For instance, Yang Zhi has clearly encountered this zombie, but he doesn't seem to know the setting at all. He could probably guess the truth just from seeing its face."

"Why can't Yang Zhi remember? This game is so terrifying, how could he forget?" Mu Sicheng wondered.

Bai Liu suddenly shifted the topic. "In what kinds of situations do people forget intense, traumatic experiences?"

Mu Sicheng thought for a moment. "Maybe they encountered something even more impactful? Maybe they're just forgetful? Memory loss?"

"Tsk." Mu Sicheng shook his head with a frown. "These reasons don't quite fit. It doesn't look like Yang Zhi has lost his memory, since it's us who've lost ours. It's odd that he can't remember the scene."

Bai Liu slowly turned his head toward Mu Sicheng and smiled. "You just reminded me."

Mu Sicheng's scalp tingled at the eerie smile. "Remind you of what?"

"Besides memory loss, there's another reason a person might confuse or forget a powerful, traumatic experience," Bai Liu said, looking at the zombie's face, which eerily resembled his own. "It could be a confused memory."

Mu Sicheng blinked in confusion. "Confused? No way! It hasn't been decades, how could he confuse something like that?"

"If you're talking about Yang Zhi, it has been decades." Bai Liu's smile curved deeper. "Don't you think it's a little unfair that we lose our memories as soon as we enter this tournament-style game?"

Mu Sicheng hesitated. "What do you mean?"

Bai Liu's gaze turned toward Mu Sicheng. "In a game with such bizarre settings, like ghosts and gods, does Yang Zhi have his own powers as a player? Maybe he has a memory-devouring charm or something."

"And what if he devoured decades of memories from both of us, causing his own memories to blur? That would make him unable to remember much of what he experienced in his last game—like this zombie's face."

Mu Sicheng thought Bai Liu's theory was outrageous and was about to refute it. But as he considered it, he realized all of Yang Zhi's inconsistencies seemed to line up, and he swallowed his objections.

The idea of having one's memories consumed was utterly repulsive—like having a private diary exposed to a stranger uninterested in it.

Mu Sicheng rubbed his arms uneasily and asked, "What if Yang Zhi really did swallow our memories? He won't find something in them to use against us, will he?"

"Against us?" Bai Liu smiled carelessly. "Do you think your memories are harmless?"

Mu Sicheng was stunned. "No, it's not... it's not good to have someone like Yang Zhi read your memories!"

Bai Liu turned his gaze from Mu Sicheng and looked out into the endless darkness of the night beyond Yinshan Village. He spoke plainly, "Some people's memories are like cotton candy. Swallowing them won't do any harm, and they'll return as sweet as ever. But others' memories are more like diaries—swallowing them gives someone a handle to blackmail you."

"I think I could develop that kind of personality," Bai Liu added with a smirk, "and my memories probably wouldn't be pleasant."

He turned back with a crooked smile. "Swallowing them could feel as painful as swallowing a razor blade."

Yinshan Village

Yang Zhi's body was drenched in an icy chill, and he winced, slowly awakening from a trance-like nightmare.

Beside him, Kong Xuyang frowned as he looked at Yang Zhi, who was crouched next to him. "What's going on with you? You've been out of it," he said.

Yang Zhi shook his head vigorously, trying to clear his mind, forcing a weak smile onto his pale face. "I don't know what's happening. The more I process Bai Liu's memories, the easier it is to slip into his past. It never used to be like this..."

Kong Xuyang's interest piqued as he mentioned Bai Liu. "What do you mean by 'slipping into his past'?"

Yang Zhi furrowed his brow. "His memory is strange. It's as if there are three layers of overlapping areas."

Kong Xuyang raised an eyebrow. "What overlapping areas? Weak points? Private memories?"

"No... nothing like that," Yang Zhi replied, his voice uncertain. "It feels like the memories have been overwritten, creating another layer over the original ones. It's strange when I try to process it, like eating the same memories over and over from the same period."

Kong Xuyang's curiosity deepened. "So, Bai Liu's memories were wiped and rewritten, you think?"

Yang Zhi nodded slowly. "It seems like it. His life has been full of confusion."

Kong Xuyang smiled meaningfully. "Well, at least the monster we're watching hasn't moved. Tell me more."

He sat down, putting on a bored expression. "I haven't heard anything interesting tonight. Tell me something to cheer me up."

Yang Zhi glanced at Kong Xuyang, then said deliberately, "Bai Liu first experienced this memory collapse at fourteen, back when he was raised in a private orphanage."

Kong Xuyang's eyes narrowed. "The childhood of a typical loser, then?"

Yang Zhi's face grew uncomfortable as he continued, "Bai Liu faced a lot of discrimination and abuse in that orphanage. The director didn't like him and often punished him for trivial things, like claiming he hadn't finished his chores or study tasks on time. Sometimes, the punishment was to make him stand barefoot in a bucket of water in the snow during winter, or to cut ice in sub-zero temperatures to clean the pond behind the orphanage."

Kong Xuyang whistled in amusement. "Sounds like the typical life of a loser."

"But these memories were altered," Yang Zhi continued. "The final memory left on Bai Liu's side is that he grew up in a well-managed public orphanage, with good treatment and no abuse or torture. He did have issues with rebellion, but the teachers and director treated him well."

Kong Xuyang clicked his tongue. "Well, if the abuse is erased from memory, there's no lasting trauma. So, what about the second memory layer?"

Yang Zhi's expression grew more serious. "The second memory overlap happened at eighteen, just a few months before his entrance exams."

"Gao Kao?" Kong Xuyang smirked. "I checked his college entrance exam results—they were only around 400 points. Far lower than mine."

Yang Zhi frowned. "Even though someone might have altered his memories to spare him from childhood trauma, Bai Liu still didn't manage well academically."

Kong Xuyang raised an eyebrow. "Over 300? Did he skip three years of high school?"

Yang Zhi shook his head. "Bai Liu never really paid attention in class. He usually slept through it. A good friend of his, Lu Yizhan, tried to keep him focused, but it didn't last. He'd skip evening study sessions and go out to play games."

"He even got into serious trouble in his senior year," Yang Zhi continued. "It went on his record, and the whole school criticized him. His grades only got worse after that."

"How bad were his grades?" Kong Xuyang asked, intrigued.

Yang Zhi responded, "They were so low that he barely passed. What do you expect when you don't study? But the real trouble came when he tricked some classmates into stealing money from their families for gambling. It escalated to armed fights involving tens of thousands of dollars. He almost went to jail."

Kong Xuyang raised an eyebrow. "And yet, the school didn't expel him?"

"No," Yang Zhi said. "Fang Dian, the top student in his class, and Lu Yizhan, another top student, both threatened to leave the school if Bai Liu was expelled. They went up to the flagpole in front of the whole school and took all the blame on themselves, forcing the school to let Bai Liu stay."

Kong Xuyang whistled. "And what happened to Bai Liu after that?"

"He was still bullied," Yang Zhi replied. "His desk kept getting moved, and his bed was constantly ruined, splashed with water and other things. It was school bullying, but Bai Liu didn't care. If his desk was gone, he'd just change classrooms. If he couldn't sleep in his dorm room, he'd sneak out to an internet café and sleep there instead."

Kong Xuyang clicked his tongue. "A real gangster."

Yang Zhi's expression grew increasingly strange. "But at this point, someone suddenly appeared in Bai Liu's memory."

"Or perhaps it's not quite right to call it a person," Yang Zhi continued. "This entity could only be seen by Bai Liu—no one else. It's like a companion ghost, or the kind of imaginary 'friend' a lonely child might create when something goes wrong in their mind."

"This ghost followed him silently, appearing and disappearing with him every day. Bai Liu never pushed it away. It would crouch like a dog every night in front of the chair where Bai Liu slept, occasionally resting its head on him and curling up beside him."

Kong Xuyang snorted. "Bai Liu's brain is messed up, isn't it? I mean, it's honestly surprising his mind hasn't cracked sooner, given everything he's been through."

"… I don't know if it's Bai Liu's brain that's messed up, or if it's me, consuming too much of his memories and getting confused," Yang Zhi muttered, running her fingers through her hair, her voice trailing off. "This ghost… this friend of his, appearing out of nowhere at the end of high school... someone he couldn't tell if he imagined or not..."

Yang Zhi paused, staring at Kong Xuyang. "It… it looks exactly like Spades."

Kong Xuyang froze, his eyes wide. "What?!"

Meanwhile...

Bai Liu led Mu Sicheng around a weir, crossing a dry stone bridge as they followed the path shown on the television, eventually reaching a wild mountain range filled with graves.

The graves varied in size—from new ones to old, some recently buried and others long forgotten. Even after Qingming, remnants of offerings still lay scattered about: unburned paper money, half-burned candles stuck in the ground, firecracker strings hanging from gnarled trees, and scattered afterlife money.

The newer graves belonged to the recently deceased villagers of Yinshan, with neat marble headstones and laser-engraved epitaphs. In contrast, the older graves were little more than weathered mounds, sometimes accompanied by crude gravestones that were barely legible.

Mu Sicheng, holding his camera in night-vision mode, carefully snapped photos of the gravestones under the eerie green light.

In the darkness, the tombstone photos came alive, revealing elderly faces with white hair and warm smiles, now twisted into cynical expressions. The same faces that had once greeted the living with kindness now stared bitterly at the two uninvited guests disturbing their graves.

Mu Sicheng folded his hands in prayer, whispering, "I am not to blame for disturbing you."

Bai Liu, standing a distance away, waved him over. "Mu Sicheng, come here and take a shot from this angle."

Mu Sicheng carefully stepped over the grave markers and aimed his camera in the direction Bai Liu indicated, squinting. "What's this?"

In front of the graves, three white porcelain wine cups lay, stained with a little ash and wine. Nearby, there were three plates of raw meat, each with distinct colors and textures. A pile of gold paper money was stacked on the ground, and incense pillars burned in the front, surrounded by two candles and a small money garment burning with an eerie glow.

"This is an arrangement for [borrowing Yin wealth]. Someone came here before me and set up these offerings. The villagers of Yinshan, where they were buried, used to perform this ritual to borrow Yin energy and wealth. But now, this place can no longer grant that power. I can’t complete my mission here," Bai Liu explained, looking up at Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth. "Damn, Kong Xuyang, that bastard is at it again!"

Yinshan Village

"If you can't draw Yin energy here, can you get it from the tomb instead? You're a descendant of the Vampire Daoist, after all," Mu Sicheng asked, looking up.

Bai Liu shook his head. "That's not a good idea. The Vampire Daoist is at a crucial stage of gathering Yin energy. If I cast a spell at its tomb to siphon Yin energy for money right now, it wouldn't be borrowing—it'd be stealing. And that would make us enemies."

"So we're just giving up on this mission?" Mu Sicheng's face darkened, his expression stormy with frustration.

He glanced at Bai Liu—and then froze.

Even though Bai Liu had just had his mission stolen, there was a faint smile on his face. It didn't reach his eyes or the corners of his mouth, yet somehow, it made him look eerily relaxed. Dangerous, even.

"No," Bai Liu said, tilting his head slightly, his smile deepening. "You've been waiting until now to make a move. That takes patience."

Mu Sicheng hesitated, watching Bai Liu's knowing expression before realization dawned on him. His voice turned wary. "You're not... deliberately pushing Kong Xuyang and the others into a corner so they'll have no choice but to take on your mission, are you?"

Bai Liu blinked innocently. "What? How could I ever be so evil as to steal someone else's mission?"

Mu Sicheng: "....."

He had watched every step Bai Liu took, yet he still couldn't tell if Bai Liu was doing this on purpose—or just playing dumb.

"So are we still doing this mission?" Mu Sicheng frowned. "But according to you, it's impossible now."

"No, it's still doable." Bai Liu took two steps to the side and gestured for Mu Sicheng to look at the ground.

Mu Sicheng adjusted the camera, and in its eerie green glow, he saw seven neatly arranged rectangular pits beneath them.

Each pit was uniform in size, with marble headstones in front of them. The headstones bore black-and-white photographs of the seven elderly men from the temple.

Mu Sicheng recoiled in shock, nearly stumbling into one of the pits. He gripped the camera tightly and staggered back, his voice trembling. "Wait… are these… the graves of the seven old men? They were dug out, but they haven't been buried yet?"

Bai Liu nodded. "Kong Xuyang used the Yin energy of the other ancestors buried here. But these seven? He couldn't touch them."

Mu Sicheng quickly put two and two together. "Because they haven't been buried yet!" His eyes brightened as he elbowed Bai Liu, grinning. "You're a quick thinker. So, once they're buried, you're planning to use their Yin energy to make money?"

Bai Liu effortlessly dodged the elbow and smiled. "That's the plan."

"But Kong Xuyang isn't stupid. He must've accounted for these seven, right? He wouldn't leave such an obvious loophole." Bai Liu turned to the empty graves. "Normally, they'd be buried after the first seven days. But after the first seven days…"

Mu Sicheng's face fell as he made the connection. "The Daoist zombie goes berserk!" He cursed under his breath. "Shit. Then what do we do?"

Bai Liu looked up at the sky. "If the normal funeral process won't work, we'll just have to go with an abnormal one. Once daylight comes, we'll head back to the village and bring the coffins here for an early burial."

Mu Sicheng gulped, already dreading the idea of returning to the village. "We're going back at dawn, then. But what do we do until then?"

Bai Liu clapped a hand on his shoulder, smiling lightly. "It's a dark and windy night—perfect for digging graves. Come on, let's figure out which one we need to dig up first."

Even though Mu Sicheng was athletic and used to physical exertion, he suddenly felt weak. Maybe it was from running all night, or maybe…

He let out a deep breath, adjusted his camera, and followed after Bai

Liu like a man heading to his doom.

"Bai Liu, slow down a little. If you step on something…"

Meanwhile—
Kong Xuyang crouched next to Yang Zhi, his brow furrowed. "Bai Liu… you can see this much in just the second layer of memory folds?"

Yang Zhi smiled bitterly. "Bai Liu's memories are incredibly complex. Especially the folded sections—when I try to peer through them, many parts are blurry or disconnected."

He exhaled sharply. "What I do know is that his second memory fold completely erased the existence of that Spades-like apparition."

"So Bai Liu doesn't remember meeting someone who looked exactly like Spades when he was eighteen?" Kong Xuyang narrowed his eyes.

Yang Zhi nodded. "His memories have been rewritten—he would recall studying normally, taking his entrance exams, then heading off to university."

Kong Xuyang grew more puzzled. "So… some top player who can modify and collapse memories went out of their way to make Bai Liu forget an imaginary friend? One that looks exactly like Spades?"

Yang Zhi nodded again.

Kong Xuyang clicked his tongue. "That's weird as hell… Who would waste that kind of effort on a loser who only scored around 300 in high school?"

But he didn't linger on the thought for long. He leaned in eagerly. "What about Bai Liu's third memory fold?"

Yang Zhi's expression tensed. "I haven't fully digested it yet, but I can make out some general details."

She took a deep breath. "The memory fold happened when Bai Liu had just graduated and started working. About a year ago."

Yang Zhi clenched her fists, sweat beading at her forehead as she concentrated. "…Something bad must have happened. His memories are chaotic. It looks like he spent a lot of time in a hospital."

Her breathing grew uneven. "There was a strong smell of disinfectant. Bai Liu was sitting on a bench outside a ward, his hands covered in blood, his head down. He seemed… very emotional."

Yang Zhi trembled, her voice almost dry. "…It was overwhelming."

Kong Xuyang rubbed his chin, grinning. "A year ago? I was dominating the pre-season tournament back then. Won every match, made it to the challenge round."

He laughed. "Sounds like Bai Liu was having the worst time of his life while I was having the best."

"Maybe that's the difference between a successful person and a loser." Kong Xuyang sighed theatrically, spreading his hands.

Yang Zhi, lost in his memories of Bai Liu, didn't respond.

It felt as if he had fallen beneath the surface of a frozen lake—he could faintly hear Kong Xuyang's smug voice, but the meaning of the words barely registered.

The memory of Bai Liu's chilling indifference surged through Yang Zhi's limbs, paralyzing him. It was as though he were sinking into deep water, eyes wide open, on the verge of suffocation.

Bai Liu sat motionless at the end of the corridor, slumped forward, his hands clasped tightly against his head. Orange juice dripped from the ends of his soaked hair, pooling near a battered bag of oranges at his feet.

His white shirt and shoes were splattered with blood. A bloodstained baseball bat rested against the back of the chair beside him.

The noise of the crowd seemed muffled by an invisible barrier. Yang Zhi could only catch fragments of hushed conversation:

"... hit directly by a motorbike."

"I heard they were a kindergarten teacher..."

"A kindergarten teacher? You mean that incident today, where those bikers sped straight into a kindergarten?!"

"You're remembering it wrong. That never happened. It was a kindergarten teacher who, after work, saw a gang surrounding someone on the road. They stepped in to help, but got hit—sent flying several meters. I heard their intestines were spilling out..."

"They were taken to the ER this afternoon. Haven't come out yet..."

Yang Zhi watched as Bai Liu, still seated on the bench, slowly tightened his grip on his head—so tightly that his knuckles turned white.

The oppressive intensity of Bai Liu's emotions made Yang Zhi's thoughts scatter. The voices around him blurred, yet the details felt eerily familiar.

Bikers. A kindergarten. A crime that happened—and yet, had been erased...

Then, it came back to him.

It was as if Bai Liu's emotions had forced open a locked space in Yang Zhi's mind. The memory unfolded with brutal clarity.

Yes. This had happened.

But against which team? Yang Zhi still couldn't recall.

They had targeted so many people. After every attack, they made sure to erase all traces of it. By the end of the day, remembering the victims' faces felt like a waste of effort.

But they did keep records. They documented their victims through photos—trophies of tragedy, used to mock rivals and stir unrest.

And yet, strangely, this particular kindergarten teacher—the one they had clearly attacked—left no trace in their records.

Yang Zhi finally realized: his own memory had been altered.

But he couldn't remember who had done it.

Now, however, under the force of Bai Liu's emotions, those suppressed memories were unraveling.

Yang Zhi turned his gaze toward Bai Liu.

They had attacked Bai Liu.

Along with that kindergarten teacher.

The two were connected—targets in a strategic assault orchestrated by some warring tactician.

Kong Xuyang always liked to prepare multiple plans in advance. He had sent a photo of the kindergarten teacher to the opposing tactician, making it seem like she was their only target. But in reality, even her friend—Bai Liu, a mere twenty-two-year-old—had been marked for elimination.

It had been an unsuccessful attack.

The woman was nothing like they had expected. A kindergarten teacher, yet absurdly strong and agile—she had jumped from the first-floor window with one hand braced against the frame, landing as if stepping onto solid ground.

Like something out of an action movie, she had snatched a baseball bat from a wall and, with uncanny precision, single-handedly taken down an entire gang of bikers.

They had lost. Humiliated.

To erase all evidence of the attack, they had no choice but to offer points to the system—wiping out any record of the kindergarten incident.

Kong Xuyang, ever the strategist, had already prepared a backup plan: an ambush on Bai Liu.

Shifting their focus, they turned to Bai Liu, who was walking home from work.

But the woman was perceptive. Too perceptive.

She figured out their next move almost immediately.

Revving her electric bike, she sped after them, determined to intercept the attack.

The electric bike was sturdy—almost like a motorbike in her hands. The way she handled it, racing full speed toward them, wielding a baseball bat—it was enough to make even the most reckless of them hesitate.

Still, they had anticipated this.

Their ambush had been set long before Bai Liu turned the corner into a dimly lit alley.

He carried nothing but a bag of oranges.

And then—

A dozen motorcycles, each weighing hundreds of kilos, roared toward him. If they hit, Bai Liu would be reduced to nothing more than pulp on the pavement.

The attack was in motion.

Their side charged forward.

She was still ten meters away from Bai Liu.

Too far.

Too late.

There was no time to shout a warning. No time to stop them.

It was over.

But the woman was relentless.

To protect Bai Liu—

She didn’t hesitate.

She didn’t stop.

At full speed, she swerved her bike, veering directly between Bai Liu and the oncoming motorcycles.

And then—

She crashed. Knocked away in an instant.

Yinshan Village

The red light above the hospital's resuscitation room flickered off. Bai Liu, seated on a bench, slowly lifted his head. His gaze passed over Yang Zhi, who stood in front of him, and landed on the resuscitation room behind him. Their eyes met briefly in a seemingly casual exchange.

In that fleeting moment, Yang Zhi knew Bai Liu couldn't actually see him, yet he still felt an eerie chill crawl through his body, as if his mouth, nose, and internal organs had turned to ice.

He had expected him to rush into the resuscitation room immediately. But he didn't. Instead, he merely glanced at the now-darkened sign, then averted his eyes.

Bai Liu made a small movement that sent a shiver down Yang Zhi's spine—lowering his head, he reached for the bag of oranges that had fallen at his feet, selecting one that remained intact. His long, pale fingers peeled it open, segment by segment, and he placed each piece in his mouth with an almost deliberate slowness.

Drops of juice dripped from his fingers onto the floor.

Then, in a flat, almost indifferent tone, Bai Liu remarked, "What a waste. So few survived the fall… and they weren't cheap."

His words and actions were ordinary, but in Bai Liu's memory, Yang Zhi could clearly sense a deep, underlying malice. A violent intent so visceral it sent a wave of nausea rolling through him. The sheer intensity of it made him struggle to wake from the memory.

He gasped awake, drenched in cold sweat. His face was ashen, his breath coming in ragged pants.

"What's wrong with you now?" Kong Xuyang's irritated voice cut in. "You were talking, then you just stopped. If you've got something to say, say it. Don't just leave people hanging."

Yang Zhi shook his head, trying to open his mouth, but no sound came out. His throat and nose felt as if they were stuffed with damp cotton. His vision blurred, the world spinning in fragmented, multicolored light.

The murderous intent Bai Liu had directed at the killer was suffocating—overwhelming in its raw intensity. Yang Zhi couldn't process or withstand it. It swallowed him whole, dragging him under like a tidal wave.

...It was terrifying.

Yang Zhi had digested countless memories before, yet never had he encountered emotions this extreme—so powerful that merely glimpsing them triggered a physical reaction of resistance.

But what was even more terrifying was how calm Bai Liu had been.

Despite the sheer weight of his emotions, he carried them with unsettling ease, as if he had long grown accustomed to suppressing such monstrous depths of feeling.

Yang Zhi trembled, bile rising in his throat, before barely regaining his composure. He reached out, gripping Kong Xuyang's arm for support, but before he could speak, his eyes lit up with excitement.

"They're coming," he interrupted.

From the darkness of the cemetery, several mutilated corpses staggered forward. Their heads turned side to side, sniffing at the grave mounds one by one, as if searching for their own resting places.

Kong Xuyang held his breath. Yang Zhi didn't dare breathe.

They had waited here for over an hour, watching for the moment the zombies would return to their graves.

The problem was, there were too many burial sites. No names, no monuments. And not every grave contained someone tied to the main backstory—meaning the village calendars buried with these corpses might not be the ones Kong Xuyang needed.

Digging them up one by one would be inefficient—and dangerous. Some graves contained nothing but empty dirt, while others might hold restless spirits, waiting to attack the first fool to disturb them.

After weighing their options, Kong Xuyang had come up with a plan—watch and wait.

At dawn, the paper daoist would drive these zombies back into their graves, like cattle returning to their pens. Then, at night, the paper daoist would summon them again, pairing them with the lingering Bridge Martyr ghosts to quell their resentment and reunite them with their lost spouses.

This meant that any zombies returning to their graves now were directly linked to the main plotline. All Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi needed to do was track which graves the zombies entered—then dig up those specific ones to find the calendars buried within.

Kong Xuyang smirked, pressing the talisman of disguise on his forehead. Holding a branch in his hands, he watched with satisfaction as the zombies clawed their way through the dirt under the dim moonlight.

Right on schedule.

“I’ll use a charm to freeze them in place,” Kong Xuyang instructed, holding a yellow talisman between his fingers. “Once they stop moving, go straight for the graves they dug up. Got it?”

Yang Zhi nodded. He was just about to sprint forward when he abruptly halted, eyes widening.

“Brother Kong, look! That zombie already has one of your talismans on it!”

“What? That’s impossible. I haven’t—” Kong Xuyang followed his gaze—and his face darkened.

A zombie, already bound by one of his [Body Binding Talismans], stood rigidly in place, turning in slow, confused circles.

And right next to its grave—digging furiously—was Mu Sicheng, a camera slung around his neck.

Beside him, half kneeling over the coffin, examining its contents, was Bai Liu.

The moment Kong Xuyang and the others stepped forward, Mu Sicheng looked up, baring his teeth in a sharp, mocking grin.

“Well, well. Digging up graves in the middle of the night too? What a coincidence.”

Bai Liu lifted his head, his gaze locking onto Kong Xuyang’s.

His lips curled into a slow, knowing smile.

“Fate really does bring old friends together.”

Yang Zhi broke into a cold sweat.

That smile—it was the exact same one from his memory.

His throat clenched. He struggled to speak, his voice trembling. “Brother Kong! How did they get one of your charms?!”

Kong Xuyang’s expression twisted with rage.

“They got it from the tomb.” He gritted his teeth, eyes burning with fury as he glared down at Bai Liu.

This was supposed to be his trap.

A carefully laid scheme meant to break Bai Liu slowly, to drag out his suffering for the sake of spectacle—to milk every last drop of entertainment from his demise.

But somehow, Bai Liu had turned it back on him.

The situation had spiraled far beyond what Kong Xuyang had planned. And now, there was no more reason to play games.

The zombie daoist had been released. His panel was sealed again. He had no means of escape.

They had only one option left.

Kong Xuyang’s eyes darkened. His fingers curled tightly around the talisman.

“Kill Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng. Now. End the game.”

Several yellow talismans shot forward from between his fingers, sticking to the foreheads of the zombies.

Their movements stopped. Their eyes burned red.

Then, with a deep, guttural hiss, they lunged—fangs bared—straight at Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng, crouched on the ground, swore under his breath—but he didn’t hesitate.

Bai Liu stood up smoothly, sidestepping a claw that sliced toward him from the side. His eyes flickered with a calculating light as he took in the battlefield at a glance.

His gaze landed on Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who were still knee-deep in their grave-digging, and he spoke in a low, measured voice:

“Avoid the claws and teeth. They’re laced with necrotic poison.”

"Go straight for Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi. They're skilled at setting traps and attacking from a distance, but they shouldn't be good at close combat."

Bai Liu lifted his gaze, eyes cold. "Steal the talisman from his hand, but be careful not to touch that book of proper spells. I suspect it might influence your game path and identity determination."

"Zombies can't bend their legs—go from below," Bai Liu quickly reminded.

Mu Sicheng gave an "OK" gesture, exhaling as he flipped the broken, sharp wooden board in his hand. His eyes locked onto Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, lurking in the darkness behind the swarm of zombies.

Lowering his stance, a red glint flashed through his pupils. For a fleeting moment, his form shimmered—a monkey-like silhouette flickering around him. His hands, as they landed, seemed to transform into a monkey’s before reverting back when he touched the ground.

In the blink of an eye, Mu Sicheng darted forward, slipping beneath the zombies and onto the path leading straight to Kong Xuyang and the others.

With a sharp twist, Mu Sicheng slammed his foot down, braking hard. He spun, leaped, and brought the wooden board down in a vicious arc, his bared teeth and fierce snarl making him look more beast than man. His crimson pupils contracted into slits, and behind him, something almost like a tail flickered into existence.

"Die for the master!"

At some point, a long, snow-white bone whip had appeared in Bai Liu’s hand. He glanced up at the zombies charging toward him, their teeth bared and claws outstretched. Unhurried, he tightened his grip on the whip, flicking it skillfully left and right.

Like a bolt of white lightning, the whip cracked through the air, striking the zombie lunging straight for his face.

The force sent the zombie flying backward. Midair, its limbs twitched involuntarily, the attack still half-formed on its hands and mouth. Its expression was one of confusion, as if it hadn't yet processed what had just happened—how it had been launched into the air so effortlessly.

[System..... Zzt..... Notification: Player Mu Sicheng is activating "Monster Book: Capuchin Thief" form.....]

[System Alert: Player Kong Xuyang's skill (Panel Silence) is about to expire.....]

Kong Xuyang's eyes widened in shock. "How is that possible?!"

The spectators watching from the sidelines were equally stunned.

"What's going on?!"

"Kong Xuyang's skill isn't working?! That's impossible!"

On the Silence of the Lambs team, nearly every player shot to their feet, staring at the big screen in disbelief. A few were so tense that the veins in their necks bulged.

However, not everyone reacted with alarm. Among those still seated were Hearts and the players around her, as well as the Reverse God and his companions. Even Wang Shun, though visibly shocked, leaned forward in interest rather than panic.

The Reverse God leaned back in his chair, a relaxed smile on his face, as if he had expected this all along.

Unable to contain his curiosity, Wang Shun blurted out, "Reverse God, why did Kong Xuyang's skill fail this time?"

The Reverse God turned to him lazily, as if only now realizing he had been spoken to. He blinked once before shifting his gaze away. "Wasn't this all part of Bai Liu's setup? He didn't tell you?"

"No!" Wang Shun grimaced internally. "Even though President Bai discusses strategy in advance, he never explains why he does things!"

Most of the time, Bai Liu's logic was impossible to follow. Even when Wang Shun thought he understood, he could never predict how it would connect to the final outcome.

With a bitter chuckle, Wang Shun still politely pressed on. "I've researched every match Kong Xuyang has ever played, and I've never seen his skill fail like this. I really don't see what President Bai did to make this happen."

The Reverse God paused in thought before responding casually, "I gave Bai Liu some first-hand information on Kong Xuyang's skills. He must have started from there."

Muke, intrigued, leaned in closer. "Skill?"

"Exactly." The Reverse God smiled. "Bai Liu exploited Kong Xuyang's skill weakness."

In the audience, Qi Yifang, seated next to Hearts, raised the same question.

"Skill weaknesses?" Qi Yifang frowned. "What kind of weakness could Kong Xuyang have? His skill never failed against us last year. When we played him, our entire panel was disabled from start to finish."

His voice dropped into a mutter. "And our team last year was a lot stronger than Bai Liu's current squad, wasn't it? Kong Xuyang didn't expose any weaknesses against us, but he did against Bai Liu? That doesn't make sense, does it?"

"If Kong Xuyang's skill had a real weakness, Queen, you would have seen it last year, right? That match wasn't easy for us either—it was brutal..."

Hearts reclined slightly, propping her chin on the audience railing, her gaze fixed on the big screen.

"I did see it," she admitted. "But we couldn't take advantage of it."

Qi Yifang stared at her, stunned. "Why not?"

Hearts lifted her eyes, glancing lazily at him. "The Reverse God the year before us should have noticed Kong Xuyang's weakness too, but he still had a tough fight. In the end, he had to kill Kong Xuyang outright to break through."

"So it's not just us," she continued. "None of the major guilds—no matter how strong—could exploit Kong Xuyang's weakness."

Qi Yifang's confusion deepened. "Why?!"

Hearts exhaled, almost amused. "Because against strong teams, Kong Xuyang doesn't have a weakness."

"No weakness against a strong team?!" Wang Shun echoed, completely lost. He struggled to process the Reverse God's explanation. "But... Reverse God, isn't Kong Xuyang the type to crumble when faced with real strength?"

The implication was clear: Kong Xuyang was someone who looked tough on the surface but should have been fragile when up against top players. How could he not have weaknesses against stronger opponents?

The Reverse God propped his elbows on his knees, watching the big screen, before suddenly changing the topic.

"Skills are all derived from desire," he mused. "Wang Shun, your skill makes it easy to investigate Kong Xuyang's background. Based on his life, what do you think his core desire is?"

Wang Shun quickly pulled up Kong Xuyang's profile, scanning through it in an instant.

His gaze locked onto a line he himself had summarized: "To be a man of honor, to erase the shame of the past."

The Reverse God tilted his head toward the screen, about to speak when Liu Jiayi and Muke leaned over from either side.

Liu Jiayi scoffed. "That doesn't sound like him. 'Panel Silence' isn't about proving himself—it's about dragging others down."

Wang Shun continued scrolling. "I noticed that Kong Xuyang rarely uses his skill against weaker teams. He only activates [Panel Silence] when facing strong opponents."

"So far, he's used it in fewer than five pre-season matches."

"Of course he wouldn't use it on weak teams," Liu Jiayi retorted swiftly. "His panel stats are already better than most weak players'. If he disabled his panel against them, he'd be handicapping himself."

"But against a strong team, the situation flips. By silencing their panels, he drags top-tier players down to his level—where he has the advantage. He has more experience fighting without panels, so he can beat them in that state."

Muke's eyes flicked to Kong Xuyang's university history.

"...Extremely resentful and jealous of classmates from wealthier families. He believed that if he had the same conditions, he wouldn't have faced such discrimination..."

Muke fell silent for a few seconds, then turned to the Reverse God.

"Kong Xuyang's core desire isn't success," he murmured. "It's injustice, isn't it?"

The Reverse God nodded, a glint of approval in his eyes. "That's my guess too."

"[Injustice]?" Wang Shun frowned in confusion. "What kind of core desire is that?"

Muke withdrew his gaze from Wang Shun's system panel and tapped on the profile twice with his index finger. "I've seen plenty of people like this. A kind of twisted 'muqiang'—they think they're exceptional and deserve the best, but when they fail to obtain those things on their own, they blame society and their background instead."

"To put it simply, Kong Xuyang feels the world is [unfair] to him whenever he compares himself to those who are better off than him in terms of material conditions."

The Reverse God nodded. "The skill derived from this desire is [Panel Silence]. When Kong Xuyang erased everyone's panels, he effectively reset all initial conditions, achieving the [fairness] he sought."

Muke looked up at the Reverse God. "And Kong Xuyang believes that, under such [fair] conditions, his own excellence will allow him to win."

"But I still don't understand why this skill doesn't work against President Bai." Wang Shun rubbed his temples and let out a wry smile. "Please, explain it in simpler terms for your less-than-brilliant audience."

"At this point, the answer is pretty obvious." Muke reached for Wang Shun's panel and scratched at the Fever Lamb's matchmaking sheet. "Shun, look here—like you just said, Kong Xuyang never uses his skill against weaker teams. He only activates it against stronger opponents."

Wang Shun stroked his chin and nodded. "Yeah, the little witch just explained that to me."

"It's more than that." Muke shook his head slightly. "The fairness Kong Xuyang wants is inherently warped. He doesn't seek true equality—he only wants those better off than him to be brought down to his level. Those beneath him don't even register in his idea of [fairness]—to him, they exist only to be trampled, unworthy of his skill."

"In other words," the Reverse God smiled, "the condition for activating [Panel Silence] is that Kong Xuyang must perceive his opponent as stronger than himself."

"So his skill will always work against teams he considers formidable—teams like ours, the ones he is wary of, determined to surpass, even resentful toward."

Muke added, "But if Kong Xuyang sees his opponent as weaker than him, his skill is likely to fail."

"Like right now."

Wang Shun froze, realization dawning on him. Slowly, word by word, he pieced together the entire setup Bai Liu had orchestrated from start to finish.

"So President Bai, in order to enter the Yinshan Village game, has been following Kong Xuyang's plan step by step. He didn't resist too fiercely when Kong Xuyang sent scouts. He even allowed Kong Xuyang's people to gather intelligence on him. The information he gave me—it was the worst possible version of himself..."

"Even letting himself get injured three times in the game, putting Mu Sicheng in a life-or-death situation, allowing Yang Zhi to eat away at his and Mu Sicheng's memories right from the start—even when he knew there was something wrong with Yang Zhi—all of it was for the sake of..."

Muke, who had remained tense throughout the game, finally relaxed. A small, scattered smile appeared on his face.

His eyes glowed slightly as he looked up at the big screen. "If I'm right, Bai Liu has been deliberately maintaining a [weak] stance."

"He's been baiting Kong Xuyang—appearing vulnerable to create a crack in Kong Xuyang's skill."

"But hasn't... President Bai's memory been swallowed?" Wang Shun suddenly had an epiphany before hesitantly asking, "Can he even remember the plans he made before?"

"Bai Liu doesn't remember." Liu Jiayi leaned back in his chair, resting his face in his hands with a mischievous grin. "But the moment he entered the copy, he used his old method—setting up follow-up arrangements in advance and leaving them behind for his amnesiac self to find later."

Wang Shun frowned, recalling that before Bai Liu entered the copy and lost his memory, he hadn't seen him write any notes, leave marks along the way, or even record a video.

He couldn't understand how Bai Liu had managed to leave himself a safety net, so he humbly asked, "What's this 'old method' President Bai used to secure a fallback?"

"Book fold markers," Mu Ke answered with a smile. "It's something Bai Liu and I used to do back at the orphanage."

Wang Shun was taken aback. "Book fold marks?"

"Yes. Don't you think it's strange how quickly Bai Liu memorized so much from this 'Maoshan Evil Handbook,' given his memory?" Liu Jiayi tilted his head toward Wang Shun.

Wang Shun hesitated. Now that she mentioned it, it did seem a little off. But Bai Liu had spoken about it so naturally that he had overlooked any suspicion.

Liu Jiayi, however, didn't let it slide. She analyzed it carefully: "If the person in the game were Mu Ke, he could indeed read through the book in a short time and extract the key information.

"But with Bai Liu's memory, that would've been impossible."

She raised a finger. "So there's only one possibility—pre-amnesia Bai Liu skimmed the book, picked out the most important sections, folded the pages he needed, and post-amnesia Bai Liu only read those marked pages. That's how he 'remembered' so quickly."

Wang Shun's head started to spin. He hadn't played enough games to keep up with Liu Jiayi's strategic thinking. His eyes glazed over. "Can Bai Liu really understand what his pre-amnesiac self wanted just from folded pages?"

"Also, what exactly is this 'Maoshan Evil Handbook'..." Wang Shun muttered, still confused. "It wouldn't contain detailed notes on Kong Xuyang's weaknesses or Bai Liu's specific plans, right?"

The Reverse God chuckled. "It doesn't need to be that explicit."

"Because Bai Liu isn't asking for advice—he's giving instructions. He just needs the person following behind him to do exactly what he marked in the book."

Wang Shun finally grasped the concept and let out a bitter laugh. "So it's just like how we usually communicate with President Bai—we don't need to understand why. We just follow the terms he lays out and complete the task."

The Reverse God nodded with a sigh. "Something like that."

"Bai Liu is usually right, but personally, I think he's a little authoritarian." He spread his hands helplessly, then patted Wang Shun's back with a wry smile, as if offering sympathy. "But hey, don't take it personally. He treats himself the same way—just go along with him..."

Mu Ke and Liu Jiayi slowly shifted their gazes toward the Reverse God. Even Tang Erda, who had been silent until now, gave him an extra glance.

"You—" Liu Jiayi narrowed her eyes. "Tactician of the Killer Sequence… Did you just take on the role of our battle group's tactician?"

Mu Ke frowned. "This style... It's too familiar."

Tang Erda's eyebrows rose in suspicion as he looked at the Reverse God with a wary, cold gaze.

The Reverse God: "....."

He coughed into his fist, regaining his composure. "What? It's just an ordinary level of knowledge about a potential future opponent. We on the team know Bai Liu well—don't you agree, Spades?"

Sitting next to him, Spades nodded earnestly, his expression blank. "I know best."

Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi, who had been left out of the conversation from start to finish: "....."

Wait. Do you?

Hadn't they just met Bai Liu last month? Or had these two secretly gone behind everyone's backs to study Bai Liu?

While the Wandering Circus side enjoyed a harmonious discussion, the viewing pool was in complete disarray.

Over at Fanatical Lamb, the atmosphere was chaotic. Many members ran around anxiously, their faces filled with panic. Having previously dumped all their reserve points into list control, they now found themselves in crisis. The audience wasn't stupid—many were pulling out as fast as they could.

Their betting pool's growth rate had just been wiped out.

The audience whispered among themselves:

"Wow, that was close. Good thing I didn't bet on the Lamb—I'd be broke right now."

"…I have a feeling the Circus is going to win. Should we bet on them now?"

"I'm tempted too, but let's wait and see…"

"Yeah, but the longer we wait, the lower the exchange rate. We should get in while it's still high!"

"But Kong Xuyang, even if his skill is temporarily disabled, can still use it later, right? I still think Bai Liu isn't that great. Let's wait and see…"

Wang Shun stared at the system panel, his brows furrowing. "We clearly have such a big advantage, but the betting pool isn't rising significantly. It only spiked a little before cooling down again."

"Because Kong Xuyang's skill is still an option, and he's a veteran who has played in the big leagues three times. Many viewers are waiting to see what happens," Liu Jiayi said calmly. "It's normal. Just wait."

Though she called it normal, her face remained tense, her lips pressed into a thin line as she stared at the big screen.

"Kong Xuyang can't use his skill on Bai Liu anymore." The Reverse God tilted his head slightly, watching Bai Liu wield his whip on the screen. His voice was soft.

Liu Jiayi turned to him. "Why?"

The Reverse God suddenly smiled—softly, yet with a strange, unreadable emotion in his expression. A hazy, smoke-like veil covered his gaze.

"Because Kong Xuyang saw Bai Liu's memories."

"When you believe someone is an all-powerful, heartless, god-like villain, you fear them. You believe they are too powerful to overcome, so you try to kill them before they turn the tables."

"You see them as nothing more than an unstoppable force—an enemy that must be eliminated. And as long as you think they are strong, you push yourself to the limit to defeat them."

"That fear fuels your aggression."

"But once you realize that this 'powerful villain' had a miserable childhood—stepped on ice in the winter, nearly drowned in the summer, struggled in school, dozed off in math class, reached adulthood without ever buying himself a birthday cake, and instead settled for two pounds of oranges because he was too stingy to spend more…"

The Reverse God fell silent for a moment, lowering his eyes.

"At that point, you can't see him as powerful anymore."

"The illusion shatters. You stop fearing him. And without fear, there's no reason to think he's stronger than you."

He suddenly turned to Liu Jiayi, his lips curving in a smirk, his voice filled with quiet, unshakable confidence.

"Of course, personally, I think Bai Liu is far better than Kong Xuyang. That much is obvious to all of us, right?"

Liu Jiayi stared at the Reverse God for a long time, turned his head sideways, and said coldly, "Rubbish is not worthy to be compared with

Bai Liu."

The Reverse God took the words in good faith and smiled, "True."

In-game.

The monkey paws and tail on Mu Sicheng's body flickered like unstable projections before solidifying completely. He swung his board down effortlessly, sending up a thick cloud of dust from the ground.

Kong Xuyang rolled to the side, barely dodging Mu Sicheng's overhead strike. He half-kneeled on the ground, covering his mouth, his eyes so bloodshot they looked like they could bleed. "How the hell did you escape my skill? You're just two losers—!"

"Who the fuck are you calling a loser?" Mu Sicheng landed lightly on his feet and lunged forward, claws raised to shield his face before striking at Kong Xuyang with feral aggression. "You're the loser here!"

His claws slashed down hard, but instead of flesh, they met the resistance of a talisman with a sharp metallic clang, like steel striking stone.

"What the fuck—?!" Mu Sicheng was dumbfounded. "An iron crotch?!"

Kong Xuyang sneered. "Steel and Iron Bone Charm."

"Don't think you've won just because my skill is temporarily disabled." Despite the setback, Kong Xuyang remained composed—he had played mid-season matches before and could adapt quickly to unexpected situations.

Ignoring Mu Sicheng, he turned toward Yang Zhi and barked, "Don't panic! Keep digging! My skills are disabled right now, but once they're back, I'll take control again!"

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and lunged forward once more, aiming a sweeping kick at Kong Xuyang. But before the blow could land, Kong Xuyang slapped another Steel and Iron Bone Charm onto his own ankle.

With a snicker, Kong Xuyang took a calculated step back. He knew he couldn't match Mu Sicheng in close combat, so instead, he let the zombies around them close in, using them as a shield.

At the same time, he bit down on the tip of his tongue, letting blood drip onto a stack of yellow talismans in his hand. His pupils contracted sharply as he raised his arm and performed a quick, precise gesture—his fingers twisting in the air before flicking forward. The talismans shot out, sticking to the heads of the surrounding zombies.

"Steel and Iron Bone Charm—activate!"

The moment the talismans adhered, the zombies' red eyes flared ominously. Fibrous strands of muscle wove together beneath their rotting skin, reinforcing their bodies with layers of unnatural strength. A metallic sheen coated their decayed flesh, and their fangs extended by an inch.

These undead, dressed in half-mattressed pre-war attire, their scalps half-shaved in a traditional style, now gleamed with a coppery luster as they turned to surround Mu Sicheng.

"Are you fucking kidding me?!" Mu Sicheng snarled, failing to break through the encirclement despite multiple attempts. His attacks only left his hands and feet raw from impact. "Is this some bullshit Eighteen Bronze Men Zombie Formation?!"

He shoved one zombie away with his left paw while using his right to block another's attempt to sink its teeth into his neck. His muscles tensed, veins bulging along his throat as he gritted out, "Bai Liu, where the hell are you?!"

A whip lashed through the air, slicing between the zombies, but instead of breaking through, it struck their hardened flesh with a dull ping, as if hitting solid stone. The creatures, now as tough as metal, barely flinched under the attack.

"Looks like I can't help you here," Bai Liu's voice drifted in calmly from outside the formation. "They're too hard. I can't get in. You're on your own—cheer up."

And then, it sounded like he turned and walked away.

Mu Sicheng, trapped in the middle of the formation, stared after him. "????"

"Get the fuck back here, you bastard!" Mu Sicheng's fur bristled, his curly monkey tail standing on end. "Didn't you say you'd take responsibility if anything happened?! Now I'm stuck with all these men, and you're running away—own up to it, damn it!"

But Bai Liu's voice was gone. Instead, Kong Xuyang let out a mocking laugh. "Dumped, huh?"

Kong Xuyang smirked, his confidence growing. "I studied all the proper spells for this game. The Steel and Iron Bone Charm makes these zombies near invincible. Their attack power might be average, but their defense is ridiculous. And since they were cursed by me, they won't listen to anyone else's orders. There's no counter to this."

He wiped the blood from the corner of his mouth and continued smugly, "Sure, it takes a bit of my essence and blood to maintain them, but so what? I'm about to win. A little blood loss is nothing."

Stepping forward, Kong Xuyang closed in on Mu Sicheng, who was still struggling against the formation. Grinning wickedly, he raised a sharp dagger. "No need to let the zombies finish you off. I'll make it quick."

Just as he was about to strike, a loud bang echoed in the distance, followed by the crashing sound of rushing water.

A bullet whizzed through the air, hitting Kong Xuyang's raised hand with a sharp pop. His dagger slipped from his grasp and clattered to the ground.

Kong Xuyang let out a pained cry as blood spurted from his palm. "What the hell?! Bullets?! In here?!"

He clutched his injured hand in shock, turning toward the source of the shot.

Yang Zhi, who had been focused on digging, snapped his head up in alarm. "What just happened?!"

"Nothing much." Bai Liu's voice remained as composed as ever. He stood at a distance, calmly lowering the revolver in his hand. "I just blew up the weir and connected the grave to this mass grave."

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has switched to Player Tang Erda's personal panel and used the skill (Rose Bullet).]

Yang Zhi paled. "Wait—why the hell would he blow up the weir?!" He turned to Kong Xuyang in alarm. "That connects to the underground river in the catacombs! Blowing it open like that—"

"It's going to flood this place and draw in every monster from the catacombs!"

His voice cracked in panic. "Brother Kong, there are too many of them —we won't be able to handle this!"

Kong Xuyang clutched his bleeding right hand, his cheek muscles twitching from the strain of his clenched teeth. He hissed through gritted teeth:

"Bai Liu—!"

How could he be pushed to this point by someone like him—a worthless, inferior man with nothing to his name?

Not far from the broken weir, pale limbs emerged from the water, clutching at the shore. The ghosts of tiger demons struggled to crawl out from the muddy bottom, their figures paper-thin, faces once cheerful now smeared with dirt. They leaped erratically from side to side, moving toward the wooded path. Beside them stood a veiled bride, waving a wedding handkerchief with eerie grace.

Directly ahead, the ghosts of the Martyred Bridge advanced, their white umbrellas concealing their faces, water dripping as they walked. The ground was littered with shadows—twisting, writhing, rising, and falling—each one an evil spirit. A cacophony of high-pitched, joyful laughter from men, women, and children echoed endlessly.

At the farthest edge of the procession, paper effigies carried seven open coffins. Inside lay drowned old men, their faces tinged blue and purple, mouths twisted into unsettling smiles.

One of them had his hands folded peacefully over his chest, sharp black nails interlaced. He looked truly dead—until a closer glance revealed that his nails were still growing. Slowly, his smile stretched wider and wider, splitting the corners of his mouth all the way to his ears.

On the damp, narrow road winding through the gloomy countryside, red and white funeral robes overlapped in a ghostly haze. The air was thick with the scent of incense, melted wax, rot, and decay. Funeral coins rained from the sky, their square holes casting shifting shadows. The wailing of dual shawms—one high, one low—blended together, simultaneously festive and mournful.

A hundred ghosts prowled in the night.

Mu Sicheng, ensnared by the bronze vampire, stared at the approaching nightmare in pure horror.

Bai Liu, is this a rescue or a goddamn massacre?!

Yang Zhi's voice cracked with fear. "Brother Kong! What do we do?!"

Kong Xuyang frantically tapped at his panel. Icons flickered in and out, some barely responding. His gaze darted over the sporadic symbols before locking onto the system's alert messages.

[System Alert: Player Kong Xuyang's Personal Skill is about to be completely disabled—5, 4, 3, 2, 1...]
[System Alert: All players in the room have their panels unblocked.]

Kong Xuyang exhaled sharply. Finally.

His skill required precise control through his panel. Earlier, with it stuck in limbo—neither failing nor functioning properly—he had been the most restricted one here. But now that it had completely deactivated, his panel was fully accessible again.

And that meant one thing—

A manic grin spread across his face as he slammed his finger down on the skill button.

[Use (Panel Silence) skill again!]

[System Alert: Loading Player Kong Xuyang's Skill (Panel Silence)...]

Any second now. His advantage would return. He was too good—there was no way he would lose to Bai Liu, that pathetic, underfed orphan who barely scraped by in life. A failure who couldn't even break 400 points on his high school exams.

Given the right conditions, Kong Xuyang was the best. No one could defeat him when his skills were in play—unless they had better conditions than him.

And Bai Liu?

Bai Liu was nothing. A loser from birth, through childhood, adolescence, and youth, surviving only because his memories had been altered.

Kong Xuyang's bloodshot eyes fixated on the loading bar, his gunshot-wounded hand trembling uncontrollably. But his grin only widened.

He was about to win.

[System Alert: Player Kong Xuyang's skill (Panel Silence) failed to load.]
[Reason for failure detected...]
[Target player does not match the skill's usage conditions. Skill cannot be applied across the board.]
[Player Bai Liu is ineligible for this skill.]

Kong Xuyang froze. His breath hitched. The glaring red alert on his panel blurred before his eyes.

A surge of blood rose in his throat, and he choked out a hoarse, disbelieving cry:

"What?! How is that possible?!"

[System Note: You cannot use the skill on Bai Liu because you firmly believe Bai Liu is weaker than you. Your skill conditions do not apply to those weaker than yourself.]

Kong Xuyang's mind reeled. His pulse pounded in his ears.

"What kind of bullshit is that?!" he screamed, slamming his system coin in frustration. "Why can't I use my skills on Bai Liu just because he's weaker than me?! You're rigging the game in his favor! This is unfair!"

"I was about to win!"

[System Warning Note: The game never favors anyone.]

Yang Zhi, trembling, kept backing away from the advancing ghostly horde. He looked at Kong Xuyang in terror. "Brother Kong! They're coming!"

Kong Xuyang clenched his jaw, forcing himself to suppress his rage. His glare snapped toward Bai Liu, who stood not far away. His breaths came in ragged gasps.

A mere Bai Liu… No skills… No power… And yet…

Kong Xuyang spat blood onto his thumb, smeared it onto a talisman, and slammed his palm against his panel. Two incantation slips shot out, latching onto the backs of the bronze vampires surrounding Mu Sicheng.

He snarled, "Arise! Formation—Bronze Wall!"

The zombies surrounding Mu Sicheng stirred, their stiff limbs moving into position. They linked arms, forming an unbreakable ring, their vacant eyes turned outward.

At the center of the formation stood Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi—safe.

Mu Sicheng, also trapped inside, was bound tightly, his arms forced behind his back.

Blood oozed from the deep bite wounds on his neck, his skin pale with necrotic poison. Panting heavily, he slumped to the ground, his flushed cheeks burning with fever.

Kong Xuyang sneered at Mu Sicheng’s weakened state. "So what if you have skills? Without your memories, you don’t even know how to use them. You’re just another failure."

He crouched down, his breath hot against Mu Sicheng’s ear, his grin widening.

"An hour. That’s all it takes for the poison to destroy your spirit value."

"And Bai Liu—" Kong Xuyang’s voice dropped to a whisper, his eyes gleaming with manic triumph.

"—he'll end up just like you."

Straightening, Kong Xuyang turned coldly to Yang Zhi. "Dig up the remaining calendars. Let's get the True Ending and end this game."

Yinshan Village

Yang Zhi threw himself into the hard labor of digging, his breath ragged. Wretchedly, he wiped the mud from his face with the back of his hand before hurriedly handing the pile of Huang Li he had unearthed to Kong Xuyang. His voice was urgent:

"Brother Kong, this is what I just dug up. Can you take a look and see what's going on?"

Kong Xuyang took the Huang Li and quickly skimmed through it:

"Year of Gengzi, Month of Gengchen, Day of Dechai, March 21—The young and strong men of the village gathered to worship their ancestors. Resolute, they set out as a group, determined to uphold righteousness and fight against the ghosts. Their wives, daughters, and parents knelt by the bridge, tears streaming as they prayed to the gods of heaven and earth to bless the warriors of Yinshan Village and bring them home safely..."

"Year of Gengzi, Month of Xin Si, Day of Xin Chou, May 1—News of war reached the capital. The distant rumble of cannons, the sharp crack of gunfire, could be heard a hundred miles away. Families in the village grew anxious, praying day and night at shrines and temples..."

"Month of Xin Si, Day of Yi Si, Fifth Day of the Fifth Month, Dragon Boat Festival—There were no women to wrap rice dumplings, no elders to raise their voices in celebration, no children to play. The villagers sat in mournful silence at the village entrance, their eyes fixed on a lone, covered body returning home."

"The deceased was named Wang Wu, thirty-eight years old. He left behind a wife, a son, and two daughters. An honest man, hardworking in the fields, and always ready to help his neighbors during harvest. His wife knelt before his corpse, sobbing, her trembling hands unable to form words. When the white cloth was lifted, she saw a body barely intact—flesh torn, bones shattered, his right hand and foot missing, said to have been blown apart by the artillery of the evil spirits, making it impossible to retrieve the remains."

"Wang Wu's son and two daughters shook his lifeless body, their voices rising in bewildered cries—but Wang Wu did not respond."

"…On the eighth day of May, the corpses were brought back. Each was laid on a wooden frame at the village entrance, their faces covered with white cloth. The villagers stood before them in silence, no one daring to step forward to lift the cloth and identify the dead. Instead, they remained where they were, sobbing quietly, their grief overwhelming.

A few hours passed before Elder Zhang of the village finally stepped forward. With a trembling hand, he uncovered the cloth. The moment his eyes fell upon the body, he let out a heart-wrenching howl, calling out the name of the young one as tears streamed down his face, unchecked. Overcome with sorrow, he collapsed before the corpse…"

.....

"On the 23rd of May, all the young and strong from the village of Yinshan returned—yet none survived."

"On the 27th of May, it was deemed the right time to move the earth, travel, and bury the dead. Most of the bodies of the young and strong who returned home were incomplete. Following customary practice, they were not placed in the ancestral graves but were instead buried at the foot of the opposite hill. The mourning women held the tablets, children wept before them, and the parents carried the coffins, keeping vigil for seventy-seven to forty-nine days. Though the bodies were not interred in the ancestral graves, the rites were performed with great reverence, and the burial was solemn and thorough."

.....

"On July 20th, all the righteous perished. The foreign devils rampaged unchecked, marching to the capital, unopposed. They burned, killed, and plundered, committing unspeakable atrocities. The smoke from the fires hung heavy in the air, and the village of Yinshan was barely visible through the haze."

"The court remained passive, allowing the ghosts to feast on the people. Within three days, they surrendered."

"On the seventh day of the ninth month, rumors spread throughout the capital that the imperial court had secretly negotiated with the foreign devils. As a gesture of goodwill, they handed over the villages of the involved individuals and their families to the invaders, granting them free reign to slaughter, pillage, and defile at will. With this tacit agreement, the invaders were allowed to march deeper into the land, cede territory, and punish the populace—this, they claimed, was a sign of their sincerity."

"The only women left in Yinshan village were Old You, frail and defenseless. In their sorrow, they preferred death over the shame of humiliation."

"I would rather be a stern ghost beneath the bridge than a disgrace in the halls."

.....

"What's all this nonsense?!" Kong Xuyang's anger grew with each passing moment. "Nothing to do with that Taoist zombie nonsense—anything else?"

Yang Zhi nervously stole a glance at the growing number of ghosts being kept away from the zombies, his body shuddering. He couldn't help but blush, afraid even to shake his head at Kong Xuyang for fear of provoking him. "No, nothing else."

"Then there's no more digging!" Kong Xuyang kicked Yang Zhi in the head, his face flushed with rage.

Mu Sicheng, standing nearby, watched the scene unfold and couldn't help but snort derisively. "Only a fool would take it out on his own teammates."

Kong Xuyang's temple twitched with irritation. He marched over, raising his hand to strike Mu Sicheng, but stopped halfway as he saw the fangs at the corner of Mu Sicheng's mouth.

Mu Sicheng was now a zombie, infected with corpse poison, and if Kong Xuyang went near him, he would risk a bite.

Kong Xuyang's energy was nearly depleted, and he could no longer command the zombies to attack Mu Sicheng. All he could do was have the zombies keep watch over him.

If the zombie failed to kill Mu Sicheng with another bite, and his spirit level dropped below 20 without death, something much worse could happen.

Prioritize, don't waste energy. Find the calendar first!

Kong Xuyang's raised hand paused for a moment, then he took a deep breath, shaking off his anger. He turned to secure the calendars around his waist, squatting down to continue digging the grave with Yang Zhi.

Mu Sicheng's eyes flickered toward the yearbook strapped to Kong Xuyang's waist. The monkey's paw, clipped behind the zombie, twitched, exhaling a slow breath.

He had tried to provoke Kong Xuyang into coming closer to steal the calendar from his waist, but he didn't expect Kong Xuyang, the idiot, to keep his wits about him, not glancing at him even as Mu Sicheng screamed.

Mu Sicheng's gaze darkened as he looked at the bronze wall surrounded by zombies. Though it trembled slightly under the assault of ghosts and monsters, it remained unshaken in the short term.

Kong Xuyang had been right—his stockpile of killer cards would last until he found all the calendars.

If the calendar truly held the key to the game, as Bai Liu had said, then Kong Xuyang might actually win, just as he claimed.

And with Bai Liu and these ghosts outside the walls, who knew how long he could last…?

The fangs around Mu Sicheng's mouth lengthened, his skin taking on a near-corpse green hue. His breathing became labored as he calculated the distance between himself and Kong Xuyang.

It was a distance he could close in a single burst—he could charge, catch Kong Xuyang off guard, steal the calendar from his waist, and throw it outside the zombie wall.

But if he forced the issue, the zombie behind him would surely strike again, and Kong Xuyang would be furious, likely killing him on the spot.

...But would Bai Liu manage to decipher it in time? Could he uncover the secret of the Taoist zombie and come to his rescue?

It was clear that cooperation would be too late. If he tried this the hard way, he'd likely end up unconscious, or worse.

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath.

But for some reason, thinking of Bai Liu outside, no matter how outrageous the plan, Mu Sicheng felt like he could——Bet!

Mu Sicheng stared at the calendar on Kong Xuyang's waist, took a deep breath, crouched down, and flashed his right paw to strike Kong Xuyang’s waist with a sharp swipe.

Kong Xuyang’s reflexes were quick. Before his anger could fully rise, the short knife in his hand whipped back and slashed outward, swatting Mu Sicheng’s outstretched claws away.

But what Kong Xuyang didn’t expect was that Mu Sicheng didn’t roll over to block the zombie behind him as anticipated. Instead, he grabbed Kong Xuyang’s short blade with his right paw and yanked it forward, pulling Kong Xuyang right into his path.

In Kong Xuyang’s stunned and unprepared gaze, Mu Sicheng took a vicious bite from the vampire behind him. With his left hand, he hooked the calendar from Kong Xuyang’s waist, then snatched the calendar Yang Zhi had just thrown out of the grave. Without hesitation, he crumpled both into a ball and tossed them out, shouting: "Bai Liu, the calendar’s out! Bai Liu, the calendar’s out!"

The zombie behind Mu Sicheng sank its teeth deeper, and he choked on a mouthful of blackened, bruised blood.

From the bite, a steady stream of corpse poison surged into Mu Sicheng’s body, causing his face to decay within moments.

Propped on his hands, Mu Sicheng panted heavily, his breath foul and rot-scented. His eyes glowed black, his fangs elongated near his jaws, and his throat hissed with an insatiable thirst for blood.

Kong Xuyang watched, fury bubbling up as the calendars he had worked so hard to collect were thrown out by Mu Sicheng. His muscles tensed, trembling with rage. “Mu Sicheng…!”

He lunged, stabbing his knife toward Mu Sicheng’s back, but it met resistance, like stabbing into tough animal hide. The knife bent, unable to penetrate.

Kong Xuyang faltered, his face going pale. No...

Two bites in a row, and Mu Sicheng’s spirit value dropped to 20!

[System warning: Player Mu Sicheng's spirit value has dropped to 17, entering berserk state!]

Mu Sicheng slowly raised his scarlet eyes, his head twisted at an unnatural angle. He turned his shoulders a few times, cracked his fists, and stood tall against the zombie still biting him on his back. His arms, now more monstrous, lengthened, and he looked down at Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi, who were retreating. A slow, mocking grin appeared as his eyebrows arched.

“No wonder Bai Liu didn’t rush to my rescue when he left me here,” Mu Sicheng mused. “So, this game has a berserk setting.” He flicked his tongue out, licking the bloodstains from his lips, a red glint flashing in his eyes. “That’s funny. I like it.”

Kong Xuyang’s voice rang sharp and piercing as he formed a palm with one hand. “Zombie back! Protect me!”

The wall of zombies surrounding them quickly shrank inward, enclosing Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi.

Kong Xuyang’s face was ashen, drained of color, his energy nearly gone.

Yang Zhi, forced to avert his gaze, dug furiously at the grave, his breathing shallow and quick, driven by a desperate urge to survive.

The only hope now was to dig up the graves and end the game as quickly as possible.

With renewed purpose, Yang Zhi dug with determination, but halfway through, something felt wrong.

The grave was surrounded by fragments of beautiful, antique gold and silver jewelry, as well as Chinese porcelain. At the center, however, lay a small lambskin diary, an unusual find—not a calendar—and written in English, not the familiar brushstrokes.

Confused, Yang Zhi dug a bit deeper, and then his eyes widened in shock as he uncovered a foreign-style hexagonal coffin. He pried the lid open and peered inside, his face pale as he screamed and stumbled back. Pointing a trembling hand toward the coffin, he gasped, “Kong! Brother Kong, look! Look at the person in the coffin…”

Kong Xuyang followed his trembling finger, his eyes falling on the two bodies inside the coffin, and he froze.

The bodies were dressed in foreign clothing, but underneath, Taoist robes lined the coffins. Their attire was strange—neither fully Eastern nor Western—but it was their faces that truly shocked them.

The faces of the two corpses were identical to Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang's.

Yang Zhi, horrified, stepped back. His voice quivered, "Brother Kong, what is this? How can these corpses look just like us?"

Kong Xuyang stared at the two bodies, his expression frozen as if caught in a nightmare. His face turned blue and white as he muttered under his breath.

"The grave robbers from Yinshan Village a hundred years later, and the fake foreign devils who raided Yinshan Village a hundred years ago…"

"If the evil Taoists from Maoshan are guarding Yinshan Village, then the proper Maoshan warlocks should be…"

A sudden realization struck Kong Xuyang, and he grabbed the copy of Maoshan Daoism he had stolen from the back of the temple, flipping through the pages without finding any notes. As a thought crossed his mind, he folded the book and glanced toward the side.

There, written in English on the pastedown, were these words:

[On April 17, 1901, I request the two masters' assistance in breaking Yinshan Village using legitimate techniques. I will reward you generously.]

Yinshan Village

Kong Xuyang's eyes widened with anger, and he nearly tore the Maoshan Daoist text in half. "Why is this set-up like this?!"

Yang Zhi, startled by Kong Xuyang's manic reaction, took a step back, then cautiously offered the diary. "...Brother Kong, do you want to see what's in the diary?"

Kong Xuyang closed his eyes, taking two deep breaths to calm himself. He then snatched the diary from Yang Zhi and skimmed through it quickly.

No matter what the game throws at them, there must be a way through.

They were playing the roles of the righteous warlocks who had attacked Yinshan Village a hundred years ago. The fact that these warlocks were buried with such honor at the entrance of Yinshan Village proved they had been the victors. If they had won a century ago, they could win now.

And how they won—it had to be written in the two journals buried with these warlocks.

The sheepskin diary was written in English, and because of its age, some of the language conventions were outdated, making the translation a little awkward. But the meaning was clear.

The diary read:

In the year Gengzi, on the twenty-fifth day of the eleventh month, the court held a meeting with the Great Ones. They drew up the outline for the surrender of the Book and formally ordered that Yinshan Village be handed over to the Great Ones.

Foreign soldiers entered the mountain with firearms and searched for Yinshan Village. Only two roads at the village's edge remained. The flat land of the village had disappeared.

The government was in turmoil, with rumors circulating that it might be the Maoshan magic that concealed the village.

The next day, the court summoned my brother and me and ordered us to assist the foreigners in attacking the village, which we did quietly.

The first time I saw this was when my brother and I ventured into the mountains to investigate. It turned out a person with great skill was using an evil Maoshan technique to hide Yinshan Village.

The court then ordered my brother and me to break the law, and after consulting the canon, we found a method:

[The Daoist nature of the heavenly family can be suppressed by the heavenly might of the law, corrupting its righteousness and breaking its formations.]

[Permission granted by the court.]

In the year Gengzi, on the thirteenth day of the lunar month, with Chinese New Year approaching, the court ordered that no foreigner should be harmed. Those who harmed foreigners were seen as disobedient to the Heavenly family and would be severely punished.

The next day, the entire country carried out this decree. Rain poured down, and thunder struck the mountain, breaking the maze and dispelling the spell hiding Yinshan Village. 513 people, including men, women, and children, knelt in front of the village, weeping and cursing the heavens.

A yellow-robed Taoist stood in front of the village, raising his hand to drop the fog, concealing the village once more in poisonous mist and insect miasma. Ninety-one formations lay within the fog. Foreigners forced their way in, killing and injuring over a hundred people.

In April, the people of Yinshan were forbidden from entering the village. The foreigners, growing impatient, pressured the court, which issued a new order:

[No resistance to foreign forces, no refusal to allow missionaries into homes, no harsh words to foreign lords, and an agreement to pay an indemnity of 450 million taels.]

[On that day, the maze of Yinshan Village was broken, and the village gate was opened. The foreigners entered with firearms.]

The yellow-robed Taoist, carrying a century of evil on his back, wielded a ten-thousand-foot thunderbolt, refining hundreds of evil spirits and leading the corpses of the dead to guard the village gate without retreating.

[The foreigners were too afraid to enter.]

The court issued a golden decree, forcing the yellow-robed Taoist to surrender and implicating the nine clans of Yinshan Village. It threatened the death of the Taoists, including me and my disciples, if we did not comply.

[Yellow silk was added to the body, the evil spirits stooped to the ground, and all the people of Yinshan Village were sealed by the holy decree.]

[My brother and I stole the holy decree and changed the date of the surrender to one hundred years.]

When the foreigners entered Yinshan Village with artillery, my brother and I hid the surviving descendants of Yinshan Village in their ancestral graves. We secretly provided them with sacrificial wine and food to ensure their survival.

The descendants, following my request and my brother's guidance, built a law inside the grave, using water as its form. This was done to preserve the Yin corpse within the grave for a hundred years, ensuring the Yin souls of the descendants would not scatter after death, preventing them from being taken to hell or heaven. This was done to avoid the decree from the court, which was intended to disperse them with heavenly thunder.

[After one hundred years, when the evil has been removed, Yinshan Village will be empty, and all descendants will be dead. The surrender will be null and void.]

[Yinshan Village will no longer be a sinner in the world and can enter the six paths of reincarnation to begin anew...]

The more Kong Xuyang read the more his eyes gleamed with understanding. He suddenly turned to Yang Zhi, grabbing his arm. His voice was hoarse, almost inaudible. “I know the zombie’s weakness.”

“It’s the surrender decree! We need to dig quickly! This holy decree must be in the tombs of these two foreign Taoists!”

.....

Bai Liu was also examining the calendar Mu Sicheng had thrown aside, holding it up and flipping through its pages as he stood at the entrance of the village, beside the motionless Taoist zombie.

After Mu Sicheng’s spirit had been broken, Bai Liu pinned him down, tying him with a whip. Mu Sicheng collapsed against the village gate, slumping against the pagoda nearby.

After a while, Mu Sicheng stopped moving. His eyes stared blankly ahead, a strange expression on his face, as though he had seen something that should not have been there.

Bai Liu held the calendar with one hand while his other was chained to Mu Sicheng. His right foot rested on Mu Sicheng's shoulder, keeping him in place. Bai Liu's eyes dropped to the calendar, quickly scanning its contents as he muttered to himself.

"So, the formation in the tomb wasn't set up by the Taoist inside, but rather by the descendants of Yinshan Village in collaboration with the Taoists from the righteous sect. The gathering of Yin Qi wasn't to refine corpses, but to restore the souls of the Taoist zombies damaged by heavenly thunder, ensuring their souls wouldn't scatter after a hundred years and preventing them from being lost to reincarnation."

"The new bride and the elderly man who drowned in the tomb were once fighting an invading enemy. Desperate, they knelt before the Taoist and begged him to use the most potent dark magic to turn them into fierce ghosts and protect Yinshan Village."

Bai Liu softly read the words on the calendar, "I died tragically because I couldn't protect my country and my family."

"But to die, my generation too must become ghosts with a family, not slaves to the dead."

"The evil arts say that an unmarried woman, who dies on her wedding path, may turn into a Red Fury—an unspeakably powerful ghost. This is true, for in Yinshan Village, fifty-one girls, all unmarried, were brought together for a wedding. Wearing double wedding veils, they sat on a palanquin with scissors in hand, killing themselves on their wedding path. They became Red Furies, the left position guardians of the village…"

"Fifty-one girls named: Yixi Wang (daughter of Wang Wu), Jiangping Green (engaged)…."

"The evil arts also say that elderly men and women who drown in a pond may become fierce ghosts, unspeakably powerful. This is true as well. So in Yinshan Village, two hundred seventy-one elderly men and women were collected to die, wearing white clothes and trousers. They jumped into the water and drowned, legs thrashing as they refused to surface, turning into White Furies, the right position guardians of the village…"

"Two hundred seventy-one elderly men and women named: Zhang Eshan…"

"The two red and white demons were buried together by the Taoist, who opened his ancestral grave and thickly interred their corpses. He gathered Yin energy and endured excruciating pain, refining himself into a corpse, becoming neither human nor ghost, to protect the village. The villagers revered him, built a temple, and worshiped him as a god, vowing to pay tribute in his honor…"

"In a few days, the village gates will be opened to face the enemy…"

As Bai Liu read, the Taoist zombie beside him, who had been motionless, suddenly opened his eyes.

The charms on its body remained unaffected by the wind, and the hem of its yellow Taoist robe fluttered as if stirred by an unseen breeze. The Taoist raised two fingers to the sky, and the peach wood sword on his back flew from its sheath, landing crosswise in front of the village gate, forming a barrier to prevent anyone from entering.

The Taoist, still in his yellow robe, spoke in a calm voice, looking beyond the gate, "Who is the visitor?"

Outside the dark gates, the hills and forests shifted, as if something large was marching through the night. From the shadows came intermittent, shrill laughter and cries, all blending together in a chilling sound, a malicious aura creeping toward Bai Liu's feet.

From the darkness emerged a man holding a candle: Kong Xuyang.

Half of his face was illuminated by the flickering red light of the candle, a low, muffled laugh escaping his lips. His expression was twisted, almost mad. His right hand clutched the candle, wrapped with torn fabric, still oozing blood, while his left hand held a golden scroll wrapped in cloth, resembling a prop from a Qing dynasty court drama.

Behind him trailed a group of zombies with charms on their foreheads. Further back were rickety skeletons in old-fashioned Western military uniforms, holding rusty guns and artillery, resembling foreigners.

Yang Zhi followed Kong Xuyang, his face calm, no longer showing any signs of the panic he had earlier.

“You didn’t expect this, did you?” Kong Xuyang laughed maniacally, spreading his arms wide. “Bai Liu, look, what do I have now that I’ve played the role of the holy decree?”

“The army, the war effort—everything.”

Kong Xuyang sneered at Bai Liu and the Taoist zombie in Yinshan Village, a wicked grin spreading across his face. “A hundred years ago, you and the zombie next to you were nothing but my defeated foes, surviving only on my mercy.”

“Now, I am no longer so merciful.”

“If this holy decree hadn’t been intentionally tampered with a century ago, your Yin creatures would have had your souls scattered long ago!”

Kong Xuyang’s expression hardened as he raised his hand, striking through the “100-year” period carefully added to the decree. He then read aloud the contents of the decree:

“The people of Yinshan Village are disloyal, unrighteous, and unbelieving. They attack others, cultivate evil spirits, and repeatedly defy the decree.”

“Attack the village and destroy all these demons and monsters that have harmed me!”

Yinshan Village

As soon as the words "hundred years" were crossed out of the decree, the sky darkened with hidden thunder, and a purple light flickered behind ominous clouds. Lightning erupted in a flash, and snow began to fall.

Kong Xuyang laughed furiously, wiping the rain from his face, and held the decree aloft. "The time has not yet come. This decree is still valid. Wait until you are struck down by lightning, you rabble!"

Inside the gates of Yinshan Village, the Daoist zombie remained calm, ringing a bell with his right hand. Raising his eyes, he spoke slowly, "Form up to meet the enemy."

The rain drenched the scattered coins on the ground, extinguished red and white candles, and dampened unburned incense. Dark oil lamps in every house flickered, casting the fragmented silhouettes of people in the windows.

The figures were all men in the prime of life, missing arms or legs, some with half-blown-off heads. They moved sluggishly out of the houses. Just as they were about to be drenched by the rain, a yellowish-white umbrella suddenly appeared above their heads, shielding them from the downpour, which seemed to be a punishment for their sins.

The woman in the white birthday suit, with a cracked head from the bridge pier, silently followed the man, holding the umbrella for him every step of the way. Their hands remained clasped under it.

The bride, in her red wedding dress, held a wedding handkerchief in one hand and blood-soaked red scissors in the other. She was carried by a bow-legged bridesmaid as she waddled out of the woods, laughing freely from beneath the umbrella.

"The Red Furies are listed on the left," the Taoist said, raising his hand. A yellow talisman flew out of his sleeve and landed on the bride's head, placing her at the head of the row.

The bride's bridesmaid lifted her black, empty eyes, laughed, and stood still on the left, her head bowed.

A drenched old man crawled out of the weir, his bruised and swollen face covered in emerald-green puffballs. His mouth was open, and a steady stream of dark mud and sand poured from it.

"The White Furies are listed on the right," the Taoist said, raising his wrist and gesturing. The old men did not move; their black, cavernous, ebony eyes stared unwaveringly at the village gate.

Kong Xuyang glared at the two golden peach wood swords that blocked the entrance to the village. He cursed through clenched teeth, his heart burning with anxiety.

This century-old peach wood sword was blocking the entrance, preventing him and the Yin Furies behind him from advancing. They had to wait for the lightning to strike and break it.

The clouds rumbled, and purple lightning flashed. A bolt of lightning, more than a foot wide, rumbled down and struck the Daoist at the entrance to Yinshan Village.

In the flash of lightning, the talisman paper on the man's body was instantly obliterated, the peach wood sword shattered into splinters, and the pagoda bearing the name of Yinshan Village trembled under the impact.

The two Red and White Furies, who had stood to the left and right, were pressed to their knees by the force of the heavenly thunder. They straightened their spines in the mud, struggling to stand.

Hundreds of grieving ghosts howled in desolation, their ghostly auras spilling forth. Their wedding clothes were tossed in the cold wind and rain, and their wailing voices grew heavier.

"Heaven and earth are unkind!"
"Heaven is unjust!"

Kong Xuyang sighed in relief, overwhelmed with joy, as he read aloud the words of the decree: "The people of Yinshan Village have used evil magic to cause countless deaths and injuries, their crimes too numerous to list."

As the thunderstorm dissipated, the yellow talisman on the Daoist's face was cleaved cleanly in two, revealing a face identical to Bai Liu's. With a calm expression and a light tone, the Daoist said, "I confess my sins."

"It doesn't matter if you don't recognize it..." Kong Xuyang's smile widened, only to stop suddenly as if struck by realization. "What did you just say?!"

The Daoist, whose face resembled Bai Liu's, repeated calmly, "I confess my sins."

Both the Red and White Furies on the ground looked up in amazement, and the Martyred Bridge Ghost dropped his umbrella to join the others in staring at the Daoist in deathly silence.

The Daoist looked at Kong Xuyang and spoke slowly, "Over the past hundred years, your ancestor used the grave to accumulate Yin Qi, protecting the souls of the people of Yinshan Village. This nurtured evil spirits and forced the descendants to reincarnate, causing countless innocent deaths."

"This tomb formation has been arranged to such an extent that the Yin Qi now only serves to unite the spirits of us ghosts and restore our sanity. It also empties Yinshan Village of all of us, so that we may avoid the punishment of our spirits flying away under the Holy Decree."

"But over the centuries," the Daoist slowly raised his eyes, "the people of Yinshan Village were transformed into vengeful ghosts by me. Their souls were scattered and lost all sanity. They remembered only the order I gave them—to guard Yinshan Village to the death, preventing any outsider from entering. This caused them to kill many innocent people who passed by."

"You are right. I have indeed used evil magic and killed innocent people indiscriminately."

The Daoist, in his yellow robes, stepped forward, crossed the main gate of Yinshan Village, lifted his robe, and knelt down on one knee in the pouring rain. He took the holy decree from the stunned Kong Xuyang with one hand and looked up at him.

"In the face of the evil effects of my dark arts, I am the only one responsible," the Daoist said in a flat tone. "I should bear the consequences, not the people of Yinshan Village."

"I wish to be executed, to be struck by heavenly lightning until my soul is scattered. In exchange, I offer a hundred years of peace for Yinshan Village and the safety of all beings. Let people walk the path of people, and let ghosts walk the path of ghosts."

"But before that..." The Daoist took the holy decree from Kong

Xuyang's hand, crossed his knees, and slowly rose to his feet. The night gale blew so fiercely that the three golden crowns of hair tied around his head swayed from side to side.

A flash of green and purple lightning tore across the sky, as bright as day.

In the blinding light, the Taoist lifted his rain-drenched face and slowly turned to look at Bai Liu within the village of Yinshan. "Are you my descendant?"

"Judging by the face," Bai Liu replied respectfully, "I suppose so, old man."

The two faces, not far apart, locked eyes across the shifting pagoda of Yinshan Village, battered by the fierce storm.

One stood in a white shirt and trousers, casually watching as if observing a play. The other, wearing a neatly made Taoist robe, stood with a calm brow and righteous eyes. They were opposites—one high, one low, one inside, one outside—surrounded by hissing ghosts and the white bones of foreigners holding foreign guns and artillery, while Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi stood frozen in disbelief.

Had Mu Sicheng been sober, he would have been stunned by the smile that appeared on Bai Liu's face, a rare sight indeed.

"Old master? I was only in my early thirties when I died, and you call me that..." The Taoist smiled, his eyebrows softening. "You're a mischievous young man, aren't you? Born with a naughty nature. Have you borrowed your yin money? Want me to help, old man?"

Bai Liu shook his head honestly. "Not yet, but it would be great if you could help."

"I can help," the Taoist smiled. "You're my descendant. I've accumulated quite a bit of yin energy over the past hundred years, so lending you a fortune before I go wouldn't hurt."

He lifted his feet, as if a swimming dragon flying through the wind, and landed in front of Bai Liu in the blink of an eye. His Taoist robe billowed and scattered in the air as the immense Yin Qi he released filled the space around him.

The three golden crowns of hair on the Taoist's head spread out, and the greenish-black Yin Qi that had lingered for so long on his face dissipated, revealing a handsome, vibrant face. The black nails on his hands retracted, revealing clean, human-like fingers.

He leaned down, his eyes half-lidded, and whispered into Bai Liu's ear. His words, faint yet tender, were barely audible over the rush of Yin energy.

"A hundred years ago, Yinshan Village was to fall and be handed over. I was at my wits' end when an evil god appeared. He promised to protect Yinshan Village for a hundred years and prevent any outsiders from invading, and in exchange, he gave me this evil art. I agreed to give him my soul and suffer for a hundred years."

"But the hundred years have passed, and the evil god never came. Time in Yinshan Village has stopped. It's frozen, caught in a seven-day cycle that never moves forward. Every day, strange beings begin to enter the village on the first day of the cycle."

"I wanted to end it, but I couldn't."

The Taoist's long, bony fingers reached out and gently touched Bai Liu's forehead. The Yin Qi poured from his body like an oceanic current, flooding into Bai Liu's body.

"Many thanks."

"Whether you entered the tomb without harming the villagers or woke me from my slumber, thank you."

Bai Liu looked at the Taoist. "Don't you hate the evil god who played with and tormented you?"

The Taoist, looking like Bai Liu, closed his eyes. A look of remembrance crossed his face as he whispered, almost to himself.

"...So what if I hate him, and what if I don't? I begged him willingly from the start. I've never regretted what happened. I remember when I knelt before him, turned my back on the faith of my ancestors, and said—"

"But let the dragon city fly, and teach not the horses—"

The clouds in the sky rolled and parted, and purple light gathered. Thunder roared like the crash of a mountain. The rain lashed like a wave. In the gap, a ball of lightning gathered, aimed directly at the indistinct yellow-robed Taoist below, and struck down with the force of a thousand pounds.

The Taoist in yellow opened his eyes violently, turned to face the heavenly thunder directly, and, with a fierce wave of his sleeve, spread his robe to shield the evil spirits of Yinshan Village and Bai Liu behind him. He bellowed the last three words with authority:

"-Du Yin Shan!"

Yinshan Village

The thunder crashed down, hitting the ground with a deafening rumble. The earth shook violently, throwing everyone off balance, and a blinding beam of light enveloped everything.

In its wake, all spirits and grievances were scattered by the earth-shattering thunder.

The Red and White Furies were reduced to mere shadows in the purple light, while the skeletons of the foreigners turned to ash in the blazing thunder. The pagoda of Yinshan Village shook violently, collapsing under the storm, struck by lightning and engulfed in flames.

The Taoist raised his arms, as though finding relief in the heavenly punishment that burned and melted his soul. He turned to look at Bai Liu, who had been spared the thunder's wrath.

"... I'm fortunate to have a descendant like you in a hundred years," the Taoist said softly, a smile touching his lips. "Listen carefully: the road ahead is long. Don't be stubborn or chase after fleeting illusions. It's better to cherish the person in front of you."

"The moon reflected in the water is still the moon right before you."

After a brief pause, the Taoist gently stroked Bai Liu's head and sighed. "You're still young, but your memory is poor. You keep forgetting things. But some things are better left forgotten..."

With that, the Taoist's figure began to dissolve, transforming into clouds of smoke and stars, disappearing from sight.

When the thunder finally subsided and the rain ceased, only Yang Zhi, Kong Xuyang, an unconscious Mu Sicheng, and a silent Bai Liu remained in Yinshan Village. Bai Liu was lost in thought.

Kong Xuyang, still in a daze, first glanced at his empty palms, then slowly scanned the deserted village, before his eyes settled on Mu Sicheng lying unconscious on the ground. A manic joy crept across his face.

"The boss monster is dead! The entire village has been cleared, and Bai Liu's teammate has passed out..."

Kong Xuyang threw his arms wide, laughing maniacally as the ashes swirled around him. “This is it! God is on my side!”

Amidst all the chaos, Yang Zhi couldn’t help but drop to his knees, laughing in a trance-like state, as though trying to convince himself. “... We can win. I’m sure we can win!”

Bai Liu raised his gaze, fixing Kong Xuyang with a smile. “Should I congratulate you in advance?”

Thinking Bai Liu was about to strike with his whip, Kong Xuyang instinctively took a few steps back in fear. But when he looked again, Bai Liu was standing still, unmoving.

Kong Xuyang froze mid-step, suddenly realizing something as his eyes fell to Bai Liu’s exposed limbs.

Bai Liu was zombifying, paralyzing him completely.

For a moment, Kong Xuyang stood frozen, then his maniacal grin spread, his hands clapping together as he laughed. “Bai Liu, Bai Liu, I thought you were so smart! You got played by an NPC zombie Taoist!”

“That zombie tricked you into taking in all that yin energy—now you’re turning into one of them, aren’t you?”

Kong Xuyang’s eyes gleamed with malicious delight as he strode over to Bai Liu, who remained immobile. “You and your monkey teammates will become monsters and be stuck in this copy forever.”

Bai Liu, with a calm smile, looked back at Kong Xuyang. “That does seem like the case.”

Kong Xuyang, now certain Bai Liu was immobilized, drew a bayonet from his side and approached him with feigned sorrow.

Imitating Bai Liu’s calm smile, but with raw resentment in his eyes, Kong Xuyang aimed the bayonet at Bai Liu’s heart, preparing to deliver the final blow.

“Let me teach you—losers and winners can’t speak to each other from such a level-headed angle!”

However, just as the bayonet came within a few centimeters of Bai Liu’s chest, Kong Xuyang’s hand faltered. His arm shook, unable to complete the strike.

Bai Liu looked down at Kong Xuyang, his body slightly hunched as he smiled deeper. “So, you enjoy speaking from a position of inferiority, don’t you, hometown?”

“W-What...?” Kong Xuyang’s eyes widened in shock and fury as he looked down, his gaze landing on the wisps of black Yin Qi seeping from the tip of the bayonet.

The black Yin Qi crawled into his palm, paralyzing it, turning it as immobile as Bai Liu’s.

Nearby, Yang Zhi opened his hands slowly, his palms now covered in the same black aura.

Sharp black nails began to grow from his hands and feet, and he felt his hair thickening and shortening unnaturally, like a corpse.

Terrified, Yang Zhi screamed in panic, trying to escape. But his body had grown stiff, the zombification taking hold. He struggled to move, but only managed to fall face-first into the muddy ground, his hips wriggling in vain as he couldn’t get up.

"Only when both parties agree can one party pass Yin Qi to the other!" Kong Xuyang was frozen in place, on the verge of collapse. "Why can you pass Yin Qi to me? I never agreed to it at all. It's not in accordance with the rules of Maoshan Daoism!"

"Is that so?" Bai Liu raised his hand, rubbing the back of his neck. He tilted his head and stretched his muscles, his smile growing more serene. "I didn’t know there were so many rules to Maoshan Daoism."

Kong Xuyang, rigid with disbelief, stared at Bai Liu, who was moving freely. "Why can you move?!"

"Maybe it’s because..." Bai Liu stepped forward, gently taking the bayonet from Kong Xuyang's hand. He casually moved up to Kong Xuyang's eyes, looking at him levelly and whispering with a soft smile, "You and your good teammate, Yang Zhi, sucked all the Yin out of me?"

Kong Xuyang froze, then quickly glanced down. Bai Liu's body was slowly releasing wisps of black Yin Qi, which moved from Bai Liu's body into Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi's. Their bodies absorbed the Yin energy like two black holes.

As the energy passed, Bai Liu’s previously pale face flushed, while Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi’s eyes darkened and fangs began to sprout.

"Many of the Old Xie Villagers helped me absorb the Yin Qi," Bai Liu smiled, genuinely grateful. "The Old Man's Yin energy was so strong, it all came at once. Without the help of those two old folks, I would've turned into a zombie much sooner."

Kong Xuyang stared at Bai Liu, shocked and confused. "Why would we actively suck the Yin energy out of you?"

Bai Liu feigned surprise. "Don't you know, folks?"

Kong Xuyang's anger flared, blood vessels bursting in his eyes, his pupils bloodshot. His nostrils flared with each breath.

Bai Liu slowly asked, "Old villager, do you remember where all the Yin Qi from the corpses in Yinshan Village gathered?"

"The catacombs," Kong Xuyang replied, grinding his teeth.

Bai Liu's smile widened. "So, who's the one gathering the Yin energy in the tomb?"

"That ashen Daoist zombie on..." Kong Xuyang hesitated, his face changing abruptly. "Is borrowing Yin wealth?!"

Bai Liu's smile deepened. "Right."

"The whole Yinshan Village is a large tomb, and all the Yin energy fed into this tomb converges on that Daoist alone. Wherever you borrow Yin energy, it all comes from that Daoist."

"And that Taoist gave you all the Yin Qi..." Kong Xuyang's face drained of color. "As long as the device we set up to borrow Yin Qi is still in place, and as long as you give it, the Yin Qi will keep flowing from you to us..."

Bai Liu smiled. "And since I'm always generous, since the old folks like Yin energy, I'll lend you all the Yin energy in my body."

Kong Xuyang's eyes turned red, his skin bruising and his nails growing longer. "You deliberately lured me to rob your quest and borrow Yin wealth. You already knew there was something wrong with your character's main quest?!"

"There's no free lunch in this world," Bai Liu said, smiling regretfully as he spread his hands. "Nor is there a perfect character setup. Since my character has the advantage of location and people, the main quest must have a flaw for fairness in the game." He shrugged. "That's why I never dared to do it. But it was you, homeboy, who dared to be the first to try it for me—covering me so I could try it myself."

Kong Xuyang, his eyes bloodshot with rage, roared hoarsely, "Bai Liu, you beast!!!"

[Yang Zhi's panel goes berserk, personal skill enhancement in progress...]

Yang Zhi trembled as Bai Liu's memories flooded his mind, digesting them in mere milliseconds. But as his spirit level continued to plummet, Yang Zhi was instantly submerged in an illusion formed by Bai Liu's memories.

He felt his feet cold and a strange burning sensation, as if they were submerged in a bucket of ice water. Someone's voice echoed nearby, laughing loudly:

"Bad boys, Bai Liu..."

The scene shifted. Now, he was sitting on the edge of a flower bed by his high school playground. A Spades-like figure knelt in front of him, the distant sound of volleyballs crashing and a noisy crowd, though everything felt distant and muted.

The Spades-like figure was hugging his knees, tilting his head, and staring at Bai Liu as though he was the only one left in the world.

Spades spoke softly, with a serious tone, "Can I have one of those ice creams you're holding?"

Yang Zhi heard Bai Liu reject the request, his voice cold and firm: "No."

Spades paused for a moment before asking again, "Can I switch with you then?"

Bai Liu leaned forward slightly, his eyes lowered with a hint of interest, "In exchange for what?"

Spades answered, "In exchange for my newly born soul."

The scene shifted again.

Yang Zhi sat, disoriented, in a hospital room.

On the bed, Fang Dian was eating from a thermos. Two men sat silently on the benches beside her. One of them was Bai Liu, and the other was a man Yang Zhi found somewhat familiar—handsome, with dark circles under his eyes, and the strong smell of cigarette smoke emanating from him.

Fang Dian finished eating, wiped her mouth with toilet paper, and reached out to pat the man's shoulder without a hint of shame. "Old Lu, come and help me. I need to go to the toilet."

Yang Zhi realized this man was Bai Liu's childhood friend, Lu Yizhan.

Lu Yizhan helped Fang Dian walk to the toilet, the thermos bottle in his hand. As they limped toward the bathroom, Fang Dian sighed, "Damn, Old Lu, I'm not becoming a straight man, am I? Eat and shit..."

"No, you're fine. Your gastrointestinal function is good. I've already asked the doctor." Lu Yizhan responded calmly.

Fang Dian gave him a thumbs up with a smile that showed her white teeth, "I asked the doctor that right after I woke up from the anesthetic!"

Lu Yizhan, his face turning red, awkwardly helped her to the toilet. "Next time, ask about something else if you're worried."

Fang Dian's voice floated out from the bathroom, "That's exactly what I was worried about. We haven't even slept together that much..."

It sounded like Lu Yizhan had covered her mouth.

Bai Liu, sitting in the room, couldn't help but let a small smile tug at the corners of his lips before quickly dropping it.

The sound of the toilet flushing was followed by Fang Dian emerging, supported by Lu Yizhan, looking pale and fragile.

She had injured her abdomen, and every time she used the toilet, the wound would hurt.

But when Bai Liu visited, she never once showed any pain.

"No more blood in the stool," Fang Dian said, relaxing as she leaned back against the hospital bed, patting her bandaged belly. "I'll be out in a few days."

Lu Yizhan, worried, stood up and tried to stop her, "You should stop tapping the wound!"

Fang Dian waved him off casually. "It's not a big wound. Really."

Bai Liu spoke up, his voice calm, "It will certainly affect fertility, won't it?"

Fang Dian and Lu Yizhan froze, their movements stopping in place.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze, averting his eyes before continuing, "It's my fault—"

Fang Dian sat up, propping herself up on the pillows and wrapping her arms around Bai Liu, pulling him close as he tried to avoid her gaze. "It's not your fault!"

"It was the fault of the person who hit me. It was the fault of my rash actions, the fault of the weather, the fault of everything in this world that led me here. But it's not your fault."

Her face was pale, but her voice was firm. "I had to save you. You didn't do anything wrong. Don't apologize to me."

Bai Liu gently opened his mouth, "…Consider it a debt I owe you."

Fang Dian rolled her eyes and laughed. "Since high school, when have we ever counted favors?" She propped herself up and lay back down.

Then, as if remembering something, she looked at Bai Liu thoughtfully before reaching out to touch his head with a slightly wistful expression. "If you really want to say you owe me, it's not a favor you owe. It's something else."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "What do I owe you?"

Fang Dian grinned, reaching out and playfully pinching his cheek. "I'm owed a son. Bai Liu, give me a son. I like kids like you."

"I’m serious, I'm not kidding," Fang Dian said with a playful pat on Bai Liu’s head, laughing brightly despite her haggard, pale face. Her eyes sparkled as she looked up at him. "I’ve always raised you like a son, anyway."

Bai Liu fell silent for a long moment before slowly averting his gaze. "I’m past the age of adoption."

Fang Dian blinked in surprise before bursting into laughter.

"I don’t care!" she grinned, her eight teeth flashing in a wide smile. Her happiness was genuine, radiating from deep within. She reached out, grabbing Bai Liu’s head and giving it a playful rub. "Say 'daddy!'"

Lu Yizhan, standing nearby, wiped away a tear as he hurriedly intervened. "Be careful!"

Bai Liu was pinned under Fang Dian’s grip, his face contorted from the pressure. He opened his mouth, his voice strained. "…Get some rest and recover soon."

Once Fang Dian had fallen asleep, Lu Yizhan and Bai Liu walked out of the ward in silence, their footsteps echoing down the empty hallway. They reached the corner of the stairs, where a narrow, high window let in the daylight, casting shadows across their faces.

Lu Yizhan pulled out a cigarette, holding it between his lips, unlit, as he leaned against the wall. The sunlight illuminated his face, revealing the exhaustion of a long night.

His gaze wandered, lost in thought. "…Everything is my fault," he murmured, almost to himself.

Bai Liu glanced at him, his tone cold. "Do you need me to remind you how your wife comforted me?"

Lu Yizhan let out a short laugh, removing the cigarette from his lips. He coughed twice and then turned back to Bai Liu, his expression an unreadable mix of emotions.

For a brief moment, Bai Liu felt as though Lu Yizhan was seeing someone else through him.

Lu Yizhan quickly composed himself, averting his eyes for a moment before speaking softly. "It's my fault for making the wrong decision and letting you and Fang Dian get hurt."

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed as he sensed something off in Lu Yizhan's tone. He asked calmly, "Is this something you're involved in?"

"Sort of." Lu Yizhan placed the cigarette back in his mouth, his head bowed so his expression was unreadable. "The person who retaliated against you and Fang Dian is a prisoner I once chased. He was recently released from prison and wanted revenge. At first, he only sent me Fang Dian's picture, so I warned her to be cautious."

"But you didn't think they'd target me as well?" Bai Liu asked, his voice steady but filled with a hint of accusation. "Why didn't you warn me?"

Lu Yizhan hesitated for a moment before responding. "They're not just criminals," Bai Liu continued, his voice growing sharper as he dissected the situation. "This group is organized, disciplined. This isn't their first time—they attack people in the streets without hesitation, taking pictures like it's a performance, a game. They talk about winning contests, getting something, treating it all like some kind of competitive challenge."

Bai Liu's face grew pale as he connected the dots. "This group… It's more like a terrorist organization, with a unified purpose, a common belief. And those kinds of groups often have religious ties."

Lu Yizhan's face darkened as Bai Liu pressed on. "Terrorist organizations usually attack on a large scale, unpredictably. It's clear now that the target is anyone connected to you. And yet, you told Fang Dian about this but kept it from me."

"Putting all this together," Bai Liu continued, "the only conclusion I can draw is that you're working undercover in some highly profitable, highly staffed, recreational religious group. Or, more accurately, this game. And you've achieved a position of no small importance there."

Bai Liu paused, eyes locked on Lu Yizhan. "Because you know this game involves me, you've been trying to keep me in the dark while the other side knows everything about me, even wants me to join their religious group."

Bai Liu took a deep breath, his voice cold. "I don't know anything about this group or the game. But there are two possibilities for why they're targeting me."

"One," he said, "they want to recruit me as one of their believers."

His eyes bored into Lu Yizhan's. "And the second… They want me to be their god, don't they?"

Lu Yizhan fell silent for a long while before lifting his head and meeting Bai Liu's gaze. He let out a hoarse laugh. "Sometimes, I think it's not a good thing to have a friend who's too smart."

"Now you know this exists," Lu Yizhan said, exhaling slowly. "What will you do?"

Without hesitation, Bai Liu answered, "I'd join the organization."

Lu Yizhan closed his eyes, a look of resignation crossing his face. "I knew you'd say that."

"I can promise you I won't do anything reckless when you go in," Bai Liu said, his tone calm, but his words carried a heavy edge. "But I don't like putting the initiative in someone else's hands. Right now, I'm more comfortable with the scenario where Fang Dian drives her motorbike straight into them, and the other side ends up in the hospital… or the morgue."

Lu Yizhan stared at Bai Liu, his gaze intense. "So you want to kill someone, do you?"

Bai Liu didn't respond, but his silence spoke volumes, and Lu Yizhan understood the unspoken answer.

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath, forcing himself to calm down. "Okay, you're going to kill... How many people are you planning to kill? How do you intend to do it, and what will you do with them afterward?"

"I know that, as I speak, your mind is already working out ways to handle everything. I know you could take control of all of this and use this organization, this tool, to navigate the world with god-like freedom—killing at will, amassing untold wealth, and satisfying every human desire."

Lu Yizhan looked directly into Bai Liu's eyes. "But then what?"

He reached out, placing his hands on Bai Liu's shoulders, his gaze warm and pleading. "Are you really going to keep being that kind of god?"

"Fang Dian and I both want you to be an ordinary person—someone who can go to work, enjoy birthday dinners, have friends, hold a job, cry, laugh, get hurt, love, and be loved."

"I've seen how you've been. Your life seems like it's everything, but that's only because it comes at the expense of others. You wouldn't be happy like that. No one would."

"Bai Liu, I watched you grow up. Don't let me watch you fall down that path again."

Lu Yizhan hugged Bai Liu's shoulder, closing his eyes. "I promise you, one day, you'll be able to bring those who hurt Fang Dian to justice—legally, within the moral framework we both believe in. But not now."

He stroked Bai Liu's head gently, then slowly raised his hand, a strange white light flickering on his palm. His eyes filled with a mix of emotions. "I forgot to say this earlier... Happy birthday, Bai Liu."

[System Prompt: Do you wish to use the Divine Rule Skill (World Memory Folding)?]

[This skill modifies the memory lines of everyone in the world, overwriting special events so that no one can remember or find traces of those events. Everything seamlessly resets—this is the highest-level Memory skill.]

[The memories after the reset become the foundational facts of the world and cannot be erased or altered by any object or skill.]

[System Prompt: The player has used the World Memory Folding skill twice. Only one more use remains. Do you wish to proceed?]

Lu Yizhan closed his eyes: [OK.]

A brilliant white light erupted, and Yang Zhi's mind collided with the skill head-on.

The World Memory Folding skill allowed Yang Zhi's thoughts to shift rapidly, causing his mind to flicker uncontrollably.

Yang Zhi, whose memory skill was only a basic one, couldn't handle the high-dimensional power of this skill. After devouring so many memories, he was overwhelmed by the force of their modification and folding, driving him into madness.

Yang Zhi collapsed to his knees, clutching his stomach in agony as blood poured from his mouth. The conflicting memories of everyone he had consumed rushed back all at once, swirling in his mind like a violent storm.

In a desperate attempt to quell the pain, Yang Zhi grabbed handfuls of mud and tried to swallow them without chewing, but it only intensified the sharp, glass-like sensation in his gut.

Writhing in pain, he screamed, his limbs spasming uncontrollably, his face streaked with snot, eyes wide and pupils dilated.

Kong Xuyang was still desperately searching for any way to reverse his fate, but no matter how much he struggled, it was futile—his surroundings only grew more and more real.

His mind drifted back to his university days when people mocked him and trampled on him for being poor—saying he'd never amount to anything.

"I won't!" Kong Xuyang yelled, crawling through the mud, his nails digging into the earth, tearing at his own flesh. His voice trembled with frustration, "It's not fair! Why should I be trampled like this when I'm better than them?"

He looked around, seeing those same people, now rich and smug, with expensive shoes on his face, laughing at him. They said, "You've lost. You're the loser now."

"I will win!" Kong Xuyang cried out, desperation in his eyes. His body jerked violently as he reached for the shoes of the men who mocked him, blood spilling from his mouth and nose. "I win! I can afford what you can! Stop looking down on me!"

The moment the mechanical voice announced the end of the match, Wang Shun collapsed backward, slumping in his chair. Liu Jiayi, whose lips had been tightly pursed, finally allowed them to curl into a smile. Muke let out a long sigh of relief, and Tang Erda, who had been tense throughout, relaxed his shoulders.

The Reverse God smiled and glanced toward the exit beside the big screen, where Spades was also watching intently.

Everything seemed to move in slow motion.

Bai Liu logged out from the side of the big screen, taking his time to straighten his shirt before standing up.

Mu Sicheng logged out shortly after him, slightly wounded and muttering curses, as though accusing Bai Liu of exploiting him unfairly in the game. But a closer look revealed the mischievous grin on Mu Sicheng's face, his eyes twinkling as if he wasn't bothered by the events at all.

It was all for the win.

The crowd's response was a mixture of curses and cheers, interrupted by the frantic screams of the Fanatic Lamb players and their supporters.

"What will we do when the president dies?"
"How can we fight a group battle without a tactician?!"

Bai Liu carefully smoothed the hem of his shirt, lifting his face slowly as the chaotic noise of the crowd gradually quieted. All eyes shifted to him as he looked up, the energy in the air suddenly changing.

In most matches, the tactician of the winning team would take the spotlight to deliver a closing remark—often a moment for self-praise and belittling the opponent. It was part of the ritual to soak up any remaining points from the audience and build hype for the next match.

Bai Liu, however, simply smiled and raised his hand, offering a slight bow toward the audience. "I hope my opponent and I have contributed to an enjoyable viewing experience."

With that, he turned and walked off the stage without any further fanfare, as if the victory had been effortless.

He didn't mock his opponent or glorify his own achievements. He didn't linger on his triumphs or hardships. Bai Liu moved past the victory with a calm, almost casual grace.

This understated yet graceful display of victory was powerful in its own right.

Especially considering this was a rookie tactician facing off against a professional guild for the first time. The audience's fascination with him grew exponentially.

After a brief silence, the noise from the now subdued Fanatic Lamb supporters died down, replaced by murmurs of excited discussion.

The subject of their talk was obvious.

"Bai Liu..."
"I'm betting half my savings on the Roving Circus next time..."
"This tactician feels so strong, maybe even stronger than last year's killer sequence..."
"He doesn't kill as much as last year's Spades, but his field control and pressure? He doesn't play like a rookie. No wonder Charles the old greaser had his eye on him—he's not cheap..."

As Bai Liu returned to the Roving Circus team, everyone stood up to hand him bandages. It was a tradition—a gesture to help teammates recover from their injuries, similar to offering a drink to a boxer during a match.

However, bandages were usually given only to those with minor wounds.

Bai Liu looked at the six bandages handed to him and raised an eyebrow. "I don't, like, take my injuries out of the game, do I?"

Beside him, Mu Sicheng, with a bloodied face, watched the scene and grinned sarcastically. "Six top-tier bandages? That's rich. Why didn't anyone pass me a bandage?"

Bai Liu took Muke's bandage and handed it to Mu Sicheng with a sincere "Thank you for your hard work."

Mu Sicheng took it, his grimace only slightly softened by the sarcasm in his voice. "Don't be nice in front of me. You'll be lucky if you don't screw me over in the next game."

Bai Liu responded with a straight face. "I'll try."

Wang Shun, observing this exchange, retrieved the bandage that Bai Liu hadn't asked for. His gaze shifted between the Reverse God and Spades, who also silently took their bandages. His expression showed confusion.

Bai Liu is the president of our team, and it's only right for us, the four members of the Roving Circus, to give him bandages. But why are you two—killer sequence players—giving him bandages? Isn't that a bit... much?

The Reverse God, without a hint of embarrassment, smiled and extended his hand to Bai Liu. "Well done. You've made a fortune for all of us who bet on you. Thank you, President Bai, for such a great performance."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu swatted the Reverse God's hand away without a second thought, smiling as he looked at him sideways. "If you're that grateful, why don't you share half of the points you earned from your bet? We'll split it 50/50, and I'll call you next time there's another opportunity like this."

The Reverse God paused. "That's not necessary. It would be too much trouble for President Bai."

"How can it be trouble?" Bai Liu immediately turned the tables, patting the Reverse God on the shoulder with a broad smile. "What's our relationship? No need to be so formal."

"Haha, really?" The Reverse God scratched his head in feigned confusion. "I didn't realize President Bai and I were so close. I'm flattered."

Bai Liu nodded with a smile. "Oh? Why else would Reverse God come all the way here to watch my match, bet tens of millions of points on me, and hand me bandages?"

"My best friend hasn't treated me this well. Wouldn't you agree, Reverse God-sensei?"

The two exchanged words and laughs, their expressions matching, though they'd gone back and forth four or five times by now. Those around them watched in awe.

Was this a battle between top tacticians?

The encounter ended with both sides biting off more than they could chew.

Liu Jiayi stepped forward, her expression serious. "Bai Liu, that Yang Zhi skill hasn't affected your memory, has it?"

"No," Bai Liu replied quickly. "I went over my biography in my head after coming down and was able to recall everything just as before."

"You know you have three memory folds in your mind..." Liu Jiayi began, but her words trailed off as she seemed to remember something. She glanced at the Reverse God beside her, and then, without missing a beat, shifted the topic. "Let's race first. We'll talk after we come down."

Bai Liu gave a casual thumbs-up in response.

"We're currently at four points in the tournament. The Fanatic Lambs have lost too much this time. They might be desperate to force a team game with us to make up for it. Are you still in good shape?" Tang Erda asked, frowning as he squeezed Bai Liu's arm, almost lifting him off the ground. He seriously inspected him from head to toe. "Any hidden injuries?"

Spades watched Tang Erda hold Bai Liu's arm, his gaze intense. The Reverse God smiled at him but kept a firm grip on Spades, who was about to lunge forward. With a low voice, he warned, "These are Bai Liu's family. Behave yourself."

Spades lowered his head slowly, clutching the bandage he had failed to hand to Bai Liu earlier. He sat down quietly in the corner without a word.

He understood the Reverse God's meaning. Bai Liu had just logged out of the game and was deliberately ignoring him by not taking the bandage.

It was the same as before, when Bai Liu had met him in the game pool and refused to make eye contact.

Bai Liu gave Spades a brief, almost imperceptible glance before turning back to Tang Erda. "Don’t worry. The team won’t play against us."

Tang Erda blinked, confused.

As soon as Bai Liu spoke, the news of the Fanatic Lamb's forfeit was communicated to the system.

[System Alert: Fanatic Lamb forfeits the regatta.]

[System Alert: Wandering Circus vs. Fanatic Lamb, Wandering Circus wins.]

"They won’t be bothering us much," Bai Liu said with a smile, turning to look at the Fanatic Lamb crew, who were visibly shaking. "They’ve spent all their points on this game. They can’t afford props to erase traces of reality."

The Reverse God followed Bai Liu’s gaze, his smile deepening, though a dark gleam flickered in his eyes. "That means their group will soon be in danger."

After the game, the winners and losers were required to shake hands in the center of the large screen.

Kong Xuyang and Yang Zhi were still replaying in their minds the horrific deaths they had suffered at Bai Liu's hands. Just the thought of what they had planned for him made their faces pale with fear.

Not to mention that Bai Liu had now accumulated so many points, he could easily do anything to them.

Bai Liu, ever smiling, shook hands with the Frenzied Lambs team, chatting casually as they did so.

"Oh, I know you. Just had Wang Shun check you out. There's a police station about a kilometer from your house—seventeen minutes by foot, or a minute by motorbike."

"There's another police station five kilometers from your place..."

"Your house is in a good location—three police stations nearby. Which one do you prefer?"

After the handshake, the members of the Fanatic Lambs were frozen in place, drenched in cold sweat and wanting to cry, too terrified to move.

Having worked with Kong Xuyang for so long, they knew all too well that what was even more terrifying than what had happened to them in the game was the fact that Bai Liu knew so much about their real lives.

Players in the game, no matter how crazy they acted, were tethered to someone or something in the real world. Having their reality exposed was a terrifying vulnerability. They'd used this weakness to target their opponents in the game, but now, Bai Liu was doing the same to them with information from his sources.

Earlier, they had exploited others with the paparazzi, and now Bai Liu was using the same tactic against them.

Karma, it seemed, had a way of coming full circle.

Bai Liu didn't leave immediately after the handshake. Instead, he asked casually, "Where is that paparazzi member of yours? I'd like to meet him and make friends."

The men of the Fanatic Lambs inwardly hissed. You're deliberately seeking revenge!

But they didn't dare resist.

The paparazzi member stepped forward, trembling. "B-Bai, President Bai, I am the paparazzi," he stammered.

Bai Liu slowly examined him, his gaze cold. "Did you keep all the pictures of the victims you took?"

The paparazzi hesitated before nodding. "I... I kept them."

"Good." Bai Liu smiled, though there was something chilling in his eyes. "There are two police stations near your house. Put your evidence photos up, hop on your crime prop motorbikes, and turn yourselves in if you don't want to be tortured to death by me in the game."

The men of the Fanatic Lambs froze for a moment, first overwhelmed with relief at surviving, only to quickly realize something was wrong.

"B-Bai, President Bai..." the paparazzi asked cautiously, "We've erased all traces of our crimes in reality. We can't turn ourselves in, even with the evidence..."

"What does that have to do with me?" Bai Liu's smile remained, but the coldness in his eyes deepened. "I just want to see you suffer."

"If you can't recover the evidence, I'll gladly take it upon myself to torture you."

"We'll get it back somehow!" The paparazzi shouted, his voice filled with panic as he took a few steps back, staring at Bai Liu in fear. "We'll definitely recover those marks to turn ourselves in!!!"

Bai Liu glanced up at him, then turned away, offering a faint, cryptic response. "I'll see."

Chapter End Notes

Did everyone catch who the Reverse God is??? 🫣

Pre-season

After a formal handshake with the defeated Frenzy Lamb, the crowd in the viewing pool reluctantly dispersed, though many still craved more of the spectacle.

Amidst them, Hearts lounged lazily in her seat, resting her chin on one hand. Her gaze flickered between Bai Liu, who was communicating with the gods, and Spades, who stood unmoving at Bai Liu's side, his eyes fixed on him. As her curled lashes lowered, a slow smirk tugged at her red lips.

"I know Spades' weakness."

Qi Yifang, who had just stood up to leave, froze mid-step and snapped his head toward her. "What is it?"

Hearts didn't answer immediately. Instead, her gaze lingered fondly on the side of Bai Liu's face. As if sensing her stare, Bai Liu turned to her, offering a polite smile while raising a hand in a small, graceful curtsy of thanks.

So, they had noticed the tens of millions of points Hearts had placed on Bai Liu earlier.

Rising elegantly to her feet, Hearts tipped the brim of her hat lower and waved back at Bai Liu before turning away, her smirk deepening.

"Adjust our tactics for the Slayer sequence," she instructed as she walked off. "Next time we face off, I'll be targeting Spades."

Qi Yifang frowned in confusion. "But Empress, haven't your skills always been ineffective against Spades? He sees through all your disguises. We even tailored our strategy specifically to keep you from facing him alone."

"That was then."

As Hearts strode forward, the sharp click of her heels echoed in the now-empty ornamental pool. Her figure subtly shifted—shoulders broadening, her long skirt tightening into tailored suit trousers, a crisp white shirt tucked neatly at her waist. Her cascading red curls twisted and shortened, morphing into a casually tied ponytail that swayed against her pale neck.

Within moments, she had transformed into Bai Liu.

With Bai Liu's familiar face and a leather-gloved hand gripping a stark white bone whip, Hearts—or rather, the new Bai Liu—turned to Qi Yifang with an easy, knowing smile.

"But Spades is in love with someone."

Qi Yifang stood frozen, eyes wide in shock at the flawless transformation. His heart skipped a beat as he stared at Bai Liu—no, Hearts—who somehow looked even more seductive than before. His pulse pounded as he stammered, "E-Empress... Emperor!"

Hearts chuckled softly, reaching out to pat Qi Yifang's cheek. "A friendly warning—don't look at Bai Liu like that in front of Spades."

Qi Yifang snapped out of his daze, slapping his own face in quick succession as if to knock some sense into himself. I'm not gay. He clenched his fists. I'm not gay. I'm not gay.

Still dazed, he hurried after Hearts, his mind too muddled to process the full weight of her words.

"Wait, Empress—" he hesitated, his brow furrowing. "Spades liking someone... that doesn't hurt you, does it?"

Hearts cast him a sidelong glance, her lips curling. "Why would I be hurt?"

Qi Yifang faltered. Huh?

You like Spades. Spades likes someone else. Shouldn't you be upset?

The confusion must have shown on his face because Hearts let out an amused laugh.

"What a naive little boy." Her voice was rich with amusement. "You don't actually think I like someone just because I say I do, do you?"

Qi Yifang blinked rapidly, thrown by the casual dismissal. "I—I'm almost twenty-six. I'm not some little boy anymore..."

"Oh? Is that so?"

Hearts tilted his head, fingers drifting up to undo two buttons on his shirt. His ponytail unraveled slightly as he casually ruffled it, letting strands fall messily over his face. Beneath the loose fabric, the curve of a pale collarbone and a sliver of smooth chest peeked through, as if someone had just carelessly stripped it open.

Qi Yifang's mind short-circuited.

Hearts' gaze lowered for a beat before lifting again, his smirk widening as he leaned in, voice dripping with playful teasing.

"Control your reaction before you stand in front of me and insist you're not a schoolboy."

Qi Yifang's entire face flushed red from the base of his neck up. He stood there, utterly shell-shocked.

If anyone had passed by him at that moment, they would have heard the King's Guild's formidable rookie murmuring under his breath, his eyes glazed over in disbelief.

"I'm not gay... am I? Am I gay or not...?"

"... Bai Liu is so pretty."

Bai Liu, unaware that someone was silently admiring his good looks, politely shook hands with the members of the Killer Sequence as a farewell. However, what was meant to be a brief exchange ended up dragging on with no resolution in sight.

He glanced down at Spades, who was gripping his hand tightly, his face devoid of emotion.

Beside them, Reverse God coughed loudly into his fist. "I've come all this way to watch Bai Liu's match, and after all this delay, it's about time we head back!"

Bai Yi immediately jumped in, feigning a cough of his own. "We still have a ton of training left. Right, Spades?"

Bai Jiamu stuffed his hands into his pockets, looking away as if he had nothing to do with the Spades who was currently clinging onto their team's strategist.

Liao Ke, watching the scene unfold with both amusement and helplessness, sighed and turned to Bai Liu. "Please bear with him, President Bai. Our Spades tends to be a bit...persistent, and we still haven't quite figured out what goes on in his head."

Despite the obvious attempts at persuasion, none of them actually made a move to separate the two. It was as if they had collectively agreed to ignore the situation.

Mu Ke and Mu Sicheng frowned at the sight.

What was the Killer Sequence playing at? Letting Spades hold onto Bai Liu's hand so forcefully—was this some kind of provocation?

Yes, that had to be it. Neither Mu Sicheng nor Mu Ke had ever seen Bai Liu and Spades together before, and they had no trouble interpreting this intense handshake as a blatant challenge.

Meanwhile, Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi—who actually knew what was going on—

Liu Jiayi wordlessly removed her goggles and, without changing expression, began pretending to be blind.

Tang Erda, on the other hand, kept raising his hand as if about to intervene, only to hesitate and lower it again.

Separating them… felt wrong. But not separating them… also felt wrong.

For the first time in his life, Captain Tang found himself torn in an emotional standoff he had no clue how to handle.

Bai Liu finally lifted his gaze and spoke, his tone calm. "Let go. Then we can talk about whatever it is you want to talk about."

Spades was silent for a moment before releasing his grip.

"You guys go on ahead." Bai Liu turned to Wang Shun and the others. "Wang Shun, prepare the debriefing report for the next league match. Go over it with Liu Jiayi and the rest—I'll be there shortly."

Wang Shun nodded. "Understood, President."

Mu Ke and Mu Sicheng clearly didn't want to leave, but Tang Erda and Liu Jiayi dragged them away before they could protest.

Finally, seeing Bai Liu freed, Reverse God let out a long sigh of relief. He clasped his hands together in a mock bow. "Most benevolent President Bai, on behalf of all members of the Killer Sequence, please have a good chat with Spades. We are eternally grateful for your kindness."

With that, he grabbed Bai Yi—who was craning his neck in an obvious attempt to eavesdrop—and hauled him out of the scene as quickly as possible.

Now, only Bai Liu and Spades remained in the empty decorative pool.

Spades fixed Bai Liu with an unwavering stare. "Why are you avoiding me?"

Bai Liu met his gaze, calm and detached. "Why does it matter to you if I do?"

His expression was steady, his eyes cool and unreadable, as if the man before him had never once stirred him. "We've only met twice in the game pool. Is it really so strange that I would avoid a stranger who's been chasing after me?"

Spades went silent. His back straightened, his hand clenching around the whip at his side. His voice was low when he finally spoke.

"Would a stranger grab someone’s hand the first time they met?"

"I can tell—you don’t hate me."

Bai Liu paused, considering, before responding in an almost languid tone, "I suppose I do find it difficult to hate your face."

Meanwhile, Bai Yi—who had been forcibly dragged out of the viewing area—finally stopped craning his neck and turned to Reverse God. He nudged him with his elbow.

"Hey, is it really okay for you to just dump Spades on Bai Liu like that?" Bai Yi frowned. "Spades is completely clueless when it comes to relationships. No matter how you look at it, he's the one Bai Liu is playing with."

He shook his head, reminiscing. "Back in the forest, Spades was so mesmerized by Bai Liu that he couldn’t even tell the difference between four and five. And in the end, Bai Liu just used him. Even after getting out, Spades was still pining for him."

Bai Yi sighed dramatically, stroking his own face with exaggerated sorrow. "What is this world coming to? Good guys like me and Spades, getting deceived by cold-hearted people who don’t appreciate us—"

Bai Jiamu visibly shuddered in disgust. "The hell are you talking about? What kind of delusion makes you think you and Spades are the same?"

Reverse God, however, remained composed as he gazed toward the ornamental pool. "If Bai Liu actually sat down and examined his own feelings rationally, I wonder if he'd realize how much he values Spades."

Bai Yi blinked. "Wait, what do you mean? Bai Liu looked pretty attached to Spades back in the forest. You're not saying—"

Reverse God met Bai Yi's eyes. "Yes. Exactly what you're thinking."

Bai Yi's jaw dropped. "Shit! Does Spades know? And you still left him with Bai Liu?!"

Reverse God's gaze remained steady. "By now… he should."

Back in the ornamental pool, Bai Liu slowly lifted his eyes to meet Spades'. His voice was quiet, deliberate.

"Because the person I loved a long time ago looked exactly like you."

Spades' fingers tensed around the whip at his side.

"He's dead," Bai Liu continued, his tone devoid of emotion. "So I find it hard to hate someone who looks just like him and still keeps getting close to me."

He stepped forward, reaching out to brush his fingers against Spades' face. His touch was gentle, yet his expression remained unreadable.

"Because it would be such a shame to waste a perfect keepsake."

Pre-season

Bai Yi paced anxiously in front of the Killer Sequence, hands clasped behind his back, like a father waiting for his daughter's first date to end.

"Why isn't he back yet…?"

Bai Jiamu, growing impatient, sighed. "Can you just sit down and calm down?"

Bai Yi spun around, throwing up his hands in exasperation. "Calm down? Our guild leader is acting as someone's body double! How do you expect me to stay calm?!"

"Spades won't be a stand-in," Bai Jiamu said with certainty. "He might seem indifferent, but he's proud. Besides, I doubt Bai Liu would let him. He'll make his move, and Spades will come back after fighting him."

Bai Yi, left speechless by the rebuttal, turned to drag someone else into the conversation. "Reverse God, what do you think Spades will do?"

Leaning against the balcony railing, the Reverse God narrowed his eyes against the breeze. At Bai Yi's question, he turned his head slightly, smiling in vague amusement. "Relationships are matters best decided by the people involved."

Bai Yi, already familiar with the Reverse God's cryptic way of speaking, narrowed his eyes and pressed on. "I don't care about the people involved. I want to hear your opinion as an outsider."

"My opinion?" The Reverse God rubbed his chin. "I don't think there's a contradiction between Bai Liu wanting something other than Spades and him already liking Spades."

Bai Yi frowned. "Huh? What does that even mean?"

The Reverse God's grin widened, as if something about the conversation amused him. "It's like an eighteen-year-old swearing they'll never share their ice cream… but then they end up giving it away anyway."

He glanced out the window, his expression thoughtful. "He may not remember it now, but I think he's making the same choice this time as he did before."

"Because it's the same person asking for the ice cream."

Spades looked at Bai Liu, his expression serious. "I'm just a souvenir—so you can't like me?"

Bai Liu was silent for a moment before looking away, his voice steady and calm. "The affection given to a souvenir isn't the same as the affection given to a person. It's… lesser."

Spades nodded as if that logic made perfect sense. "Then I don't count as a person," he reasoned, stepping forward to grip Bai Liu's wrist. "So you can like me now."

"In the way you like souvenirs."

Bai Liu tried to pull his hand away, but Spades tightened his grip, refusing to let go until he got an answer.

Turning his face aside, Bai Liu's voice cooled. "You're not even a very good souvenir."

Spades leaned in, his breath brushing against Bai Liu's ear. "What part of me isn't good enough?" His voice was low, almost teasing. "You said I have a good figure. So what doesn't fit…?"

"Enough," Bai Liu cut him off, his chest rising and falling with restrained frustration. "I don't want to—"

"Is it my face?" Spades pressed, lifting his hand to his cheek as if inspecting himself in a mirror. "Am I not good-looking enough?"

"No." Bai Liu's voice was steady, but quiet. "You're just… not enough like him."

Spades froze. His expression remained unreadable, but his gaze sharpened as he stared at Bai Liu. "What's different?" he asked, voice even. "My mouth? My nose? My eyes?"

Bai Liu finally turned to meet Spades' gaze, his own eerily calm. "Your bones."

Spades stilled for a fraction of a second. Bai Liu exhaled, almost imperceptibly relieved.

This was exhausting. He'd much rather Spades just give up.

But then realization flickered in Spades' eyes. He reached for his whip. "Oh. This?"

The whip lashed up, its tip nearly grazing the skin of his face, ready to carve through flesh and expose the bones beneath. "I can cut them out and have them changed."

Bai Liu's pupils contracted. He moved instantly, slamming his hand down to stop the whip—but it was too late. The razor-sharp edge had already traced a deep, bone-deep gash down the left side of Spades' face.

Cold blood dripped from Spades' jaw, landing on the back of Bai Liu's hand.

Bai Liu's eyelids flickered. His voice turned ice-cold. "What are you doing?"

Spades' tone remained natural, unbothered as if he hadn't just tried to carve into his own skull. "Changing the bones you don't like."

Bai Liu's chest rose and fell twice in measured breaths. The warmth of Spades' blood on his skin sent a shiver up his fingers, curling them slightly.

"I don't take souvenirs that have been artificially altered." Bai Liu glanced up at Spades, his gaze lingering on the gash across his face. His expression cooled a few degrees further. "I don't take scraps with scars either."

"I won't have a wound. I heal fast," Spades insisted.

Bai Liu exhaled a long, slow breath and held out his hand. "Bring the bandages."

Spades immediately pressed the crumpled bandage he had been clutching into Bai Liu's palm.

Bai Liu glanced down at it before lowering his eyes. "Keep your head down."

Spades obediently ducked his head. Without breaking eye contact, Bai Liu raised his hand and wrapped it around Spades' face, carefully bandaging his wound. Spades watched him intently, as if Bai Liu himself were the most fascinating thing in the world.

Bai Liu's fingers paused. The bandage had just covered Spades' eyes.

For a fleeting moment, Bai Liu was lost in a memory.

In the orphanage, Xie Ta had made a doll—a long, thin figure, eerie in its facelessness. It had no features because there were no bandages to shape them. Later, Xie Ta was covered in needle marks, his body a map of drawn blood.

Xie Ta looked at Bai Liu as he bandaged him and whispered: "When these bandages come off, your long, skinny ghost doll will finally have a face."

But Bai Liu had never seen Xie Ta without the bandage mask, in the end.

Now, Spades sat before him, his face wrapped in bandages, only his black eyes exposed. He looked at Bai Liu with unwavering calm, as if offering himself up as the perfect souvenir—flawed, yet entirely devoted.

Bai Liu hesitated.

Spades, despite having his mouth covered, found a way to speak. His voice was muffled, slightly distorted.

"You just looked at me like you wanted to kiss me—"

Bai Liu tugged sharply on the bandage. Spades staggered forward two steps, pulled off balance. Without changing expression, Bai Liu tightened the bandage and pulled it up over Spades' eyes.

A slow, confused pause. "...I don’t have a cut on my eye to wrap."

Bai Liu’s voice was pleasant. "Keep talking nonsense, and you’ll have one soon."

Spades wasn’t sure what he had said wrong, but some instinct warned him to shut up. He wisely obeyed.

Silence settled between them, broken only by the sound of each other's breathing.

Spades, now blindfolded, couldn't see Bai Liu’s face. But he felt the air shift, the almost imperceptible way Bai Liu leaned in. Bai Liu’s breath brushed lightly against his skin—

And then, through the bandages, Bai Liu pressed a kiss to his face. His tone was light.

"You're now a certified souvenir. Bonus."

When The Reverse God logged back into the game, he was greeted by an unsettling sight.

Three men sat in rigid silence around the coffee table in the killers' lounge, their expressions grim. Across from them, Spades lay motionless on the sofa, facedown against the balcony railing like a lifeless corpse.

The entire scene had the distinct air of a memorial service for a fallen soldier.

The Reverse God hesitated at the doorway before stepping in cautiously. "...What happened? Did Spades try to grope Bai Liu and get smacked into next week?"

Bai Yi slowly lifted his head, his expression dark. "It’s much worse than that."

"I don’t know what Bai Liu said to him," Liao Ke sighed, shaking her head. "But Spades came back with a serious self-awareness crisis. I’ve given him a full round of counseling, and there’s still no improvement."

Bai Jiamu clenched his fists, his face slightly pale. "Falling in love… it’s terrifying."

Hearing that, the Reverse God relaxed slightly and took a sip of tea. "Alright. What exactly happened when Spades came back?"

Bai Yi’s expression darkened further as he recalled.

"The moment he walked in, I knew something was off. His eyes were empty. He was clutching a bunch of bloody bandages. And there was a huge gash on his face. I have no idea what kind of psychological warfare Bai Liu put him through."

"Not just that," Bai Jiamu added grimly. "He kept staring at us and demanding to know what kind of thing would have its whole face wrapped in bandages."

"I just told him that usually, a bandaged face means a mummy." Bai Jiamu looked regretful. "I shouldn't have said that."

Liao Ke threw up his hands in exasperation. "And then Spades said he didn't want to be a lizard anymore. He wanted to be a mummy. I told him that wasn't possible, that it was too cruel. But he insisted. When we refused to tell him how to become one, he got mad and just… stopped moving. We've been waiting for you to come back and sort him out."

The Reverse God stared at them, speechless.

Bai Liu, just what kind of nonsense did you fill Spades' head with?!

Pre-season

Stray Circus Meeting Room

Wang Shun activated the panel, displaying various pieces of information as he explained the process in a clear, structured manner.

"Now that we've won this stage and the pre-season is nearing its end, we're up against higher-ranked teams. They may not be as strong as the Fanatic Lambs, but we can't take them lightly."

As he spoke, Bai Liu pushed open the door and walked straight to the chair at the front of the room. Without hesitation, he sat down and raised a hand, gesturing for Wang Shun to continue.

Wang Shun gave Bai Liu a nod before resuming. "President Bai, Captain Tang, and I have discussed this, and we believe you're nearly ready to begin training. The next step is to focus on team matches."

Bai Liu leaned back in his chair and tapped his fingers on the table in front of Mu Sicheng, who was dozing off. "Do you know what the most important aspect of the tournament is?"

Mu Sicheng, head propped up, was drifting in and out of sleep. He had taken a hit during the last match, exhausting both his energy and stamina. Bai Liu's question jolted him awake, and he blinked in confusion. "… Teamwork?"

"No." Wang Shun sighed, casting a worried glance at Mu Sicheng. "It's stamina, God Mu."

He continued, "From here on, you'll have not just single matches, but also pairs and team matches. Unlike training in the game pool or the smaller pre-season rounds, these matches will be just as intense as today's pairs match."

"Unlike mental and physical strength, which can be restored with potions, your consciousness remains under extreme strain during these high-intensity battles. The exhaustion builds up, and once your state declines, it's hard to recover."

Wang Shun looked toward Bai Liu, his expression serious. "Chairman, after facing two strong teams back-to-back, I'm worried that God Mu and the newcomers won't be able to keep up."

Bai Liu crossed his arms. "That's why I came back—to discuss this with you." His gaze swept across the room. "Liu Jiayi is the most crucial player for the team matches. She needs to maintain her condition, and since her skills aren't suited for singles or pairs matches, she'll only participate in team rounds."

"Muke, you'll play singles when you're in good form. Mu Sicheng and I will handle the pairs match."

Bai Liu met their gazes. "For the regular lineup—Tang Erda and I will rotate in singles. For pairs, Mu Sicheng and I will be the fixed duo. Any objections?"

Tang Erda nodded. "No problem."

"I have a problem with it." Mu Sicheng frowned.

"You're playing in singles, you're in the pairs, and you're the tactician for the team?" He raised an eyebrow. "Bai Liu, you just said the newcomers won't be able to keep up after two games. But you're a newcomer yourself—how are you supposed to last through three?"

The exhaustion weighed on Mu Sicheng. He had only played one match, yet his mind still buzzed from the effects of Yang Zhi and Kong Xuyang's skills. His vision blurred, and he struggled to keep his eyes open. If this was how he felt after one game, he couldn't even imagine what three back-to-back matches would do to Bai Liu.

Tang Erda, listening to Mu Sicheng's argument, suddenly felt a sense of unease.

He hadn't questioned Bai Liu's arrangement at first—after all, in other timelines, Bai Liu had played three consecutive games regularly. But this Bai Liu was still a rookie in his first year of league play. Three matches against strong teams? That was excessive. Even Tang Erda himself wouldn't be able to maintain peak form under those conditions.

Liu Jiayi spoke up. "I'm fine with my role, but Bai Liu, your allocation is a serious problem. I won't argue about singles—Muke, you, and Tang Erda have the right skills to rotate there—but there's no reason you and Mu Sicheng should be a fixed pair for doubles."

Muke considered it. "Couldn't we rotate between me and Mu Sicheng instead?"

Bai Liu shook his head, his voice calm. "Mu Sicheng doesn't have enough coordination to support different partners. The only player who can be fixed in pairs is me—I can adapt to anyone."

"With Tang Erda and Muke rotating in singles, Mu Sicheng is the best choice as my doubles partner."

Liu Jiayi pressed her lips together but couldn't refute him.

They all knew Bai Liu's plan was the most efficient. But it also put the heaviest burden on him.

"If there are no further objections," Bai Liu stood, his tone light, "then the tactical lineup is settled. Everyone's exhausted—get some rest."

The room fell silent. They had objections, but when they looked at Bai Liu—the dark circles under his eyes, the exhaustion in his posture—they swallowed them down.

… The most exhausted person here was Bai Liu. More than anyone, he needed rest.

Wang Shun couldn't help but glance at Bai Liu.

Technically, Bai Liu had already decided on this layout, but convincing Wang Shun had been effortless.

Bai Liu had simply smiled and said they would agree.

At the time, Wang Shun had thought it unlikely that the players were genuinely concerned about Bai Liu—surely they wouldn't let him wear himself out like that. But when it came down to it, Bai Liu had brushed off their concern as if it were nothing.

Sighing, Wang Shun sorted through the paperwork in his hands.

There it was again—the ever-composed President Bai, who pretended to deliberate but had, in reality, already made all the decisions.

And who, Wang Shun wondered, would ever be able to change the mind of this overconfident tactician?

By the time Bai Liu and his group logged out of the game, night had fallen in the real world.

Du Sanying hadn't logged in to watch the match—he had completely forgotten about it. The memory only came rushing back when he saw Bai Liu return home.

Panicked, Du Sanying bowed at a full 180 degrees. "I'm so sorry, Mr. Bai Liu! I really forgot!"

"Never mind." Bai Liu stepped inside, casually undoing his tie and hanging it on a rack as he walked further into the house. He smiled at Du Sanying. "We won. What did you eat today?"

Winning, to Bai Liu, was something mentioned as lightly as a meal—just another inevitable, everyday occurrence.

And just like that, Du Sanying was swept along by Bai Liu's pace, trying to recall his meals. "Uh... I had beef noodles in the morning and a roast goose lunchbox for lunch."

"You haven't eaten dinner yet?" Bai Liu slumped onto the sofa, pulling his phone from the pocket of his suit trousers. He leaned back lazily, glancing at Du Sanying. "How about hot pot? My treat."

From where Du Sanying stood, he could see Bai Liu's Adam's apple move as he swallowed. The first button of his shirt was undone, revealing the faint line of his collarbone. His shoulders and neck slumped loosely against the sofa, his half-lidded eyes giving him a look of complete ease.

For a moment, Du Sanying was struck by the sight.

For some reason, Bai Liu seemed... relaxed. Even in a good mood.

Was it because he won the game?

But... Bai Liu had won before, and he'd never looked like this.

Bai Liu glanced up at Du Sanying, tilting his phone slightly. "Want to eat? If you're in, I'll invite the others too."

Du Sanying hesitated. "It—it's not too expensive, right?"

"It won't break the bank." Bai Liu smiled. "I'll call someone, then."

Less than a second later, Du Sanying heard Bai Liu's voice over the phone.

"Lu Yizhan, are you off work yet?"

A faint grumble about overtime filtered through the speaker, and Bai

Liu's lips quirked in amusement.

"Mr. Lu, I won the match against the Fanatic Lambs," Bai Liu said offhandedly, his voice as casual as ever. "Let's celebrate—hot pot at your place?"

Du Sanying was stunned.

He had been taught by Wang Shun that in-game stories were meaningless to ordinary people.

Why was Bai Liu suddenly bringing up the game to a normal person?

Bai Liu tapped his fingers rhythmically against the back of the sofa, one by one. Du Sanying unconsciously counted along—seven times.

Seven taps later, Lu Yizhan's confused voice came through the phone.

"...Bai Liu, what did you just say?"

Bai Liu smiled again—a light, fleeting thing, like a cloud drifting across his face, ready to disappear with the wind.

"It's nothing," Bai Liu said. "Just remembered I haven't had dinner with Sister Fang in a while."

Lu Yizhan was silent for a moment before letting out a soft chuckle. "Yeah... Ever since your birthday the year before last, you suddenly seemed to grow up overnight. You stopped coming over for dinner—used to at least bring two pounds of discount oranges when you did."

Lu Yizhan sighed. "Fang Dian and I used to celebrate your birthday every year. Then one day, you stopped wanting to celebrate it at all."

"Speaking of which... isn't your birthday coming up soon?"

Bai Liu let out a vague hum of acknowledgment.

Lu Yizhan's voice turned teasing. "What's this? Nostalgic at 25? Finally willing to come over for dinner and let us celebrate?"

"But it's still a little early for that," Lu Yizhan continued. "Let's keep it simple—just hot pot today. I'm not off work yet, so go buy the ingredients first. Sister Fang's home, and you have the key. Get whatever you want; I'll transfer you the money later..."

"Actually, wait—your Sister Fang can't cook. Maybe you two should wait for me to—"

"Lu Yizhan." Bai Liu suddenly cut him off.

His voice was even, but something about it made the air still.

"If, one day, there was a game that both you and I really wanted to win," Bai Liu asked quietly, "would you still throw the match for me?"

A long silence stretched between them.

Then, finally, Lu Yizhan let out a soft, breathy laugh.

"No," he said.

"I'd do everything I could to win against you, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu took a brief pause before changing the subject. “Is it okay if I bring someone over for hot pot?”

On the other end of the line, Lu Yizhan was momentarily stunned. He soon let out a helpless sigh. “...You really see me as an endless source of generosity, huh?”

“Pick up some more fruit,” he added, amusement in his voice. “The oranges from the supermarket downstairs are on sale today—get two catties.”

After hanging up, Bai Liu sent a message to the group chat, asking if they wanted to have dinner together. The replies came in almost instantly.

[Music]: Wow, a once-in-a-century event! White Pickle is actually treating himself.

[Muke]: Need help choosing a place? I know some decent private restaurants.

[Tang Erda]: Are we drinking? I’ll bring some wine. @Bai Liu

[Bai Liu]: I’m not treating you. I’m taking you to my friend’s place for hot pot, and I’m buying food later.

[Bai Liu]: @Tang Erda, bring it on.

As soon as Bai Liu sent the message, the group chat erupted.

[Music]: Damn it, what a freeloader! Bai Liu, you have no shame!

[Bai Liu]: So, you’re not eating?

[Music]: No way! I’m in! I want shrimp balls! Tripe! Brains! Duck intestines! Sliced lung!

[Muke]: I’ll bring some common hot pot ingredients. Anyone allergic to seafood?

Bai Liu glanced at the flood of messages, his fingers pausing briefly on the cracked screen before he typed again.

[Bai Liu]: Do you guys eat oranges?

[Music]: Of course! Who doesn't?

[Muke]: I like them.

[Tang Erda]: Yeah. @Bai Liu, I have two bottles of orange liqueur—not too strong. Want me to bring one?

Bai Liu replied a few more times before calling Liu Jiayi. He told her he'd pick her up, only for her to coldly refuse and warn him not to let anyone ride on the back of his Haro bike. Instead, she told him to send the address, saying she'd find her own way there.

On the way, Bai Liu bought half a catty of mushrooms, a catty each of lettuce and enoki mushrooms, and half a catty of sliced beef. He also grabbed a two-liter bottle of Coke from the supermarket downstairs and two catties of the discounted oranges.

He made sure to get Mu Sicheng's shrimp balls, tripe, and duck intestines, though they were all frozen—no fresh ones were available this late.

Altogether, the pile of groceries cost him 167 yuan.

But in the end, Bai Liu bought it anyway.

He also picked up crispy sausages and meatballs—things a kid would like. He skipped the brains and lung slices, which weren't available in the supermarket, and by now, the wet market was already closed.

After all the odds and ends, the total came to 218.2 yuan.

Du Sanying followed Bai Liu nervously as they entered an old residential neighborhood, Bai Liu carrying several plastic supermarket bags.

The area was lined with clusters of apartment buildings, with a couple of large supermarkets and convenience stores nearby. At the entrance, an elderly man sat on a rusted bench, wrapped in a faded military coat. His legs were crossed as he nodded off, squinting at passersby.

As Bai Liu walked past, the old man's eyes snapped open. He stared at Bai Liu for a long moment before recognition dawned.

"Aren't you Fang Dian's high school classmate?"

Bai Liu offered a polite nod. “It’s me. Long time no see, Uncle Li.”

Uncle Li let out a hearty laugh as he stood up, clapping Bai Liu on the shoulder. “I haven’t seen you in two, three years—I barely recognized you at first.”

“Good thing your head’s still the same shape as in high school. A couple more glances, and I knew it was you.”

His expression softened with nostalgia. “You and Lu Yizhan used to hang out at Fang Dian’s place all the time back then. Lu Yizhan’s been living there these past couple of years, but you—why don’t you come by anymore?”

Bai Liu paused for half a second before replying with his usual flawless, polite smile. “Work keeps me busy.”

Uncle Li shook his head, disapproving. “You young folks always say you’re busy.”

“You and Fang Dian have been friends for years. You shouldn’t just stop coming around like that.” His voice turned more serious. “Back in high school, the three of you had a rough time, but you stuck together and got through it. Friendships like that don’t come easy. If you don’t cherish them now, once the connection fades, where will you find friends who’ve been through thick and thin with you?”

Uncle Li nudged Bai Liu toward the entrance. “Go on in, I won’t keep you.”

“Thank you, Uncle Li.”

Bai Liu continued deeper into the neighborhood, arms full of groceries.

The residential buildings in the district were old, none taller than seven floors, and none had elevators. The electronic locks at the entrances were just as outdated—the displays flickered, barely functioning.

Bai Liu didn’t bother entering a password. He simply pushed the door open and walked inside.

Du Sanying followed, glancing around before asking, “What floor is it on?”

“Third,” Bai Liu replied.

As they climbed the stairs, Du Sanying hesitated before speaking again. “Mr. Bai Liu, did you come here often when you were in high school?”

When the security guard had approached Bai Liu earlier, Du Sanying had instinctively stepped away. He had only caught bits of their conversation, but it was enough to tell that the man was very familiar with Bai Liu.

Bai Liu rounded the next step. His voice was calm. “This is Fang Dian’s home.”

“When I couldn’t stay in the dormitory or return to the orphanage, she would give me the key and let me stay here.”

Du Sanying frowned slightly. “Huh? Why couldn’t you stay in the dorm or go back to the orphanage?”

“I was about to be expelled,” Bai Liu said matter-of-factly. “Someone accused me of luring my classmates into gambling and instigating a fight with weapons. The school was doing everything it could to distance itself from a future ‘criminal,’ while the orphanage was reevaluating my eligibility for financial aid and considering whether to send me to juvenile detention.”

He spoke as if recounting someone else’s life, detached, unbothered.

“I spent a week living in an internet café before Fang Dian found me and gave me her house key.”

Step by step, Bai Liu made his way up to the third floor, carrying a plastic bag. He stopped beside the old, decaying staircase and looked ahead. Just two more steps away stood a red stainless steel security door.

An inverted golden fortune character was pasted at its center, flanked by untouched spring couplets. A bagua mirror hung above the door, and a bunch of dried mugwort rested beside it.

He hadn’t been here in nearly two years, yet everything remained just as it had been back then.

In the dim, chaotic haze of the internet café, amid the flickering screens and suffocating smoke, Fang Dian had grabbed Bai Liu’s wrist and dragged him from the makeshift bed he had fashioned out of two swivel chairs.

Bai Liu resisted, his body slack as he leaned into the chair, eyelids heavy with sleep. His head lolled to the side, exhaustion weighing down his expression. When he half-opened his eyes, they were cold and distant.

"…I'm not awake yet. What do you want?"

"Back to school," Fang Dian replied, unfazed. "You've missed a week of classes. Lu Yizhan has been searching for you like crazy. I didn't expect to find you hiding in some hole-in-the-wall café."

"He doesn't need me," Bai Liu muttered, eyes closing again as he sank deeper into the chair. "We were never meant to be in the same world."

"Now that you've found me, can you let me sleep?"

Fang Dian crouched down in front of him. "An internet café isn't a place to sleep."

She pressed a set of keys into Bai Liu's palm. "Do what you need to where you're supposed to. Play games in the café if you want, but when you're done, go back to school."

Her voice softened. "Go home and rest."

"Go home, Bai Liu. Lu Yizhan and I are waiting for you."

Bai Liu turned onto his side, pulling his school jacket around himself and burying his face in the couch. His breathing was even, his eyelids still. He was shutting her out, refusing to acknowledge her presence.

That was his way of telling her to leave.

Fang Dian only chuckled. She reached out and ruffled his hair. "Alright, have it your way. I won't tell Lu Yizhan where you are."

"We had a deal, right? I cover for you when you do something bad."

She stood up, her voice turning quiet. "But Bai Liu, I can only hide the bad things you do. I can't hide it when you've done something wrong."

"You don't feel guilty about doing bad things." She looked down at him, curled up in the chair, and suddenly smiled. “But if it bothers you this much… maybe you didn’t just do something bad.”

“Maybe you did something wrong.”

She left the keys behind and walked away.

Bai Liu didn’t quite remember what happened after that. Maybe he stayed at the café until he ran out of money. All he knew was that, in the end, he found himself standing at Fang Dian’s door, key in hand.

When he turned the handle and stepped inside—

On the sofa across from the door, Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian were fast asleep, too exhausted to hear him enter.

The coffee table before them was cluttered with paperwork—transfers, administrative forms, school regulations, legal documents—mixed with unfinished practice exams covered in handwritten notes. A pile of photocopied petitions and unsent letters lay nearby, all addressed to various welfare organizations and schools.

At the bottom of the stack were two neatly written pledges.

One was a guarantee for the orphanage, arguing that Bai Liu’s actions didn’t warrant expulsion and that he still deserved support.

The other was a letter to the school. There was no argument, no plea —only a single line: If Bai Liu is expelled, I will leave with him.

The guarantor was Fang Dian.

The rustle of papers must have woken them, because the next thing Bai Liu knew, Fang Dian was blinking sleepily at him. Lu Yizhan stirred beneath her, groggy and confused.

But there were no harsh words, no accusations, no disappointment.

Fang Dian simply propped herself up, peeking over the coffee table. Then she reached across it and gave Bai Liu a firm pat on the head.

“Finally home, huh?”

She laughed. “Don’t be afraid to come home just because you messed up.”

“Only kids do that.”

Now, standing in front of that same door, Bai Liu adjusted the plastic bag in his grip and raised his hand to knock.

Before he could, the door swung open.

Fang Dian stood there, trash bag in hand. She froze for a second, then arched an eyebrow, a slow smile spreading across her face.

She reached out and, just like before, gave Bai Liu a firm pat on the head.

“Took you long enough to give up and come home.”

Still smiling, she added, “Don’t be afraid to come home just because you messed up. You’re too old to be acting like a kid.”

After greeting Bai Liu, Fang Dian turned her attention to Du Sanying, who was hiding behind him. She smiled warmly and stepped forward to shake his hand.

"Hello, are you a friend of Bai Liu's?" she asked.

Du Sanying instinctively backed away, waving his hands in a panic. He was afraid his misfortune would rub off on her and looked to Bai Liu for help.

But Fang Dian was quick. With a swift stride, she caught Du Sanying's hand and gave it a firm shake. Du Sanying could only stare, dumbfounded, as she grinned at him.

"Welcome!" she said brightly.

She waved at them before heading down the stairs with a bag of trash in hand. But just as she took a step, her shoelaces came undone—causing her to stumble forward, nearly tumbling down the stairs.

Du Sanying's pupils shrank in horror. "Eh—!!!"

Before he could react, Fang Dian suddenly pushed off the ground, nimbly skipping over six or seven steps and landing with ease. She turned back to them with a cheeky grin and an "OK" gesture.

"Safe landing~" she announced.

Du Sanying was stunned.

She shook his hand… so she should have been affected by his misfortune. And yet—she was fine?

Fang Dian knelt to tie her shoelaces before standing up and waving at them nonchalantly. "You guys go in first. Old Lu is back—he's washing dishes in the kitchen. I'm going to take out the trash."

As she left, Bai Liu, who had been standing quietly beside the dazed Du Sanying, spoke up.

"I'll bring you in, so don't be so nervous. You'll be fine."

Du Sanying looked down, clenching his fingers. "But just now, she still almost fell…" he murmured.

"She wouldn't have fallen," Bai Liu replied, his gaze lingering at the stairwell where Fang Dian had disappeared. "Fang Dian is a national Grade 2 volleyball athlete. She won the provincial team championship twice in high school. She could probably jump straight from here to the ground floor and still land on her feet."

Du Sanying blinked in astonishment. "Eh?!"

Bai Liu glanced at him. "She has the best fitness, coordination, and reflexes I've ever seen."

Then, in a calm tone, he continued, "Your misfortune may still affect those around you." His eyes remained steady. "But these are my friends."

"The fact that they're my friends means they're capable of handling the misfortune that comes with knowing someone whose luck value is zero."

Bai Liu met Du Sanying's gaze. "So, your misfortune—they can handle that too."

"Now, let's go in and eat."

Without waiting for a reply, Bai Liu turned and stepped inside.

Du Sanying lingered at the doorway for a moment. He took a deep breath, exhaled shakily, and then wiped his eyes with the back of his hand before following Bai Liu in, head lowered.

"Thank you, Mr. Bai Liu," he whispered.

"You're welcome," Bai Liu replied. "To each his own."

Inside, Du Sanying carefully sat on the living room sofa while Bai Liu carried the bags to the kitchen.

The sofa was made of soft leather—likely a recent purchase, given its smooth, polished sheen. The whole house looked recently renovated. From the wallpaper to the furniture, everything seemed fresh and new, though a few older, well-worn pieces still remained, standing in contrast to the neighborhood's outdated atmosphere outside.

Across from the sofa, an LCD TV played an anime on loop. The opening theme drifted through the room:

"I awaken the sea..."

"Awakening the mountains..."
"...Even if there are billions of kilometers..."
"One ton of luggage..."
"We don't give up..."
"It takes courage to move forward..."

On the coffee table, a handmade wool blanket lay draped over the surface, partially covering a clutter of children's toys and unfinished crafts—half-completed puzzles, scattered drawings, and scribbled notes.

Du Sanying picked up one of the drawings. At the top, written in large, crayon-scrawled letters, were the words: [Quan Family Fortune].

The picture depicted a father, a mother, and a child, with an additional figure squatting beside them.

The child had drawn this person with an exaggerated grin, showing eight large teeth. Next to the figure was a label: [My favorite Ms. Fang!!]

Beneath it, in red pen, was a handwritten note from Fang Dian herself:

[Nice drawing! I know you like it when teachers visit, but if I joined your family, wouldn't that ruin it? Haha! 😊]

Below that, written in the child's handwriting, was a response with a large crying face:

[Can't the teacher join our family? 😭]

And finally, Fang Dian's reply:

[Nope! Teachers have their own homes too! 🐶🍥]

A small chuckle escaped Du Sanying as he began gathering up the scattered drawings.

It seemed like these were all discarded drafts—perhaps rejected versions of a class project that the children had to redo. But what stood out was how, in nearly all of them, the kids had included Fang Dian in their depiction of the "Quan Family Fortune."

It was amusing to see how the children and Fang Dian playfully "negotiated" through their drawings.

As he picked up more, he saw some creative attempts to include her.

One child had drawn Fang Dian as a pet dog, sitting happily beside the family with a bone in her mouth.

Fang Dian's comment: [I think I'd rather stay human, JoJo! 🐕]

Another child had drawn two families—one being their own, the other being Fang Dian's—though, due to space constraints, Fang Dian's family had been squeezed into the corner, crouching awkwardly.

Fang Dian's comment: [Appreciate the thought, young master! But maybe check with your parents before adopting someone else's family! 🫠]

One particularly… abstract drawing caught Du Sanying's eye.

The child, perhaps influenced by Picasso, had split their parents down the middle—half of each parent looking normal, while the other half had Fang Dian's features.

Fang Dian's response: [If I'm already broken, how can I join a broken family? 🫠]

The more Du Sanying read, the more he wanted to laugh. But as he picked up another sheet, his amusement froze.

It wasn't a drawing.

It was a handwritten wedding invitation.

A guest list filled the page—categorized neatly into colleagues, friends, and family.

At the very top, under [Family], was a single name:

Bai Liu (main table proper).

The kitchen door suddenly swung open. Startled, Du Sanying scrambled to put the invitation back, but Bai Liu had already noticed.

Leaning over, Bai Liu glanced at the paper in his hands. "What are you looking at?"

Du Sanying shrank back, feeling as though he had committed a great offense. "I was just trying to help clean up… and then I saw the invitation…"

Bai Liu casually flipped the paper over. His eyes scanned it briefly before he looked toward the kitchen.

"Lu Yizhan, I'm the best man?"

Halfway through washing dishes, Lu Yizhan peeked out. His voice held no surprise—only mild confusion.

"Yeah. Who else would it be?"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Who are the bridesmaids?"

Lu Yizhan thought for a moment. "Fang Dian said she might invite her best friend from high school, but she hasn't decided yet."

Then, as if suddenly remembering something, he called out, "Oh! Bai Liu, write down a list of everyone you brought here this time! Don't forget!"

"I invited my guests, I invited Fang Dian's—but I still haven't invited your best friend."

His tone was so natural as if it went without saying that Bai Liu and his closest people should be present at his and Fang Dian's wedding.

Just then, the door creaked open—someone had returned.

Tang Erda, carrying a bottle of wine, looked serious in his formal attire. Mu Sicheng followed, his hands full with food, his eyes glowing with excitement. Behind them, Muke was accompanied by four butlers and seven large black boxes labeled with Michelin three-star ingredients—contents unknown.

Standing directly in front of them, Fang Dian smiled at Bai Liu and said, "I saw them downstairs while I was taking out the trash and brought them up with me."

"No need to change your shoes, just come in," Fang Dian beckoned.

Tang Erda's jaw was taut. This was his first time stepping into the home of Bai Liu's so-called friend, and an odd sense of nervousness settled over him. With a solemn expression, he handed the wine to Fang Dian. "Please."

Fang Dian took the bottle, barely sparing it a glance before grinning and setting it on the shoe cabinet without a second thought.

“You’re too polite! And you even brought wine! Come in and have a seat.”

A bottle worth more than 60,000, freshly decanted, was left to sit quietly on the shoe cabinet—forgotten. Even Tang Erda, who had handled it so carefully, paid it no mind once he stepped inside.

Meanwhile, Du Sanying sat stiffly on the sofa, his back straight, his mind a haze as he solemnly watched Happy Together on TV.

Mu Sicheng, much more at ease, strode in carrying two large bags and immediately called out to Bai Liu, “You said you didn’t get brains and duck intestines! How are we supposed to eat hotpot without them?”

Bai Liu’s gaze dropped to the plastic bag in Mu Sicheng’s hand. “Take it to the kitchen,” he instructed.

Muke entered next, dismissing the butlers at the door. He looked slightly apologetic, his brows furrowed with dissatisfaction. Turning to Bai Liu, he said, “It was too late to get the best ingredients, so I had to cut a batch from some restaurants. I’m not sure about the quality. If it’s not good enough, just don’t eat it.”

Bai Liu, who had bought 167 yuan worth of frozen goods and two pounds of discounted oranges, nodded calmly. “Alright, same goes for you.”

Pre-season

Lu Yizhan had been working in the kitchen for a while, breathing heavily as he emerged with a steaming pot. “Quick, quick! Get it on the induction hob! It’s hot!”

Fang Dian, quick as a flash, set up a table and directed Bai Liu to bring over the induction cooker. He managed to get the bottom of the pot on the ground just as Lu Yizhan was about to burn himself and send it flying.

A large pot of spicy hot pot simmered on the induction stove, and the pungent, warm aroma of spices filled the room instantly. The surrounding tables and benches were piled high with plates of ingredients and washed lettuce, water dripping off them.

Lu Yizhan let out a long sigh of relief and clapped his hands together in satisfaction. He rested his elbow on Bai Liu’s shoulder, admiring the pot for a moment. “Not bad, huh? I’ve been simmering this bone broth for over an hour. If I had to buy it, I’d be looking at a 168 yuan pot, right?”

He continued, “The keel’s over forty bucks a catty. This pot’s the most expensive thing in the house. If you hadn’t brought me here, I wouldn’t have made such an extravagant base…”

Before Lu Yizhan could say more, Tang Erda looked up at Bai Liu beside him, holding up the bottle of wine worth over 60,000 yuan. “Do you have a corkscrew?”

Muke pulled a lobster with pincers the size of his head out of the chiller, then looked apologetically at Lu Yizhan. “Sorry, we’re not finished with the ingredients. Can I use the kitchen so my butler can help with this?”

The smile on Lu Yizhan’s face froze. “….”

Slowly, he withdrew his hand from Bai Liu’s shoulder and stepped aside stiffly. “… I may not have a knife here worthy of handling that lobster…”

Muke smiled politely. “It’s not an expensive lobster, just deal with it.”

He handed the lobster to the butler, and Lu Yizhan’s gaze landed on the tag hanging from its tail. It displayed a money symbol followed by five digits in English, $—a price tag more than a little eye-watering.

Muke, with Lu Yizhan's permission, called his team of four butlers into the kitchen. He turned to Lu Yizhan, saying, "We'll use the kitchen carefully, no damage will be done."

Lu Yizhan watched the team disappear into his cramped three-square-meter kitchen, a look of sadness in his eyes. "…It doesn't need to be that careful."

That lobster alone was worth more than his entire kitchen.

Bai Liu casually pulled a bottle opener from the fridge door and handed it to Tang Erda. The faded words "Brave and Bold" were printed on it—a promotional item from a beer brand. "Can I open it with this?"

"Yes." Tang Erda took the opener and was about to use it when Lu Yizhan sharply stopped him. "No!"

"That opener's only ever opened cans of stinky tofu and Lao Gan Ma," Lu Yizhan said, eyeing the wine label and trying to maintain his composure. "… I'll go find you a proper one."

After a long search, Lu Yizhan returned with a new bottle opener, handing it to Tang Erda with a theatrical sigh. "Open it. This should be the most glorious moment of its life."

The bottle opened with a satisfying pop, and at that exact moment, the doorbell rang.

Bai Liu turned to answer the door, and there stood Liu Jiayi, dressed in a small floral dress, her hair tied in two playful ponytails, wearing princess shoes, white lace-trimmed socks, and two pink bow clips. She stood silently, waiting.

Bai Liu smiled lightly, commenting politely, "The way you're dressed today…" He chuckled, "It suits your age."

Liu Jiayi tugged at her skirt, straightened her expression, and took a deep breath. Just as she was about to retort, Fang Dian's surprised voice rang out, "Why is there a little girl?"

Liu Jiayi smiled sweetly for a moment, then blinked her large gray eyes in confusion. "Hello, sister. I didn't bring anything for my first visit. I bought some candy downstairs."

She extended a small bag of candy to Fang Dian, winking playfully.

Fang Dian stared at her for a long time, making Liu Jiayi feel as though her disguise might be giving her away.

Fang Dian's gaze was fixed on Liu Jiayi, standing in the doorway with her head tilted, holding the candy bag, while Bai Liu stood beside her, his arm clutching her tightly. Fang Dian leaned in, lowering her voice in a soft hiss. "She's so cute!!!"

"Do you think her mother would mind if she had an extra mom after coming out to dinner?" Fang Dian's thoughts ran wild.

Bai Liu glanced over at Liu Jiayi, who had gone from nervous to relieved. He smiled broadly and added, "I think her mother would be happy to have a beautiful daughter like her."

Fang Dian quickly turned and rushed inside. "Wait for me! I need five minutes to put on makeup!"

When so many young men came to Fang Dian's house, she regarded them as if they were invisible. They walked around in large slippers, laughing so loudly that the roof might lift off, sitting on the sofa with their legs crossed, casually scrutinizing the Bai Liu team members one by one. A group of people stood before her like minions on parade.

"You're the youngest son of that Wood Group! Wow, that's impressive! How do you know Bai Liu, the poor guy?" she asked.

"A famous university student, huh? Can, can, can!" she continued.

"Wow, those muscles—how did you build them? Teach me!" she exclaimed.

In short, she paid no attention to her personal appearance and seemed to have forgotten she needed makeup.

When a little girl arrived, Fang Dian's long-lost kindergarten teacher instincts kicked in. She rushed inside to change her clothes and freshen up.

As Fang Dian left, Bai Liu squatted down and looked at Liu Jiayi with a smile. "Xiang Chunhua and I said you hated wearing pink dresses. Why are you wearing such a neat and tidy suit today?"

"I suddenly like it today," Liu Jiayi replied. "Don't you know you should dress formally when visiting a friend's house? It's about being polite."

Bai Liu repeated her words thoughtfully: "So, you're nervous because it's your first time visiting a friend's house?"

Liu Jiayi froze, but the moment was quickly lightened by Fang Dian, who rushed out of the room.

Now dressed up, Fang Dian crouched in front of Liu Jiayi, makeup perfectly applied, wearing a dress, a polka-dotted bow in her hair, and holding a cloth doll. She smiled, looking friendly and gentle, and waved at Liu Jiayi like a strange aunt. "Come here, little one, teacher —no, sister has a lovely doll! Want to play with it?"

Liu Jiayi: "....."

Fang Dian gave Liu Jiayi a careful hug and stroked her fluffy ponytail, her expression nearly bursting into tears. "She's so soft and cute when she lets people hug her."

Liu Jiayi sat stiffly on Fang Dian's lap, her small hands clutching the hem of her skirt, too nervous to move.

Lu Yizhan, amused by Fang Dian's behavior, put his hands on his apron. "You play with children in kindergarten every day, haven't you had enough hugs?"

Fang Dian propped up her chin, sighing. "It's not just about hugging. The kindergarten has surveillance cameras, connected to parents' phones in real-time. If a parent sees me hugging a child casually, I'll get reported."

"Especially with girls," she continued, "Parents are extra cautious. I couldn't touch them much, even if they approached me willingly."

"They're not my children, after all."

Fang Dian said this casually, but Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan both subtly stiffened at her words.

She placed Liu Jiayi down, adjusted her skirt and hair, and knelt down to look tenderly at her. "It certainly feels different seeing a little girl who almost became my daughter."

Lu Yizhan had discussed adopting Liu Jiayi with Fang Dian. She had seen Liu Jiayi's photographs, but in the end, Liu Jiayi hadn't chosen them.

Liu Jiayi remembered this now, her lips pressing together as if unsure of what to say.

... Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian are really good parents. They're so good that I feel guilty for not choosing them.

Fang Dian smiled and parted Liu Jiayi's hair from her temples. "What a lovely little girl. No wonder we're not the only ones who want to be your family."

"But it's nice to be friends!" she added cheerfully.

Kneeling on the carpet, her eyes level with Liu Jiayi's, Fang Dian solemnly extended her hand. "Hello, Jiayi. My name is Fang Dian. I'm 25 years old. May I ask if you've made any new, unforgettable friends recently?"

Liu Jiayi paused for a moment, then the corners of her mouth began to turn up, two small dimples appearing on her cheeks.

She lifted her chin slightly and put on a condescending face, mirroring Fang Dian's performance. "None."

"But I'll make an exception for you." Liu Jiayi extended her hand to Fang Dian's.

Fang Dian exaggerated her surprise and joy, picking Liu Jiayi up and placing her at the table. "I can't repay you for such a big exception, so I'll treat you to hot pot! Let's eat!"

Bright wine was poured into glasses, and everyone but Liu Jiayi raised theirs in celebration—until the electricity cut out halfway through.

Everyone: "....."

Du Sanying covered his mouth, choking up. "I'm sorry, it's all my fault..."

"It's fine," Lu Yizhan reassured him. "The circuits here are old, so the power goes out often. I'll get the solid alcohol, and we can move the pot to the balcony to eat."

Fang Dian gasped. "Wouldn't that be a lobster candlelight dinner? So romantic!"

Bai Liu, ever calm, poured cold water on her excitement. "Romance is for two people. There are seven of us here, so even if we pair off, there'll still be one extra person."

"Well, Bai Liu, you've become social after working, haven't you?" Fang Dian rolled up her sleeves. "How dare you talk back to me?"

Tang Erda, confused, followed Bai Liu's lead, frowning as he thought hard about the two-by-two grouping idea. "So, who do I team up with? Bai Liu, why don't you and I—"

Mu Sicheng, eating from his bowl, called out, "No, Bai Liu and I are on the same team!"

The lenses on Muke's eyes flickered, but his voice was warm. "Bai Liu, sit over here and I'll get you some lobster slices."

"....." Lu Yizhan sighed dramatically, holding back tears. "Okay, okay, stop it, sit down. I'll get the alcohol."

In the darkness of the night, surrounded by twinkling lights, a family sat on the balcony with dishes and chopsticks, sharing a humble yet lively hot pot meal that cost nearly six figures.

Years later, when asked about the best meal of his life, Du Sanying, whose memory was still a bit fuzzy, would answer in a heartbeat:

—The first time Bai Liu took him to his friend's house for that hot pot meal during the power outage.

At 10 pm, Du Sanying lay on Bai Liu's couch after a shower, scrolling through his phone.

He had added many new friends today, and his social media was full of content. He carefully looked through each post, smiling to himself.

He came across a recent post from Fang Dian—a hand-drawn illustration of them having hot pot that day.

In the drawing, Fang Dian held Bai Liu's head in her arms, her chopsticks reaching into his bowl, while Lu Yizhan scrambled to stop her. Muke was pulling back, Mu Sicheng was laughing, Tang Erda was drinking, and Liu Jiayi, hiding in the corner, was actually taking pictures. She held her glass in the air, giggling and blushing, clearly tipsy.

Everyone was there, and everyone was laughing.

Fang Dian’s caption for the drawing read: ‘Quan family fortune.’

Pre-season

The penultimate day of pre-season and mid-season.

Wang Shun took a deep breath as he entered the Circus meeting room, a stack of documents in hand. His gaze swept over the seated players before he spoke.

"I'm sure you all know our opponents' information inside and out."

He let out a bitter chuckle. "Because there isn't much to analyze."

He tapped on the system panel, pulling up data. "Russell Cemetery Warriors—our final opponents."

"Russell's pre-season strategy has remained consistent with the past two years: they abandon singles and pairs, focusing entirely on team matches. For a newly formed team like ours, this is both a blessing and a curse."

"The good news? You only need to prepare for one match. The bad news? It's a team game—your weakest format."

Wang Shun tapped the panel again, bringing up a small video. As he hit play, a thick, swirling gray mist filled the screen. The footage showed only vague outlines of figures running, their heavy, ragged breathing audible through the distortion.

Wang Shun paused, his expression darkening.

"I've shown you this clip before," he said grimly. "This is footage from Russell Cemetery's last game. And this is what nearly all of their pre-season matches have looked like."

"A fog so dense you can't see a thing."

Bai Liu leaned back in his chair. "We've analyzed this already. To keep their players' abilities hidden, Russell Cemetery has likely assigned a fixed member with a Mist Obscuring skill. This player activates their skill mid-game, blinding their opponents while concealing their own team's tactics from both rivals and spectators."

Wang Shun sighed. "It's been an incredibly effective strategy, and it's nearly impossible to counter. They don't rely on public support, so they can afford this secrecy. After an entire pre-season of matches, all we really know about them is their death toll."

"Which, compared to last year, has dropped significantly."

He hesitated for a moment. "Actually, 'significant' doesn't even cover it. Russell Cemetery reached the final round of pre-season this year with only two recorded deaths."

"At first, I couldn't understand why a team ranked 10th last year would give up their mid-season spot to compete in pre-season again. But after analyzing everything alongside President Bai, I realized I had fallen into a false assumption."

Wang Shun shook his head, a wry smile on his face. "I always thought Russell Cemetery was a cruel, ruthless guild—one that sacrificed its own members in cold blood for victory."

Mu Sicheng, resting his chin on his hand, spun a pen between his fingers. "Isn't that exactly what they are?" He raised an eyebrow. "They sacrificed over eighty rookies last season."

Bai Liu reached over and plucked the pen from Mu Sicheng's hand. "Not necessarily."

"On the contrary, their guild operates exactly as they advertise—a sanctuary for the desperate. A 'warm, humane' collective cemetery. Russell Cemetery is the textbook example of a tight-knit community guild, bound by solidarity and mutual care—like neighbors looking out for each other."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Solidarity and friendship? When they send each other to die?"

"You're looking at it the wrong way," Bai Liu said calmly. "The players who join Russell Cemetery do so with full awareness that their deaths are likely inevitable. In other words, these people didn't join the guild hoping to live."

He met Mu Sicheng's gaze.

"They joined because they were prepared to die—but they didn't want their deaths to be meaningless."

"And Russell Cemetery ensures their deaths hold the highest possible value."

Mu Sicheng slumped forward onto the table, staring at Bai Liu. "Even so, how does that translate to ‘solidarity and love’?"

Bai Liu regarded him for a moment, then abruptly changed the subject.

"What do you think is the greatest value of death?"

Mu Sicheng blinked, caught off guard. He sat up straighter, thinking. "Money?" He frowned. "No, I wouldn’t be able to spend it after I’m dead. Fame? But what’s the point if I’m not alive to enjoy it...?"

After a few more moments of silent contemplation, he clicked his tongue in frustration and leaned back in his chair. "I don’t get it. Once you’re dead, nothing is left. No matter what you exchange it for, death has no real value. And in this game, dying means losing points—points that can be traded for actual things. It’s just not worth it."

"That’s because you," Bai Liu said evenly, "are a high-value player. One that top guilds would fight over. In reality, too, you're in a strong position—good family background, top-tier education. You have a firm grasp of your own worth, so you'd never even consider reducing yourself to zero."

He paused, watching Mu Sicheng’s expression shift, then added, "You’ve never been 'rolled,' have you?"

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Rolled?"

"Involution," Bai Liu clarified. "When competition becomes so intense that no matter how hard people try, they still lose. It happens in schools, in jobs—wherever resources are limited. The weaker players in this game have already been ‘rolled’ out of opportunities."

Mu Sicheng exhaled sharply, his frown deepening. "Isn’t that just a job market thing?"

Bai Liu tapped his pen against the table. "It’s the same everywhere."

He glanced at Mu Sicheng. "Think of this game as an economy. Top guilds own most of the resources, making it nearly impossible for weaker players to survive. No matter how hard they fight, they’ll always be at the bottom."

Mu Sicheng’s fingers drummed against the table as he mulled it over. He wasn’t the type to care much about ‘weaker players,’ but he couldn’t deny Bai Liu’s logic.

Bai Liu continued, "Anywhere resources are monopolized, internal competition exists." He picked up a pen and wrote a single word on the blank sheet of paper in front of him.

"Points in this game are earned through matches, just like a salary is earned through work. In that sense, playing the game is a form of labor."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow, but he didn’t interrupt.

"As guilds evolved, they found ways to optimize this system. They streamlined point-earning strategies, improving efficiency while providing support structures to minimize player casualties—much like how companies operate in the real world."

"Ordinary players join these guilds voluntarily, hoping to earn points more efficiently and increase their chances of survival."

Bai Liu wrote another phrase under the first. "Primitive Mode."

"This is the first stage of development—a functional and reasonable system. Normally, it would remain stable for a long time before breaking down under pressure."

He paused, his pen hovering over the page before he added a final word.

"However, in this game, there’s a unique mechanic that accelerates its collapse."

He slowly lifted his gaze.

"That mechanic," he said, "is gambling."

"Gambling in this game operates as an anticipatory loan system—one that binds your faith, interests, and very life to the guild. This mechanic doubles the cost of your bets. Even when a player knows the odds of being devoured by the guild, the gambler's mentality, sunk costs, and the difficulty of finding a new guild make it almost impossible to leave. This creates the first essential element of an inescapable cycle."

"Binding."

"The tighter the binding, the slower the movement of players between guilds. As circulation slows, players realize that switching guilds becomes increasingly difficult—eventually, choosing a guild turns into a lifelong commitment. During the initial recruitment period, new players frantically compete to enter the top guilds, often at the cost of lowering their own benefits."

"And once things reach this stage, an astonishing phenomenon occurs." Bai Liu tapped his pen twice against the paper. "Guilds become exponentially more efficient at accumulating points. Games rotate at a faster pace, and more points circulate between pools, causing an explosion in the game's overall economy."

"But for new guild members, the benefits keep shrinking. The guilds no longer have stockpiled points—they're forced to pour everything into the league just to maintain their rankings, leaving little to no reserves."

"So where did all those points go? What swallowed them up?"

Bai Liu set his pen down and nudged it forward with his fingertip, rolling it toward a stunned Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng reached out to catch the pen, a chill creeping down his spine. "…The gambling pool."

"Bingo." Bai Liu smiled. "The pool functions by leveraging points at five times their value with each bet. While this might seem like an opportunity to gain, in reality, the winnings—along with all other earnings—eventually cycle back into the pool. Every transaction, every win or loss, is subject to a five to fifteen percent fee, which quietly devours the majority of the points."

"If the wealthiest guild isn't the Killer Sequence but rather the Gamblers' Alliance, then it's clear—the biggest winner in this game is the gambling pool itself."

Bai Liu glanced at Wang Shun's system panel. "Now, let's consider the perspective of an ordinary player—someone with average skills and stats. They can survive, but they aren't exceptional enough to roll into a major guild or become a star player."

"They're scraping by, barely making ends meet. Then, one day, during the league, they can't resist betting all their savings on a particular team. And they lose everything. It's only in the depths of their breakdown that they realize—they're never getting their points back from the pool."

"Meanwhile, after each league, the inflated point values from leveraged gambling drive up the prices of in-game props. If a player refuses to gamble, their points stagnate, and they can afford fewer and fewer survival items. The game becomes increasingly brutal."

"They have no extra points to exchange for real-world money. The game, instead of fulfilling their desires, traps them in a cycle of misery. After working six grueling days in reality, they're forced to return to the game—not for fun, but to grind for points, just to afford the life-saving props needed for the next round."

Mu Sicheng stared blankly ahead. "…Thanks, I kind of want to die after imagining that."

Bai Liu continued, "Only two types of players have the luxury of using in-game points to buy real-world items: high-level players who have the points to spare, and reckless players who live only for the moment. The former are a minority. The latter—players who gamble everything—have become the dominant group. That's why the gambling league has grown so massive."

Wang Shun nodded in agreement. "But not all guilds operate under gambling mechanics. After President Bai's analysis, I looked into the average investment of players in Russell Cemetery's pool."

"The results were surprising." Wang Shun tapped the panel, pulling up a data table. "The average player there has invested no more than ten points into the gambling pool. They're essentially a non-gambling league."

"Gambling thrives on future expectations. When players stop betting, it signals a deep pessimism about their future."

Wang Shun sighed. "They can't break into the big guilds. They don't dare to gamble. They survive the weekly death trials, only to return to a harsh reality where they work themselves to exhaustion for little pay. And when they finally enter the game, hoping for an escape…"

"Their suffering only deepens."

It was bad enough that even Wang Shun, an enemy investigator, found it difficult to stomach.

"…No way." Mu Sicheng suddenly felt a twinge of pity for the other team. "But didn't they win all the mid-season team games last year? Even if they're stuck at the bottom of the gambling pool, they shouldn’t be struggling this much, right?"

Bai Liu held up three fingers.

"First, without star players, they receive minimal investments. Their betting pool is shallow, so they can only feed off each other’s losses."

"Second, even when they win, the majority of the pool’s earnings go to the spectators who placed bets. After the pool’s commission is deducted, the team itself only receives five to ten percent of the base pot."

"Third, last year, they were an unknown team. They had little audience engagement during the mid-season, so their matches didn't attract large bets. Their earnings came only from the five percent base gold charge on the big guilds' star players' small TV points."

"In short, they’ve been winning—but they’ve never been able to cash in on the league’s real profits."

Wang Shun sighed. "I've heard that the president of Russell Cemetery donated the pool points they won last year as compassionate payments to the families of those who died."

Mu Sicheng's expression was complicated. "…I wouldn’t have lasted if I were in their place."

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. "So, let's return to the original question. If a person can’t do anything, can’t achieve anything, has worked hard all their life, and in the end, still can’t hold on—what is the maximum value of their death?"

"What holds meaning for the dead when money, power, fame, and fortune are meaningless to them?"

Muke, who had remained silent, finally spoke. "To be recognized as valuable at the moment of death, and for that value to be remembered."

"I studied abroad before, where the suicide rate was very high. Many people would linger in accident-prone areas or wander the streets before taking their own lives. When they encountered a robber or a gangster, they would rush in, trying to do something, hoping to be killed in the process."

"There was an article in a magazine—over seventy percent of people who have had suicidal thoughts wanted to do something meaningful before they died. Something that would make others remember them."

Muke paused before continuing. "Some suicides form groups to help each other. I've seen them referred to as 'suicide communities.' The leader of such a group is often someone who also wants to die, but paradoxically, they start these communities because they want others to live. They try to help the members, hoping to give them reasons to keep going."

"But the strange thing is," Muke hesitated, "that being in such a community sometimes increases the suicide rate instead."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Why?"

Liu Jiayi, sitting nearby, answered, "Because someone remembers them. And if they're remembered, they can die knowing they won't be forgotten."

"In an environment like that," Bai Liu's gaze flickered toward the system panel displaying information about Russell Cemetery, "it's easy for a sense of sacrifice to take root. To put it simply—"

His eyes darkened. "I died for you, so I want you to live and remember me in my place."

"The ones who survive might suffer more than the ones who die, because carrying the weight of remembrance is its own burden—even the price of death."

The meeting room fell into silence.

Wang Shun coughed lightly, breaking the heavy atmosphere. "With all this in mind, President Bai and I took a closer look at the Russell Cemetery team."

"Everyone knows a team's most important member is its tactician. But Russell Cemetery constantly rotates its members, with a new tactician for each game. Despite this, their tactical style remains consistent."

"So, we suspect that the real strategist behind their plays isn't any of the frontline players being cycled out—but rather, the president of Russell Cemetery, who has never appeared on the field."

"But this president is incredibly mysterious. He hasn't participated in the league for the past two or three years, and we have very little information on him. The only thing we do know…" Wang Shun's expression turned grave. "An old player swore to me—on oath—that this president once entered the tournament alone."

"When he stepped onto the field, the system displayed five players registered under Russell Cemetery. The tournament proceeded as if a full team was present."

After the meeting adjourned, Tang Erda, who had been silent the entire time, finally spoke up as Bai Liu was about to leave.

"Can we talk about Russell Cemetery alone?"

Bai Liu, who had just stood up, sat back down. He gestured to Wang Shun, the last person remaining, to close the door behind him. Then he turned to Tang Erda. "What does Captain Tang want to discuss?"

Tang Erda studied Bai Liu carefully. "You think Russell Cemetery operates like a suicide community?"

Bai Liu intertwined his fingers, resting his elbows on the table. "So far, that's what the evidence suggests. And the guild president is its core—the kind of leader typical in mutual aid suicide communities."

Tang Erda frowned. "What psychological traits define that kind of leader?"

Bai Liu met his gaze evenly. "They do everything they can to save their members."

"But Russell Cemetery lost over eighty members in midseason games last year," Tang Erda said, tapping his fingers against the desk for emphasis. "I don't see how sending rookies into a league match has anything to do with saving lives."

Bai Liu suddenly smiled. "Then tell me, Captain Tang—how would you save a group of people who want to die?"

Tang Erda hesitated. "I… don't know."

"You give them hope." Bai Liu's tone was calm. "Winning the league is their hope. This guild doesn't care about points. They don't care about life or death. They just want to win. I believe the president of Russell Cemetery initially wanted to win at all costs—so that he could use the championship reward, a wish, to save them all."

"But they lost to the Killer Sequence and had to go through ninety qualifying matches again."

Bai Liu continued, "Captain Tang, do you remember Wang Shun saying that the Russell Cemetery team broke down and forfeited after a reunion? Do you think a team that ruthlessly sacrifices rookies would fall apart after just one meeting?"

"It was only five deaths." Bai Liu's voice was level. "The lives of bottom-tier players are the cheapest commodity in this game. A midseason victory should have meant they were well on their way to success."

"But they forfeited. They skipped midseason entirely and started over from the preseason. Captain Tang—why do you think they did that?"

Tang Erda fell silent.

He had an answer in mind. But it was hard to believe—and even harder to accept.

Bai Liu provided it for him. "Because of the casualties."

"If they played midseason again, they would face stronger teams. Even if they won, they would suffer another massive loss of players. So, instead, they gave up their ranking, their fame, their hard-earned points. They chose to start over, embracing the uncertainty, just to minimize the number of deaths."

"They just want to win. They just want to live."

Tang Erda reached into his pocket, as if searching for a cigarette, but in the end, he resisted.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "A guild like this can only form if its members wanted to die from the very start. I suspect Russell Cemetery was founded by a group of people who already knew each other in reality."

"Communities like that—ones that damage their members' egos—aren't allowed to exist in this country. Which means they likely started out as something else."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered toward Tang Erda, who remained silent. "And you came to me alone because of this group, didn't you, Captain Tang?"

Tang Erda was silent for a long time before he spoke, his voice hoarse. "Your analysis of Russell Cemetery reminded me of something that happened around this time last year."

"The Heresy Bureau received a report about an unusual case. We investigated for a long time, but in the end, we found no evidence of heresy. It was officially classified as a social incident."

Bai Liu tilted his head. "What kind of incident?"

Tang Erda hesitated before answering. "There was a mass suicide at the Sunnyside development. Forty-seven people jumped, one after another, from the upper floors over the span of a month."

"Because we initially suspected supernatural involvement, we suppressed the news. But once the investigation cleared, we let it go public half a day later."

Bai Liu's expression remained unreadable. "And what was the official conclusion?"

Tang Erda lit a cigarette. With Bai Liu's nod of approval, he took a long drag before answering in a muffled voice.

"Sunnyside was a failed development project, abandoned for over three years. The investors took the money and fled overseas, leaving the residents trapped in financial ruin.

"They jumped household by household. After they died, the remaining residents collected the bodies, took them to the funeral home, cremated them—and placed their ashes back in the ruined apartments they once called home."

Tang Erda exhales a slow puff of smoke: "The rooms in that rotten building are now empty, full of urns, like a cemetery."

Pre-season

The edge of the city, glowing in the night.

Amidst the glittering neon lights, a peculiar building stands in total darkness—from the top floor to the bottom—opposite the city's largest shopping center. It looms like a giant monster, devouring the light around it.

Step inside, and you'll see that this 36-story structure, overlooking the booming metropolis, is only half-finished.

Its concrete walls are lined with exposed rebar, much of it left unsealed. The edges of the rooms open directly to the night sky, allowing a clear view inside from the outside.

And yet, strangely enough, these unfinished rooms are not empty. Their furnishings are faintly visible in the obscured, multicolored glow of the city lights.

Some rooms contain little more than a simple mattress, a sleeping bag, a desk, a kettle, and a few rolls of toilet paper scattered on the floor—clear signs that someone is living there.

Others hold only a table, atop which rests a black-and-white photograph of a stack of apples, an incense burner, and an urn arranged like a shrine.

The incense burner still holds four unlit sticks, evidence that someone had recently come to pay their respects.

As wisps of incense curl into the air, a phone rings in the decaying building.

A young man struggles to balance it between his chin and shoulder, his left hand weighed down by a heavy bag of apples, his right clutching a bundle of joss paper and incense. His voice is clear, light.

"Hello? I just finished burning incense for Simone Li. Where are you guys?"

"Seventeenth floor," replies a young woman on the other end. "Shall we meet at Brother Wang's place on the eighteenth?"

He nods instinctively, shifting his grip.

A pause. Then, in a lower voice, the woman continues, "Yuan Guang… we haven't burned incense for the two players who died in the pre-season this year."

Yuan Guang stops cold. His hand trembles slightly, the apples feeling heavier, pulling him downward. His shoulders tense, his head dipping as he exhales slowly.

"……When we win the last game," he murmurs, "we'll all go together to honor them."

The woman hums in quiet agreement before hanging up.

Eighteenth floor, Room 1803.
Inside, a black-and-white photograph of a bearded man sits on a table. The name beneath it reads: Wang Shuqi, aged 42.

Silently, and methodically, Yuan Guang places the apples one by one on the offering plate in front of the shrine. He pulls out four incense sticks, lights them, bows three times, then folds his hands together and mutters under his breath.

"Uncle Wang, we made it to the playoffs again this year. I hope you're watching over us, keeping everyone safe."

His voice falters.

"……Last year…… last year's game……"

He takes a deep breath, his eyelids fluttering slightly, damp at the corners.

"It was hard on you all."

With that, he steps forward and solemnly plants the incense into the burner.

A woman enters the room.

She wears flats, jeans, and a simple t-shirt. Her hair is pulled into a loose bun, and though she looks no older than twenty-seven or twenty-eight—an age of vibrancy and recklessness—her exhaustion is unmistakable. Watching Yuan Guang go through the incense ritual with practiced ease, she sighs and hands him a candle.

"I bought these," she says. "Will you light a pair for Uncle Wang?"

"Don't," Yuan Guang shakes his head. The dim light catches the side of his face as he turns.

His features hint at youthful brilliance—single eyelids, thin lips—but the impression is ruined in an instant.

His hair, long overdue for a trim, is sloppily tied back, lopsided over his right shoulder, with stray strands sticking out in all directions. A deep shadow circles his eyes, as if he hasn't slept in days. His entire posture sags with exhaustion.

A band-aid slants across his left temple. A red smudge—marker ink—streaks his cheek, unnoticed.

The woman is struck by his appearance. Just two or three days ago, he looked fine. Now…

Now, he looks excessively haggard.

Yuan Guang shakes his head again, gathering his things.

"Better not," he says. "Sister Qian and the girls are still staying here. There's no fire safety, and candles aren't worth the risk."

"We'll let the incense burn and then head out."

They stand in silence before the offering table.

Yuan Guang's eyelids droop once, twice—then, suddenly, his body lurches forward.

His head nearly crashes into the incense burner.

The woman gasps, lunging to catch him.

"Yuan Guang!!!"

His forehead slams against the table. He groans, clutching his head, then sways backward in a daze.

Half laughing, half exasperated, the woman steadies him.

"How long have you been awake?"

Yuan Guang leans his head against the wall, exhaling shakily. His voice is hoarse, barely above a whisper.

"……My company's got a project going on. The lead designer's been making us work insane hours. I wanted tomorrow off for the game, but the boss said I had to finish everything beforehand, so……"

The woman sucks in a sharp breath.

"You haven't slept in two days?!"

Yuan Guang nods weakly, looking utterly pitiful.

"I just finished this afternoon."

He gestures at the band-aid on his temple.

"And that's how you banged your head?" She sighs, exasperated. "You're playing tomorrow. You might die in there. Can't you just let work go for once?"

Before he can answer, both their phones vibrate at the same time.

A text notification flashes across the screen:

[Your debit note (XXXX) will be deducted $6437.96 at 18:00 on September 29th. Please ensure sufficient funds. Your credit history will be updated accordingly…]

They glance down at their screens. A long silence follows.

Yuan Guang cast a wry glance at the woman. "I thought that if I didn't die, I'd have to keep working to pay off the mortgage."

The woman: "……"

Damn. Can't argue with that.

She sighed and sat down next to Yuan Guang, caught between amusement and sorrow. "Other guild leaders call the shots, but look at you, Yuan Guang. You can't even afford your mortgage."

Yuan Guang hugged his knees, resting his chin on them as he gazed at the woman. His voice dropped to a whisper, teasing yet resigned. "And don't ace players from other battle teams have crowds at their feet, millions of fans, and tens of millions pouring in from their livestreams?"

Shi Qian: "..... I play a fog skill. My whole thing is covering the battlefield in mist so no one can see anything. How the hell would the audience even remember my face?"

A silence stretched between them. Then, in unison, they sighed in frustration.

"I'm so jealous," Yuan Guang muttered. "A rich guild and all that."

She was the first to break the silence again. "How long is your loan term?"

Shi Qian thought for a moment. "Equal principal payments for twenty years. What about you?"

"Same. I picked that one because they said the payments would shrink over time." Yuan Guang glanced at his phone, checking his bank balance. His shoulders eased slightly when he saw the number was still above 6,437. "Three years down. My payments have gone down by a little over two hundred per month."

Shi Qian hesitated before asking in a small voice, "How many years did Uncle Wang take out his loan for?"

Yuan Guang was silent for a long moment. Then, softly, he replied, "Thirty years. Uncle Wang and his family didn't have much income, so the Quan family helped cover the mortgage. They barely scraped together the down payment. Just when they finally managed to pay it off, the developer ran off with the money."

"When he entered the game, he was already at his breaking point. He held on for a while, but in the end... he got down on his knees and begged me to let him play in the league, just so he could die with some dignity."

"I refused at first." Yuan Guang's voice wavered. "And then Uncle Wang just... slit his wrists."

"The only reason he survived was because he lived in a shoddy building. The rooms didn't even have proper doors, so the neighbors saw what happened right away and got him to the hospital in time."

He fell silent again, fingers absently rolling an apple in the plastic bag beside him.

"I put Uncle Wang on the roster last year."

“At mid-season, hundreds of people came to me, asking to sign up. Some were owners of this crumbling building, some had joined the guild later... all of them had their reasons. But in the end, it was the same—whether in reality or in the game, they couldn’t hold on any longer.”

“Forty-seven of the players who died last year lived in this building. They entered the game at the same time as me, lasted for years, but in the end, they begged me to put them on the field.”

“I...” Yuan Guang exhaled, poking at the apple with his finger. “I agreed to all of them.”

A dry laugh escaped his lips. “I know they were at their limit because... I’m not going to last much longer either.”

Shi Qian said nothing. Instead, she clapped a firm hand on Yuan Guang’s shoulder. They sat back-to-back, huddled together in the room of an unfinished, abandoned building that was never meant to be lived in.

Behind them, the faint glow of four incense sticks flickered on the altar, the tiny flames trembling in the darkness as if they could go out at any moment. Yet, they were the only lights in this building that sat among a city of bright windows.

Yuan Guang lifted his head, staring out at the neon-drenched nightscape. The lights blurred in his eyes, swirling together like oil paints smearing into a tear that had yet to fall.

He sniffled and suddenly let out a laugh. “It’s funny. All those big guilds analyzing our tactics, saying we were ruthless, cold, willing to sacrifice each other, that only those with a screw loose could handle our rotations and substitutions.”

“But in the beginning, our roster wasn’t decided by strategy. None of them ever guessed the real reason.”

Yuan Guang exhaled, his breath unsteady. A trembling smile tugged at his lips. “It’s because in reality, everyone has jobs. Everyone has bills. Mortgages. They can’t just take time off work to stay in the game full-time. So we had no choice but to rotate our players.”

He clenched his fist at his side.

“And now, it’s become our so-called ‘tactic.’”

His voice softened. “Shi Qian, sometimes I think it’s strange. Every single person in our guild has a job. Friends. Family. People they love. We support each other. No matter how hard life is, we grit our teeth and keep going. We refuse to burden others, even in death. And no matter how bad it gets, we still want to help each other survive.”

“If everyone here is a good person…” His voice cracked. “Why is it so damn hard to live? Why can’t we even make it three years?”

Shi Qian’s hair rustled in the night breeze. She spoke quietly, as if afraid to break the moment.

“Today is the anniversary of Uncle Wang’s death.”

She turned to Yuan Guang. “We go on the field tomorrow.”

A pause.

“Do you think, a year from now, it’ll be the anniversary of our deaths?”

Pre-season

1 AM. Reality. Inside Bai Liu's rented house.

Du Sanying had already fallen asleep. Bai Liu and Tang Erda crouched on either side of the coffee table, which was cluttered with scattered documents.

At Tang Erda's feet sat an ashtray filled with cigarette butts, crushed by a pestle and mortar. A fresh cigarette still burned between his lips as he frowned at the papers, flipping through them.

"These are the documents I just had Su Yang print and send over—information on last year's owners of the Sunshine property." He slid a page toward Bai Liu. "If your theory is correct, then the profile of the victims from the Sunshine development matches the Russell Cemetery Guild."

Tang Erda hesitated for a moment, then added, "But something doesn't add up. If these people were really gamers, their lives should have…" He trailed off, searching for the right word.

Bai Liu glanced down at the documents. "Looked more extreme?"

Work, eat, sleep, take vacations—there was nothing unusual about these people's routines. No hints of secret, high-stakes games happening behind the scenes. Just exhausted, ordinary people trying to survive.

Tang Erda exhaled, nodding. "Exactly. Gamers—at least the ones we've encountered—tend to be desperate, willing to use game props outside the rules of reality to escape its crushing weight. Think of Rabid Lamb." His brow furrowed. "But these people? Even under immense pressure, they showed no signs of that."

"That's why we didn't notice anything unusual last year. They didn't look like gamers at all."

Bai Liu pulled a few documents closer, scanning them. Without looking up, he asked, "Captain Tang, if you were one of these property owners and got dragged into the game, what would you do?"

Tang Erda barely hesitated. "Use my points to track down the developers who fled and bring them back."

Bai Liu slid a newspaper clipping in front of him. “Would you?”

The headline read: Developer of Sunshine Property Surrenders—Claims Embezzled Funds Were Transferred Abroad.

The article was dated last October—one month after the owners had jumped.

“After he turned himself in, all his assets were seized to help cover the financial gap, but it wasn’t nearly enough. He was sentenced to life.” Bai Liu’s voice was even. “So now the developer is caught, but it changes nothing. You still have to pay your mortgage. You still have to scrape together points to survive in the game. What do you do next?”

Tang Erda was silent for a long moment, as if struggling to find an answer. Finally, he murmured, “I… might keep pursuing the developers…” But even as he said it, he stopped halfway, realizing the futility.

“There’s no point,” Bai Liu said calmly. “Even if you kill them, it won’t bring the money back. It’s already overseas—probably laundered multiple times by now. The only thing that could actually solve their problem is money.”

He tapped a document. “Points earned in the game can be exchanged for money, but those points are also what keep you alive. When you’re forced to clear a game every week, you wouldn’t dare touch your savings. The only choice left is to work—work just to pay off the mortgage.”

Bai Liu met Tang Erda’s gaze. “You were right about them. They’re just ordinary people. All they wanted was an ordinary life. But when their world collapsed, that moment of extreme desperation forced them into the game.”

“But instead of helping them, the game only made things worse. The pressure kept building, like a snowball rolling downhill. Balancing both work and the game—it’s not a pace an ordinary person can survive.”

“They tried to escape reality by entering the game, but once they were inside, they found there was nowhere left to run.” Bai Liu’s voice was steady. “So they turned to Russell Cemetery.”

Tang Erda picked up a newspaper with a grim expression. “These people had stable jobs, families, friends—support systems. Even if things were hard, they shouldn't have broken down so fast. It took just three years."

Bai Liu's eyes drifted to the black-and-white photos of last year's jumpers printed in the article.

"Maybe it wasn't three years that broke them."

He turned over another clipping. The bolded words stood out: Thirty-Year Mortgage.

"Three years of hardship might not be enough to drive someone to despair. But thirty years?" Bai Liu's voice was quiet. "That's a different story."

"For the mortgage, there's still hope—it might take decades, but it's possible to pay it off. But there's no hope of ever leaving the game." He glanced at Tang Erda. "I think that's what really broke them."

"Not everyone has the endurance of Captain Tang," Bai Liu continued, "who's survived hundreds of worlds without a single shred of hope."

Tang Erda put out his cigarette in the ashtray, leaning back on the sofa with his eyes closed. Smoke curled from his lips as he abruptly asked, "Bai Liu, if you were the president of Russell Cemetery, and you wanted to save these people, what would you do?"

Bai Liu didn't hesitate. "Win. Win a game by any means necessary."

He skimmed through the owners' profiles, pulling out page after page.

"One victory is all it takes. With enough points, their financial problems are gone. Their survival in the game is secured. And more than that—"

Bai Liu's gaze lifted to Tang Erda.

"I think that president… wants to make a wish. A wish to get everyone out of this game."

"This isn't a game where normal people can survive. Either they'll go crazy or die," Bai Liu said. "He wants everyone to survive; he has to get everyone out of this game. There's no other way but to win the league."

"This naive thinking shows he's never heard of Captain Tang. He must be quite young," Tang Erda replied. Bai Liu finally slowed down his search for the owner's information. He pulled one out from the pile, placed it on the coffee table, rotated it 360 degrees, and pushed it in front of Tang Erda. "Can Captain Tang find out more about this person?"

Tang Erda's eyes fell on the information Bai Liu handed him:

[2701 Homeowners: Yuan Guang – The owner of Sunshine Homeowners Victims Group]

The final day of the pre-season and mid-season in the Roving Circus meeting room.

Tang Erda, who had spent the whole night researching, rubbed his temples and closed his eyes. Meanwhile, Bai Liu, who had been reading until after four a.m. the previous night, rested his chin on his hand, half-closing his eyes.

Wang Shun pushed open the door and entered. He surveyed the room and took a deep breath. "Today's match-up team: Russell Cemetery."

"Before we head to the viewing pool, let's broadcast some good news."

Wang Shun clicked on the system panel. "As I mentioned before, President Bai's popularity has risen to 73 after the last tournament, making him the first person on our team to earn an exemption."

"And today, we have a second popular player with an exemption."

Wang Shun's gaze shifted slowly to Mu Sicheng. "The lingering effects of the last tournament, combined with God Mu’s recent outstanding performance, have pushed your popularity to 98. Congratulations, you've earned a death-free medal."

Mu Sicheng was momentarily stunned, clearly unable to process it, before leaping up, clenching his fist, and shouting, "YES!"

"I've emphasized the importance of the death penalty to you all many times," Wang Shun continued. "Your eyes shouldn't just focus on the match in front of you; you need to look ahead and think about the future. If we win today, we will compete against the eight guilds selected for the mid-season tournament and play a challenge match."

"Today is also the last day of the mid-season tournament. Excluding today's matches, the top eight guilds in total points so far are—"

Wang Shun tapped the system panel.

"First: Killer Sequence Second: King's Guild
Third: Deer Hunter
Fourth: Golden Dawn
Fifth: Gamblers' Union
Sixth: Kabbalah
Seventh: Masons in Paradise
Eighth: Cloak of Invisibility"

Wang Shun turned to everyone. "These eight teams are all top powerhouses, and most of them have exemptions. So, even though we've qualified for the playoff challenge so far, we can't slack off today. We must not only win but win decisively, to gain the support of the crowd and try to get all our players exemption cards in this one game."

Bai Liu slowly opened his eyes. "And in order to do that, we first need to interrupt that Mist skill player."

"If we allow the other team to successfully use their skills to obscure the map and block the view of the spectators, it will make the match harder for us and prevent the audience from seeing the action, not to mention winning their support."

Bai Liu stood up and scanned the room. "When you're ready, let’s move."

Everyone responded in unison, "Yes!"

As Bai Liu started to walk forward, Tang Erda stood up and strutted beside him. Bai Liu turned his head slightly and asked in a low voice, "Did you find anything after reading all night?"

"I didn't find anything," Bai Liu replied flatly. "Except that Yuan Guang and I are peers."

Tang Erda blinked and asked without thinking, "A fellow smuggler? Is he in the smuggling business too?"

"No." Bai Liu gave Tang Erda a quick look and smirked. "He’s an artisan."

Elsewhere, Yuan Guang sat nervously on the bench, shaking his legs. His fists were clenched, and he kept taking deep breaths, though his face still betrayed his anxiety.

Shi Qian, sitting next to him, looked at him with a mix of annoyance and amusement. "As the head of the team, can you at least act like a leader? Is it reasonable to be this nervous?"

"I don't know how many times I've had to get up on stage and give speeches—elementary school, high school, college, work… I'm just as nervous now as I was when I first presented my ideas," Yuan Guang admitted, glancing sideways at Shi Qian. "I get just as nervous when the main beauty introduces me."

Shi Qian looked at him with pity. Unable to resist, she muttered, "We advanced two teams in the pre-season, so why not we just drop out and take the challenge directly against the big guilds? It's a guaranteed loss anyway."

"No!" Yuan Guang's voice grew steady as he looked at Shi Qian. "We can't give up. We need to fight."

"If we give up now and go straight into the challenge against the big guilds, we'll lose a lot of players. We might not even win. The Roving Circus guild, in particular, has been the most well-funded lately. The players who have died and those who will die need pensions, or their families won't be able to pay their mortgages. Some can't even pay this month's mortgage. If we don't win this betting pool..."

Yuan Guang took a deep breath, clenching his teeth. "Anyway, I'll win this match!"

Shi Qian retorted mockingly, "What do you mean, you? We're the ones who are going to win!"

Yuan Guang was quiet for a moment. "Thank you. We were just colleagues, but I dragged you into this."

As the Roving Circus group approached in the distance, Shi Qian clenched her sweaty fists and exhaled slowly. "Real relationships in reality, in-game relationships in the game."

"We're standing here now," Shi Qian said, turning to Yuan Guang and smiling. "Then we're no longer colleagues, we're comrades in arms!"

"We're going to win!" she declared with certainty.

Chapter Notes

Mu Sicheng frowned as he looked at the Russell Cemetery team sitting across from them on the bench, ready for the match. "Why are there only two of them? And why are they wearing masks?"

The masks worn by the Russell Cemetery members depicted a sun radiating light in all directions.

Wang Shun observed the two players sitting quietly, his expression tensing. "That's their president on the left. He hasn't played in a long time—why is he playing against us this time?"

"In their usual tactical style," Liu Jiayi analyzed calmly, "These two should be able to handle us with their skills."

Bai Liu briefly glanced at the Russell Cemetery team's masks before shifting his attention to the audience. His eyes scanned the gallery, eventually stopping at a corner where a man in a tall hat, white gloves, and a cane sat. The man seemed to notice Bai Liu's gaze, and he raised his hand to take off his hat, smiling slightly and spreading his hand in greeting.

Wang Shun followed Bai Liu's line of sight, surprised. "Charles? What's he doing here? Didn't he say he wouldn't come to watch us play before the challenge?"

"And if I remember correctly..." Wang Shun quickly tapped on the system panel, "There's a mid-season tournament today with the Gamblers' Alliance guild playing! He's supposed to be playing—so why is he here?"

Bai Liu's eyes locked with Charles. "Because I had a chat with him before I came on."

Wang Shun was stunned. "Talk about what?"

"After this match, the next one will be a challenge match. The opponent's pool and points will be dozens of times larger than ours. To control the field, I need the strong support of Charles, the investor," Bai Liu replied nonchalantly, then withdrew his gaze. "So I told him to come watch today's game. He'll get a gambling match that will satisfy him."

"So, he decided to forfeit his own game and come watch me bet on the match?"

"To satisfy Charles?" Wang Shun's voice rose slightly before he quickly lowered it, his face tense. "Chairman, Charles is a gambler—he won't be satisfied with anything unless it's a game where he can double his points."

"We're about to play the challenge. There's no point in showing him loyalty now. You shouldn't have rushed to talk to him today. Even if we beat Russell brilliantly today, their pool isn't large enough, and the money from the pool won't be enough to satisfy Charles."

Wang Shun's expression grew more serious. "By giving up his own game to watch ours, Charles is sacrificing his own pool... If he doesn't get the return he's hoping for, he won't hesitate to pull out. He'll withdraw his money without a second thought."

Bai Liu calmly adjusted his leather gloves as he prepared to move forward. "I'm sure of it. Just leave it to me. Don't worry."

Seated in the audience, Charles leaned on the top of his cane, absently tapping his fingers on the orb as he shifted his gaze between Bai Liu and the Russell Cemetery team. The smile on his face grew more meaningful.

"It's been a long time since I've seen a gambling race that's pleased me," he muttered to himself. "I hope my stakes horses don't disappoint this year and deliver a race that satisfies me, instead of wasting my precious racing time."

The audience erupted into discussion:

"Wow, how could the Gamblers' League forfeit the game after just three rounds and give away eight points to their opponents?"

"Anyone who voted for the Gamblers' League must be going crazy right now!"

"Well, what can you do? Charles has done this before—playing fake tournaments to control gambling pool points. He's got the largest reserves of points in the game. He doesn't care about winning; he's here to gamble. It's hard to understand his way of thinking, but there's no way to stop him."

"I wouldn't dare vote for the Gamblers' League, it’s too unpredictable. I don’t know what the people voting for them are thinking..."

"Want points? One good bet, and you could win hundreds of times more."

"Charles usually abstains, which means he’s voting for his opponent. So, who’s his opponent?"

"The Deerhunters."

"Deerhunters are fierce this year. They’re in third place. If I were Charles, I’d abandon the tournament, too. Their clownish leader has soul-crushing skills. They shoot indiscriminately on the field, and the screams from the players they kill are terrifying..."

"The Deerhunters are only nine points behind the Kings Guild. Do they still have a match?"

"Let’s see... Grrr! —Today’s next mid-season game: Killer Sequence vs. Deerhunters!"

Mid-season Tournament Field

Daniel leaned back lazily in his chair, humming an obscure hometown ditty as his apple-green eyes swept over the men of the Killer Sequence. His gaze was detached as if he were looking at a pile of corpses rather than a top-tier team.

Spades, adjusting his shoes, noticed someone staring at him. He looked up, meeting Daniel’s eyes across the room. For a brief moment, Daniel flashed a smile and playfully waved his hand in a shooting gesture, narrowing one eye as if aiming at Spades and a few of his teammates. The sound of an onomatopoeic “thump” followed his playful move.

The Reverse God, sitting at the front of the bench, bowed his head in silence, while Cen Buming, opposite, straightened up, fixing his eyes on the Reverse God with a gaze full of intent.

The MC, standing in the center, raised his voice: “Will both tacticians please shake hands before the battle?”

The Reverse God and Cen Buming stood and walked toward the large screen in the middle. As they extended their hands toward one another, the Reverse God raised his head, locking eyes with Cen Buming. There was a strange and complicated look in his gaze as he spoke: “You’ve killed a lot of people this year in the tournament.”

Cen Buming grinned, tightening his grip on the Reverse God’s hand. “Is that so? Maybe it's just because there are so many damned people this year.”

Cen Buming stepped closer, clutching his wrist to prevent him from pulling away. He swallowed the word “division” and instead muttered “Reverse God” under his breath.

“Against the gods,” Cen Buming said, his chest rising and falling with emotion. His voice grew hoarse as he added, “Do you think I’m wrong to kill? To kill?”

“These people—” he paused, looking at the Reverse God with intensity. “You know what they’ve done, and what they will do. I know it too. Don’t they deserve to die? Shouldn’t I kill them?”

The Reverse God gazed at him steadily. “They may deserve to die, but not now.”

Cen Buming laughed low and hoarsely, slowly letting go of the Reverse God’s hand. His voice was tinged with sarcasm as he spoke. “So, they’ll die in the future, huh? This world line... it’s already the last future. We don’t have any more futures left to consume, to start over.”

“If they don’t die, Bai Liu—if they don’t die—there will be no future for anyone,” Cen Buming’s voice was sharp, his gaze unwavering.

“Haven’t you and I seen this future six hundred times before?” He gave a bitter chuckle, shaking his head. “Are you really going to cling to that silly philosophy of no wrongdoings, no consequences?”

The Reverse God met his gaze, his answer simple: “Yes.”

The fire in Cen Buming’s eyes flickered and faded as he let out a resigned snort, turning away with a shake of his head, as if the situation amused him more than it should.

“I am his guardian,” the Reverse God’s calm voice followed him. “I will take responsibility for his wrongdoings.”

Cen Buming clenched his fists tightly, his frustration reaching its peak. He spun around, grabbing the Reverse God by the collar, his voice raw with anger. “He’s the one doing wrong, not you! It’s the heretics who are killing people, not you! He’s the one torturing you, torturing Fang Dian, torturing everyone—your friends, your colleagues, your family—he’s torturing us all!”

“Why do you have to be on his side?!”

His eyes, red with fury, narrowed as he hissed at the Reverse God’s emotionless face. “If you continue like this, you’ll die, Lu Yizhan!”

The pre-match exchange between the tacticians took place at the login barrier in front of the large screen, just a step away from logging into the game. While their words were obscured, their heated argument was visible to everyone present.

As the situation threatened to escalate, Cen Buming was swiftly pulled away by his teammates, ensuring the match would proceed without further interruption. He struggled against their grip, his disbelief evident as he stared back at the Reverse God. The Reverse God remained still, his eyes watching him with an unsettling calmness.

Just before being pulled out of view, Cen Buming caught a faint whisper from the Reverse God: “Sorry, Master.”

Yuan Guang shakily stood up. He clicked on the [Tactician Permissions] section of the system panel, selecting to abstain from both the single and double matches. He then turned to Shi Qian beside him, silently inquiring with his eyes.

Shi Qian nodded affirmatively, signaling that he was ready.

Yuan Guang took a deep breath, turning his attention to Bai Liu across the room. He clicked on the [Group Match] option.

How to Own Five Buildings

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu opened his eyes.

Before him stretched a forest of steel and concrete skyscrapers, their upper floors so high that they disappeared into the sky.

Between the towering buildings, narrow roadways—only three or four meters wide—and sidewalks of one or two meters were crammed with pedestrians. Low street lamps lined the streets, casting dim light on the scene. Bai Liu stood facing an entrance marked by seven large red neon letters: [Welcome to Sunshine City].

Below the sign, a slogan read: [Chasing the sun, chasing happiness, the future is here for you!]

Inside the entrance, the streets bustled with people dressed in black, white, blue, and grey work uniforms, moving quickly, heads down, eyes glued to the ground. They passed through the vibrant metropolis, but no one looked up at the sun, almost hidden by the skyscrapers, or even noticed Bai Liu, standing there at the city's threshold.

Bai Liu checked his pocket and pulled out a citizen ID card.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has been detected with an important authentication item: Citizen ID Card.]

The Citizen ID card managed everything—daily income, expenses, savings, and even mortgage deductions. Each person had only one card, tied to a unique number. It could not be replaced, transferred, or destroyed at will. If a person died, the card would be canceled instantly, and it was bound to their life, property, authentication, and travel within the city.

[Card balance: $2,700.]

Bai Liu glanced around, confirming that he was alone in the area.

It seemed the others had been dropped off at a different entrance. He made his way into the lane, holding his ID card. A toll collector, looking tired, poked his head out from behind a desk, an unfinished bucket of instant noodles beside him.

"Going into town?" the toll collector asked.

"Entry fee is 1200," he added, holding out his hand. "ID card, please."

Bai Liu hesitated for a moment before handing over his ID card. The toll collector swiped it through a terminal, his gaze sharp as he looked back at Bai Liu. "You're not a resident of our city, are you?"

"No," Bai Liu replied with a polite smile. "I'm new here."

The toll collector's eyes narrowed in suspicion. He shoved the ID card back at Bai Liu. "Outsiders aren't welcome here."

"But outsiders can still get in, right?" Bai Liu said, pointing to the entry requirements on the toll collector's computer screen. "I see out-of-towners are allowed to register as citizens."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the toll collector's license, where a complaint number was listed. "If you're not following the rules, I'll file a complaint, and your job could be at risk. So, are you really not going to let me in?"

The toll collector stiffened, reluctantly returning the ID card. His tone remained harsh. "Fine... Registration fee is 1400. The total is 2016, you still have 100 left."

"You don't have a house in Sunnyside, so you're just a temporary resident," the toll collector continued. "You'll need to pay a land use fee to stay here—$10 per hour. It's deducted directly from your card. If the balance is insufficient, your ID will turn red, and a patrol will evict you within fifteen minutes."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Land use fees? What's that about?"

The toll collector rolled his eyes. "Of course, it's the fee for using the land."

"Every inch of land in Sunnyside is owned by five major property developers, and you're paying to use their land every second you stand on it."

As he spoke, the toll collector's expression softened slightly, a touch of nostalgia in his voice. "Of course, if you own a house in Sunnyside, it's yours, and you don't need to pay land use fees while in your own home."

"With 100 dollars, you can stay here for 10 hours, at most, if you don't find a job." The toll collector swiped Bai Liu's ID card again, handing it back along with a printed copy of the [Instructions for Entering the City] notice, his gaze tinged with contempt. "Here, take it and go in."

Bai Liu took the card, noticing an embossed line in the bottom right corner: [Sunnyside Temporary Resident Card].

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for officially entering Sunshine City and starting the main quest - Visit the job market today and find a job that suits your fancy!]

As Bai Liu walked past the toll booth, he could still hear the toll collector's muttered complaints.

"Another outsider trying to take a house from us... Property prices will go up, and competition for jobs will get tougher. So annoying..."

Bai Liu entered the grey, drab Sunshine City. No one gave him more than a passing glance. People moved quickly, making calls or rushing to other tasks, all focused on their own business.

After all, standing outside cost $10 an hour, and no one wanted to waste time helping a stranger.

Bai Liu strolled leisurely through the streets, reading the "Entry Guide" in his hand, feeling out of step with the busy crowds around him.

The [Instructions for Entering the City] outlined three types of residents:

The first type, [Homeowners], had successfully bought property in the city and enjoyed various discounts on public services such as healthcare, education, and shopping. Their land use fee was reduced from $10 per hour to $5.

The second type, [Housing Slaves], had made a down payment and were still paying off their mortgage. While not as privileged as homeowners, they were no longer considered temporary residents. They benefited from slightly reduced land use fees ($8 per hour) and enjoyed priority when it came to employment opportunities.

The final type of resident was Bai Liu—a temporary resident.

The entire [Admission Notice] felt more like a real estate advertisement, focusing on the benefits of owning property and the so-called happy life of homeowners, without ever mentioning the price of the houses.

Bai Liu flipped the notice over to see what was on the back.

On the reverse side was a warning:

Sunshine City strictly prohibits renting housing by individuals, collectives, or companies, the private buying and selling of properties, and the prolonged occupation of public land in fixed locations (e.g., sleeping on the street). Violations result in a minimum fine of 100,000 RMB, with no upper limit depending on the specific circumstances.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at this.

The ban on private property sales and purchases effectively cut off the average citizen's ability to buy a home from anyone other than the five major real estate developers, while also preventing smaller real estate agents from entering the market.

This meant that if an average citizen wanted to buy a home, they had no choice but to purchase from one of the five major developers. Additionally, the ban on all forms of renting left no alternative for those who couldn't afford to buy.

Anyone who couldn't afford to buy or rent would have to find somewhere else to live, but the third rule also prohibited occupying public land for extended periods. This meant that non-housing areas were off-limits, leaving people with only one option for survival: to buy a home from one of the five developers.

Bai Liu soon realized that Sunshine City was entirely controlled by these major real estate developers, with a clear monopoly over survival.

Interestingly, such a harsh and tightly regulated city would logically have a small, low-fertility population with few people willing to start families. After all, how could anyone afford to raise children in a place where survival was already a struggle?

Yet, the city's population had reached a permanent 10 million, with a steadily rising birth rate and an increasing number of migrants arriving. What was even stranger was that once people entered the city, few ever left.

Bai Liu noticed a slogan on the [Admission Notice]: [A happy city with a marriage rate of over 50% for three years in a row!]

It seemed completely contradictory to the harsh reality of the city. There had to be something else at play—something Bai Liu didn't yet understand—that was influencing the city's operations.

[System Alert: You have been wandering in the public area of Sunshine City for one hour. The cost of using the land is 10 RMB.]

Bai Liu glanced at the system prompt, then turned his attention to the crowded, bazaar-like area ahead. The place was overflowing with people, and the display sign at the entrance read: [Talent Market].

Upon entering, Bai Liu saw rows of scanning printers along either side of the doorway, with the words [Automatic Resume Generation Instrument for Facial Scanning] displayed above them. Nearby, another sign reads: [Swipe card to print, 10 dollars per use].

There was a queue at the front of the machines, with people anxiously moving back and forth through the crowd. Some were crouching in the corner, drinking mineral water, while others stared blankly at their phones, waiting for replies. The toilets had long lines, and hoarse cries occasionally echoed from inside.

"I didn't pass. They didn't want me. What should I do? I can't find a job!"

"Down to just over 3,000. I passed the written test but didn't make it through the interview. I was all set, but they took someone whose family owns property instead..."

The scene felt strangely familiar to Bai Liu. Having experienced the job market before, he couldn't help but feel a subtle discomfort.

Chapter End Notes

> I honestly find the system utterly cruel. The Russell Cemetery community already endures such harsh poverty in real life, and now there's a game designed to trap them in that same misery all over again. It's heartbreaking to think they have to suffer twice, once in the world they live in, and again in the twisted game they're forced into.

How to Own Five Buildings

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bai Liu glanced around and joined the queue for the printer.

In a typical job market, job seekers would print multiple copies of their CVs and distribute them widely. However, the job seekers here were clearly not wealthy, and printing costs were high. Bai Liu noticed that most of them only printed a single "hard card" CV for $10.

The "hard card" CV was an A4-sized cardboard sheet, densely packed with all the CV details. A hole was perforated at the top for easy attachment.

Once they printed their CVs, the job seekers naturally pulled out a string, threaded it through the hole, and hung the CVs around their necks, then made their way toward the job market.

This peculiar resume method caught Bai Liu's attention, and he followed the group as they walked down a long corridor, eventually turning a corner into the job market.

He tilted his head and paused.

After learning about the system here, Bai Liu understood that these temporary residents—who needed to work to survive and pay off their loans—were at the bottom of the social hierarchy in Sunshine City.

With so many residents reliant on jobs to cover their basic living expenses, supply and demand made finding a job difficult. This, in turn, meant that the employer held a high status compared to the job seeker, who was seen as having low status.

The job market here was far from a professional, respectful environment. It was more like a chaotic and raw marketplace.

Job seekers, their CVs hanging from their necks, squatted along the sides of the corridor like beggars. Their faces were pale, their hands clutching half-eaten loaves of bread or cups of noodles, their eyes following the well-dressed, suit-and-tie job seekers walking down the center of the hall. It was as if they were human commodities, their worth displayed like prices on a product.

Recruiters walked past, indifferent, casually inspecting the candidates as if they were choosing meat at a butcher's stall.

"Hey, you! Stick your head out here for a second."

The job seeker eagerly stretched his neck, trying to present his CV, and greeted the recruiter nervously. "Hello, how are you?"

The recruiter glanced at the CV hanging from the job seeker's neck and muttered, "Secondary university undergraduate degree, three years of experience, previous company... alright..."

"Salary requirement: $5,000?" The recruiter's tone shifted as he read further.

The job seeker immediately responded, trembling, "Negotiable! How much do you think is appropriate?"

"We're offering $3,800 to $4,000 for this position," the recruiter replied flatly.

The job seeker hesitated, his eyes downcast as he nervously adjusted his resume. "Four thousand is too little... This position requires ten hours of work a day, and the land fee costs $3,000 per month. I'll only be able to save $800 to $1,000. Noodles here cost $8 a bucket—if I eat just two meals a day, that's $480 a month. I can't survive on four thousand... Please, can I get $4,500...?"

Suddenly, a red-eyed job seeker jumped up and shouted, "I'll take $3,500! Just give me the job!"

Another man scrambled to get closer, grabbing the recruiter's trouser leg and showing his CV. "Look at me! I'll take $3,200!"

"Three thousand!" someone else called out. "Three thousand, and I'll do it!"

"Two thousand nine!"

"Two thousand eight!"

To the shock of the first job seeker, the salary continued to drop, all the way down to $2,500, where it finally stalled, with numerous others clamoring to offer even lower amounts.

The recruiter, clearly anticipating this, waited patiently until the bidding war subsided. He turned to the initial job seeker and asked, uninterested, "$2,500? Why?"

Tears filled the job seeker's eyes. He lowered his head and stayed silent. The recruiter ignored him and looked at another applicant: "You—stick your head out here."

"Wait!" the job seeker interrupted, his voice quivering with emotion. "Is $3,000 okay? I can't survive on $2,500 here!"

The recruiter glanced at the kneeling job seeker without a flicker of sympathy. "Does it matter to us if you survive or not?"

With a dismissive wave, the recruiter dismissed the pleading job seeker and nodded to another candidate. "You—show me your resume."

The new candidate eagerly approached, saying, "I'll accept $2,500!"

"Hmm," the recruiter nodded, "There are plenty of people willing to work for that amount. It's not like we're handing out money just because you're willing."

The man slumped back down, murmuring numbly, "Yes..."

The recruiter turned and instructed the person next to him, "Distribute the written test papers. Once they're finished, have them submit their answers. Let those who score ninety or higher know they'll be called for an interview."

After that, the recruiter left, his departure under the watchful gaze of the crowd. A few who had finished their tests and handed in their papers began to wait anxiously, phones clutched in their hands, praying silently.

"Please let them call me soon, let them call me soon!"

"Let me get this job!"

The job seeker who had sat down at the start was now clutching his CV in a daze. He clearly was new: "Why are people still fighting for jobs that only pay two and a half thousand? It's impossible to live on that..."

The job seeker sitting next to him, having already finished his test, shot him a strange look. His bloodshot eyes spoke of a sleepless night. "Of course, you can't live on one job," he replied.

"We all take two or even three jobs."

The man stared at him in disbelief. "Two or three? How do you have time for that when you're already working seven days a week, ten-hour shifts without even counting overtime? Don't you sleep?"

"Sleep?" The other man snorted, his tone bitter. "We don't have a place to sleep. How could we sleep on the street? We sleep in the office." He made a gesture, counting on his fingers. "Besides, if I'm lucky enough to get a job at a real estate company, I only have to pay five bucks an hour for the land I work on! And I get to sneak in a little nap! It's a huge profit!"

"The one who just approached you works under the real estate umbrella," the man continued, clearly sincere. "You're crazy to turn that down. Next time, if they offer two and a half thousand, just take it."

"Two and a half thousand is the standard here," the man muttered, shaking his head. "That's all we're worth to them—just enough to keep us alive."

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze, printed out a copy of his CV, and held it in his hand, not around his neck. He then made his way to the job market.

Most of the people here were temporary residents and laborers, desperately in need of money.

Each person’s eyes were bloodshot, anxiety and desperation lurking beneath their weary expressions. Every time a recruiter passed by, their eyes would momentarily light up, but the spark would fade as quickly as it appeared, leaving them feeling more distant, more hopeless.

On his second lap, Bai Liu found his team members huddled together among the recruiters.

When he spotted them, Mu Sicheng was in the middle of an argument with one of the recruiters.

"You want to hire me for two thousand five hundred?" Mu Sicheng sneered, his resume cardboard in hand. His smile was so hostile it seemed like he was about to slap the recruiter with it. "So cheap, why don't you hire a dog for your company's front desk?"

"A dog front desk and a dog company? Sounds like a perfect match," he added sarcastically.

The recruiter, now visibly angry, shot back, "I approached you because you have a good image and we need you for the front desk at the sales building. Don't be ignorant. If you don't want this 2,500 job, there are plenty of people who would."

As soon as the recruiter's words left his mouth, the heads of the surrounding job seekers all turned toward him.

Mu Sicheng, who clearly wasn't new to this, immediately recognized the situation. His anger surged. "I already called you a dog for doing this! Don't you feel ashamed of yourself?"

But no one was paying attention to Mu Sicheng. Instead, they all looked at the recruiter, waiting for his response.

The recruiter, chest puffed out, glanced around triumphantly before turning back to Mu Sicheng. "If you don't want it, there are plenty of others who will take it. Not just 2,500—people will even settle for 2,000, 1,500. Plenty of them will do it."

"What's the difference between these lowly citizens who can't even afford a house and a dog?" The recruiter sneered. "Paying them to work, letting them stand on the ground in Sunnyside a little longer, giving them a roof over their heads for a while—it's charity, you know?"

Mu Sicheng bared his teeth. "You—"

Before he could say more, Tang Erda, who had been standing next to him, reached out to stop him. His expression darkened. "Don't do it. If you hurt him, your ID will turn red, and you'll be expelled by the patrol. You won't be able to buy five buildings."

Before Tang Erda could say another word, a sharp bone whip appeared around the recruiter's neck, cutting smoothly to the side.

Blood spurted out, and the recruiter covered his gaping wound, his smug expression quickly turning to panic. Gasping for air, he fumbled for his phone to call the police.

A pair of bloodied hands casually pulled the phone from his pocket. Bai Liu smiled, half-kneeling beside the recruiter, shaking the phone in front of his face. "Is this what you were looking for?"

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has been detected killing an NPC. The city ID card has been changed to red name status, transitioning from temporary resident to wanted criminal!]

Tang Erda looked at Bai Liu, who was crouched on the ground, tense. "Bai Liu, our mission is to own five buildings. Killing someone will get us evicted and disqualified as residents of Sunnyside. We won't be able to own anything here."

Bai Liu waited until the recruiter had gulped his last breath, then looked up at his team with a wry smile. "Captain Tang, you're missing the point. We're not just going to own five buildings—I never said I'd own five."

"It's impossible to complete this copy the normal way with only five buildings in a week. We'll need to take an unconventional route. This is a regimental copy, so everyone needs to have a role. Only one person in our team has to be a normal resident to qualify for ownership of the house. The rest of us don't need to worry about being residents."

Bai Liu stretched out two fingers, rummaging through the recruiter's body. He found a resident ID card, some recruitment papers, and finally a property deed from the inner compartment.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for killing a homeowner and obtaining the property deed for a suite on the 18th floor of Block 17 in District A!]

[When the owner dies, they will haunt the room, attacking anyone who enters and turning it into a murder house. This is problematic.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu must go to the location and deal with the ghost of the house owner before claiming the murder house!]

Bai Liu smiled, standing up and holding the bloodstained property deed between his fingers. "Looks like I'm on the right track."

Chapter End Notes

This work has finally reached 1 million words!!!!! □

When the job seekers nearby saw that the recruiter had been killed, they stared blankly at Bai Liu. He gave them a glance that instantly made them retreat into themselves, burying their heads in their knees and trembling as if they hadn't seen anything.

Some murmured in fear, "We won't say anything, we won't say anything when the patrols come! Please don't kill us!"

"I'm not going to kill you," Bai Liu replied, crouching down on one knee. He smiled calmly at the job seeker and held out his hand, the bloodstained property deed in his grip. "Would you like to live in the house I just... 'acquired'?"

The job seeker was stunned, stammering, "You... you want to rent me a room? People who rent and those who live in Sunnyside without permission—they're breaking the law! I can't..."

"No," Bai Liu's smile deepened. "Are you afraid to live in a murder house if I give it to you for free?"

The man was momentarily confused, shaking his head before muttering, "You're giving me... a free house in Zone A?"

Bai Liu nodded. "Yes."

The surrounding job seekers stared in disbelief, whispering among themselves.

"Is it illegal to live in a house given to you for free?"

"...I don't think it breaks the law if there's no lease involved."

"Oh my god, a house in Zone A! I've dreamed of living there just once..."

"Am I dreaming? A murderer has stolen someone's house for us to live in?"

Suddenly, those who had been frightened by Bai Liu's blood-covered appearance and had previously backed away now quietly gathered around again. Their bloodshot eyes eagerly and cautiously studied him, while a few couldn't help but voice their opinions.

"There are so many of us here, and you only have one murder house. Are you going to choose who gets to live in it?"

As soon as they spoke, those who had endured years of job hunting puffed out their chests, practically shoving their CVs in front of Bai Liu. Others whispered about their strengths.

"You need strong yang energy to hold down a bad house, right? I have an excellent eight-character!"

"I have even better eight characters!"

Tang Erda watched the group with a mixture of helplessness and concern as they began to squabble. "Enough, stop for a moment."

"There's no need to fight over it." Bai Liu smiled, standing up and addressing everyone. "We're going to own five buildings soon, and everyone will get a free house."

A brief silence followed, then an outburst of chatter.

"Five buildings?!"

One person quickly grew concerned. "Are you planning to keep killing people and stealing houses? The patrols here are vicious. I saw them last time at the talent market—they beat up a backpacker who'd been living here for over ten hours without paying the fine for occupying public land."

Tang Erda frowned. "That's against the law. Won't the patrols face consequences?"

The man looked confused. "Why would they be punished? They're hired by real estate agents, and the rules here protect them."

Tang Erda's frown deepened. "Don't your laws allow you to sanction criminal patrols?"

"They would have, but last year, when the opposition exceeded fifty percent, the vote was canceled. They said patrols have the right to deal directly with anyone they deem a threat to public peace in Sunnyside, in order to protect all residents."

"Why was the vote canceled?" Tang Erda pressed. "How did it pass when it clearly undermines your rights?"

The man was increasingly bewildered, about to speak when Bai Liu, standing next to him, replied nonchalantly, "Because they don't have the right to vote."

"You need to have a house here to be considered a full resident, and they don't have one. That's why they're in the lower class now. And lower-class citizens don't have any rights here," Tang Erda explained.

Bai Liu smirked at him. "Captain Tang, not all laws are made for the benefit of the majority."

"There are places where the law benefits those with the most power, like here," Tang Erda countered.

Bai Liu's expression grew more serious. "I broke the rules not because I wanted to kill anyone, but because I knew the game's main quest couldn't be reached through the rules they set. The rules were designed to protect their interests and exploit others."

"Captain Tang, don't worry too much about me breaking the rules in real life. The Torah protects the rights of regular people like me, especially those who've been laid off. I don't need to break those laws," Bai Liu reassured him.

Tang Erda sighed in relief, still remaining still.

The game's realism had Bai Liu on edge, especially when he started killing people.

Bai Liu patted Tang Erda's shoulder, giving him a reassuring smile. "Relax, Captain Tang. It's just a game."

"You can't live in this house for now. We still need to handle it." Bai Liu turned to the job seekers. "I'll come back to you after we've dealt with this. Do you know how to transfer property titles here?"

One person glanced at the recruiter, who lay dead on the ground, then hesitated. "With this sudden death, you can't just transfer the title easily. The house will be repossessed by the property company, and you'll have to exploit some loopholes."

"Right," another person nodded in agreement. "Go to the [Suicide Estate Auction Centre]. You can transfer there. You should be able to use his ID card to get a death certificate before the patrol registers it."

"A suicide auction centre?" Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "What's that?"

The man seemed surprised. "You don't know? It's where properties are auctioned off after the owner commits suicide."

"The suicide rate here in Sunnyside is high. Many house slaves jump from buildings after they can't pay their mortgages. A large portion of the house is still owed to the property developer, and they repossess the house to foreclose on the loan."

"Those kinds of murder houses are cheap, but still, I can't afford them."

"They say those houses are haunted, with owners dying one after another, but people still buy them because they're cheap."

Suicide Estate Auction Centre.

Two people, heads covered with tarps, hid in a crowded room. Their heads touched as they whispered.

"You don't think they'll spot us like this, do you, Yuan Guang?" one asked.

"I don't think so," Yuan Guang replied. "This replica map of Sunshine City is huge, with a population of ten million. How unlucky would we be to run into them?"

"If you're unsure, I can use my Mist skill to cover us," the other suggested.

"No way! We can use that against other teams, but their team is strong. Two popular players got immunity, your Mist skill CD takes a day to reset, and mine takes seventeen hours. Save them for when we really need them."

One of the people sighed quietly. "Yuan Guang, do you think we're really this unlucky? A game like this... meeting them..."

Yuan Guang looked around cautiously, then squeezed his sun cloth. "Honestly, I don't think we're that unlucky now that I've looked at the people in this game."

Both Shi Qian and Yuan Guang shuddered together and said, "The prices here are insane."

"In real life, I make 7,000 to 8,000 a month, and house prices are 10,000 to 20,000 per square foot. I can still look forward to buying a house, but here..." Yuan Guang shook his head, his face reddening, "The only way to buy a house here is to rob one."

Shi Qian nodded, holding up a linen pouch. "We just robbed eighteen recruiters. They're loaded. Their ID card balances add up to sixty million. We should have no problem buying a dozen small murder houses."

Yuan Guang breathed a sigh of relief, his eyes lighting up again. "At this rate, we might be able to buy five murder houses in seven days!"

"If Bai Liu and the others are using the same method, we'll use our skills to outpace their progress and win!" Shi Qian grinned.

The both of them relaxed at the thought, and Shi Qian glanced up at the auction stand. "320,000 per square foot? With a 4,500 salary and land use fees, that's outrageous! How can people live like that?"

Hearing Shi Qian's exclamation, the man next to her nodded. "Well, the only way to live is in a murder house."

"The Murder House..." Shi Qian and Yuan Guang exchanged a glance, realizing this was a replica of the spirit world. "There are real ghosts in those houses, aren't there?"

"Isn't that what it means to live with the dead? And people are still willing to live there?" Shi Qian asked.

The man shrugged nonchalantly. "People die if they don't live in a murder house. Patrols kill people every day, and a ghost might scare me to death, but at least it's not as bad as being killed by a patrol."

Shi Qian, a seasoned homeowner, couldn't help but ask, "How did the prices get this high? It's outrageous!"

"Speculation?" The man gave her a confused look. "What's speculation on house prices?"

Shi Qian was taken aback. "You know, when people buy something in bulk, hoard it, and then raise the price so no one else can afford it, like speculating in stocks..."

The man's eyes widened in realization. "Oh, that's what you mean by speculation."

He shook his head. "But we don't speculate on property prices here. Most of the properties are set by the top five real estate developers."

Shi Qian was stunned. "What does that mean?"

The man spread his hands. "It means the price is whatever they say it is."

Shi Qian was dumbfounded. "As much as they say?!"

The man nodded. "Yes. They own all the land in Sunnyside, so we can only buy houses from them. That's why the prices are whatever they say."

Elsewhere...

Mu Sicheng, having heard the same information, raised his voice. "What did they say the price was? You'll buy when they say 320,000 per square foot?"

The man who had bought a murder house was shocked by Mu Sicheng's reaction. He scowled, nodded a little, and quickly slunk away.

"Shit!" Mu Sicheng yelled, jumping up and down. "I wasn't finished asking! Why are you running?!"

Tang Erda placed a hand on Mu Sicheng's shoulder. "Calm down."

Mu Sicheng clenched his fist in frustration. "This is a pile of dogshit companies! And these people! They set the price at 320,000 per square foot, and they just accept it? What a bunch of fools!"

Muke, remaining calm, said, "They don't have a choice. They have to buy it."

"320,000 a flat, and they have to buy it?!" Mu Sicheng spun around, incredulous. "On what grounds?!"

Bai Liu spoke slowly, "Because they control all the land."

"Imagine if one person controls all the rice in the world, and you can only buy rice from them if you want it."

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng. "If they're selling rice for a dollar a pound today, you have to buy it. Tomorrow, if they raise the price to five hundred a pound, you'll still have to buy it because if you don't, you'll starve. It's the same with houses in Sunnyside. Without a house, you can't get a job, you can't access healthcare, you can't go to school, and you'll even be killed."

"Rice is as essential as a house. And when something essential is monopolized, they can price it however they want. They'll set the price high enough for you to barely afford, but low enough to force you to work at your limit, whether it's 320,000, 420,000, or even 500,000 per square foot."

Bai Liu's gaze sharpened. "If you want to live, you'll pay that price. It's your survival on the line."

How to Own Five Buildings

The auction for the murder house began shortly after.

A man in a black suit and red tie, holding a shiny old Little Mu hammer, arrogantly stepped onto the auction stage. He scanned the eager crowd below, his voice drawing out as he declared, "The auction begins."

"As you're all aware, Sunny City is divided into five districts—A, B, C, D, and E. The real estate resources in District A are the best, and today, you're fortunate to have two houses from District A up for auction."

"I'm sure you've all seen the properties for auction today, so I won't go into too much detail. The first one: Zone A, 18 sq ft, turnkey, ready to move in. It's a pleasant home for a family of four, though, sadly, this family of four jumped to their deaths just the day before yesterday."

"We begin, as is customary, by expressing our gratitude to the previous homeowners who've contributed to your opportunity to purchase a bargain property in Zone A. Please, bow your heads and pray that they ascend to heaven in peace."

The auctioneer led the crowd in a false moment of silence, hands folded.

"The starting price for this house—" He slammed the hammer down after the prayer, lifting his eyes to the crowd. "—is three million."

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian, in the crowd, exchanged confused glances. "18 square meters... what's the starting price?"

Before they could even process it, the price began to soar. The people around them scrambled, red-faced, raising their paddles and shouting out bids.

"3.1 million!"

"3.18 million!"

In just three minutes, the price had surged to four million, a scene so lively it almost seemed like a robbery.

Yuan Guang hesitated, ready to raise his hand. He held a card worth one million but found himself momentarily dazed by the frenzy over an 18-square-meter house, where a family of four had just died.

"Good." The auctioneer, indifferent, dropped the hammer and raised his hand to a gaunt, haggard man who looked like he might collapse at any moment. "Congratulations, Mr. Li. This house is yours for four million, seven hundred sixty thousand."

Mr. Li threw his hands in the air, ecstatic, almost maddened with joy. "I've got a house! I finally own a house!"

"I'd like to invite Mr. Li to come up, collect his property title, and share a few words of gratitude with all the residents of Sunny City still hoping for a home," the auctioneer announced.

The skeletal Mr. Li climbed onto the stage in one breathless step, accepting the title with the auctioneer's slightly disgusted assistance. He beamed at the residents below, as if he had just conquered the world.

"My goal, ever since I started working at sixteen, was to own a house in Sunny City," he said, his voice trembling with emotion. "Full payment!" His eyes gleamed with an eerie wildness. "I'm determined not to be a house slave. I want to be a first-class citizen of Sunny City, right away!"

"To reach this goal, I ate only instant noodle pastries, treated myself to a cup of soup every other day, worked six to ten odd jobs, slept in company bathrooms to save on rent, and saved every penny for thirty years. And now, I've saved enough for four point seven-six million!"

Mr. Li held up the property certificate like a trophy, tears of joy streaming down his face. "Finally, on this day, I bought an 18-square-foot house with full payment!"

The crowd responded with scattered, awkward applause and a few derisive comments.

"Seriously? What's he so proud of? I've worked twelve jobs before, you know."

"Thirty years to save 4.76 million? Just pure luck to grab this unit. Someone like him doesn't belong in District A."

"Can we just get on with it? Waiting for the second house to go up for auction is painful enough."

Mr. Li, sensing the awkwardness, descended from the stage with the property deeds, looking slightly embarrassed.

Yuan Guang stared numbly at his retreating figure. "I feel like my mental values have taken a serious hit."

Shi Qian nodded slowly. "Same here."

Another group of onlookers, equally taken aback by the spectacle, was also reeling.

Mu Sicheng was stunned. "This Mr. Li, looking like a skeleton... isn't he going to keel over the moment he moves in?"

"And then the murder house will get repossessed and put up for auction again," Bai Liu said with a mischievous smile, eyeing the auctioneer. "Feels like a fresh twist to the fairy tale."

Mu Sicheng nervously took two steps away from Bai Liu. "Bai Liu, why do I get the feeling you're being so... aggressive in this copy?"

"Normal," Liu Jiayi, who had been silent until now, glanced at Bai Liu and said coolly, "He was also aggressive with the foremen in The Rose Factory and ended up killing almost all of them. Bai Liu hates the upper class that exploits him, and he didn't like Muke back then."

Muke took a deep breath.

Bai Liu shrugged. "It's natural to hate the class that takes away your interests. No one likes being a leek."

Tang Erda couldn't help but glance at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu smiled faintly. "Captain Tang, I'm just venting in the game. I won't bring it into reality."

With that, Bai Liu handed the completed property certificates to Tang Erda. "Captain Tang, as the most disciplined and strongest member of our team, I've decided to put all the property titles we've obtained in your name for now. Is that alright?"

Tang Erda took the deeds. "Yes."

"So, our current strategy is to kill and take the room?" Tang Erda frowned, clearly uncomfortable with this approach.

"Of course not." Bai Liu raised his eyes toward the hot auction block.

"It’s too inefficient to kill and take the room."

Tang Erda was puzzled. "Too inefficient?"

"Kill one person and get a house? What could be more efficient?"

"Well, I only killed the recruiter to test two theories: that the game should be cleared through unconventional methods, and that people in Sunny City turn into ghosts when they die," Bai Liu explained, unhurried. "It’s unlikely that we’ll get five houses in seven days through murder alone."

Tang Erda frowned and asked hesitantly, "Why not, if... we could kill the owners of five houses?"

Liu Jiayi replied coldly, "Because we can’t tell who the owner is, so how would we know whom to kill?"

"Exactly," Bai Liu nodded. "There are ten million people in this city, and homeowners are a minority. Most are house slaves or temporary residents. Killing them won’t give us full proof of property, and sifting through everyone to find the homeowners is inefficient."

"We could just go to the building and kill the residents," Mu Sicheng suggested, rubbing his chin. "Most people living in a building are homeowners, right?"

"Also house slaves," Muke countered, his voice calm. "And with a building of thirty or forty floors, five to six homes per floor, and decent quality doors, windows, and valves, we’d need to break into at least 150 homes in one night."

Mu Sicheng pondered, "A hundred and fifty households a night isn’t impossible, is it?"

"Of course, killing can be done," Bai Liu replied, lifting his eyes, "but have you forgotten? People here turn into ghosts when they die."

Liu Jiayi thought for a moment before speaking up, "But there’s something that doesn’t add up here."

"When you killed that recruiter earlier, the system prompted that he would turn into a ghost and remain in the house, attacking anyone who entered. So, following this pattern, if people have died in these murder houses, shouldn’t they turn into ghosts as well, haunting the house and attacking anyone who enters?"

Liu Jiayi furrowed her brow. "The system can't lie about the rules of the game. So why are these people still alive if they're living in murder houses?"

"They're not exactly 'alive and well,'" Muke recalled what the previous job seekers had said. "Some of the people who bought these murder houses lived in them for a while, but then something happened to them."

Liu Jiayi glanced at the bustling auction scene behind them. "But there's no denying that many people living in these houses seem to be doing fine. Otherwise, the market wouldn't be so active."

Bai Liu looked down at her. "I thought about that too. But have you noticed something different between these murder houses and the ones we take over?"

Mak Si pondered for a moment. "Aren't they both murder houses after someone dies in them? What's the difference?"

Liu Jiayi paused and quickly realized, looking at the property deed in Tang Erda's hand. "It's about ownership."

"The recruiter we killed was wealthy. He had full ownership of a house, making him the homeowner. But these murder houses being auctioned off were repossessed by the real estate company, which means the people who died in them were basically house slaves still paying off their mortgages."

Bai Liu smiled. "Exactly. That means the homeowner doesn't fully own the house."

"My guess," he continued, "is that ghosts who fully own their houses can only stay in them. But ghosts who don't own their houses can't stay in them permanently—they have to wander most of the time and only return occasionally."

Liu Jiayi quickly caught on. "That's why we have to deal with the ghosts of the owners in our murder houses right away, while some people living in these auctioned houses are having problems, and others seem fine."

Bai Liu's smile deepened. "Not only that, but remember what the auctioneer said? The deceased paid off part of the mortgage for you. I think the ghosts own part of the house too."

Muke paused, slowly looking up as he processed this new information.

"Bai Liu," he said, "are you implying that the living here have to follow the real estate developers' rules, but even when people die and become ghosts, those ghosts still have to abide by the developers' rules? So, even the ghosts must pay the mortgage before they can stay in the house? And their ownership can be regulated too... does that mean—"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes. "That’s right. I suspect that the top five real estate developers here may not even be alive."

Chapter Notes

The auction for the murder house came to a close.

Just as Yuan Guang and Shi Qian lowered their heads, they heard an astonishing figure: "The starting bid for this suite is 300,000."

The two of them looked up sharply at the auction stand, and Bai Liu, having caught wind of the price, glanced over with interest.

The auctioneer looked down at the catalogue and read the introduction in a monotone voice: "- This is a 2.45-square-meter custom-built house on the 18th floor, located on the outskirts of Sunnyside in Area E. The property has a usable area of about 2 square meters after sharing the equalization. There's no toilet, kitchen, electricity, water, or gas connections, and no hospital, supermarket, or transport station nearby. It's intended for one person."

"The previous house slave died suddenly while working, so the property was repossessed."

The auctioneer raised his head, his tone indifferent: "The bidding starts at 300,000..."

Yuan Guang nervously raised his $310,000 sign, scanning the room to see if anyone else would compete with him. To his surprise, very few people raised their signs for such a cheap house. It was a stark contrast to the previous bidding wars. Even when people did raise their signs, there was a clear hesitation and fear on their faces.

"305,000."

"306,000..."

"Thirty—sorry, I'm not auctioning anymore. Count me out for not shouting. Sorry."

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian exchanged puzzled glances. After assessing the probability of winning the house, they whispered to each other.

"Why isn't anyone bidding for this house? It's cheap, only 300,000."

"It’s too small, and there’s no water or electricity. Is that why it’s uninhabitable?"

"That can’t be it. There was a house in Area B, just a bit bigger than this, 3 square meters, a basement, no electricity, and it sold for 470,000."

"Is the location really that bad?"

"They’re all here for the murder houses. I don’t think they care about the location..."

The more Shi Qian thought about it, the more she felt something was off. "I feel like they’re scared of the house."

Yuan Guang grew more confused. "This group is all bidding on murder houses. What other house could scare them?"

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian tried asking the people around them what was wrong with the house, but everyone was too secretive to answer. The only person who spoke kindly advised them, "Don’t bid on it. It’s really bad news if you live there."

"The house houses the undead?" Shi Qian asked, her confusion evident.

The man waved his hand, glancing around before leaning in close to Shi Qian’s ear. "People don’t always die when they live in a murder house, but they definitely will if they live in this one. Don’t put money on it!"

Yuan Guang hesitated, then remembered they hadn’t captured anything that day. Just as they were considering their next move, a low male voice came from behind them.

"Three hundred and twenty thousand."

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian instinctively turned around. When they saw that the person holding the sign was Tang Erda, the tallest person in the crowd, they gasped and quickly shrank back, hiding in the crowd, trying to blend in under the cover of their sunscreen, not daring to make a sound.

"Are you still auctioning, Shi Qian?" Yuan Guang whispered.

"What the hell! Bai Liu and their team are here. If we auction for it, we'll be spotted for sure!" Shi Qian said glumly. "That house will have to go to them first."

As if afraid Tang Erda would change his mind, the auctioneer quickly struck the gavel. "Will the gentleman please come forward to collect your home, valued at 320,000!"

Tang Erda walked forward with a tense expression, coldly swiping the recruiter's ID card and paying 320,000. He swiftly took the property deed and left with Bai Liu, his movements hurried and awkward, as if he were a first-time thief trying to cover his tracks.

Hidden in the crowd, Yuan Guang glanced at Shi Qian, as if sharing a silent understanding. "How do you think they got the money?"

"If I'm not mistaken..." Shi Qian barely finished his sentence when a loud scream erupted from the auctioneer's side, pointing toward the direction Tang Erda had left. "Patrol! Catch the man who just swiped his card! He used someone else's card!"

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian: "..."

Ah, sure enough.

"Luckily, we forced those recruiters to write the check right away..." Yuan Guang patted his chest in relief. "That was too close, or we might have gotten caught too."

Shi Qian looked in the direction where Bai Liu had disappeared, slowly frowning. "What's going on with that 320,000 house in Area E?"

Zone E

Bai Liu, after a few detours, successfully lost the patrol following them and headed straight for the location listed on the property deed in Area E.

"18 Street 444..." Mu Sicheng spat as he read the address on the property deed. "What a horrible street number. Really unlucky, right? No wonder the house is so cheap."

Liu Jiayi glanced at Mu Sicheng for a moment. "I don't think a street number would affect the price of a house in Sunshine City."

"They shouldn't care about such things anymore," Tang Erda muttered, scanning the area with a stoic expression. "At this point, people will live anywhere as long as they can survive."

Muke furrowed his brow and asked, "But why would they rather live in a murder house? A house so cheap that only a handful of people put up bids—why is that?"

Bai Liu remained indifferent. "We'll see when we get there."

In contrast to the concrete jungle of the city center, the E district was isolated on the outskirts, with potholes and puddles on the road, muddy from the rain. The district's recreational facilities—walkers and slides—were rusted and collapsed, much like the roads.

Although the buildings were tall, they looked ancient, with paint, plaster, and tiles peeling away in patches. Some buildings were even overtaken by green vines, indicating years of neglect.

A sense of decay hung in the air throughout the entire E district.

Most residents of the old houses appeared elderly. From the windows of their homes, grandparents with frail bodies and weathered faces hung laundry, their clothes faded and patched in several places.

The buildings all looked alike, and even the clothes drying on the balconies seemed to match—nothing stood out.

"Let's ask for directions," Tang Erda said, scanning the area. He spotted an elderly couple walking slowly along the rambler. "Excuse me, how do we get to 444 E?"

The elderly pair looked up when they heard the question, and Tang Erda hesitated when he saw their faces.

The two elderly people, a man and a woman, had cloudy, lifeless grey eyes. Their faces were covered with age spots, and a foul stench of decay hung in the air around them. Yellow-green, reddish blood and pus trickled from their ears and noses, dripping onto the ground, where it was quickly absorbed.

These two people looked as if they had reached the extreme of aging, so much so that they appeared almost like… corpses that could still move.

"You're on…" Tang Erda hesitated.

The elderly man trembled as he replied, "I'm sick… just exercising with my wife."

"The old man should rest when he's sick," Tang Erda said, steadying them with his hand and frowning. "Where are your children?"

The grandmother shook her head. "We can't rest. We have to work."

"Work?!" Mu Sicheng, helping to support the grandmother, asked incredulously, "Granny, you're so old and you still have to work?"

The grandmother gave Mu Sicheng a strange look. "Yes, if you don't work, you don't get paid."

The elderly man nodded approvingly. "We both have a mortgage to pay."

Everyone fell silent for a moment, except for Bai Liu, who stepped forward and gently took over from Tang Erda, helping the old man. "How many years did you take out the loan?"

The elderly man raised his hand to indicate a seven. "I took out a loan with my wife for seventy years. I started working when I was fifteen, and now I have ten years left to pay it off."

"You have to be strong to keep working and paying off your mortgage," the elderly man said, patting Bai Liu's hand as if teaching a younger man. "Don't stop working just because you're sick. It's not right. Look, I've worked for sixty years, and soon, I'll finally have my own house."

"It's a pity that there's nothing left here in E. Back when it was filled with young people, it was as prosperous and expensive as Area A. Unfortunately, now it's just us old folks living here," the elderly man said with a sigh.

"We're getting older. We don't have the energy to work seven or eight jobs a day like we did when we were younger. We don't make much money, and places like hospitals and schools that require heavy spending can't stay open anymore. They all moved out a few years ago. These days, there aren't even a few restaurants left in this neighborhood," the old grandfather continued, shaking his head.

"Hospitals and schools moved out?" Mu Sicheng asked, surprised. "But they're supposed to buy storefronts for hospitals and schools. How could they just leave?"

The elderly man nodded. “Of course, they had to leave if they couldn’t continue. Running a hospital or school is expensive. Although the fees are high, we understand—getting a mortgage for a storefront is very expensive. People who work in hospitals and schools are struggling too. Out of the fifty dollars they earn, forty-eight goes straight toward paying off their mortgage.”

“It’s hard to run a business these days,” the grandmother added, shaking her head in agreement. “We’re just earning a little bit here and there. If we can’t keep going and can’t pay off the mortgage, we’ll have to die, and when we do, the property will be repossessed. Isn’t that what moving out means?”

Mu Sicheng opened his mouth to respond but was at a loss for words.

Soon, the old man perked up again. “But even though the amenities in Area E aren’t great right now, there is one thing that’s nice about the houses here.”

The grandmother smiled gratefully. “It’s a good thing we bought early. Otherwise, we’d be chewing on the scraps now.”

The old man nodded solemnly, his beard shaking with anger. “Yes, these young people today… they want to live well, they want nice houses, but they don’t work hard. They just expect the next generation to take care of them. It’s shameful!”

“What do you mean by ‘gnawing on the next generation’?” Mu Sicheng asked, looking confused.

The old man glanced at him, realizing he didn’t understand. “It’s about the length of property ownership,” he explained kindly. “The houses in E were bought early, and they were given a hundred years of ownership. That means we could live here for almost a century. We were able to get a loan for seventy years. But now, real estate agents don’t offer that long of ownership anymore.”

“Yes,” the grandmother agreed, “I remember that now the ownership is only twenty years. After that, the estate agent takes it back. The loan has to be paid off within twenty years, and the monthly payments are very high. Many young people can’t afford it and end up relying on the next generation to pay the mortgage.”

“Relying on the next generation?” Tang Erda frowned. “What do you mean by that?”

“Well,” the old man hesitated, looking around at the young people who seemed so out of the loop. “It’s a new repayment system that five major developers came up with. It’s where you get an advance on your future, so your children can help pay off the mortgage for you.”

“If you’re interested, there’s a new property opening in Area C today. You can go check it out.”

New development in Area C.

When the grand opening of the property sales center took place just three days ago, the response was overwhelming. Now that it had finally opened, the crowd surged in like a group of hungry men who had been starving for days and smelled a feast.

At the entrance, heavily armed patrols stood guard, holding high-voltage electric batons and steel forks to maintain order.

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian were swept into the crowd. For a few seconds, they were disoriented, unable to comprehend what was happening. It took a while for them to recover.

The number of people attending the opening was far beyond what Yuan Guang and Shi Qian had anticipated. They had only heard the news and decided to take a look, but with just $60 million in their pockets, they knew they couldn’t afford to buy. Still, they understood that buying new properties might be the surest way to survive this game, as opposed to auctioning off murder houses, which might not even guarantee a win.

Originally, Yuan Guang and Shi Qian had thought that not many people would show up for such an expensive new development. But as they looked around, they saw a mixture of well-dressed, first-class citizens, worn-out house slaves, and a few temporary residents wearing CV signs on their chests and barely any clothes.

The extremely diverse crowd only deepened their confusion. Why would a first-class citizen want to buy another home when they already owned one? Why would homeowners who were already paying off mortgages come to a new development they couldn’t afford? And why would temporary residents, who couldn’t even pay their mortgages, come to see it?

Before they could fully process their thoughts, an enthusiastic salesperson approached them, helping them up with a bright smile. “Hello, are you here to buy a house?”

Yuan Guang, a little flustered, replied, “Yes, yes.”

The real estate NPCs here all exude arrogance and condescension. As soon as they notice your clothes and realize you can’t afford to buy a house, they look down their noses at you, waving their hands impatiently and shooing you away like you're a fly.

“The property isn’t available for sale today. Would you like to view the lot and location first?” Xiaodong, the salesperson for Area C, number 1534, smiled brightly. She quickly moved to help Shi Qian and Yuan Guang sit down. “Would you like a drink? Perhaps some tea?”

Yuan Guang replied cautiously, “Do you have Coke?”

Shi Qian: “Chrysanthemum tea will be fine, thanks.”

Xiaodong smiled and nodded, then raised the microphone in her ear. “One Coke and one chrysanthemum tea, please. I’ll get them for you, just wait a moment.”

As Xiaodong walked away, Shi Qian and Yuan Guang exchanged quick glances, observing that all the salespeople were overly enthusiastic, treating everyone—homeowners, workers, and temporary residents alike—as potential customers who could afford to buy a home.

Shi Qian commented dryly, “If they’re this enthusiastic, there’s probably a reason things aren’t going well.”

Yuan Guang nodded gravely.

Soon, Xiaodong returned with a tray, handing Shi Qian the Coke and Yuan Guang the chrysanthemum tea. She opened the property map and began introducing the house types. “What kind of rooms would you like to see today?”

“We have smaller homes here, 12-16 square meters. They’re perfect for a small family, and when you factor in the equalized area, they still come down to about 11 square meters or more—ideal for a family of three.”

“Of course, if you’re planning to have more children, we recommend a flat between 20-25 square meters. After removing the equalized area, it comfortably fits three to four siblings."

"For example, you could design a layout with two folding beds and an invisible bed, plus a large bookcase to separate the parents' and children's sleeping areas. This way, you can only see each other's feet, not your faces, providing privacy."

Xiaodong added with a slightly awkward smile, "And it won't interfere with your life as a couple."

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian stared blankly at the 20-square-meter apartment. The parents and children, separated by a large bookcase, could only see each other's feet, but still, they were supposed to have a couple's life in this setup?

Meanwhile, a nearby man and woman seemed to nod approvingly as they discussed the apartment. "Yes, this layout is much more private. Our old place was only 12 square meters, and with three kids, we had to sit on the floor while they watched us—quite uncomfortable for my wife and me."

Shi Qian nearly spit out the water she was drinking.

Three kids watching you while you and your wife...? Something is seriously wrong here.

The salesman's eyes lit up at this. "You have three children?"

The man gave a reserved nod. "Yes, we came here because of the kids."

The salesman smiled even more warmly. "Since you have three children, perhaps you'd be interested in this large 28-square-meter home…"

As they continued their conversation, Shi Qian began to notice something odd. Most of the buyers were couples with multiple children—rarely just one or two. The sales presentations seemed heavily focused on family-friendly homes, particularly those capable of housing multiple children. It felt… strange.

In Sunshine City, Shi Qian was sure she didn't want to marry or have children, but the idea of starting a family seemed prevalent here. The most popular house types were those around 25 square meters, capable of accommodating three kids.

Xiaodong finished her spiel and glanced at Shi Qian and Yuan Guang. “So, are you two planning to get married and have children anytime soon?”

Both Shi Qian and Yuan Guang were taken aback. They had worked together for years, and due to their shared cynicism—shaped by their experiences with soulless buildings and games—they had long abandoned any worldly desire for the opposite sex. Their friendship had evolved into a family-like bond, and the sudden question left them both a bit dumbfounded.

Yuan Guang was about to decline, but Shi Qian quickly covered his mouth. She had noticed the focus on children and gave a shy smile, looking at Xiaodong. “Yes, I’m planning to have three children.”

Yuan Guang, who had just finished a can of Coke, let out a long, horrified burp, his eyes wide.

Xiaodong, understanding the implication, smiled warmly. “Since you’re planning to have children, let me introduce you to a special loan service we offer at Sunshine City Real Estate—our Sunshine Nursery Loan.”

Shi Qian raised an eyebrow. “What kind of loan is that?”

“Well, many people in Sunshine City can’t afford a down payment for a home. For instance, a 25-square-meter unit costs around 320,000 yuan per square meter or 8 million yuan total. The Sunshine Nursery Loan requires a minimum down payment of 50%, which is 4 million yuan. The balance can be repaid over 20 years, at 16,000 yuan per month, excluding interest—most families can manage this.”

Shi Qian couldn’t help but reply, “How is a loan interest-free?”

Xiaodong chuckled lightly. “The Sunshine Nursery Loan we offer doesn’t require interest.”

Yuan Guang shook his head. “Even if there’s no interest, a 4-million-yuan down payment is still too high. Who can afford that?”

Xiaodong’s smile deepened. “That’s the beauty of Sunshine Loans.” Her tone was almost patronizing. “The Sunshine Nursery Loan allows you to secure loans for your children.”

Yuan Guang was momentarily silent. “What do you mean, ‘securing loans for children’?”

Xiaodong smiled as she pulled out a contract book. “Here’s how it works. Let’s say you can only pay a 1-million-yuan down payment. For the remaining 3 million, your child can sign a labor contract with our real estate company, pledging their future labor. For example, each of your three children would only need to pledge 1 million yuan in future salary.”

Yuan Guang looked down at the employment contract she handed him, stunned.

[... "Party A agrees that when their child turns 16 and is able to work, they will work 12 hours a day at Party B’s company. Party B will pay them 4,500 yuan per month (average salary level), while deducting 80% of the child’s salary to repay Party A’s mortgage debt until the loan is paid off."]

Yuan Guang’s spine chilled as he slowly raised his head, dizzy from the implications. “80% of his salary? He’ll work 12 hours a day with no breaks… How will the child live?”

“That's not your concern,” Xiaodong replied with a cold smile. “Children are meant to support their parents. Didn’t you have them so they could help pay for your house and let you enjoy your life?”

She continued, unfazed, “Besides, if you’re worried about your child’s hard life, don’t forget—they’ll eventually have kids of their own to care for.”

"So that's why Sunnyside's marriage and fertility rates have been so high for three years in a row," Bai Liu mused. "It's because of the [Sunshine Nursery] loan."

Mu Sicheng, horrified, asked, "A mortgage on a child? Won't these kids run away when they grow up and realize they're being mortgaged?"

The grandmother sighed and shook her head. "You can't leave. Once you come to Sunnyside, there's no way out until you've paid off the loan."

"My partner and I haven't left in sixty years," the old man said, looking out over the E block. The tall buildings blocked most of the sunlight, letting in only a sliver of light. His eyes reflected a brief longing. "Sometimes, I want to go outside, but when I finally take a day off work, I don't."

He paused, his voice softening. "I really hope that, in ten years, after we've paid off the loan, we'll have some money left over to see the outside world."

"In all my time here, I've never seen the sun in its entirety."

The old man sighed, but before he could continue, he broke into a violent coughing fit. Blood and pus spilled from his mouth and nose.

The grandmother, quickly retrieving a small handkerchief from her chest, wiped his face, then turned to Bai Liu and nodded apologetically. "I'm sorry. He and I both work on construction sites. The dust has always been bad for our respiratory health. It's an old issue."

"The monthly medical bills are a huge burden," she continued. "When we were young, we should've worn protection. We shouldn't have rushed to work for so little." She patted the old man's back in a slightly reproachful manner, letting out a long sigh. "You see now, don’t you? You need to go to the doctor, right?"

Tang Erda took out a bottle of water, slowly feeding it to the old man. He frowned, asking, "Is this an occupational disease from working so many hours? Is it a serious workplace injury, and your company doesn't cover it?"

The old man and his wife looked at him, confused. "What work injury? What compensation?"

Tang Erda opened his mouth to explain but stopped. Realizing how the systems worked—or rather, didn't work—he closed his mouth and awkwardly muttered, "Nothing."

After sipping the water, the old man pondered Tang Erda's question for a moment. He seemed to understand, and then, with a chuckle, shook his head. "Eh, young man, after decades of working on construction sites, when you reach my age, everyone ends up with a disease like this."

"The company didn't start to do charity work," he added, waving his hand dismissively. "Do you think they'd mind covering our medical bills after all these years? There's no benefit to them in that."

Bai Liu walked alongside the old man. "I've noticed many new citizens coming to Sunnyside. Are you both natives of this place, or did you immigrate?"

"My partner and I are immigrants," the old man replied, looking at Bai Liu. "In recent years, fewer immigrants have come to Sunnyside, and most of the newcomers are from earlier waves—like us."

Bai Liu pressed on, "Why were there so many migrants to Sunnyside in the past?"

The old man paused, as though struggling to remember. "Ah, we had a loan program back then called [Sunshine New Home]." His eyes glazed as he searched for the details. "I can't remember exactly, but if you came to Sunnyside, bought a house, and brought at least twenty others to buy houses too, you'd get nearly three million in subsidies for the house price."

"At that time, everyone was buying houses around 30 square meters, at about 200,000 yuan each. It was basically a 50% discount!" The old man looked proud. "Even though salaries were low, one or two thousand a month, it was still a great deal!"

The grandmother nodded in agreement. "Buying a house back then, even though it was a struggle, was the best decision we ever made."

The old man chuckled softly, shaking his head. "We were reluctant to move at first. We were so desperate that I shouted things like, 'If you're a brother, cut me three million off the price!' across the street."

"Yeah," the grandmother added, laughing. "We were coaxed by a friend to come over because they needed twenty foreigners to buy houses to qualify for the [Sunshine New Home] loan service."

The old man's eyes glinted with nostalgia as he remembered. "Under my friend's strong persuasion, I was a man of principle, so I gritted my teeth and bought the house. Then, I called twenty friends to come buy houses too, so we could all get the [Sunshine New Home] deal."

With a proud wave of his hand, the old man said, "Now, they're all grateful to me. Without my help, they could never have afforded a house at today's prices."

Bai Liu's expression shifted slightly. "I see."

No wonder there are so many new immigrants in this sunny city. It turns out it's all part of this pyramid scheme to bring people in.

Once someone buys a house here and pays off their loan, they end up bringing in twenty more people who also buy a house and pay off their loans. Then, those twenty people bring in four hundred more, and so on. Once someone buys a house in Sunshine City with a loan, they can't leave—each wave traps more people here, creating a never-ending cycle.

"Is the [Sunshine New Home] loan program still available?" Bai Liu asked quietly, noticing that there were still quite a few new migrants.

"Long gone," the old man replied, shaking his head. "Now, Sunshine City's population increases significantly each year just through births. There's no need to bring in foreigners anymore. The immigrants arriving now probably aren't well-informed. They don't know that the [Sunshine New Home] loan was canceled long ago, and they missed out."

The grandmother sighed, "These young people came too late. If they'd arrived earlier, they could have bought a nice 20-square-foot house in Sunnyside just by bringing others in."

"Property prices are so high now," the old man lamented. "No wonder young people are stuck living in cemetery houses. You're basically living with the dead. It's bold of you to buy one and actually live in it."

Bai Liu quickly picked up on the term. "Cemetery house?"

The old man gave them a wry look. "Didn't you know that Road 444, Route 18, in Zone E, is the Sunnyside cemetery?"

Mu Sicheng paused for a moment. "But the property deed says it's the 18th floor. How can it be a cemetery?"

"Right," the old man explained naturally. "Our cemeteries here are also buildings, dug deep underground. The closest floor to the ground is the first floor of the cemetery, and the deeper you go, the higher the floors. Usually, each tomb has 18 floors. The one you have is the top floor—basically, the lowest cemetery level, the worst one."

"The bottom floors have large tombs, typically large enough to hold the bodies of the Quan family, about 3-5 square meters. These are usually bought by the wealthiest citizens. The top floors, on the other hand, are much smaller, around 1-2 square meters, only big enough for one body. They're harder to sell, but yours is a decent size—about 2.5 square meters."

"To the 18th floor of the cemetery?!" Mu Sicheng gasped, a little dizzy from the idea. "What's the difference between that and the 18th level of hell?"

The old man laughed, thinking Mu Sicheng was joking. "This is just how things are in Sunshine City. The cemetery is a high-rise building, just like the other buildings. Otherwise, it would take up too much land, and land here is too expensive."

"But don't live in one of those cemetery houses," the old man added, his tone turning serious as he spoke directly to Bai Liu. "I know some young people buy them because they're cheap, but trust me, don't live in one."

"If you can live in a murder house, why not here?" Bai Liu replied with a raised eyebrow.

The old man leaned in, lowering his voice to whisper in Bai Liu's ear. "There's no elevator in the cemetery building, so if you want to go back to your place on the 18th floor after a long day of work, you'll have to walk up, floor by floor, passing all the tombs."

"And at night..." The old man lowered his voice further, "It's a place for the dead. They come out at night."

"Living in a murder house, you might only encounter one ghost, but living in a cemetery? You'll meet a ghost on every floor. The ghosts on the ground floor... where would you hide from them? You won't even be able to run up to the top in time."

The old man paused to cough, then gave Bai Liu a serious pat on the shoulder. "Living among the dead will slowly turn you into one, too. It's better to work hard, earn money, and try to buy a house on the ground floor in Sunnyside."

How to Own Five Buildings

At 6 p.m., twilight settled in, and with the towering buildings throughout the sunny town, the daylight quickly faded, casting the area into darkness.

In District C, the streetlights lining the new buildings flickered on one by one, casting a warm, even orange glow. The lights on the top floors of some buildings also came on, sparkling like diamonds, much brighter than the streetlights. They shone like stars against the night sky, making Yuan Guang and Shi Qian pause to gaze up at them.

"It's so bright," Shi Qian exclaimed. "These penthouses are so bright, I haven't seen such a bright light even during the day."

"Of course," Yuan Guang said, taking a packet of bread and a bottle of mineral water. He tilted his head, looking at the top floors. "That's where the wealthiest people in District C live. Usually, they buy the entire floor."

"Each floor is over 320 square feet, and that's just the ground floor," Yuan Guang continued. "Typically, each floor is more than 300 square feet, even after the average share is taken out."

Shi Qian blinked, astonished. "More than 320 square feet for a single suite? If we calculate it based on 25 square feet per person, that means this could house at least 52 people!"

"And the top floors are the most expensive," Yuan Guang added, crunching the numbers he'd gathered from sales figures. "For a ground floor, prices go up to 370-400,000. That works out to around 130 million for a whole floor…"

Shi Qian, who had been listening to Xiaodong all afternoon about Sunshine Seedlings, subconsciously began doing the math. "They can pledge 50 to 1 million per child here, so for 130 million, that's about 130 children…"

The maximum number of people that could live in the house is 52, but it takes 130 children to secure a mortgage, and it's clear that these additional children won't grow up to live there. There's no space for them, and their names aren't even on the property deeds.

According to Xiaodong, these children, who are given loans by Sunshine, will eventually be asked by their parents to leave home once they’re old enough to work. They'll have to save up for their own homes while paying off their parents’ loans for decades.

This means they will live under the pressure of two mortgages for the rest of their lives.

The thought hung heavily in the air, and both Yuan Guang and Shi Qian fell silent, feeling a sense of suffocation.

Yuan Guang looked down at his 10 yuan packet of discounted bread, squeezing the greasy bag between his fingers. "Without the [Sunshine loan] program, with the average salary of 4,500, it’d take an eternity to live in a penthouse. Not even counting the interest on the loan, you'd have to stop eating and drinking altogether..."

Shi Qian paused, managing a bitter laugh. "It seems like you’d need to work for 2,000 years just to afford a 300-square-foot house..."

Yuan Guang took a bite of the bread, chewing in silence. The bread tasted stale, and he swallowed it with difficulty, his stomach churning.

"This bread is expired. Don't eat it," Shi Qian said, having long since stopped eating it and simply holding onto it.

Yuan Guang looked down at the bread. "But it's one of the hot sellers at the convenience store. Everyone else is queuing up to buy it."

"Because it’s cheap, I guess," Shi Qian sighed softly. "We were late; the eight-dollar instant noodles sold out. Here, a skewer of Kanto costs sixteen dollars, and people can’t afford anything other than the ten-yuan discounted bread."

Shi Qian straightened up and patted Yuan Guang on the shoulder. "It all tastes the same, so don’t bother eating it. I lost a bit of life after one bite. Go throw it away."

Yuan Guang took a deep breath and stood up. He looked back at the darkness of the buildings, which loomed like a steel forest, only the top floors gleaming with an eerie, beautiful light.

"That salesman said the top floor is the closest to the sun in Sunnyside, so it’s always in high demand. The rich people rush to get them."

Yuan Guang muttered in a daze, "It’s only six o'clock, and it’s already as bright as day. There's no darkness anywhere else—only the top floors are lit. No wonder everyone wants to buy a house here."

Shi Qian walked over to the bins and turned around to follow Yuan Guang's gaze. The complexity of her expression was hard to hide. "Because only the residents on the top floors come home from work at six o'clock and leave the lights on, I suppose."

"The other floors are occupied by ordinary residents who are probably still working overtime."

Yuan Guang was taken aback. Her thoughts quickly snapped back. "Yes, they basically work all day without any holidays..."

Just as they were about to toss the bread into the trash, a man suddenly appeared and stared at the bread in their hands with eager eyes. Both Yuan Guang and Shi Qian jumped in surprise.

The woman whispered, "Can I have the bread you're not eating?"

Yuan Guang glanced at the woman standing in front of them. She was well-dressed, with light makeup, and the faint light from the streetlamp illuminated her features. He couldn't resist calling out, "Xiaodong?!"

Standing by the trash bin was Xiaodong, the smiling real estate salesperson who had introduced them to the properties.

Xiaodong didn't seem embarrassed at all and fixed her gaze on the bread they were about to throw away. "Can I have the bread if you're not going to eat it?"

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian exchanged hesitant glances. After Shi Qian gave a small nod, Yuan Guang handed over the bread, still confused. "Xiaodong, you work in real estate sales. Your salary must be pretty good, so... why would you..."

Yuan Guang's words trailed off as they watched Xiaodong finish the bread in two large bites, not even bothering to drink any water.

... It had decayed to the point where both he and Shi Qian nearly lost their lives eating it. Xiaodong, however, showed no reaction, as if she was accustomed to such food.

After finishing the bread, Xiaodong clapped her hands together and flashed Yuan Guang one of her signature business smiles. "I'm just a salesman, like a receptionist. People come from all walks of life; I was just lucky to be chosen because I'm good-looking and can talk."

Yuan Guang asked, "Would you mind telling us how much you make a month?"

Xiaodong answered without hesitation, "Three thousand five hundred."

Yuan Guang's expression faltered. In this world, one couldn't even buy a property with that amount... it was truly surreal.

Shi Qian asked, "Normally, don't you get a commission when a building is sold?"

"What's a commission?" Xiaodong looked confused.

After Shi Qian explained, Xiaodong suddenly understood. "Oh, you mean that. The agent developer takes a commission of 27% on each building sold. We don't get that profit. We just help out the developer's agent."

Yuan Guang furrowed his brow and asked, "You act as the developer's agent?"

In the real world, he understood the concept of an agent developer. But now that the land was privately owned, what need was there for an agent?

Xiaodong nodded. "Yes, every new development has an agent developer. The agent developer is usually a descendant of one of the top five developers who control most of the land."

"The big developers don't come out themselves," Xiaodong continued. "Instead, they contract the development to their heirs as agents. For example, the agent developer for this new development in Area C is the grandson of one of the top five developers."

She wiped her fingers, explaining further, "The agent developer is responsible for studying the needs, desires, and affordable pricing for residents in Sunshine City. They allocate floor space and design different types of houses to fit those needs."

"Affordable pricing?!" Shi Qian couldn't help but curse. "You call this affordable and livable?"

Yuan Guang's eyes twitched, and he asked, "So, the ownership of the new property is in the hands of the agent developer?"

Xiaodong nodded. "Yes."

Yuan Guang hesitated before asking, "Do you know where he lives? Or rather, Xiaodong, do you know if the agent developer for this new development in Area C will be showing up tonight?"

Xiaodong pointed to the brightest top floor in Area C. "No, that's where he lives."

"He'll definitely show up tonight," Xiaodong said, turning to Yuan Guang. "The new property pricing isn't set yet, and he has to come over to finalize it."

Yuan Guang repeated softly, "Pricing?"

"Yes," Xiaodong confirmed. "He'll determine how much the house costs per square foot. He's probably up on the top floor with other agent developers, but he should come down by 7:30 to set the price for the new property."

7:30.

In the bustling, gilded sales hall, the glow of the crystal chandelier suddenly dimmed, and the sound of a soft violin playing filled the air. A halo of white light hit the door as a middle-aged man, dressed in a baggy tracksuit, sneakers, and slightly rumpled clothes, appeared in the center of the light.

Everyone fell silent, respectfully clearing a path for him as he entered the hall. The man smiled and greeted those on either side with a fist and a bow, moving leisurely within the light until he reached the towering bleachers opposite the main doors. He turned to face everyone and gave another polite bow.

"Good evening, everyone," he said.

Xiaodong leaned in to whisper in Shi Qian's ear, "He's the general agent developer for Area C. We usually call him C Dong."

Shi Qian and Yuan Guang exchanged a look, both feeling strangely puzzled.

This C Dong... he looked like a normal person and was quite polite.

This so-called C Dong stood on a red wooden platform more than a meter above the ground. Behind him hung a large, stepped floating painting with a grid of wooden panels ascending upward, disappearing into the shadows above. These panels protruded from the painting like a ladder, each numbered sequentially from 300,000, 305,000, and so on, all the way up to 580,000.

Each panel represented a price, and the panel labeled [320,000] displayed a blue flag embroidered with the four large golden letters: [Today's Property Price].

C Dong slowly picked up the flag from the [320,000] panel. Shi Qian could hear the collective breath of the crowd, a deep, synchronized intake of air, all eyes turning to the small blue flag.

A child in the crowd whispered, "Mom, you're pinching my shoulder."

Shi Qian glanced over and saw the couple who had inquired about the house earlier that morning. The mother knelt down to hug her child tightly, tears welling in her eyes. She patted his shoulder and whispered, "I'm sorry, it's mommy's fault for bringing you to a place like this."

The child, still holding her hand, smiled cheerfully, "It's okay, Mom. We're here to buy a new home. There's nothing wrong with that."

The mother took a deep breath, burying her face in her child's shoulder with a soft "mmm."

The father, standing nearby, looked at his child with averted eyes. His hand trembled slightly as he guided their other two children, his face full of helplessness.

Shi Qian turned her gaze away, her fist clenched slowly.

Instead of simply dropping the flag, C Dong playfully held it behind his back, flashing a friendly smile as he addressed the crowd. "I believe we all came here for one thing— a home."

He continued, "It's our shared goal to provide a warm home for everyone who comes to Sunny City, and the price of housing is, of course, everyone's greatest concern. That's why I've spent the entire afternoon negotiating with the agent developers from several other districts, without even stopping for a drink of water, just to bring down the price of 320,000 per square foot."

The crowd was visibly riveted, even Xiaodong, who was excitedly hopping on her heels, trying to catch a glimpse of the action.

A few voices broke through the silence, some already blushing with excitement, "C Dong, are you really planning to lower the price of the new property?"

C Dong smiled, spreading his hands in a mock helpless gesture. "Of course. I already live on the top floor of Sunshine City and make over a billion a month. Does it make sense for me to profit from you all again?"

"Could I earn more and buy a house even higher than the sun?" he joked, and the crowd couldn't help but laugh. The atmosphere lightened as some began to cheer, calling out:

"C Dong, you're the greatest!"

"I'll definitely try to work for C Dong's company in the future!"

The couple, too, were caught up in the excitement, whispering excitedly to each other, their heads pressed together.

"If it drops any further, maybe we should just stay and work here. We can earn it back with a few more jobs."

The man nodded approvingly. "This new development is hiring construction workers, and the pay's decent. If the price drops to under 200,000 per square foot, we could work 20-hour shifts and still make it work."

Xiaodong was almost moved to tears, but Yuan Guang and Shi Qian exchanged looks, sensing something was off.

What happened to conscience this time of year?

C Dong raised his hand to calm the crowd, smiling gently. "Personally, I don't think the house prices should go up any further. I hope everyone in Sunny City can work as hard as I have to live in a penthouse here."

He then took the flag from behind his back, lowering it to the panel marked [300,000], and with great flourish, announced, "After my efforts, the price of this new property has been reduced to 260,000 per square foot."

The room fell into stunned silence for two seconds before erupting into wild cheers.

"Oh my God! That’s like two-year-old prices!"

"Am I dreaming? Pinch me!"

The couple, still holding their children tightly, exhaled in relief. The wife immediately broke into tears of joy. They had struggled in their small home, working hard to raise three children while managing a loan they had taken out for their children's birth. Now, with prices skyrocketing, the new development in Area C had seemed like a distant hope until today.

But how could they just let go of a child they had nurtured for years and send it to the fire?

"But..." C Dong's brow furrowed with a touch of sadness as he slowly raised the blue flag again, "Although the price has been reduced, my actions have made the agents from several other districts very upset. They're demanding—"

With a serious expression, C Dong lifted his friendly face and continued, "—that we raise the commission from 27 percent to 40 percent."

"So, while the house price is now 260,000 per square foot," he said, moving the flag to the [370,000] grid, "with the new commission, the final price is now 370,000 per square foot. I’ve done my best. I hope you won’t blame me, right?"

Xiaodong staggered back, her face pale. She suddenly covered her mouth and ran to the trash bin, vomiting after swallowing the bitter taste of expired, moldy bread.

The couple, dazed, dropped to the floor, clutching the [Sunshine Nursery] contract in their hands. There was no light left in their eyes as they muttered under their breath, "No blame, no blame on C Dong..."

At $370,000 per square foot, the moment the price was announced, some people in the sales office stood frozen in shock, while others rushed forward like crazed shoppers.

"I told you the prices were going to rise again!"
"Buy now! If you wait, it'll hit $400,000 per square foot, and then you'll really be priced out!"
"For sale! This way for a large 25-square-foot unit!"
"Same here! Is there still a unit on the 17th floor?"
"Sorry, the 17th floor is already sold out. How about the 27th floor instead?"

Xiaodong, clutching her stomach, managed a pale, sweat-drenched smile as she led other customers through the property. People lined up, clutching loan contracts and crowding together, desperate not to miss their chance. Faces flushed and hearts racing, they shouted in excitement:

"I want a loan for two Sunshine Nurseries!"
"I need a loan for five units!"

Some onlookers murmured to themselves, "I really can't afford this... I don’t want to mortgage my children," before suddenly turning and running out.

Within minutes, the sound of a body hitting the ground echoed from outside the building. The crowd barely reacted, glancing briefly before looking away.

"Another jumper, huh?"
"Yeah, it happens every time property prices rise. Young people can’t handle the pressure."

The patrol officers moved with methodical efficiency, collecting the bodies and transporting them to two men in white coats who were waiting nearby.

"Let’s see if these two had loans," one of the officers said. "If they did, we’ll take them to a private hospital and auction off their organs, bones, and corneas to cover the debt."

The corpse collectors nodded, while the patrol officer looked at the bodies with disdain. One officer even kicked a corpse, sneering, "You think you can skip out on your debt just because you die? Nice try!"

"I wonder how much we can get for these corpses," another officer commented. "If they had large loans, the auction might not even cover it. In the end, the big boss, C Dong, might take a loss."

"What a shameless bunch," the first officer grumbled. "The big boss was kind enough to give them an advance, and now they want to die before paying it back."

Amid the chaos, the crowd buzzed with excitement, but Shi Qian and Yuan Guang, standing in the center, felt the cold chill of horror. The patrol officers' casual conversation, combined with the loud noises of people scrambling to close deals, made them feel as though they were trapped on the 18th floor of hell.

Around them, there were people who treated others—and themselves—like mere objects, caught in a cycle of suffering and exploitation, unaware of the torment they were causing or enduring.

Yuan Guang and Shi Qian slowly turned their heads to look at C Dong, who sat proudly in the stands, beaming with a glass of wine in hand, celebrating the success of his new development. As he casually waved his hand, a dangerous silver gleam flashed.

Area E Cemetery

At 8:20, the sky had completely darkened, casting the cemetery opposite Road 444 in gloom. The straight, oval-shaped tombstones stood in the shadows, their forms barely visible through the old, two-opening, carved iron gate. The names on the headstones were faintly discernible.

Aside from the overgrown weeds, the only movement came from one or two crows, fluttering down to rest on the headstones and cawing hoarsely.

Next to the iron gate stood a dilapidated, half-buried security room with a crooked, swinging door. Inside, there was only a dusty stool, evidence that the place had been abandoned for some time.

Tang Erda's expression was complicated. "That old man said the cemetery on the E side was looted and turned into a part of the E housing development back in the day. Now, there's no one left to maintain it."

"Because everyone in Sunnyside has enough money to buy a house, but who can afford a tomb?" Mu Sicheng sighed, clearly disappointed. "I feel like these tombs are just decoration. Who would buy one, except the rich?"

Bai Liu smiled, "Not necessarily."

Liu Jiayi glanced around before speaking coldly, "These cemeteries aren't meant to be sold to the living. They're sold to the dead."

"Sold to the dead?" Mu Sicheng's face twisted in confusion. "Why would someone buy a house when they're already dead?"

Muke, surprisingly calm, nodded. "Based on what Bai Liu said earlier, and what that old man told us, we can infer that the realtors in Sunnyside built everything for profit—either in money or a currency that could be exchanged for human labor."

"Land is the means of production they control. Through monopolies and manipulation, real estate agents have turned it into something that can be exchanged for labor at an ever-increasing premium."

Mu Sicheng's head spun. "What?"

"Essentially," Muke continued, "human productivity is constantly being devalued through the monetary system. By monopolizing the means of production, they trap everyone in competition, pushing your productivity down while inflating housing prices."

Mu Sicheng looked lost. "I'm not following."

"By monopolizing land, they transform it into a means of extracting productivity at an infinite premium," Muke explained. "And when they build cemeteries, they can use them as tools to extract more productivity. They turn land into something even the dead can work for."

Muke paused and looked at Mu Sicheng. "Did you skip any foundation classes in college? Like Civic Marxism or something?"

Mu Sicheng, catching the mockery in Muke's tone, scowled and turned to Bai Liu, who was watching the cemetery entrance. "Bai Liu, Muke doesn't speak human!"

Mu Sicheng's voice was filled with mock outrage. "Good grades, a great memory—just remember everything from class like a robot!"

Bai Liu, crouched with his back to Mu Sicheng, was observing the dense footprints on the ground. Without looking back, he spoke in a calm tone.

"Don't you think ghosts are better laborers than people?"

"A person works six days a week, nine hours a day—that's about 54 hours. Take out time for eating and going to the bathroom, and it rounds up to about 50 hours of actual work."

"But ghosts don't need to eat or sleep. They only need a few rooms to house a family. They can work 24/7, up to 168 hours a week."

Bai Liu stood up slowly. "That's the equivalent of 3.4 people working 996 for an entire week."

"In terms of productivity, ghosts are far more cost-effective than people. And if you look at the extreme end—"

Bai Liu turned and locked eyes with Mu Sicheng. "Here in Sunnyside, they've been bringing in more people to stimulate population growth, but they don't care about the death rate. They've raised property prices without considering whether people can survive here. They even encourage things like suicide or euthanasia, all under the guise of 'survival of the fittest.' This helps eliminate the poor, turning them into ghosts—into 3.4 units of productivity."

"In other words, maybe the real estate agents don't care about the living at all. They only care about the dead—the ghosts, the cheap, useful labor beneath the surface of Sunnyside."

Mu Sicheng's face twisted in unease. "So, these people are forced to work, even after they die? They can't even rest in peace?"

Bai Liu glanced at him. "No."

Mu Sicheng gestured helplessly, trying to argue but finding no words. "That's... that's just horrible. I mean, if I were a ghost, I'd just stay out of it. Why would I want to keep working for them after I'm dead?"

Bai Liu, dusting off his sleeve, stood up and walked slowly toward Mu Sicheng. "Have you seen 'Sinister and Ghostly'?"

Mu Sicheng blinked, caught off guard by the sudden change of topic. "Yeah, I've seen it."

Bai Liu let out a faint humph. "Then why do you think Nie Xiaoqian, as a ghost, didn't just leave when she had to work hard every week, cheat two men to feed her grandmother, and finally sell herself to the Black Mountain Old Demon?"

"Do you think she enjoyed working for her grandmother?" Bai Liu asked calmly.

Mu Sicheng was at a loss for words.

What a stupid question! Of course, she didn't stay because she liked it. She was trapped!

Mu Sicheng frowned and pressed on, "Do you think the reason they were trapped is related to the cemetery?"

Bai Liu nodded. "I agree with Liu Jiayi. These tombs were probably not built for the living but for the dead."

"Buy?" Mu Sicheng was even more confused. "Do the developers pay ghosts?"

Bai Liu gave him a sidelong glance. "Would you work if you weren't paid?"

Mu Sicheng groaned. "I guess not."

"I'm starting to feel strange," Mu Sicheng muttered, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "If I were a ghost, stuck in Sunnyside with no way out... I wouldn't work for anyone, even if they offered me a salary."

He gave the cemetery a disgusted glance. "I don't need food, I don't need sleep... why would I need a house or money? Even if the real estate agents trapped me here, after I've worked my whole life to become a ghost, there's no way I'd work for them in the afterlife!"

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng with an approving smile. "Nie Xiaoqian probably thought the same way. Very brave of her."

Mu Sicheng grimaced. "What? You're comparing me to her now?"

Mu Sicheng, now fully frustrated, clenched his fist and raised it in the air. "I'm already dead! What do they think they're going to do to me? I'm not going out there to seduce men for them!"

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes as he studied the cemetery gates. "What circumstances would make someone willing to work like crazy even after death, just to buy a plot in a cemetery that's only two square meters wide?"

Liu Jiayi spoke up. "Could it be that, like the living, the dead still have to pay land use fees? Is that why they hide in flats or cemeteries?"

"But if they don't pay, what can they do?" Mu Sicheng crossed his arms, shaking his legs in a smug gesture. "I'm dead. They can't do anything to me."

Bai Liu slowly turned his head and smiled. "That's not true. The living don't pay for land use, they just get killed. The dead, however... they can't die again. They can be tortured in much worse ways."

Mu Sicheng's expression faltered. "So, they can't die again, no matter how much they're tortured?"

Muke, without moving, added helpfully, "Nie Xiaoqian didn't want to work for Lou Lou, either. But Lou Lou was a tree demon who tortured ghosts by sticking her roots into their bodies, making them work for her. Lou Lou would make them seduce men and rip their hearts out."

Muke smiled gently at Mu Sicheng. "There's always a way to make a ghost work. Don't you agree, God Mu?"

Mu Sicheng sighed in frustration, shaking his head. "Thanks for the perspective. Now it feels like I'm the one being seduced into working."

How to Own Five Buildings

Bai Liu pushed open the door of the dilapidated security room and stepped into the cemetery.

The scene before him was typical: rows of marble headstones, each standing in front of a plinth about 1 by 2 meters wide. The inscriptions on the plinths listed the person's date of birth, date of death, and cause of death.

Muke scanned the plinths from side to side, his gaze sharp as if he were collecting data for analysis. He then looked up at Bai Liu and said, "More than 80 percent of the people here died before the age of 60, with an average life expectancy of around 52 years. Most died from various organ diseases or work-related injuries caused by sensory conditions."

"It's not just that," Liu Jiayi said, stopping at a gravestone. "The later the birth date, the earlier the death date."

She spoke calmly, "The average life expectancy is shrinking, and there are more sudden deaths now."

Muke followed Liu Jiayi's gaze to a gravestone marking the death of a woman, just 32, who had died suddenly in front of her computer. "Judging by the headstone data, the average age of death in Sunnyside has dropped to around 30 for women and 35 for men."

Liu Jiayi added, "And both happen to be just past the prime age for childbearing."

Muke glanced at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu walked forward, his gaze distant. "Sudden death after you're no longer able to have children... the real estate developers here in Sunnyside are clearly controlling the average life expectancy, pushing it to a point where people work long enough to remain productive but decline after they have children."

He shook his head slightly. "They're extracting the maximum value from everyone."

Mu Sicheng surveyed the area, his gaze darting from the grass to the headstones. With a frown, he said, "There are only normal headstones here. I don't see any entrance to the 18-story underground cemetery building, nor any floor numbers."

Tang Erda looked at the paper in his hand. "The number is unit 0812."

Bai Liu halted, his gaze landing on a headstone. "Twelfth in the eighth row. This must be it."

Tang Erda's eyes widened when he saw where Bai Liu had stopped. There was only a headstone with no other buildings around. If Bai Liu was correct, this could only mean one thing.

"Lift the pedestal," Bai Liu instructed calmly. "The entrance is inside the tomb."

Mu Sicheng was taken aback. "Inside the tomb? So our floor is already the ground floor of the cemetery building?"

"But if the first level is the entrance and we have to lift it to get in..." Mu Sicheng glanced at the headstone of a young man who had died at 26. "Then where are the graves of these people?"

Tang Erda frowned, his suspicion growing. "These people died too young to have afforded the first tomb in a wealthy area."

Bai Liu stared impassively at the young man's posthumous photograph. "This isn’t the first level."

He continued, "According to the normal structure, the tomb here would be considered the basement or garage, the cheapest part of the entire building."

He glanced around. "So, the people buried here were likely low-class citizens of Sunnyside, unable to afford a spot in the 18-story cemetery building."

When Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng finally lifted the heavy plinth, they were stunned. The sight beneath was not what they expected. Instead of the ground beneath, there was a narrow, dark staircase leading down, so tight that only one person could pass through. But the real shock came when they saw what was inside the transparent coffin.

A young boy, perhaps in his teens, was curled up inside the coffin, his body squashed into a space too small for him. He clutched his shoulders tightly, his breath coming in short gasps. The mist of his breath condensed against the glass, creating a thin ring of fog. His expression was tense and pained, as though he might suffocate at any moment.

Without hesitation, Tang Erda lifted the coffin lid and pulled the boy out, slapping his face. "Wake up!"

The boy coughed twice, disoriented, then blinked at the strangers in front of him. "Are you the new residents of the 0812 Cemetery building?" He rubbed his eyes. "Sorry, I must have fallen asleep. But I'll get up now and let you in."

Mu Sicheng stood frozen for a moment, staring at the boy in disbelief. "You were just... sleeping here?"

The boy seemed completely unfazed and nodded. "Yeah, this is my house. I sleep here at night."

Muke stared at the transparent coffin, not even 1.5 square meters in size, which the boy casually referred to as his "home." He couldn't help but feel unsettled.

"If you're the occupant of the ground floor of this cemetery building," Liu Jiayi said, her tone sharp, "then who is the person on the tombstone outside, marked as dead at 26?"

The boy scratched his head. "That's me, but I'm not dead yet."

Mu Sicheng glanced at the posthumous photograph on the tombstone. After a moment, he nodded slowly. "Yes, the photo is blurry, but it's definitely him."

Bai Liu looked at the boy with a calm expression. "You look like you're in your teens. Why did you put a 26-year-old's tombstone on yourself?"

"I'm 17," the boy explained matter-of-factly. "When I bought a cemetery house here at 16, the agent developer offered me a tombstone. I didn't want kids and didn't have any other big goals, so I figured I'd live to 26. I told the agent to just put the date of death on the tombstone until I was 26."

He smiled innocently at Bai Liu and the others. "That's how the tombstone came to be."

Tang Erda was taken aback. "You're 17. Where are your parents?"

"They're all dead," the boy answered casually. "They worked on a construction site and died young. Not long after they passed, the house we had on loan was repossessed after twenty years."

He shrugged. "Even though we lost the house, I still had to pay off the loan for over ten years. So I couldn't save any money. That's why I had to buy a cemetery house."

Muke noticed the boy's bloodstained hands, typical of someone who worked on construction sites. He paused and asked, "Where are you working now?"

"The new building in C district," the boy replied. "It just opened, and I got lucky. The salary is good, and I've been earning a lot recently."

The boy seemed in a better mood as he crawled back into the coffin, huddling into a corner. He tilted his head, smiling kindly as he waved at Bai Liu and the others. "You have to work tomorrow, so get inside and rest. It's not safe in this building late at night."

His tone was completely ordinary, as if he were greeting new neighbors in a regular apartment building.

"I'm going to rest too," the boy yawned, settling back into the coffin. He pressed a button beside him, and the pedestal closed like an automatic lift door.

The stench of decay grew stronger as the group marched in silence through the darkened hallways of the building.

"The boy... he's only seventeen, not yet an adult," Tang Erda spoke up abruptly, his voice muffled. "What kind of place lets a seventeen-year-old face this reality—sleeping in his own grave, marked as twenty-six?"

Bai Liu's voice was calm. "I don't think 'adulthood' exists here. They measure it by whether someone can work. It seems the base age for that is sixteen."

Tang Erda fell silent once more.

The five of them continued downwards, their footsteps echoing as they reached the ground floor. A faint, eerie blue light flickered to life, casting a cold glow on the narrow, cramped cemetery building. There were five households on this floor, each door designed not for easy access but as a narrow, push-in door, with rusty iron chains hanging from the bolts.

Each door was flanked by three sliding panels, all lined up in a cramped formation. The dark blue light, thick with the stench of decay, added to the oppressive feeling. The tight, dense layout gave the place an unsettling look.

Muke spoke quietly, "- It feels more like an incinerator than a cemetery building."

As they stopped to observe their surroundings, the lights went out again.

In the sudden darkness, there were a few clicks—the muffled sound of a sliding door being pushed from the inside. Metal chains rattled, scraping clothes and tearing flesh. The air grew heavier with the smell of rot.

Without a word, Bai Liu drew a long whip from behind him and snapped it against the floor with a sharp crack.

The sound-activated lights flickered back on.

In the dim, flickering blue light, the sliding doors of all the compartments slowly creaked open. Behind each door sat a man, hunched forward, dressed in tattered, greasy clothes. His hair was filthy, his head drooped, and his arms lay motionless on the tops of his legs. Flies buzzed around them, and a sickly yellow liquid dripped from the edge of the compartment, pooling on the floor and releasing a sour stench.

The metal chains hanging from the bolts swayed back and forth, casting uneasy shadows.

Each of them drew their weapons, instinctively forming a circle with their backs to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu surveyed the group, his expression calm. "This time, we won't waste time searching for monster weaknesses. We go straight for their cemetery property cards. If you find one, head to the next floor. If you encounter any living people, bring them with you. Do not harm the low-class citizens or NPCs here unless absolutely necessary. They don’t have homes and are likely to follow the type of monsters that wander here. Understand?"

The group responded in unison, "Yes!"

The lights flickered again and went dark. In the oppressive silence, an eerie breathing sound filled the air, as though a group of people were forcing themselves to gasp with hollow, decaying lungs. A whip cracked against the floor, and the lights came on again.

A corpse, its eyes teeming with maggots and its jaw rotting, lunged grotesquely toward Bai Liu's face!

How to Own Five Buildings

Three hours later, at 12:00, Cemetery E.

The eerie silence of the cemetery was pierced by the unsettling sounds of breathing, flesh and bone being torn, and the sounds of death itself. Following the sounds, the group moved past Unit 0812, where a seventeen-year-old boy lay peacefully under his 26-year-old gravestone. They passed through the disarrayed floors 1 to 14, where bodies were strewn across the ground and blood stained the walls. Finally, they reached Bai Liu, who stood at the intermission point: Floor 15.

Tang Erda, his arm's sleeve torn and half of his upper body splattered with blood, stood against the half-open sliding door of a room—more like an incinerator. His head hung slightly, as he stood at the farthest point from Bai Liu. A hot revolver rested in one hand, and between his fingers, a cigarette glowed brightly against the dim, eerie blue light. He took a drag, his expression dark.

The scarlet glow of the cigarette butt was the only source of light in the room.

Liu Jiayi, draped in Muke's coat, leaned against the door, dozing with her head resting against Muke. Muke himself, although slightly squinting, sat with his back straight, alert. Mu Sicheng, on the other hand, was more relaxed, pulling open an incinerator-style sliding door and lying on his back.

Bai Liu, holding his bloodied whip, kept his gaze down as he calmly observed the situation.

Stamina restorers and mental boosters were prohibited in the game, making rest a vital necessity for everyone to maintain their energy. They had cleared through the cemetery building up to the 14th floor, and when they reached the 15th, Bai Liu deemed it relatively safe enough to rest. With few monsters remaining and some distance to the ground, he had decided to alternate shifts for sleep.

In cases of extreme exhaustion, Bai Liu typically placed himself and Tang Erda—his most capable fighter—on night watch for the first half of the night, letting the other three newer players rest before taking their turn on watch. After extensive training, Mu Sicheng, Muke, and Liu Jiayi had all developed the habit of sleeping and recuperating as soon as Bai Liu and Tang Erda took over the night watch, regardless of how dire the situation.

However, the leader of today's vigil appeared somewhat distracted.

"Captain Tang, what's on your mind?" Bai Liu's voice was soft but insistent.

Tang Erda paused, tapping on the system panel to mute the viewing pool, before slowly turning to look at Bai Liu. "I was wondering what form this copy might take in reality."

Bai Liu, ever the calm strategist, clicked on his own system panel, muting it, and looked up at Tang Erda with a smile. "Is Captain Tang suspecting the login method might be related to me?"

"I'm not sure," Tang Erda muttered, turning his back to Bai Liu as he exhaled a cloud of smoke. "But based on what Su Yang and I have gathered, the copies you've walked through are either ones that have already manifested in reality or ones that will, in the future."

"I'm not sure if it's just a coincidence... or some kind of inevitable... arrangement." Tang Erda's voice trailed off.

He took a sharp drag from his cigarette, his gaze growing more intense. "If Sunshine City truly materializes in reality... it's going to be..." His words faltered as his mind raced.

"It doesn't matter whether it materializes or not," Bai Liu interrupted smoothly, his voice as steady as ever. "What matters is finding the source of the problem in this copy and fixing it before it happens in reality." He met Tang Erda's gaze. "But that's not the only thing troubling you, is it? You've been distracted ever since we entered the copy. Would you like to talk about it?"

Tang Erda's expression shifted, growing serious. "I'm wondering if the Sunshine property where our opponent is located could be tied to this Sunshine City…" He paused, his face darkening. "The Heresy Processing Bureau investigated that area before, but at the time, neither the machines nor we detected any heretics."

"But now…" His voice tightened. "Now, we know that the people living in Russell Cemetery are mostly game players. Before entering the game, I had Su Yang retest the heresy values at Sunshine House—just to be cautious."

Tang Erda's gaze sharpened, his tone becoming grave. "The heretical values have become... unusual."

He clenched his jaw. "Su Yang was already investigating, but it was strange—there was no heresy detected before I entered the game."

His brow furrowed deeply. "Heretics usually influence people in very noticeable ways—like the smell of rose perfume or the bloated form of the blood lingzhi from the Love Welfare Institute. But the heresy at Sunshine House went undetected at first... and now that it's been detected, it's impossible to rank."

"That's not the worst part," Tang Erda continued, his voice low with foreboding. He looked Bai Liu straight in the eye and inhaled deeply. "Last night, Su Yang and the others evacuated the residents to investigate the Sunnyside development. They filed a report to their superiors to request temporary housing for the residents, claiming the building was a heresy that needed shelter, hoping to get the Heresy Bureau's help and funds to resolve the issue."

He exhaled slowly, his eyes narrowed. "But all the residents who were moved—those who signed consent forms to contract the rotting house to the Heresy Bureau—all suffered organ failure within two to three hours."

Tang Erda's eerie blue eyes seemed to flicker like unnatural flames in the cemetery's darkness. "The residents of the Sunshine property... like the people of Sunshine City... are trapped, alive and dead, within this place. They can't escape."

Reality, Sunshine House, 9 AM.

Yellow plastic tape marked with [Cordon] surrounded the abandoned building in layers, while a number of onlookers gathered around the always cold and decaying structure.

"Keep out!"

"There are dangerous items being handled inside! Please maintain your distance!"

Su Yang, looking exhausted, walked briskly through the dust as the man beside him spoke in rapid succession.

"The other side said they could grant funds to deal with the deteriorating building, but they might not be able to swallow the entire cost. The building transaction price is too high—tens of billions. Even though it's become a deteriorating structure, the Authority can't absorb that amount of money."

The man grimaced. "Captain Su, it's just a heresy—nearly 10 billion... that's too much."

Su Yang, who had been awake all night, rubbed his temples and exhaled a deep breath. "Doesn't the Heresy Processing Bureau want to fix the fourth and fifth bureaus? We could use that money to absorb the cost of this rotten building and transform it into the fourth and fifth bureaus, sheltering the heretics here and setting up a new bureau in one go. Killing two birds with one stone."

The man hesitated. "But the money to fix the new bureau..."

"Last year, when we captured those heretics in the third detachment, your finance department leased and lent their assets, making a lot of profit, right?" Su Yang's usual calm gaze sharpened, and his eyes—gentle by nature—took on an intense questioning tone.

"When Captain Tang was there, the third detachment was the most profitable among all the bureaus in terms of capturing heretics. Yet no one raised an objection."

The man, feeling the pressure from Su Yang's gaze, scratched his face awkwardly, offering a forced smile. "Captain Su, this... this is a huge amount of money. You're reporting this, so we'll seriously consider it."

Su Yang cut him off with a cold expression. "If not here, then where? The job of the Heresy Bureau is to shelter heretics. Since there are heretics gathered here in such a densely populated area, endangering surrounding citizens, the priority should be to solve the problem here, to repair the Fourth Bureau in this area."

"When the Third Bureau was rebuilt in such a prime location, I didn't hear you complaining about the costs. The reconstruction was funded by Georgia, the Captain of the Third Bureau, and yet no one objected."

Su Yang's voice grew icier. "The location is just an excuse."

The man considered this for a moment. "True, location is secondary. And fixing it here isn't completely out of the question..." He paused. "But that's assuming you can house the heretics in this deteriorating building. Without clarity on how to house them, we couldn't have approved such a large sum of money."

Su Yang took a deep breath, swallowing the words "didn't we earn this money," knowing they would lead to an argument. He calmed himself and pressed on. "This heresy has already caused many suicides, and people are still dying. If you don't approve this money, can you take responsibility for the consequences?"

At that moment, a team member rushed over, breathless. "Captain Su! Captain Su!"

Su Yang rubbed his nose and raised his hand. "What is it? Speak."

The team member's face was grim. "Captain Su, the influence of this heresy seems to be spreading."

Su Yang's eyes narrowed. "What do you mean?"

"At first, only the residents moving out of Sunshine property were affected. But just now, someone from a nearby neighborhood posed as a resident of Sunshine property and tried to get compensation money for a house demolition." The team member gave a bitter laugh. "Because it was chaotic, the processing staff didn't catch it and gave him the compensation."

"But then something strange happened. The man suddenly... dried up. It was as though the flesh and fat inside his body had been sucked out, leaving only his skin hanging from his bones."

"Is he still alive?" Su Yang asked quickly.

The team member took a deep breath. "He's alive, but he's been taken to the hospital."

Su Yang's expression shifted as realization hit him. His gaze snapped to the team member. "Where does he live?"

"In an old neighborhood about 300 meters from Sunshine property." Just as the team member finished speaking, his communicator rang. He picked it up, said a few quick words, and then turned to Su Yang, his face pale. "There's another plot, 500 meters from here. The people who came to claim the compensation for moving out—" He swallowed, looking at Su Yang with a grim expression. "They've dried up too."

"Captain Su, the reach of this heresy is continuing to expand! Anyone who moves out of here is being drained!"

Su Yang exhaled a sharp breath and gave a quick order. "Move all their houses back immediately and see if we can reverse this. Hurry!"

He turned back, his gaze cold, and looked directly at the Treasury officer, who was still stunned. "Fifteen minutes. I want to see the money approved."

How to Own Five Buildings

In-game.

Bai Liu tapped Tang Erda on the shoulder. "Hurry up and finish this game so you can get back to reality and handle these problems."

"Yeah." Tang Erda took a deep breath, then stood and gripped the handle of his gun. "Don't worry, I won't let it affect my game performance."

Bai Liu averted his gaze and looked at the three men still sleeping. "It's about time. Wake them up for their shift. We need to rest."

Tang Erda nodded, then looked back at Bai Liu. "Actually, I thought, given your personality, you would've chosen a more direct and faster approach to finish this copy."

Bai Liu gave a small laugh. "Captain Tang thought I'd choose to butcher the building, didn't you?"

"Yes, not exactly." Tang Erda hesitated for a moment. "I'm not sure if I'm misunderstanding, but it's true the time cost of seizing the old property owners is high in this copy. But the new property is owned by the acting developer, so why not just kill the developer to take ownership on the day it's sold?"

"For example, this new property in Area C could be yours if you wanted it."

The smile on Bai Liu's face remained unchanged. "Because that's not the right way to play."

Tang Erda blinked. "Not the right game path?"

Bai Liu lifted his gaze and smiled lightly. "It's a horror game, Captain Tang. If you can win simply by killing people, then that's not scary at all."

"If a path looks like it'll complete the main quest without any horror, then it's likely not the correct one."

Bai Liu grinned. "It's more like a horror game design principle."

Tang Erda paused, thinking it over, then wrinkled his nose. "But the path does seem to work."

"Then there’s only one possibility." Bai Liu smiled. "The horrific elements of that path just haven’t been revealed yet."

Zone C, 3 AM

Shi Qian and Yuan Guang followed C Dong, blending into the crowd. Shi Qian used a small fog skill to stay hidden behind him.

They weren't planning to engage in large-scale snipe attacks just yet. The NPCs would turn into ghosts upon death, and there was a risk of attracting unwanted attention. It was best to minimize damage, strike with precision, and only eliminate the target NPC. Even if C Dong turned into a ghost upon death, it would be just one ghost.

Dealing with one monster was manageable, but a group of monsters? For a two-man team like theirs, that would be a problem.

Abandoning three teammates reduced the risk of death for the group, but the danger to them increased, and they needed to be extra cautious.

After leaving the new building, C Dong attended four or five celebrations in a row, each with no fewer than 100 people. Yuan Guang followed him, dizzy from the long chase. Almost three hours later, they saw C Dong get on a bus back to the C area after attending his last event.

Shi Qian, still trailing behind, was in high spirits. "Looks like he's going home," she said.

A small smile appeared on Yuan Guang's face as he exhaled a long breath, staring at the mansion in front of Area C. "This fool's been partying all night and finally brought us here."

As they waited in the parking lot, C Dong suddenly greeted his bodyguards and walked toward the restroom, leaving only one bodyguard behind.

Shi Qian and Yuan Guang exchanged a look—both understood the unspoken words: this is the perfect moment to strike. They quickly split into two positions. Shi Qian used her fog skill to silently approach and take down the bodyguard.

Yuan Guang circled around quickly, moving against the wall. He pulled the hood of his sweatshirt low to cover his face and readied his utility knife.

When Shi Qian took down the bodyguard without a sound, Yuan Guang stepped out from the corner, lowered his head, and accidentally bumped into C Dong, who was about to enter the restroom.

C Dong, drunk from all the celebrations, slurred his words, barely able to form a sentence. "You, you... why do you have three heads? Are you a family here to buy a house from me...?"

Yuan Guang didn't answer. He lowered his head, drew his utility knife, and wrapped it around C Dong's neck, slashing upward diagonally in one smooth motion.

The sharp blade of Yuan Guang's knife cut through with such force that blood splattered onto the bathroom mirror. C Dong couldn't even react, clutching his neck before collapsing.

[System Alert: Player Yuan Guang used skill weapon (artisan knife) on NPC C Dong.]

[NPC C Dong was killed.]

Shi Qian, using her Mist skill, darted through the cloud of fog and crouched down to collect the corpse. As she searched his pockets, she mumbled, "ID card, keychain, cigarettes, condoms... damn!"

Her eyes lit up as she looked up at Yuan Guang, who waved a stack of certificates in his hand. "The title deeds for the new building!"

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Shi Qian for taking the lead in obtaining the ownership of an entire building in the new District C development!]

[Main Quest (Owning Five Buildings) Completion Progress: (1/5)]

Yuan Guang, kneeling beside her, finally let out a breath. "Let's pull back and find the next proxy developer."

But before their smiles could fully form, a series of system prompts interrupted.

[System Alert: The new property owned by the two of you is currently under development and requires continuous funding to maintain ownership. Based on the current market price, you need to provide 60 billion within one hour, or the construction will halt, and the property will turn into a building-]

[- Rotten building.]

Shi Qian and Yuan Guang's smiles froze.

[Countdown begins: 59:59]

Shi Qian quickly collected herself and approached a nearby cash machine to check the balance on C Dong's ID card. Her expression darkened. "The balance is less than three hundred million."

Yuan Guang took a deep breath. "They must have other sources of cash. They don't keep it all in their ID cards."

"The ID card of this NPC living on the top floor only has three hundred million in it," Shi Qian said, her nerves fraying as she repeated the word rotten. She took two deep breaths and spoke rapidly. "To gather sixty billion within an hour, we'd need to rob at least two hundred NPCs living on the top floor."

Yuan Guang's realization came quickly. Holding his bloodstained knife, he spoke hoarsely. "It won't come together."

"We couldn't raise ten billion in three years in that better part of reality," he continued, "how can we raise sixty billion in an hour in Sunnyside?"

Shi Qian closed her eyes, gripping the title deed. "The house is already in our hands. We can't run away. We have to get it together, even if it's impossible. We can't give up."

The two of them stood in silence.

Yuan Guang exhaled a frustrated breath and raised his head, his eyes a little red. "I got emotional. You're right. Let's go and figure something out."

Shi Qian nodded, and the two of them left the parking lot.

Behind them, C Dong's lifeless body twitched, his fingers moving as a purple sucker sprouted from his fingertips.

The body swelled and expanded, his hands stretching into enormous, three-meter-long tentacles tipped with octopus-like suction cups, and a ring of teeth gleamed from inside. His flesh seemed strained, swollen like a Michelin tire made of human skin, its surface shining and ready to burst like a giant blister.

[System Alert: Dead NPC corpse alienation complete. Changed into monster (Hungry Developer).]

[System Alert: The monster will roam the floor it developed, attacking anyone who enters, consuming their skin and flesh, and drinking their bone marrow.]

C Dong's eyes and nose, buried under layers of fat, became thin slits, while his mouth expanded grotesquely, filled with jagged teeth. His throat emitted a strange, muffled sound.

"My delicious houseguests..." it croaked.

Its long tongue flicked out to lick the skin around its mouth, its eyes glowing red. "Where is it?"

The new building in Area C.

Despite it being nearly midnight, the building remained lit, with tenants anxiously waiting outside the sales office for the results of their transactions.

The buyers and sellers of Sunshine City, many of whom had taken out loans to purchase properties, were in a state of limbo, having waited for hours with no qualification for property licenses.

Looking up at the massive, dark silhouette of the building, adorned with LED lights that read Sunshine House, Happy Place to Return, the anxious crowd began to shift their focus. Hope and yearning flickered in their eyes as they thought of their future homes.

One person glanced at their watch and muttered, "It's almost 4 AM. Are the formalities always this slow?"

As if on cue, a massive red countdown appeared on the building.

[00:10]

[00:09]

Confusion spread among the crowd.

"What's that?"

"A light show for a new property?"

When the countdown hit [00:01], the screen flashed a giant [ROTTEN] sign.

Inside the sales office, Xiaodong pushed open the door, her face pale. She forced a smile and bowed apologetically. "Sorry, something has happened to our property, and we need to shut down temporarily. Please come back tomorrow to pick up your certificates."

How to own Five buildings

There was a brief commotion outside the sales office of the new building in Area C. Like a swarm of disturbed bees, the crowd quickly gathered around the half-open door.

Xiaodong was so shocked by the crowd that she stepped back into the office, hastily hung chains on the door to stop anyone from rushing in, and shouted in panic, "Please maintain order, everyone! Tomorrow, our department will provide a solution!"

In truth, she had no idea what the solution was. She had been pushed out to handle the situation by the sales foreman above her, whose face had twisted with frustration. Even now, Xiaodong had no idea what had happened.

Like the others, she had stayed up all night, exhausted, waiting for the deeds to be processed. Then, suddenly, she found the finance department in a panic, shouting that the money had vanished. At that moment, a blood-red countdown had appeared on the building outside.

Looking out from the sales office at the towering new building in the darkness, Xiaodong had a vague sense that the people before her might not get their hands on the house they'd paid for.

Some of the crowd had lost their shoes, but no one cared. They jumped barefoot, shouting angrily.

"Why do we have to wait until tomorrow for a solution?!"

"What's going on with the building?!"

Their voices, full of intense and desperate questioning, echoed in the dark, accompanied by paper balls and stones being angrily thrown at Xiaodong.

"What's with the door? Say something! Tell us what's going on!"

"You're just hiding when things go wrong! Open the door and let us in!"

Xiaodong clutched her sales office uniform as she jammed the door, preventing anyone from entering. She bowed repeatedly, apologizing, her eyes reddening with unshed tears. Her voice trembled with each sob.

"On behalf of the entire property team, I sincerely apologize to all of you."

The sales director had instructed her not to open the door and let anyone in, but also to apologize on behalf of the company in an effort to calm the growing anger. If the crowd wasn't pacified, something serious would happen, and Xiaodong could be fired, her salary docked for the month.

Desperate to keep her job, she chose to endure their wrath, bowing at a ninety-degree angle over and over again, her head lowered, fighting back the pain and tears.

"A simple apology won't help! Do you know how much I've paid for this house?" someone cried out, voice choked with emotion. "I worked myself to the bone, afraid to eat, afraid to use anything, just to save enough to buy a place to sleep in this city where I wouldn't be evicted!"

"Get out of here! Let C Dong out! He's the acting developer!" someone else shouted.

Then, a tremble ran through the crowd as someone whispered a terrifying question: "C Dong wouldn't run off with our money and let the building fall into ruin, would he?"

This statement dropped like a stone into the boiling pot of anger, sparking a heated discussion among the crowd.

"No way! C Dong is rich; he wouldn't scam us!"

"There have been rotten buildings in E and B, and the developers there were also rich..."

"I thought this was just an issue with the floors?"

"But then they pushed those rotten buildings to be rebuilt, claiming the money went to construction materials, and didn't compensate the buyers of those houses..."

"Some of the troubled house buyers... disappeared. The patrols... handled them. Their bodies were sent to the hospital in pieces, all just to salvage these crumbling buildings..."

The crowd, now in a frenzy, turned their desperate eyes to Xiaodong, who stood behind the chains at the sales office door. "You just told us to come back tomorrow for the certificate. This won't turn into a rotten building, right?"

Xiaodong slowly stood up, crossed her arms, and bit her lower lip, taking a long moment to compose herself. Finally, she managed a strained smile. "No, everyone," she said softly.

"It's just that there were so many sales this time, and they needed to be processed in bulk. That's why things were delayed."

"If Ming doesn't come down tomorrow..." Xiaodong paused, giving a deep bow, her voice trembling as she forced herself to lie with a sweet smile. "It should be sorted out this week or next week at the latest."

"Please, go home and be patient."

She stood up and faced the crowd, her smile in place, though tears slid silently down her cheeks. "You'll all get your homes, I promise!"

The crowd stood in silence for what felt like an eternity. Then, one man, forcing a grim smile, turned and muttered to himself as he walked toward the new building.

"I told you, it's better to buy a house in C — low risk, reliable."

"Just wait? Tomorrow is tomorrow, a week is a week, two weeks is two weeks. I can wait... it's not like I can't."

"I'll just take a look at my future home and come back and wait calmly."

The man, lost in thought, stumbled toward the new building under construction. Slowly, a quiet group of other buyers, equally lost in their thoughts, followed behind him.

They climbed the unfinished building, step by dangerous step, through parts where concrete steps were missing, and only steel frames remained. They dragged their families, wives, and children up to floors where construction hadn't yet finished, searching through piles of unmarked concrete foundations.

"I'm 1305... I think this is it?"

"I looked at the floor plan; I think yours is 1304."

They stood in cramped concrete spaces, just a few dozen square feet, surrounded by exposed beams and steel. Tentatively, they touched the rough walls, eyes lighting up with the faintest hope.

"It’s not like a rotten building can’t be lived in if they don’t repossess it, right?"

One person stood by the edge of a half-built home, gazing out at the darkened expanse of Area C. The only light was from the sales office and the upper floors of surrounding buildings. Far in the distance, a faint outline of the moon could be seen against the backdrop of the brightly lit city center.

The moonlight reflected in his eyes, a faint white shimmer that flickered like tears.

"It's beautiful," the man murmured, looking up at the night sky. Leaning against the empty wall, he added, "I've lived in the cemetery room for so long. Did you know the moon is visible at night from the ground?"

"I had forgotten what the moon looked like," came the soft reply.

"It’s nice, isn’t it?" the man said wistfully. "To live in a place so high up, where you can see the sun during the day and the moon at night."

The light in his eyes quickly faded, and his voice grew as light and fleeting as smoke, carried away by the night breeze. "It's a shame I can’t afford a house this high up."

"This beautiful moon... A lowly person like me, I probably only deserve to see it once in my life."

He stepped forward, his toes brushing the edge of the roof. Slowly, unsteadily, he stretched his arms out into the icy night air, then closed his eyes and leaned forward, about to fall into the darkness below.

Area E, Cemetery Building.

On the 18th floor, Mu Sicheng wiped the sweat from his forehead, let out a long breath, and turned to Bai Liu with a smug expression. He waved the cemetery property deed in his hand. "Efficient, right?"

"Pretty good," Bai Liu smiled as he accepted the deed. Just then, a beep from the system echoed in the room.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for soon acquiring ownership of Cemetery Building 0812 in Area E.]

[We are still short of the entrance and ownership of the cemetery room on the floor where the headstone is located.]

Bai Liu glanced around at the others. "Let's go, we're just missing the cemetery room at the entrance."

Tang Erda couldn't help but ask, "Are you going to rob that 17-year-old of his cemetery room?"

"No, we'll trade," Bai Liu replied with a smile, giving Tang Erda a quick look. "Captain Tang, don't you have a murder house property deed that's far superior to this cemetery room? Let the boy keep it after we sort things out tonight."

"We'll swap the deed to the murder house with him for the cemetery room."

Bai Liu's smile widened. "Captain Tang, go ahead and make the exchange."

Tang Erda paused for a moment. "Thank you."

Bai Liu nodded. "You're welcome."

As the group made their way out, Tang Erda hesitated. He walked back to Bai Liu, who was at the rear of the group, and leaned in, lowering his voice. "Bai Liu, you mentioned earlier that there was a horror element in Russell Cemetery that hasn't been uncovered yet."

"Yes," Bai Liu continued, not slowing his pace. "The bodies of dead developers—based on the city's setting—those higher-ranked citizens who die and mutate into monsters with stronger attack powers. The monsters the developers turn into shouldn't be easy to handle."

Bai Liu paused for a beat before adding, "If I were the designer of this game, I'd design it that way to increase the horror and difficulty of the path."

Tang Erda furrowed his brow. "How would you design it?"

Bai Liu's tone remained steady. "If the Sunshine Property is a projection of this copy landing in reality, then based on what's happened in the Sunshine Property, the money the developers made probably didn't stay in their hands. It was most likely transferred for other investments. Killing or arresting the developers would only lead to one thing—"

"—It's a dead end," Bai Liu concluded, glancing sideways at Tang Erda. "The rotten buildings in reality are the result."

Tang Erda went silent for a moment, then spoke slowly. "You're saying the residents of these rotten buildings commit suicide."

Bai Liu nodded calmly. "Yes. After the suicides, the residents will likely turn into ghosts, and if I'm right, their hatred will be transferred to the player who killed the developer—the new developer."

"If those two from Russell Cemetery killed the developer," Bai Liu added, looking at Tang Erda, "and if they don't stop the residents from committing suicide, they'll eventually be hunted down by the ghosts from the rotten buildings."

Zone C.

Two figures dashed through the darkness, their faces bruised, running against the wind, teeth clenched. They carried bags full of ID cards.

He and Shi Qian had just finished a robbery, but after an hour of searching, they still hadn't accumulated enough to reach their 60 billion goal. Now, they were headed toward the new building, hoping they could make it before time ran out.

Yuan Guang couldn't understand why they were running toward the building. The system had already declared that the rotten building had become a ruin. Even if they watched it, they couldn't just make six hundred billion appear to save the people living inside.

But...

He knew what would happen when a rotten building was created.

Even if nothing changed, even if the people here were just data—meaningless NPCs—it didn't matter. Yuan Guang couldn't bear to watch them jump, one by one, from the edges of the building.

He had seen enough.

Yuan Guang ran, breath ragged, his lips cracked and his hands trembling from the cold wind as he sprinted faster.

Why do people need a house to survive?

He had asked himself this question countless times—when he was lying awake at night, when he was working late...

And he had asked Uncle Wang when he nearly jumped off the edge of his own rotten building, only to be pulled back and slapped twice.

Uncle Wang had scolded him, "Didn't you say your mother never lived in a nice house after your father left? That you'd buy her a flat? What's this, you're in such a hurry to join your father in a small flat?"

"I'm over thirty now," Yuan Guang had said. "I'll be over sixty when I pay off the mortgage, and I don't feel like jumping off this roof yet." Uncle Wang slapped him again. "You have a twenty-year mortgage! You can't even pay it off in time! You still have time to turn things around and buy your mother a house!"

Uncle Wang grabbed his shoulder, pleading, "Yuan Guang, don't do it. If you die, you'll have nothing."

Yuan Guang ran faster, tears streaming from his eyes, as he neared the crumbling building.

The people in the buildings nearby seemed like the living dead—moving like zombies, staring blankly into the night, their lives long gone.

Just like Uncle Wang, about to jump.

One by one, they stepped forward, falling silently into the abyss below.

Yuan Guang's heart broke. "Don't die!"

"Please, live! There's nothing left if you die!!!"

He shouted desperately, "Please, live!!!"

[System Alert: Player Yuan Guang has equipped the "Monster Book: The Painter Who Hates Himself" identity.]

The fog spread from Yuan Guang's feet as he ran, hissing and crying. The art knife in his hand transformed into a pixelated brush, slashing fiercely at those who fell.

[System Alert: Player Yuan Guang uses the Identity skill (Layer Drawing).]

"Stay alive!!!"

"There is hope only if you live!!!"

A pixelated grey layer, invisible to the naked eye, caught the falling players. They bounced softly on the strange, cottony layer before landing gently on the ground.

No casualties.

Realizing this, Yuan Guang sat down in stunned silence. Then, in the next moment, he rushed forward, grabbed one of the men by the collar, and punched him in the face without hesitation.

With tears streaming down his face, he beat the surviving NPC, shouting, "Why did you have to die?!"

"If you die, you leave nothing behind!"

Yuan Guang choked out between sobs, "You're dead, but we're still here. We'll be so sad... so upset..."

"Because you're not here anymore..."

Year after year, the rituals of those who had died continued. But Yuan Guang never despaired because he knew that those who remained were holding on, waiting for the day they couldn't anymore. Then, they would apologize to him, "Little Yuan, I can't hold on any longer."

They weren't truly gone; they just needed rest. They died with hope.

[Little Yuan, I'll take a break and wait until you win before bringing me back!]

[Eh, I'm so tired. You all go ahead. Pop a resurrection armor for me, will you?]

[President Yuan, you're up next!]

Uncle Wang knelt before him, slowly lifting his head. A tear-stained smile appeared as he patted Yuan Guang on the shoulder, "Why are you crying? Don't cry."

"I'm just taking a break in our cemetery building for a while. With you around, Little Yuan, one day..."

"Everyone will come out of the cemetery."

"We who got tired halfway through, we're just temporarily storing our deaths there. We sleep, and when the sun rises, we wake up. When the light shines on our neighborhood, the old misfits rise again!"

As each person fell in the game, pulled down from the edge of the building in reality, they turned to Yuan Guang. No tears, no despair—just trusting smiles and waves, signaling him to carry on.

"Goodbye, Little Yuan."

[We believe Little Yuan will carry us to victory one day.]

[It's hard for Little Yuan to keep our deaths for now.]

More people jumped from the building. Yuan Guang looked up, watching in slow motion as he and Shi Qian ran toward each other. Teeth clenched, brushes swinging, hot tears streaming.

"No dying!!!" Yuan Guang roared, his voice hoarse and trembling. "No dying in this despair!!!"

"Hang in there!!!"

Everything in front of him blurred.

Yuan Guang remembered the first time they entered the league. They had all sat in meditation around the system's registration screen, brainstorming names for their team.

Someone jokingly suggested that their obscure guild should be called a cemetery.

Everyone laughed, and then another person asked, "What should the cemetery be called?"

Uncle Wang scratched his head, turned to Yuan Guang, and said, "Little Yuan, what do you think of Sunshine Cemetery?"

"... It’s too corny, Uncle." Without waiting for Yuan Guang’s reply, someone else spoke up.

"Sunshine? It sounds a bit old-fashioned, doesn’t it?" Uncle Wang thought for a moment and asked seriously, "Wouldn’t it be better to have a name that’s sharper, something more aggressive?"

He looked at Yuan Guang. "Little Yuan, do you know of a form of light more aggressive than sunlight?"

Yuan Guang blinked, stunned. "... Lasers?"

"Laser Cemetery?" Uncle Wang chuckled as he mulled it over. "Hmm... that sounds a little strange..."

Someone else suggested, "What's the English word for laser?"

Yuan Guang slowly recalled the word, "Laser."

"La-Seer?" Uncle Wang repeated the word with an accent, bursting into laughter. "That's a good one! A cool name! That’s it!"

Yuan Guang ran through the night, layers spreading out above his head. His teeth ground against the pressure of everyone falling, veins bulging, but he refused to move an inch.

His eyes locked on a distant point, and he cried out in a voice that tore at his heart, his chest and soul speaking as one.

"Lasers are the most offensive form of light!"

"As long as we live, as long as we exist, we will never lose to the sun!!!"

At the ornamental pool, the people of Russell Cemetery stared at Yuan Guang on the big screen, sweat and tears mingling. They knew he had shouted those words for them.

Slowly, they stood. Someone took a deep breath, raised a loudspeaker, and shouted at the screen, "Russell Cemetery, a sure win!"

"Russell Cemetery, first!"

"Go, President!"

"We believe in the President!!!"

"We'll hang on until the last second!"

They shouted until their faces trembled, as if they wanted their voices to reach Yuan Guang through the barrier of the screen, to help him hold up those heavy layers.

"This is the first time I've seen a tactician cheering for players who can't hear them," Charles, sitting on the sidelines, mused with amusement. "But it's also the first time I've seen someone in the viewing pool, cheering on a player who can't hear them."

"Russell Cemetery: The Magical Guild."

Wang Shun watched with mixed feelings as the members of Russell Cemetery cheered for Yuan Guang. He glanced at the system panel, noting that Russell's betting pool support was rising, but still falling.

... The audience is always realistic. When you're at a disadvantage, you're at a disadvantage. No amount of effort changes that. The audience never sympathizes with the underdog.

But Wang Shun glanced back at the members of Russell Cemetery, roaring with determination.

They weren't struggling for sympathy.

Even if reality crumbled, even if the game wasn't in their favor, they didn't fight to please others or become stars. They were just ordinary people fighting to survive.

--They fought for themselves, for the "people" who had placed their hopes in them, those living in the cemetery.

Shi Qian stepped forward and leaned against the layer with Yuan Guang. Yuan Guang's legs weakened, nearly causing him to fall, but Shi Qian helped him back up, his teeth clenched as he held the layer in place.

"It will be okay."

"It will all pass."

"One day..." Yuan Guang, his face smeared with mud and his hands covered in cuts, held the man who had jumped down to see the moon. He tilted his head, took a deep breath, and let it out slowly. "Even if we live in the cemetery for a while, one day we will see the sun shining again."

The man leaned against Yuan Guang's shoulder, his tears flowing freely. "Really?"

Yuan Guang closed his eyes and held the man close. "Really."

"I, and all my friends, believe in this prophecy."

Chapter End Notes

> While there is no direct, obvious connection between "laser" and "Russell," they both symbolize resilience and the ability to cut through adversity in their respective contexts. The laser is the metaphorical tool of power, and Russell may be the community or group fighting to break through their own despair.

How to Own Five Buildings

Zone E

After Tang Erda handed the property deed to the child, Bai Liu heard the familiar beep of his system.

[System Alert: Congratulations to Player Bai Liu for obtaining a cemetery building in District E 0812. Main quest completion progress: (1/5)]

Once the deed was safely in Bai Liu's hands, Tang Erda turned to the child. "Shall we move on to the next one?"

"Wait!" The child hesitated, gripping Tang Erda's sleeve. "Did you get rid of all the ghosts in the building? Did you take their deeds too?"

Tang Erda glanced at Bai Liu, who nodded in agreement. Turning back to the child, he replied, "I took the property deeds, but I didn't evict them."

The boy sighed with relief. "At least they weren't kicked out."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Aren't you afraid of these ghosts?"

"I don't think they're ghosts," the child answered, looking into Bai Liu's dark eyes. "They're just people who live underground."

Bai Liu's curiosity was piqued. He stepped closer. "I'm curious—if you know that when people die, they become ghosts but still keep working, why do you only want to live until you're 26?"

"It's harder to die than to live. So, what's wrong with living on?"

He fell silent for a moment, looking down at his nails, before continuing softly, "Because... I'm alive and I don't have a home."

"My parents are dead, and when I die, after paying off the mortgage, I'll become a ghost and live in the cemetery with them. It might be hard, but as long as we stay together as a family, we can get through anything."

Bai Liu's expression remained calm as he asked, "You wouldn't mind dying for this?"

The boy met his gaze, his voice earnest. "I don't think I'm dead."

"Even though we can't eat like corpses, and we sleep in cramped cemetery rooms every day, I feel that as long as we're together—helping and supporting each other—no matter where we are or how hard it is, we won't perish."

He laughed softly, his eyes shining with a strange hope. "One day, we'll walk out of the cemetery and see the sun again."

"Even if we die and our bodies rot, as long as we, the living ghosts, exist and roam the underground, that day will come."

Bai Liu's curiosity deepened. "Why were you worried the ghosts in the cemetery building would be cast out?"

The boy blinked in confusion. "Don't you know?"

"People walk outside, and living developers charge land management fees. Ghosts walk outside, and dead developers charge land management blood."

"Land management blood?" Bai Liu echoed. "What's that?"

The boy glanced around cautiously, then leaned in close, whispering, "-Developers turn into ghosts after they die, and they suck the blood of lower- and second-class citizen ghosts."

Bai Liu's expression darkened. "Ghost blood isn't renewable, is it? What happens if it's drained?"

"When the blood is drained, the marrow is sucked. When the marrow's gone, they eat the flesh. When the flesh is gone, there's nothing left." The boy shuddered, his shoulders trembling. "If you get sucked that far, you're really dead. There's nothing left of you."

Bai Liu looked at the boy, who was clearly shaken. "Do you know where these ghost developers hang out?"

The boy shook his head slowly. "I don't know. I've only lived here for a year, and most of what I know came from my dead parents, with some of it from my own observations."

"But if you're looking for dead developers..." The boy glanced up at Bai Liu. "You might want to try the rotten buildings in the districts."

Bai Liu thought for a moment before nodding his thanks. "The developer of this cemetery building—was he dead too?"

The boy blinked, surprised. "This cemetery was developed by one of the five major developers a long time ago, the landowning developer of this side of E. He's been dead for many years."

Bai Liu's eyes darkened further. "Are all the cemeteries in each district developed by big developers?"

The boy nodded. "The cemeteries are part of the infrastructure, developed by the big developers in the early days. But now they're all long dead, and their assets have been passed down to their descendants. All the properties in Sunny City are now controlled by the descendants of the five major developers."

Bai Liu's voice was cool as he asked, "Is there any further development or transfer of ownership for this cemetery?"

The boy thought for a moment. "I don't think so. It's always been like this..."

Bai Liu paused, his gaze sweeping around the area quickly. Then, he gave a swift order, his tone urgent. "Captain Tang, take the kid. We're leaving now. Something's coming."

[System Alert: Congratulations to Player Bai Liu for taking the property rights of Cemetery Building 0812 in Area E from the major developer of Area E.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has disturbed the developer of Area E. He is furious about the loss of his assets and is about to wake up from the ground to hunt you down!]

[The (E Zone developers) are about to attack!]

The ground shook violently, as if the heavy footsteps of a monstrous creature had slammed into the earth. A hissing, muffled sound erupted from the ground, accompanied by a nauseating stench of decay.

Bai Liu and the others quickly retreated. Muke and Mu Sicheng, who were at the rear, glanced back at the mist in the middle of the cemetery, which was quivering behind them. They reported in unison, "The monsters are moving slowly. No one is following us!"

"No," Bai Liu murmured, glancing down at the green veins on the back of his hand, which were rapidly pulsating and filling with blood. The veins bulged slightly, then deflated. "The monster has caught up with us."

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu is being drained of blood. His life value is dropping dramatically! ...87...73...]

Liu Jiayi quickly handed Bai Liu a bottle of antidote. He took it and drank, but just as he did, a violent coughing sound came from behind him. The seventeen-year-old boy being carried on Tang Erda's back whimpered and struggled in pain.

Tang Erda quickly rolled him off his back. The boy's face had turned blue. His mouth and abdomen were caving in, his skin drying out rapidly. Veins bulged from beneath his skin, and his blood seemed to be flowing out at an alarming rate, as though being sucked away.

Mu Sicheng and Muke's faces darkened. They quickly turned their heads, trying to identify the source of the vibrations chasing them. After confirming that it was still a distance away, they turned back to Bai Liu and reported, "The source is still far from us."

"Which means the monster's attack doesn't require direct contact." Bai Liu turned to the others. "Is anyone else besides me and the NPC showing signs of being attacked?"

Mu Sicheng, Muke, Liu Jiayi, and Tang Erda all answered in unison, "No."

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu is being drained of blood. His life value has dropped below 80 again...]

The boy in Tang Erda's arms was being drained of blood so quickly that his scalp had started to dry out. He was in agony, barely able to make a sound. His body twitched uncontrollably, his eyes rolling back, large, unconscious tears slipping down his face as he whispered about his mother.

Tang Erda's grip on the boy tightened, his face tense as he looked at Bai Liu.

"I can't give my antidote to the NPC," Liu Jiayi said, her face pale as she glanced at the child. She handed Bai Liu another bottle of antidote. "At the rate this monster is sucking blood, my stock of antidotes will be gone soon."

"We haven't figured out how this monster attacks!" Mu Sicheng growled, looking at Bai Liu, whose face had turned pale, blood rushing wildly beneath his translucent skin. "It started attacking without making contact—it's a judgment-based attack. This monster is very high level."

Muke analyzed calmly, "Definitely high. The E developer is likely the top boss in this area."

"A monster that uses a judgment-based attack only needs the player to meet certain criteria or range for the attack to trigger," Liu Jiayi continued quickly. "We've only got this NPC and Bai Liu being attacked. What's the difference between you and us?"

Bai Liu bent down and lifted the child NPC, whose hand was slowly dropping. "Housing issues."

Liu Jiayi's reaction was swift, her head snapping up. "You mean—!"

Bai Liu explained succinctly, "I own a cemetery building in E district. This NPC is essentially a house servant tied to that cemetery. According to the setting, the land in E district is owned by the E district developer, which gives him the ability to drain our blood through the house."

"The house acts as a conduit, channeling the blood drain from us."

Bai Liu stopped his backward steps, looking ahead with focused eyes. "But lifting this curse won't be easy. If the house switches ownership, it will still drain blood from you. We don't yet know the full range of this developer boss monster's influence. If his reach covers the entire map, running won't help. The best way to avoid being drained is—"

"-to kill the monster."

Bai Liu drew his whip and, with a cold gaze, ordered, "Stop the retreat. Mu Sicheng, Muke, move forward and engage the enemy. Liu Jiayi, guard me and the wounded NPC—heal and defend. Captain Tang, maneuver and wait for an opportunity to strike."

Both Mu Sicheng and Muke drew their weapons in unison—one cold and calculated, the other baring his teeth—and rushed into the mist.

There was nothing in the roaring fog.

No ghosts, no developers—just an empty, still expanse with no bodies in sight. The only signs of movement were the distant vibrations and the sticky growls coming from deep below the ground.

Mu Sicheng dug into the earth with one claw, but the ground remained solid beneath his hand.

Muke gripped his dagger tightly, his face darkening as if the very air around him was heavy, and stepped forward, placing a hand on Mu Sicheng's shoulder to stop him from digging any further. "Stop. With our senses, we can detect nothing beneath or around this land."

Mu Sicheng tilted his head, his eyes reddened with frustration as he stared at Muke. "Then why does Bai Liu keep getting his blood drained?"

"What the hell is this monster?"

"What the hell is this heresy?!"

In reality, Su Yang's eyes were red as he watched people being drained of life and carried away from the Sunnyside property. He took a deep breath, leaning his hands on the table of his makeshift tent, almost hoarsely questioning himself and the team around him.

The players exchanged uneasy glances, silent.

Su Yang closed his eyes, propping his forehead up, then opened them again, taking a deep breath as he combed through the test reports presented by the team.

"Unit 1 to 6 test results: Heresy values detected fluctuate between 7,340 and 134,212, with a total of 5,793 objects in the building. No abnormalities detected in objects leaving the building."

"Unit 6 to 9 test results: Heresy values fluctuate between 7,106 and 12,985, with a total of 6,903 objects in the building. No abnormalities detected in objects leaving the building."

"Unit 9 to..."

Su Yang read through to the last test report, then paused for another deep breath to steady himself. He adjusted his emotions before speaking. "The fluctuations in heresy values are similar across all the flats, but no heresy has been detected in the objects or building materials."

He slowly stood up and addressed the group, his gaze hardening. "This means that all objects within the entire Sunnyside property show no heresy, but the land itself is saturated with heresy values ranging from 7,000 to 13,000. These values are expanding outward in a circle at a rate of 13 to 15 meters per minute, affecting the surrounding area."

Su Yang clenched his fists, his expression blank for a moment before he quickly regained his composure. "Have all the surrounding tenants been evacuated?"

"Yes, all occupants within a one-kilometer radius have been evacuated," a team member replied, his smile bitter. "But Captain Su, at this rate, the heresy will reach a kilometer in about an hour or two, and by then..."

Su Yang cut him off, his gaze sharp. "So, we're going to contain this heresy within an hour. Understood?"

The team members nodded solemnly. "Yes, Captain Su!"

One of the team members raised his hand and spoke quietly, "Captain, could it be a form of heresy that doesn't exist as an entity, like air or something?"

Su Yang shook his head slowly. "Unlikely. If it were air, the diffusion rate of 13 to 15 meters per minute would be far too slow. For example, rose perfume would spread across the city in an hour."

"And this heresy affects only certain areas, unlike air, which spreads indiscriminately." He nodded firmly at the report. "It's the buildings themselves."

"Neither the passersby nor our team members have shown any symptoms, only the residents who bought houses here."

Su Yang’s fingers traced down the electronic report on the tablet, pausing as he absorbed the information.

"Ten minutes ago, the hospital sent me this report," he continued. "At first, only those moving out of the building showed symptoms of desiccation. But over time, all residents who primarily lived here showed varying degrees of desiccation."

Su Yang exhaled slowly. "And with this change, we’ve detected that the heresy is expanding outward at an increasing rate."

"It seems that the heresy initially targeted those who intended to move out, those trying to escape. But as we processed the eviction certificates, the heresy began feeding on their marrow and flesh while expanding outward."

He paused for emphasis. "One could say our efforts to evacuate the residents from this decaying building triggered and intensified the heresy, causing it to begin drawing in every resident here without restriction."

A team member grimaced. "Won't this make the heresy more powerful, killing more people?"

Su Yang gave the team member a sharp look. "It's the Heresy Handling Bureau's job to contain this before it becomes too powerful."

Just then, a team member knocked and entered with a report. "Captain Su, the information you requested on the developer of the Sunnyside property—I've got it!"

Su Yang reached for the report and glanced at it, his frown deepening.

"This developer, surnamed Li, didn't develop the land right away. Instead, he secretly contracted part of the land to four other developers. They injected capital and started developing the Sunnyside property together in his name, making it a joint venture with five developers."

The team member nodded. "It was illegal and later exposed, but by then, this Li guy had already fled."

Su Yang turned the page, his frown growing more intense. "Li was arrested and imprisoned last year. During his time in custody, he exhibited unusual behavior—disappearing suddenly during roll call."

"He frequently went to the library to borrow horror books and games, studying them like preparing for an exam, and muttering to himself, 'I'll be out soon. I'll get that land. It's a priority for the guards...'"

"And that's not all." The team member pointed to the report. "He was very bold, provoking the guards, claiming he could change the world. He even confessed that the private contract he signed with the four other developers stated that the land lease was for 9,999 years."

Su Yang's frown deepened. "Normal contracts last 45 to 75 years. His private contract isn't even valid."

The team member nodded. "That's what the wardens told him, but he just laughed wildly. He said he had a way to make those contracts work, a way to make every piece of land his. He claimed he could make the tenants who turned him in work for him for the rest of their lives, just to buy a suite from him."

"The man said that if he wanted to, he could make it happen. A true materialist."

Su Yang remained silent as he turned the page, his brow furrowing again. "This man had contact with Li Gou, the rapist who was stabbed to death by an inmate in prison last year?"

"That's right," the team member nodded, a subtle expression crossing his face. "During the trial, the evidence mysteriously vanished. The Heresy Processing Bureau intervened to investigate, but nothing unusual was found. Eventually, the evidence inexplicably reappeared and went through the usual trial process."

"But before the trial could proceed, Li Gou was bizarrely stabbed to death in prison."

The team member pointed to the information. "This developer, surnamed Li, had brief contact with Li Gou while in prison. Afterward, Li Gou exhibited the same strange behaviors as the developer—talking to himself, disappearing during roll call, provoking the prison guards, and ranting that one day he'd be able to kill anyone who sued him."

Su Yang lifted his gaze, his expression stony. "Where is this developer now?"

The team member replied, "He's dead. His body suddenly appeared in the playground after disappearing from prison for an hour, back in August this year."

"Dead?" Su Yang asked, his voice almost rhetorical, his nose wrinkling. "How?"

"After the autopsy, we found his stomach was full of dirt—from his stomach to his mouth—and it had ruptured. He was still alive when it happened."

In the game, Muke and Mu Sicheng returned, grimaces on their faces. Muke shook his head at Bai Liu, "No monster found."

Tang Erda exchanged a glance with Bai Liu before giving orders. "Switch defenses. You two will guard the wounded NPC and Liu Jiayi. Captain Tang and I will investigate."

Liu Jiayi looked at Bai Liu, took a couple of deep breaths, and handed him a few vials of antidotes. "I won't use my skills anymore. If you need something, you can heal yourself using my panel, but be mindful of the bloodline."

Tang Erda nodded to Mu Sicheng and Muke, who had returned. "I'll guard Bai Liu. You two watch the rear."

Bai Liu nodded and, with Tang Erda, entered the mists of the cemetery. Soon, all that could be seen was the fog.

Tang Erda held her gun against her leg and turned toward Bai Liu with a grim expression. "Are your life levels still dropping?"

Bai Liu, pale and nearly transparent, nodded. "65. Still above the safety line."

"What do you think this monster is?" Tang Erda's expression grew more serious. "I've encountered colorless, odorless, invisible monsters before—difficult to deal with unless you can find their source."

"As long as you locate the origin and can hurt it, there’s nothing to fear from such monsters."

Bai Liu crouched, deep in thought, then looked up. "Captain Tang, what kind of monster could move through a house without touching the tenants? Wherever the victim runs, whether human or ghost, it can drain blood and marrow from them at will?"

"What do property developers trying to maximize profits want to deposit most?" Bai Liu lowered his gaze to the earth, which trembled after Mu Sicheng had dug there twice.

Tang Erda paused and followed Bai Liu’s gaze.

Bai Liu smiled. "I think it’s the land."

Without hesitation, he lashed down with his whip, splitting the thick earth to a depth of four or five meters.

The ground gave a shrill hiss as it shook from side to side. Black and red clay-like slurry seeped out of the fissure, and the broken mouths of pipes twisted and writhed, forming blood clots on their fleshy, greenish-gray surfaces. A strong smell of blood emanated from the flowing slurry.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has attacked with a skill weapon (Developer in Area E).]

Bai Liu observed the blood-red "slurry" and the soft pipes wriggling like capillaries trying to reconnect. He raised an eyebrow. "Wow, this is the first time I’ve seen blood vessels growing in the earth."

Tang Erda exhaled. "The physical deposit of the five major developers here is the land itself, beneath the ground."

How to Own Five Buildings

The edges of the fissure in the ground, split open by Bai Liu's whip, twisted and stretched like tentacle veins, pulling and connecting with one another. The fleshy earth slowly began to close the fissure, as if it were healing itself.

The land let out a contented, hoarse gasp.

Bai Liu glanced at his system panel and realized that, after striking the land-like developer, his own blood was now draining faster.

Tang Erda noticed this as well, his brow furrowing. "What's going on?"

Bai Liu explained calmly, "The damage is transferred. When I attack the monster developer, it can quickly heal itself by drawing blood from me and the other tenants on E Land after it bleeds out."

"Attacking it is the same as attacking you," Tang Erda said, his gaze sharp as he looked at Bai Liu, whose lips were devoid of color. "Won't it just suck your blood endlessly at this rate? Why don't we transfer the houses in E to me first?"

Bai Liu shook his head, his tone even. "What difference does it make? Whether it sucks my blood or yours, it's still the same."

Tang Erda fell silent for a moment.

Bai Liu continued, "If owning a property attracts major developers to the region and the game requires us to own five buildings, one of us will have to hold a building and be drained dry by the developers."

"This is a game," Bai Liu added, "and if a monster like this exists, it must have a weakness. We need to find it." He met Tang Erda's gaze with calm eyes. "Since attacks are useless against the land this monster is attached to, we need to sever its connection to the land and force it out."

"A connection between the land and this monster?" Tang Erda asked, almost rhetorically. "What do you think it could be?"

Bai Liu's lips curved into a slow smile. "I don't know much about this game yet, but thanks to you, Captain Tang, you reminded me that this is likely a game that's tied to reality. So, the game's basic settings must align with the rules of reality."

"For example," Bai Liu lifted his eyes and smiled, "how can the land and the dead be connected... It makes sense that a dead person would still own the land after their death, and that's why they're attached to it."

"In reality, what would make a person own land?" Bai Liu asked lightly.

Tang Erda snapped, "A land-use right certificate?!"

Reality, Sunshine Properties.

Su Yang scanned through the information on the developer named Li and looked up at Captain Xiang. "Apart from this developer, Li, who's in jail, what about the other four?"

"It was last year," a team member sighed, handing over a report. "As soon as Li was interrogated, the other four developers ran off. We only found out about them again in July this year."

"And they're all dead?" Su Yang's voice darkened as he took the report with a heavy expression, raising his eyebrows. "Last June, they took their parents, wives, and mistresses on a low-key trip to the border under the guise of a company reunion. But they were caught in a bizarre series of rear-end collisions involving a high-speed truck. The out-of-control truck kept ramming forward, and all four buses tipped over the guardrail. No one survived."

The team nodded. "They used fake IDs and altered appearances. The explosion and the burns left on the bodies were so severe that no one could identify them at first. The people related to them also died in the crash, and the bodies went unclaimed until May this year. That's when we finally traced them back to that bus."

Su Yang's eyes narrowed as he looked up. "I remember that traffic accident. If I'm not mistaken, there was one survivor, an eighteen-year-old boy who had just finished his high school exams."

"Yes," the team member replied, surprised. "Captain Su, how did you know? The survivor's name is Du Ying."

Su Yang closed his eyes and took a deep breath, his chest rising and falling with each shaky inhale.

He knew, of course, that Tang Erda had instructed him to look into the accident two months ago, specifically asking him to track down a person named Du Ying.

He hadn't expected to encounter it here, nor had he anticipated it to be tied to the deaths of these four developers...

All these strange coincidences seemed to form an invisible web, pulling them all in a certain direction.

It was as if some unseen force—like a god fiddling with the world's nodes—dropped a card or a pawn, arranging it as it pleased. These seemingly insignificant actions could leave a profound impact, creating deep dents in the ground, scattering ordinary people in pieces, their screams echoing in the air.

This chaotic, uncontrollable thing that befalls a person is called fate.

But what is it called when it strikes a whole group of people?

One might rationalize their misfortune by saying, "It's just fate, I'm simply unlucky," and endure it, looking at the fortunate ones and holding on to the hope that happiness is possible for them too.

But what about a group of people?

What happens when everyone around you suffers from the same event? Does the pain of one person get diluted by the collective understanding of the group, or does the group's shared pain intensify each individual's suffering due to mutual empathy?

Can people continue to endure under these circumstances?

Su Yang found himself in a daze for a moment, unsure of the answer.

Just then, a team member burst into the room, slamming the door open. His face was broken with distress as he shouted, "Captain Su! Seven newly recovered patients at City Six Hospital have grabbed the nurses' blades and committed suicide!"

City Six Hospital, Inpatient Rooftop

Seven people in hospital gowns, their wrists bloodied, turned their backs to the rooftop. Their pale, numb faces were a stark contrast to the frantic group of paramedics, security guards, members of the Bureau of Heresy, and police officers standing before them.

The healthcare workers exchanged anxious glances.

"One of them suddenly grabbed the blade I was using to remove stitches. It gave me a real scare!" one nurse said.

"Thankfully, the bedside doctor acted quickly and snatched the blade back. The cuts weren't deep," another nurse responded.

"Now they've all run to the rooftop..." a third muttered.

A police officer stepped forward, bending slightly and speaking gently, "Guys, we can talk about this. Don't make any rash decisions."

An older woman in a hospital gown, her lips dry and hair thin and yellowed, stared at him with a vacant expression. Before she could speak, tears began to fall from her eyes.

"It's no use... What good will talking do?" she whispered, her eyes unfocused. She suddenly laughed, wiping her own tears away.

"I don't blame you. I know you've done your best. You were getting us relocation certificates today, and then, suddenly, this strange thing happens and we have to be relocated back..."

She paused and looked toward the rooftop, muttering to herself.

"We're doomed, stuck in this blood-sucking mess..."

Her voice trailed off as she turned her back to the group and moved toward the edge of the rooftop, her head lowered, eyes distant.

"Little Yuan has carried us for three years. With him on the field today... that kid can't hold out either..."

She shook her head, tears welling up again.

"It would be selfish to keep living, relying on him to carry us while we die..."

She closed her eyes, smiled faintly, and spread her arms before collapsing backward.

"Don't die! Work hard and stay alive today too!" a male voice shouted from below.

The woman, about to fall, suddenly opened her eyes wide and twisted her head to look down. "Little Yuan?!"

Other patients with bloodied hands leaned over the edge, their faces filled with disbelief. "Did you hear that? Little Yuan!" one of them cried.

"But isn't Little Yuan in a race?" someone else wondered aloud.

"Is he the winner after the match?" another voice chimed in.

The same voice called up from below again. "Don’t die! Work hard and stay alive today too!"

By the second time the voice echoed, the people on the rooftop realized something was wrong—it had an electronic tone, like a recording.

Su Yang stood below, holding a speaker shaped like a SpongeBob SquarePants alarm clock. He pressed the play button once more: "Don’t die! Work hard and stay alive today too!"

Then, he moved the speaker closer to his mouth, speaking calmly: "The sound you’ve just heard is from Yuan Guang’s alarm clock. I know he’s very close to all of you, and he's been fighting on your behalf with the developer's representatives."

"Yuan Guang plays this alarm clock sound every morning to remind himself to live well and fight for your benefits. I’m sure he wants you to live well enough to enjoy the fruits of his efforts."

Su Yang looked up at those on the rooftop, his gaze steady. "Please trust us. We will do everything we can to address whatever is troubling you."

His voice rang with resolve. "Whoever brought this misfortune upon you, we will fight for your lives and solve this!"

The woman on the rooftop gripped the fence tightly, her eyes bloodshot, before slowly loosening her grip and taking a step back.

At that moment, officers rushed forward and pulled her and the others away from the edge.

Su Yang exhaled deeply, a wave of relief washing over him.

A team member, standing next to him, looked at him with a complicated expression. "Captain, how did you know about the alarm clock?"

Su Yang finally allowed a small smile to form. He tapped the team member lightly on the head with the speaker. "I found it when I was testing the object. The alarm clock screams when you press it—extra loud and mid-air. It caught my attention, and I remembered it."

Su Yang pondered as he walked back, his thoughts heavy.

Could it be... that this group could change its destiny? Perhaps, if they meet someone whose fate is strong enough to alter things, they might escape this cruel path, seemingly laid out by the gods.

His mind drifted to Bai Liu at the Rose Factory.

Bai Liu, too, had changed the fate of everyone around him—himself included.

The team member followed Su Yang, checking a news report as they walked. "Captain Su, regarding the search for the four cars involved in the accident, we haven't found anything substantial yet. But we did find several bags of documents at the accident site—almost all of the developers' real estate information, except for the four illegal secondary contracting contracts for Sunshine Properties."

Su Yang's steps slowed as he turned his head, intrigued. "Where is the body of the developer named Li?"

"The body of the developer surnamed Li was taken by his son after the cremation. His son hasn't reported the burial location yet, saying the body was kept at home instead of being buried," the team member replied, quickly searching his notes. "But our people discovered that after Li's death in August, his son frequently visited a certain cemetery."

Su Yang's expression grew more serious. "Surround that cemetery and don't let anyone in or out!"

In-game, Area E.

Bai Liu and Tang Erda quickly returned to the spot where Liu Jiayi and the others had stayed. Mu Sicheng, Muke, and the others were half-crouched on the ground.

On the ground lay a dying NPC, barely breathing. His skin was thin and dry, clinging to his cheekbones and forehead, more like a mantis than a person—fragile and out of shape.

Tang Erda averted his gaze, unable to look away.

"Is it still alive?" Bai Liu asked softly. "Can you determine the rate of blood loss from this NPC?"

Liu Jiayi shook her head. "It's almost dead, but it's still alive for now. I can't calculate the rate of blood loss, but if you want to know the death rate, this creature should be able to drain someone dry in about an hour."

Muke frowned. "The blood loss is too fast."

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu. "Did you solve the monster?"

"No," Tang Erda replied, tensing his jaw. "That monster is tricky. We'll have to stay here for now and look for weaknesses. Bai Liu thinks you should take this NPC and move to the other zones first."

Muke and Mu Sicheng were both surprised.

Especially Mu Sicheng, who jumped up. "Shit, Bai Liu! You're carrying a blood loss buff that can kill someone in an hour, and you want us to split up? Don't you know splitting up in a horror story is a death sentence?"

Muke also frowned, disapproving. "Bai Liu, at least let Liu Jiayi stay."

Liu Jiayi looked up at Bai Liu, about to speak, but Bai Liu's eyes scanned the room briefly before he remained silent.

Everyone fell quiet.

Finally, Bai Liu spoke, his voice calm and methodical. "This isn't a game pool where we play against each other. This isn't some horror movie either. This is a competitive horror game, and I'm your tactician."

He paused, then continued, "Now, I need you to split up, and you will split up."

Liu Jiayi, Muke, and Mu Sicheng all bowed their heads in acknowledgment. "Yes."

Bai Liu continued, "Mu Sicheng, go to Area A. Liu Jiayi, head to Area B. Muke, go to Area D. A new property has appeared in Area C. It looks like a new branch line and should provide more information. Captain Tang and I will go there after we finish in Area E. For now, avoid exploring it."

"First, go to each area and sweep the cemetery building. Once you've cleared it, don't take the title for the cemetery house. Keep sweeping until you provoke the developer. That cemetery is the developer's, so go inside and look for the land ownership certificate. Once you've found it, meet me in Area C."

Bai Liu looked at everyone. "Now move."

How to Own Five Buildings

When the others had left, Tang Erda turned his head toward the cemetery under the night sky before shifting his gaze to Bai Liu, his expression darkening. "Are you really sure that the body of the major developer in Area E was buried in one of the cemetery buildings?"

"If my suspicions are correct, that should be the case." Bai Liu nodded calmly. "According to my theory, these developers died long ago but used the land contracts to anchor their partially alienated bodies to the land. Given that, the most likely scenario is that their actual bodies were buried along with the contracts."

"Considering that most of Area E, aside from the cemetery, has been overdeveloped, I suspect that the bodies of the five major developers were originally buried in the cemetery buildings—on the land they owned from the start."

Tang Erda frowned. "But there are too many cemeteries here, and you're carrying a blood-sucking debuff. The medicine Liu Jiayi gave us won’t last long enough for a slow, step-by-step search through every building. We need a faster, more precise sweep."

Bai Liu looked around before speaking softly. "Captain Tang, if there are rotten buildings above ground, wouldn’t there also be rotten cemeteries below ground?"

Tang Erda was momentarily stunned by the abrupt question. "Why would there be a rotten cemetery underground—"

He stopped mid-sentence as realization struck him. His gaze snapped to Bai Liu. "You mean—?!"

"Exactly." Bai Liu met Tang Erda's eyes and continued without hesitation. "Have you forgotten what that NPC and I talked about? Developers linger around decaying buildings."

"From the information we received at the start, a dead homeowner returns as a ghost and attacks anyone who tries to enter their house. Following that logic, a dead developer would naturally do the same—enter the cemetery where their body is buried and attack anyone who intrudes into their domain."

"A homeowner's haunting range is their entire house. By extension, a developer's range should be a specific building or area. The closer they are to their buried body, the more aggressively they defend it. Their influence could even go so far as to prevent further construction on their resting place, leading to the cemetery building where their body lies to decay over time."

Bai Liu raised two fingers. "That leaves us with only two possibilities for the developer's burial site."

"First, a separate, isolated cemetery."

"Second, a decayed building with signs of halted construction around the cemetery house it's in."

He smiled. "Captain Tang, now that we've narrowed it down, as the main attacker, do you think you can pinpoint and eliminate the target before I die?"

Tang Erda exhaled sharply, then drew the gun from his back, his gaze turning resolute. "It's my duty."

Area C, Beneath the New Development

After rescuing the residents from the upper floors and forcibly sending them home, Yuan Guang and Shi Qian were exhausted. The long night had drained them, and just as they were about to collapse onto the floor of the new development for a few hours of rest, an eerie sound echoed behind them.

A wet, sickening boing boing—the sound of countless tentacles pulling free and slapping against the ground as they moved.

Leaning against a railing, half-dozing, Yuan Guang slowly turned his head—only to come face to face with C Dong.

The developer's face was twisted beyond human recognition, his grin unnaturally wide, saliva dripping from his slackened jaw.

"Found you."

His voice was hoarse, thick with hunger. A long, writhing tongue slithered from his mouth, lined with tiny, questing tentacles. He licked his lips.

"Delicious tenants."

Yuan Guang inhaled sharply. In one swift motion, he grabbed Shi Qian—who was still sound asleep beside him—and bolted.

"What the hell are you still sleeping for?! The monsters are at our door! Run!!!"

Shi Qian, yanked upright, stumbled forward. Saliva trailed from the corner of her mouth as she glanced back drowsily—only to jolt awake in terror.

"Shit! Why didn't you say so earlier?!" He struck Yuan Guang with a backhanded slap before launching into a full sprint.

Behind them, C Dong surged forward in a mess of frenzied tentacles. His half-decayed face split open, his grotesque tongue unfurling. The writhing tendrils on it elongated and sharpened into a mosquito-like proboscis.

"Come and buy my house!" he rasped, his voice warping into a distorted sales pitch.

"Don't you want a home of your own?"

Shi Qian's legs blurred with speed, her breath ragged.

"Yuan Guang! Should we use our skills against this thing?! If we waste another big move on this monster, we won't have a trump card left for the Wandering Circus!"

Yuan Guang was yanked to a stop, his expression grim.

"I can't use my skill unless it's the last resort," he said tightly. "You know my summoner attacks everyone on the field—except me. That includes you."

"You shouldn't have followed me into this game."

Shi Qian didn't answer immediately. Instead, he pulled Yuan Guang into a narrow alleyway. Pressed against the wall, they gasped for breath, their bodies stiff with tension.

"You shouldn't have come with me," Yuan Guang murmured again, as if convincing himself. "I always play alone because, the first time I entered a game… I used my skill, and then…"

Shi Qian bowed her head and finished the thought for him.

"…And after your summoner killed your opponent, it turned around and wiped out everyone except you."

She exhaled slowly. "From that day on, you never entered a team match again."

Silence.

Then, Shi Qian suddenly smacked Yuan Guang over the head.

"That's bullshit!" she snapped. "How is a one-man team match a team match?!"

Her voice softened, but her words carried weight.

"Instead of standing on the sidelines, watching you suffer alone, we'd rather risk being killed by you—and stand beside you."

Shi Qian looked up, her eyes slightly red.

"Russell Cemetery isn't a guild that sacrifices its own."

"Aren't you the one who keeps telling us that even if we die, we should die with hope?" She clenched her fists. "So what—are we supposed to just stand by and watch you die alone? Trapped on the battlefield, surrounded by those… things?"

She shook her head. "I can't do that."

Yuan Guang said nothing, his fingers curling at his sides.

But there was no more time to dwell on it.

The squelching footsteps of C Dong drew closer.

Shi Qian cursed under her breath before seizing Yuan Guang's wrist and yanking him forward.

"Wasn't this bastard supposed to be limited to his development?! Why the hell is his range so huge?!"

"Cemeteries aren't restricted," Yuan Guang recalled. "At the Exchange, I saw that the cemeteries in each district are original support facilities—they weren't developed by the agent developers behind this. You can go there!"

Shi Qian shot him a quick thumbs-up before sprinting toward the cemetery.

Then, suddenly—

A figure stepped into their path.

A firm grip landed on Shi Qian's shoulder, steadying her before reaching up to pull a gun from their back. The movement was crisp, practiced.

Two sharp gunshots rang out.

Bang! Bang!

Behind them, C Dong let out a strangled, infuriated roar—before it faltered, his grotesque form shuddering. A sickening thud followed as his body hit the ground.

Shi Qian spun around instinctively—then froze.

C Dong's corpse lay sprawled out before them.

But her eyes weren't on the body. They locked onto the man holding the smoking gun.

Two clean shots—no wasted effort. To take out a monster of this level so easily…

There was only one kind of person who could pull that off.

A chill ran down her spine.

Even with her face heavily camouflaged, the raw threat of imminent death made her tremble.

The man, still holding his gun at the ready, glanced at her.

"Are you a resident of District C?" he asked. "Are you injured?"

Shi Qian felt her breath catch.

If he sees through me—if he realizes who we are—he could kill us both on the spot. We wouldn't even have time to run.

She clenched her jaw, forcing herself to stay composed.

Taking two steadying breaths, she turned her head.

Tang Erda leaned forward, his brow furrowed as he grasped her arm and asked politely, "Is the ghost haunting the decayed building in your district the developer?"

"Yes—cough—yes." The overwhelming disparity in combat strength made Shi Qian choke on her words, coughing twice as her face paled. "We just bought a house in a new development, and—I don't know why we're suddenly being chased."

Yuan Guang was still in shock, staring blankly at Bai Liu, who stood beside Tang Erda. Shi Qian elbowed him sharply, snapping him out of it. "Yes, yes! I just bought a house, and it's already falling apart."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered between the two before he smiled. "Are you a couple?"

Shi Qian forced a grin and yanked Yuan Guang closer. "Yes, yes! We just got married and took out a loan to buy a house."

"Oh? Is that so?" Bai Liu slowly pulled out a blood-drenched document from its protective bag. "Well, here's the thing. We just discovered a decayed building in the cemetery district of Area E. And, as luck would have it, we also found the remains of the district's biggest developer inside. After… eliminating him—or rather, destroying his ghost—we unearthed this land certificate."

A faint smile played at Bai Liu's lips. "Interested in buying property in E now that the land is back under normal management?"

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has obtained the District E Land Certificate, extracted from the corpse of the Area E developer, triggering the true ending quest—find and destroy all five land certificates in Sunshine City.]

[Completion progress: 1/5]

Bai Liu casually waved the certificate, his light gaze settling directly on Yuan Guang. "Mr. Russell, who just got married—have you considered abandoning that worthless property and investing in E instead?"

Yuan Guang's pupils shrank to pinpricks as he stared at the document. "How did you—"

Before he could finish, Bai Liu moved—so fast his figure blurred.

In a single motion, he gripped the handle of his whip and drove it into Yuan Guang's abdomen before the man could react. As Yuan Guang staggered, Bai Liu leaned in close to his ear, his voice soft, almost teasing.

"Yuan Guang, if you don't want to be recognized next time, control how you look at your enemies."

"Your killing intent is too obvious."

In the next instant, Bai Liu struck him again, sending him hurtling backward. Yuan Guang slammed into the wall, cracks spiderwebbing in all directions. He collapsed to his knees, clutching his stomach as he vomited blood in heavy, ragged heaves.

Bai Liu didn't pause. With cold precision, he raised the whip once more, its serrated bone spikes gleaming, and lashed it down toward Yuan Guang, who was barely able to push himself up, blood streaming down his face.

Shi Qian's pupils contracted in horror. "Yuan Guang!"

Dazed, Yuan Guang looked up just in time to see the snow-white whip descending upon him.

Without hesitation, Shi Qian lunged forward, throwing out her caliper cone to intercept Bai Liu's whip. The force of the impact was so strong that she was dragged to her knees, gritting her teeth as she slid backward, bracing her shoulder against the cone to counteract the blow.

Cracks splintered through the metal, shards breaking off and scattering to the ground. Shi Qian’s knees trembled, blood pooling beneath her as she struggled to steady herself. Her breath came in uneven gasps, her pupils shaking.

...So strong.

This wasn’t the Bai Liu she had seen in past game footage. His growth was terrifying—already at the level of those monster-star players from the top guilds. They weren’t even playing in the same league.

If they didn’t escape now, they were going to die.

Thick, grayish smoke surged from the ground, swallowing the city in an instant. The towering steel and concrete buildings blurred into the fog, their rigid shapes reduced to faint silhouettes—like trees looming in an endless forest.

[System Alert: Player Shi Qian has activated personal skill (Misty Eyes).]

[Effect: This skill extends perception to 50 meters for all teammates, allowing them to navigate the mist barrier.]

A faint luminescence coated Shi Qian's features, the glow clinging to her like mist. As her vision cleared, she spotted Yuan Guang kneeling not far away, his own features now glowing with the same eerie light.

Relief barely had time to settle in before she noticed him slowly lifting his head, his gaze locked onto the land certificate in Bai Liu's hand.

Yuan Guang planted his hands against the ground, swaying unsteadily as he began moving—deliberately, unflinchingly—toward Bai Liu.

Shi Qian's eyes widened in shock.

Yuan Guang wouldn't…

He wouldn't actually try to steal the land certificate from Bai Liu, would he?

That was suicide!

His vision wavered between clarity and haze. Though Shi Qian's [Misty Eyes] allowed him to see within the fog, the damage from Bai Liu's earlier strike left his eyes bloodshot and swollen, his sight blurred with dark spots. Pain throbbed behind his skull, his ears filled with an endless ringing.

Blood and sweat dripped from his chin as he focused on Bai Liu's hands.

Bai Liu had triggered the True End Route, altering everyone's main quest. The land certificate was now the key to survival—one that Bai Liu had likely obtained more than once.

Which meant Yuan Guang had only two choices if he wanted to clear this game.

1. Kill Bai Liu and his entire team.
2. Steal the land certificate.
Either way, retreat was no longer an option.

There was no way back.

Yuan Guang closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and with a slight tremor in his hand, pushed the blade of his hobby knife to its maximum extension. Then, without hesitation, he opened his eyes and lunged at Bai Liu.

Shi Qian gritted her teeth and followed suit, using the caliper cone to maneuver behind Bai Liu, forming a pincer attack with Yuan Guang.

Their weapons struck in unison—utility knife and caliper cone slashing toward the seemingly oblivious Bai Liu at the center of their encirclement.

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, a faint, knowing smile curling his lips. “I’m a little curious—where did you two find the courage to come up here just to die by my hands?”

The knife and caliper cone grazed past Bai Liu’s neck in succession, the force of their swings stirring his hair. A loose strand fell over his shoulder.

His gaze lowered to the trembling weapons hovering just a centimeter from his carotid artery. His voice remained calm. “If you want to kill someone, it’s best not to let your hands shake.”

He chuckled lightly, but his grip on the whip was ruthless. “Let me demonstrate—this is how you use a murder weapon.”

In one swift motion, Bai Liu seized Yuan Guang’s wrists and yanked him into his 50cm visible range. With practiced ease, he looped the whip around Yuan Guang’s arms and pulled downward without hesitation.

Yuan Guang’s pupils contracted sharply. A sickening crack rang out as the tendons in his arms tore from flesh and bone. Blood spurted violently, and his throat tightened with a strangled hiss—too pained to even scream.

“The first step,” Bai Liu murmured, lifting his pale, blood-speckled face, “is to disarm your opponent.”

Shi Qian didn’t hesitate. As Bai Liu leaned back to evade another attack, the blade of her caliper cone slashed past his eyes, close enough to graze his lashes. She pressed forward, unwavering. Her gaze locked onto Bai Liu as she twisted her wrist, sending another blade spinning toward his shoulder.

Bai Liu shifted his weight, rolling his shoulder back just in time to dodge. At the same moment, he retracted his whip from Yuan Guang’s now-useless arms.

Shi Qian barely glanced at Yuan Guang—she already knew he was out of the fight. Without missing a beat, she kicked him into the mist, creating distance between him and Bai Liu. Then, teeth clenched, she braced herself for the next exchange.

Yuan Guang is a summoner, not a melee fighter! What the hell was that idiot thinking, charging at Bai Liu—someone who specializes in mid-to-long-range combat?!

In her hands, the oddly constructed caliper cone shifted like a living weapon, moving with the fluidity of a military knife. She spun it through her fingers, sending a flurry of sharp blades toward Bai Liu's shoulders from all angles, cutting off his movements and preventing him from raising his whip.

Bai Liu smirked, effortlessly weaving through her attacks. A few slashes landed, leaving razor-thin cuts on his face, blood trickling down his cheek. He met Shi Qian's gaze, his smirk deepening.

"A solid tactic," he mused, sidestepping another strike. "Whips are, after all, mid-to-long-range weapons. Close-quarters combat—targeting my arms to disarm me—is a clever method of suppression."

Shi Qian's expression remained cold. "We're enemies, Bai Liu. No need to be so kind as to teach us," she snapped.

The caliper cone in her grip spun rapidly, its shape shifting mid-air. In an instant, it transformed into a brutal corkscrew-like stabbing ball.

"Until the very last moment," she hissed, "it's not certain who will disarm whom."

Bai Liu arched backward just in time to evade the cone aimed at his back. Shi Qian anticipated his move. Without hesitation, she swung her knee up toward his face.

But Bai Liu was faster. His whip lashed around her ankle, stopping her leg mid-strike.

Shi Qian found herself yanked off balance, one foot lifted off the ground. She tensed her core, keeping herself steady despite the precarious position—one leg stretched to ninety degrees, the other barely keeping her grounded. Cold sweat dripped from her jaw as she locked eyes with Bai Liu, her breath coming in sharp, shallow exhales.

Bai Liu, face streaked with blood, met her stare with a bemused expression.

Bai Liu's face was obscured by the mist, his eyes unfocused on his own body as he stood fifty centimeters away.

This guy—he wasn't just strong as a tactician; he had the melee prowess to back it up. Even with his limited perception, he was overpowering her, a melee-based attacker with skilled precision.

What kind of monster is this guy? Definitely not a newcomer!

Just as Bai Liu was about to fling Shi Qian away with his whip, Shi Qian gritted her back teeth, braced herself, and instead used Bai Liu's own momentum to propel forward. He pushed off on one foot, letting the whip drag her in.

The moment Shi Qian's foot trapped the whip, rendering it useless, Bai Liu raised his hand without hesitation.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu retrieves his weapon (Siren Bone Whip)]

The instant the whip disappeared from her leg, Shi Qian—now on one knee, her skin torn and bruised by the whip's bone spikes—saw her chance. Her eyes flashed, and without hesitation, she lunged forward, caliper awl in hand, aiming to sever Bai Liu's arms.

—So close. Such an obvious opening. Right now!

The sharp tip of the awl pierced Bai Liu's shoulder, sinking in with a sickening creak as flesh and bone peeled away. Blood spattered, instantly drenching most of Bai Liu's body.

A gun pressed against Shi Qian's abdomen.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu loads the player's (Rose Hunter) panel and uses the opponent's skill weapon.]

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "When you're this close to me, I can see your flaws very clearly."

He'd left an opening on purpose. Just to bait her into closing the distance, escaping the mist cover of her skill, and then—

"BANG—!!!"

Shi Qian didn't even have time to finish the thought. Her pupils dilated, then quickly lost focus. Her grip on the caliper awl slackened, and she toppled backward.

Her eyes were unfocused. Blood bubbled from her mouth and nose as she choked, coughing weakly. The crimson pool beneath her body spread rapidly before being absorbed into the earth.

[System Warning: Player Shi Qian's life expectancy is dropping dramatically! 89… 73… 69… 57… 48…]

[System Alert: Player Shi Qian's skill disarmed.]

The mist shrouding the city began to lift. The first pale light of dawn filtered through the clouds.

Yuan Guang, kneeling, raised his head. Against the backlight, Bai Liu flipped his hand, replacing the gun with the bloodstained white bone whip. Then, without urgency, he began dragging the whip across the ground as he walked forward. Shi Qian lay motionless behind him, her vacant eyes staring into nothing.

The bloodied bone whip trailed behind, scraping against the ground with a sound like a rattlesnake slithering—a slow, ominous hiss.

Yuan Guang's breath hitched.

[That skill is dangerous. If I use it, I might be killed by my own summons. I won't use it lightly.]

[But I'd rather risk death and stand on this battlefield with you.]

Armless, Yuan Guang lifted his face, his gaze locking onto Bai Liu as he approached.

Bai Liu's expression was calm as if he were a god granting a final chance at life. "Withdraw from the game now, and both you and she will live."

Yuan Guang's voice was slow but unwavering. "She and I, and all the people of Russell Cemetery, will live." His eyes burned into Bai Liu's. "But not at the cost of my surrender."

Tears welled in his eyes, unbidden. "I gave up many times—on many things—to escape the pain. But every time I surrendered, someone else died." His voice wavered. "I thought it would lessen the suffering, but all it did was force others to bear even more. The living and the dead alike."

His breathing hitched. "I'm the one who condemned them to this torment. A pathetic, cowardly wretch."

"I've had enough of giving up—whether it's on myself or on others."

"This time, I will absolutely, positively not give up!"

Yuan Guang roared, veins bulging in his neck. His face was flushed with desperation, and resolve. "I'm going to win this tournament alive and bring them all back!"

As the mist dissipated, four figures emerged, walking at a steady, unhurried pace.

A deep, lazy voice spoke first. "Boss, why the hell are you in this book?"

The voice was unmistakably Mu Sicheng's, but it carried a heavier weight—older, more mature as if he were in his thirties.

Another voice replied, unhurried. “Could be Daniel’s prank.”

A more reserved, measured tone chimed in. “President, you’re too indulgent with Daniel.” The speaker was Muke, but calmer—colder.

A faint chuckle followed. “He’s useful. And useful children earn privileges with me, just as Jiayi does.”

A teenage girl’s voice, laced with disgust, snapped back, “Don’t act like my spiritual father. I’d rather throw up.”

The last of the mist finally cleared.

At the forefront of the group stood a man—his age indeterminate, his long ponytail reaching his waist. He wore a crisp white shirt, knee-high black boots, and black leather gloves. A coiled black whip rested in his gloved hands. His dark eyes, calm and pale, were lined with the faint traces of time. There was an air of intimidation about him, the kind that made people instinctively avert their gaze.

But most importantly—

He looked exactly like Bai Liu.

Or rather, he looked like Bai Liu, only ten years older.

Their eyes locked.

The older Bai Liu regarded his younger counterpart, raising an eyebrow in faint amusement before letting out a soft laugh. “Well, well… This doesn’t seem like one of my godson’s little games.”

Bai Liu's gaze swept over the surroundings, pausing briefly on Shi Qian, who had collapsed behind him, and Yuan Guang. His expression remained unreadable.

"The enemies... who summoned us with their skills?"

"How amusing."

Bai Six smiled as he studied Bai Liu, his gaze dropping to the slightly worn white shirt clinging to Bai Liu's frame. "With that cheap attire, I take it you haven't finished accumulating enough points for the first round? Is this your first time playing in the league?"

He dragged a black whip behind him, his smile widening as he took two leisurely steps forward. His whip swayed. "Want me to help you win?"

Bai Six tilted his head. "How about we make a deal? I'll take out our summoner—your enemy—in exchange for—"

Bai Liu finished the thought for him, calm and detached. "My soul, right?"

Bai Six raised an eyebrow, amused. "Looks like we're thinking along the same lines."

He sighed, shifting his weight. His left elbow propped against his right hand, fingers clad in black leather resting against his jaw. A smirk played on his lips.

"It's a shame," Bai Six mused. "If only you had this strong sense of territory and ambition back when we were kids. Things might've turned out differently." His gaze darkened. "But now that you've formed your own interest group, you're not so easy to fool anymore. I suppose that means we can't work together."

"I suppose so," Bai Liu replied indifferently.

"In that case..."

Bai Six turned his head, casting an idle glance toward Yuan Guang. After a brief moment of thought, he dropped to one knee, crouching beside the immobile figure.

Leaning in, he whispered, "Your teammate is dying. You summoned me because you wanted to save her—to kill your opponent and win this game, didn't you?"

Yuan Guang struggled but managed a weak nod.

Bai Six lowered his gaze. With deliberate slowness, he tapped a points note against Yuan Guang's forehead, covering his eyes. "Then I'll grant your wish."

His voice was almost gentle. "I'll give you ten thousand points. In return, you sell me your soul."

Yuan Guang's chest heaved. He took a shuddering breath, then closed his eyes. A single tear slipped from the corner of his eye before he gave a final, resolute nod.

Bai Six smiled, his eyes glinting with satisfaction. "That settles it. Since we can't cooperate, I'll have to stand against you."

He straightened, his tone light.

"After all, in my games—"

"Profit comes first."

With practiced ease, Bai Six folded the soul note between his long, slender fingers. It vanished as he gave his orders with crisp efficiency:

"Jiayi, heal the summoner's injured teammates. Secure the summoner and then head to point B—retrieve the land certificate and eliminate your kind."

"Mu Sicheng, move to point A. Take Tang Erda and clear the field. Muke, you're on point D—same mission as Jiayi's. Move out."

—The same tactical arrangement Bai Liu had used earlier.

The others responded lazily with a drawled "Okay," then dispersed within moments.

Bai Liu barely registered their departure before catching a sudden shift in the air—a blur of movement, a fleeting afterimage at the edge of his vision.

Shi Qian, who had been lying behind him, was gone.

It happened too fast for him to react.

"I'll take care of the extras first," a voice drawled from above, half-teasing. "Make sure to play the game well with the boss, yeah, little boss from another world?"

Mu Sicheng.

Bai Liu lifted his gaze, spotting a tall figure perched atop a streetlight pole, half-crouched. The pole groaned under his weight. His hands—long, apelike, ending in massive, bloodstained claws—gripped the metal tightly.

Through the thinning mist, his scarlet eyes gleamed with amusement.

In his grasp, a struggling woman dangled helplessly, her fate hanging by a whim.

Mu Sicheng bared his teeth in a wide grin, locking eyes with Bai Liu below.

"Don't die at the boss's hands too quickly," he added. "I still want to have some fun with you after the mission."

With that, he disappeared in a few swift leaps. The rest of the figures melted away just as quickly.

The alley fell silent.

Bai Six, now alone, strolled toward Bai Liu with unhurried steps.

Wisps of gray-white mist coiled around him—clinging to his face, waist, and boots, shrouding him in a surreal haze. At first glance, his figure seemed blurred, like a half-finished sketch stepping out of its own frame.

The sharp click of his boot against the cold, solid ground echoed through the damp alleyway.

Step by step, he approached, finally stopping less than a meter away.

Fully emerged from the mist, he smiled at Bai Liu and asked, almost playfully,

"You're not escaping?"

Bai Liu met his gaze levelly, unwavering. "Running wouldn't change anything for either of us, would it? You should already know what I'm thinking."

"That's right." Bai Six nodded in easy agreement. "For example, you must be wondering why your main attacker, Tang Erda, hasn't moved yet."

His smile deepened, teasing.

"I have to admit, I didn't expect you to pull off something I never could—turning Captain Tang, of all people, into your teammate. The man who's always been against me..." Bai Six tilted his head, intrigued. "Now I'm curious—what exactly happened between you two?"

Bai Liu's tone remained even. "Naturally, something that never happened between you."

"My, how hostile." Bai Six's grin grew flirtatious. "This might be the most hostility I've ever seen from a version of Bai Liu toward me."

He let out a soft, exaggerated sigh. "To get along with Captain Tang, I was even kind enough to spare his dear friend, Captain Su. Didn't kill him. Even left him a little instructional video—on professional ways to torture bad guys." His eyes glinted with mock disappointment. "But alas, Captain Tang didn't seem to appreciate my gift. What a shame."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered, unreadable. "Perhaps Su Yang would've appreciated it more... if you hadn't left the tape inside his stomach."

Bai Six feigned surprise. "Is that so?" He didn't seem to care, only curling his lips in amusement. "Then I do hope Captain Tang enjoys the little gift I left for him this time."

Amidst the Mist

Tang Erda clearly felt the ground beneath him begin to sink and shift. Almost simultaneously, a thick, glassy barrier shot up around him and moved at an alarming speed. Instinctively, he tried to rush toward Bai Liu, but the barrier blocked his path. His eyes darkened, and without hesitation, he fired two shots at the glass—only for the bullets to pass through uselessly.

His expression shifted. He recognized this item. A Magic Space. A prop that restricts movement.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses the prop (Magic Space) on (Rose Hunter) and (Rose Hunter).]
[(Magic Space) Rule: Only one person can leave the Magic Space alive.]

Tang Erda tensed and glanced across the confined space. A humanoid figure crouched on the ground, partially obscured by the thick mist. He slid his gun under his palm, keeping it steady as he moved cautiously along the barrier's edge.

As the mist gradually lifted, Tang Erda's pupils contracted sharply.

He was staring at himself.

Or rather, a disheveled, wretched version of himself—his hands bound behind his back in a pair of handcuffs. His jaw and shoulders were pressed against the cold floor, his body convulsing in a desperate struggle. A videotape had been forced into his mouth, stretching his lips to the point of tearing, blood trickling from the cracks. Yet, despite his agony, he didn't dare bite down.

Tang Erda immediately aimed his gun at the handcuffs, ready to shoot them off, but his bound counterpart thrashed wildly, preventing him from taking the shot.

Through muffled gasps, the bound man managed to force out a broken warning:
"Su… Yang's… handcuffs… Don't… move!"

Tang Erda flinched. His gaze snapped to the handcuffs, where a pattern of roses, guns, and tentacles intertwined along the metal's surface.

—Su Yang's skill weapon.

How did it get here?!

Tang Erda reached down and yanked the tape from the man's mouth. "How did you get here?" he demanded. "Su Yang didn't die in your world? Why does his skill weapon still exist?!"

How could there be a world where Su Yang was alive—where he still had all his skills and weapons—when in every single world Tang Erda had been to, Su Yang had already died?

The other [Tang Erda] coughed violently, then lifted his head. His gaze was grim and piercing.

“Su Yang is dead.”

Tang Erda’s brows knit together. “Then how did these handcuffs—”

“The soul of Su Yang…” the bound man rasped, “was bought by Bai Liu.”

With a sharp, deliberate motion, he twisted his fractured hand with his other, crushing the bones and wrenching his mangled palm free from the ring of the cuffs. He had chosen to break himself rather than harm Su Yang’s skill weapon.

“This,” he said, flexing his ruined hand with a cold smile, “is the skill Bai Liu used on me—with Su Yang’s panel.”

Tang Erda’s face paled. “Su Yang sold his soul to Bai Liu?”

The bound man leaned against the wall, his breath unsteady. Then he let out a low, mocking snort. “What’s so surprising about that?”

“More than half the souls in the entire Heretics Authority… belong to Bai Liu.”

A chill ran down Tang Erda’s spine. “More than half…?” His expression darkened completely. “I know my players. There’s no way they would willingly do that.”

He turned his gaze back to the man before him, standing up and leveling his gun. His voice was sharp. “And I already jumped from that world line long ago. By all logic, I shouldn’t exist there anymore. So how are you still alive in a world line I abandoned over a decade ago?”

The other [Tang Erda]—haggard, wounded, but still smiling—tilted his head slightly. His deep blue eyes locked onto Tang Erda’s with something unreadable.

Then he smirked.

“Do you remember the wish you made to the evil god?”

Tang Erda’s grip on his gun tightened.

“The power to keep going back… to change events… to stop everyone from entering the game. That’s what you remember, isn’t it?” The bound [Tang Erda] exhaled sharply. “But have you forgotten the price you had to pay?”

Slowly, he braced himself against the wall and pushed himself to his feet. Blood dripped from his fingers, staining the floor beneath him. He lifted his head, his deathly gaze locking onto Tang Erda.

“You were never meant to be human anymore,” he said hoarsely.

“You’re nothing but a monster caught in a perpetual jump through time.”

His voice dropped to something eerily calm, eerily certain.

“You’re just a memory. A fragment of consciousness. And we—the real Tang Erdas of each timeline—are the ones actually living. You’re nothing but a parasite, an aberration that hijacks our minds and wears our lives like a suit.”

He took a staggering step forward.

“You’re not even human.” His lips curled into a grim smile.

“You’re Heretic 0002: The Time Hunter.”

Tang Erda’s breath caught. He instinctively took two steps back, unable to find words for a long moment. Then he shook his head. “Even so… I don’t believe the Heretics Authority would have willingly sold their souls to Bai Liu.”

“Not willingly,” the other [Tang Erda] admitted.

He leaned against the wall and pulled out a cigarette. Then, extending his cuffed wrist, he raised two fingers. “Got a light?”

Tang Erda stared at him, unblinking. “No.”

“Tch.” The bound man clicked his tongue. He stuck the cigarette between his lips and, instead of lighting it properly, raised his gun and pressed the butt of the cigarette against the overheated barrel.

The smoldering heat lit the cigarette instantly. He took a sharp drag, exhaled, and then coughed twice before continuing.

“It wasn’t intentional.”

“After you left, the Heretics Authority went to war with Bai Liu. Then a game called Five Buildings surfaced."

Tang Erda stiffened. His eyes widened with a sudden, terrible realization. "It can't be—"

The bound man exhaled another lungful of smoke, his lips curving into something between a smirk and a grimace.

"Oh, but it is."

"Bai Liu—an absolute lunatic who lives for money—got his hands on the Five Buildings, dragged it into reality, and pushed for full-scale commercialization. He added a clause to the contracts stating that when Party B's assets were insufficient, Party A had the right to repossess all fixed and unfixed assets—including, conveniently, 'certain deep, unique assets.' Assets Bai Liu alone had the right to interpret."

"That agreement should have never passed," Tang Erda snapped. "No one would have signed it."

"Under normal circumstances, no." The bound man's eyes gleamed darkly. "But once Five Buildings landed in reality, plenty of desperate people—who had no idea Bai Liu was behind it—did."

He took another slow drag. "That included a lot of people from the Heretics Authority."

Tang Erda stood frozen.

"They didn't even realize," the bound man murmured. "Not until it was too late."

He exhaled softly. The cigarette burned low between his fingers, but he didn't seem to notice.

"Even death wasn't enough to escape Bai Liu's grip."

Tang Erda stared at the cold metal shackles. A sick feeling twisted in his stomach.

And in a quiet, almost broken voice, the bound man whispered: "…I never dreamed these handcuffs would be used on me."

How to Own Five Buildings

The evil [Tang Erda] leaned against the invisible wall of the prop [Magic Space], lighting another cigarette with the still-hot barrel of his gun. Lowering his head, he took a slow, deep drag, letting the smoke fill his lungs before speaking abruptly:

"You haven't escaped this world line yet. The situation here—still under control?"

He bit down on the cigarette, pausing. "Su Yang is still alive, isn't he?"

"Alive," Tang Erda replied. He was quiet for a moment before adding, "There haven't been any devastating copies landing in the real world either. Everything's… still going well."

The man on the other side of the table was silent for a beat before he scoffed. "After all these do-overs, you finally did it."

He leaned back, exhaling a trail of smoke. "Well done. How'd you pull it off? Show me the ropes."

Tang Erda's fingers tightened around the barrel of the gun hanging at his thigh. He opened his mouth to respond, but before he could, the man opposite him caught sight of the pattern engraved on the silver revolver's handle. His expression shifted instantly.

His dark blue eyes sharpened with suspicion, and a murderous edge crept into his gaze as if interrogating a prisoner.

"The pattern on your gun handle... why does it bear The Wandering Circus' emblem?"

Before Tang Erda could answer, the man pushed up from his seat and closed the distance in an instant. He yanked the gun from his back holster and leveled it at Tang Erda without hesitation, his hostility barely concealed.

"You sold your soul to Bai Six?!"

"He's not Bai Six. He's not the same as Bai Six." Tang Erda slowly lowered his own raised weapon, then raised his hands in a gesture of surrender. "The Bai Six of this world line is called Bai Liu—the White Willow. He—"

"That's what everyone who sells their soul to him says." The man across the table let out a sharp, derisive laugh. "You should know better than anyone what it's like to fall under his spell."

He exhaled, cigarette smoke curling around his narrowed eyes as he flicked the safety off. "I'll give you one last chance to explain yourself. Why did you sell your soul to Bai Six? Were you forced?"

Tang Erda struggled to find the right words to describe the Bai Liu of this world line, to convince his other self that Bai Liu wasn't like that.

Law-abiding? No criminal record? A good citizen?

None of it was accurate enough. Deep down, Tang Erda knew Bai Liu still had the potential to cross the line at any moment. And yet, somehow, he never did. Somehow, he had remained in this deceptively harmless state all this time.

And for some reason, Tang Erda believed he always would.

Taking a deep breath, he lifted his gaze. "There was no coercion. I trust him."

The man on the other side of the table went completely still—then pulled the trigger.

"Then you die."

BANG—!!!

Zone D

Muke cautiously searched the cemetery, moving floor by floor. Two hours earlier, Bai Liu had sent a message through his communication device, instructing them to focus their search on the central area of the solitary grave and the rotting cemetery.

Muke had yet to find the solitary grave, but after an exhaustive search, he finally located the rotting cemetery.

Turning over a headstone, he exhaled a long sigh of relief at the sight of an access point to the cemetery building below. The structure was clearly unfinished, with steel bars protruding from the walls.

His thoughts drifted to Bai Liu, who was burdened with a blood-loss debuff. With his task complete, Muke could finally regroup with Bai Liu and the others in Area C.

Drawing the short double-bladed knife from his back, he gripped it between his teeth, braced his hands on either side of the entrance, and deftly maneuvered through the steel framework in a series of swift, fluid movements, descending toward the central floor below.

Upon reaching the vast cemetery chamber, Muke's sharp gaze swept across the room. Unlike the 'incinerator '-styled spaces he had previously encountered, this one was built in a markedly different architectural style. Using the steel bars as footholds, he propelled himself inside with a precise leap, landing in the upper left corner.

Bracing his feet against the wall, he shifted into a crouch, his body taut like a gecko clinging to a surface. The knife he had held between his teeth now rested in his grip, while three fingers pressed lightly against the wall. He scanned the room with calm, calculating eyes.

The chamber, approximately two hundred square feet, was lavishly decorated—luxurious, even, as if meant for the living. This starkly contrasted with the adjacent burial chambers, which barely measured three to five square feet. In the center stood a mahogany table, upon which rested a shrine with a black-and-white photograph. Next to the photograph, the cause of death was inscribed: "Died in a car accident."

Beneath the shrine sat a white porcelain urn.

If Bai Liu’s deductions were correct, the land certificate would be inside the urn.

Muke was just about to leap down to retrieve it when he abruptly halted. His fingers, previously pressed against the wall, retracted slightly as he glanced at them.

Only a thin layer of dust clung to his skin.

A subtle sense of wrongness crept over him. Some areas of the room were thick with dust, while others had only a light coating—particularly the corner where he had landed, the floor beneath him, and—

Muke’s gaze shifted slowly toward the mahogany table—the shrine that held the urn.

If the developer monster inside the urn had crawled out, the room wouldn't be so pristine. There would be clear disturbances in the dust—trails where it had moved. Yet the only path where the dust was noticeably thinner led directly to the urn.

Which meant—

Someone had approached the urn in the exact same way he had. And they had deliberately brushed aside the dust to conceal their tracks.

A voice, cool and detached, spoke from the shadows at his side.

"Only just noticing?"

The rhythmic sound of something heavy being dragged echoed through the room, accompanied by the deliberate, unhurried steps of leather shoes striking the wooden floor.

"What a disappointing world line. I can't believe I'd be this slow to react to my surroundings."

From the darkness, a delicate profile emerged.

"If I were facing an opponent like me, that sluggish reaction would be enough for me to kill your president thirteen times over."

Muke dropped from the wall, his muscles tensing the instant he saw the figure before him.

Standing across the room—was a much older version of himself.

The older [Muke] dragged a developer monster's corpse behind him, its lifeless body leaving a long, bloodstained trail. He was taller, and broader than Muke, dressed sharply in a fitted black waistcoat. A pale-colored rose peeked from the right pocket of his suit.

Gold-rimmed glasses rested on the bridge of his nose, a delicate chain linking the frames to his ears. A reversed cross earring swung slightly in his left ear. He was dressed impeccably, exuding the elegance of a refined socialite who had just stepped out of a grand soirée.

Expressionless, the older [Muke] let go of the corpse. With his free hand, he retrieved a folded document from his pocket, holding it up.

"Is this what you came for?"

Muke instinctively put distance between them. This man—this version of himself—radiated an unmistakable sense of danger.

He couldn't have been created by Bai Liu. Even if Bai Liu made independent decisions, he always informed the players of their outcomes.

Which left only one possibility—

Muke's voice was tight. "Were you summoned by Yuan Guang's skill?"

"Summoned?"

The older [Muke] finally met Muke's gaze head-on.

"The only one who has the right to define my existence is my president."

He lifted his chin, an air of restrained arrogance in his posture. His speech was measured, unwavering.

"And you—what gives you the right to judge me?"

With that, he released the document. The land certificate fluttered toward the ground.

Muke's gaze locked onto it.

At the same time, the older [Muke's] attention fixated on the black dagger in Muke's hand. His expression darkened slightly.

"The president of this world line found you a personal skill?"

Muke caught the shift in his counterpart's emotions, his sharp eyes flicking toward the older [Muke's] hands—both wrapped in white bandages from fingertips to wrists, disappearing beneath his suit cuffs. His neck, too, was bound in layers of bandages.

A slow, deliberate step forward. The dim lighting obscured his eyes as he raised his hands and, with meticulous precision, began to unwind the bandages from his fingers. His voice was soft, unhurried.

"The president does not waste time or energy on a player without skills. Nor would he train someone with no value."

"Those who have no value—do not deserve to survive."

In the muted light, his refined face took on a somber hue.

"It's the same way heart disease has no place in a lasting social structure. It's a fundamental rule of the world. As a Muke, you should at least understand that, shouldn't you?"

Muke's breath hitched for a split second—but he quickly regained control, stepping back cautiously as the older [Muke] advanced.

"To be of greater value to the president. To stand on the same battlefield as him. To win for him as a team member."

The bandages unraveled further, draping past the older [Muke's] elbows.

"I trained relentlessly. I fought ruthlessly. I killed countless players, trying to seize their skills. But either they wouldn't give them up—or they didn't have the abilities the chairman wanted."

"In the end, I became the only unskilled member of the Wandering Circus Team."

The last of the bandages fell to the floor. With careful precision, he folded them and placed them on the mahogany table beside him.

Muke's brows furrowed. No matter how composed he was, he couldn't suppress the unease that settled over him.

From fingers to wrists to his throat, the exposed skin was riddled with scars—deep bruises, cuts, bullet wounds. A grotesque, chilling tapestry of injuries.

"Perfect combat skills. Precise environmental awareness. Predicting enemy behavior."

His voice took on a near-pleased lilt. "That's how I became the president's alternate primary attacker."

"Every time I finished a fight, every time new wounds appeared on my body, the chairman himself bandaged me. Proof that I had created value for him on the battlefield."

"The more scars I bear—the more valuable I am to the president."

"And you—"

Opposite him, Muke raises his hands, his leather-clad feet spinning against the ground.

Almost instantly, the older, more mature [Muke] appears before him.

In a seamless motion, he lifts a hand, snatches the dagger from Muke’s grasp, and slashes it toward his neck.

Muke reacts instantly, leaning back to evade the strike while flipping his palm in a swift recall of his weapon.

[System Alert: Player Muke recalls his skill weapon.]

The dagger in [Muke's] hand flickers, its form wavering as if on the verge of vanishing. Yet in the split second before it does, the man moves—so fast that even the system struggles to register his motion.

At the exact moment Muke recalls his weapon, [Muke] grips his own dagger and reverses the strike, carving a deep, bloody gash across his counterpart’s neck.

Blood spatters onto the surface of [Muke's] gold-rimmed glasses.

Lowering his gaze, he speaks in a tone laced with cold disdain. "Your mediocrity and incompetence have squandered the President’s favor."

He tilts the dagger, the blade gleaming with fresh blood.

"I will kill you myself—with the weapon he entrusted to me."

How to Own Five Building

Zone B

Liu Jiayi crawled out of the cemetery building, her face tense. She crouched low, hands and knees on the ground, then sprang forward in a sudden burst. She rolled midair, narrowly avoiding a tentacle that lashed out from the cemetery, aiming for her ankle. As she landed, she struck with precision, severing the tentacle. It recoiled violently, retreating back into the darkness.

In her right hand, Liu Jiayi clutched a white land certificate, its edges slightly crumpled from the fight. Blood stained her face—whether her own or the enemy's was uncertain. Her lips pressed into a thin line as she turned her sharp gaze toward the cemetery's exit.

Behind her, the cemetery exhaled a thick, black mist laced with poison. From within, the eerie hissing of a monster's corroding body echoed, distorted and agonized.

Liu Jiayi was the first of her team to secure a land certificate.

She had used her Poison Fountain ability to kill the developer monster lurking below. It wasn't ideal—she had wanted to conserve her ability for later, waiting for the cooldown to reset. Given enough time, she could have whittled the monster down through other means. But Bai Liu had been out of contact for too long. Something must have happened to that guy.

She took two sharp breaths, adjusted her grip on the land certificate, then strapped on her skates. Without hesitation, she shot forward, heading at full speed toward Zone C.

A lone figure, a small girl racing through a graveyard at night, arms swinging as she moved—it was a strange, eerie sight. But what was even eerier was the silent, creeping mist that had begun to gather behind her.

It moved unnaturally, as if alive. A shadow trailing her every step, closing in like Death itself, cloaked and patient.

Liu Jiayi came to an abrupt stop. Her instincts screamed at her. She reached behind her, fingers curling around two vials of poison. Without turning her head, she swiftly slid backward, dodging the encroaching mist. Her gaze locked onto a point within the cemetery.

“Who’s there?” she demanded, her voice sharp and cold.

A voice answered, hollow and amused.

"Finally, I've waited until you used your big move."

From within the mist, the faint silhouette of a woman emerged. Her voice was slightly slurred, as though she were chewing on something, and a teasing smile laced her words.

"Not that I couldn’t have killed you earlier," she continued lazily, "but I like to maximize enemy casualties while minimizing effort."

She chuckled. "It's basic witchcraft, isn't it?"

Liu Jiayi wasted no time. She threw a vial of poison directly at the mist.

The two poisonous mists—hers and the enemy’s—collided, forming a stark dividing line between them. A powerful wind erupted from the point of impact, blowing outward in both directions. The vegetation caught in the crosswinds withered instantly, blackening and curling in decay.

The opposing mist was swept back, revealing the woman standing inside it.

The moment Liu Jiayi got a clear look at her, she didn’t hesitate. She turned on her heel, stomped twice on her skates, and shot off in the opposite direction.

A light, appreciative laugh followed her retreat.

"A good decision," the woman mused. "A witch's first rule of survival—when faced with an opponent beyond your ability, secure an escape."

Her tone turned sly.

"But what if your opponent is just as clever?"

A crisp snap of fingers echoed in the darkness.

"Like this."

One by one, the cemetery buildings around Liu Jiayi erupted with toxic fog, converging inward. Every escape route was sealed, until only a small, empty patch remained at the center—her last safe zone.

Liu Jiayi tried twice to break through. Both times, she was forced back, gritting her teeth in frustration.

Eventually, she stopped, turning toward the woman who was now strolling leisurely toward her.

Now fully visible, the woman's appearance was eerily familiar.

She was Liu Jiayi—an older version.

Her short hair was cut in two layers, one framing her ears and the other at her nape, tucked back casually. She wore a clashing red-and-blue athletic top over matching shorts, but layered it with an oversized sweatshirt that hung loosely to her waist. Graffiti-colored sneakers and white socks—pulled just high enough to stand out—completed the look.

Her figure was lean and muscular, toned from intense physical activity. A black thigh strap wrapped around her right leg, a belt slung diagonally across her waist. Poison-filled test tubes were clipped to both, their inky liquid shifting ominously under the dim light.

On the skin beneath her leg ring, a reversed cross tattoo, palm-sized, was etched in dark ink.

She chewed bubble gum absentmindedly, blowing and popping bubbles in a lazy rhythm. Slung over her shoulder, she dragged an unconscious woman—Shi Qian.

With an easy smile, she raised a hand in greeting.

"Hello, little blind girl who can't run away."

She tilted her head. "You've figured out who I am, right?"

Liu Jiayi slowly hid a poison vial behind her back, her expression impassive.

"Isn't it a little sad to be your own enemy when you're only eight years old?" she asked coolly.

The older [Liu Jiayi] grinned, casually tossing Shi Qian aside like discarded baggage. She crouched down, meeting Liu Jiayi's gaze at eye level.

Her left hand lifted, cupping Liu Jiayi's face with a gentle, almost affectionate touch.

"Isn't it only natural for a big sister to bully her little sister?"

Liu Jiayi leaned away, barely avoiding the contact. Out of the corner of her eye, she checked the poison vials in her right hand.

“Big sister,” she said icily, “don’t you think this is overkill? You’ve got five poison test tubes ready—I’ll be dead in one hit.”

“Ehh? Is that so?” The older [Liu Jiayi] smirked, tilting her head.

"But that’s how my brother and I used to play before he died."

Her voice was casual, almost playful.

"He had so much fun. In the end, he even plucked out his own eyes and begged me to use them before he died."

She opened her eyes wide, showcasing their pristine condition. A slow, joyful smile spread across her lips.

“Well, he gave me these eyes. Not bad, huh?”

Liu Jiayi’s breath hitched. Her fingers instinctively curled around the rag doll at her side, gripping it tightly—then just as quickly, she forced herself to release it.

Across from her, the older [Liu Jiayi’s] gaze flickered downward.

She saw the doll.

Her pleasant smile vanished in an instant.

"You still have that disgusting thing?" Her voice was lower now, more dangerous.

Her eyes darkened. "You’re not still keeping Liu Huai alive in your heart, are you? Bai Six didn’t help you execute him?"

Liu Jiayi inhaled sharply. "He’s dead."

She exhaled. "Bai Liu never helped me kill my brother. He kept saving him."

The older [Liu Jiayi] let out a sharp, derisive snort.

"That guy helped you save someone? Bai Six?" She sneered. "Please. He was just playing you. Luring you into killing someone for him."

Liu Jiayi looked up, her expression shifting as if she had just realized something. She raised her small face and smirked nastily at her older counterpart across the room, pulling a slight grimace.

"Because my brother is hell-bent on dying for me."

She tilted her head, her voice carrying a hint of derision. "My brother is different from yours. He died after killing a bad father for me."

Across the room, [Liu Jiayi]—her older self—stared at the younger girl's tense expression for a few seconds. After seemingly confirming that she wasn't lying, her face went blank. Then, without hesitation, she backhanded five test tubes of poison, smashing them onto the floor.

The air instantly turned noxious. Liu Jiayi moved quickly—holding her breath as she secured his mask, connecting the antidote spray to its nozzle. She pressed the canister twice, inhaling two deep breaths of the antidote.

Even so, her life bar flickered downward before climbing back up at an agonizingly slow pace.

Just one breath and it's already affecting me. This woman's poison is terrifying!

From within the thickening mist, an eerie voice echoed from all directions, ethereal and taunting—like a witch chanting a curse.

"Like me, you had a foolish father and a brother who believed until the very end that he loved you. And a Bai Six who keeps using whatever is left of your worth—your anger, your emotions—to bait you into helping him kill, into doing his dirty work.

"And since we're creatures bound by the same fate, my last scraps of sympathy compel me to make your death a little easier."

The toxic fog clung to Liu Jiayi's dress, corroding the fabric along with the doll strapped to her waist. She glanced around warily before responding, her voice cold.

"Thanks for your compassion, big sister, but you should save your pity for yourself."

Her expression remained unreadable as she continued, "Before my brother died, he made a soul deal with Bai Liu—to make sure Bai Liu would treat me as family."

"And Bai Liu has done just that."

"He got me out of the orphanage. He found me adoptive parents. He introduced me to his friends."

Liu Jiayi spoke evenly, her tone unwavering. "Whatever the circumstances, Bai Liu has never once asked me to kill anyone."

She tilted her head slightly. "Sympathy usually comes from those who are better off, looking down on those who aren't."

"So from that perspective, Big Sister... shouldn't I be the one sympathizing with you?"

The swirling poison mist shuddered—stunned into stillness. But only for a moment.

Then, in the next breath, it surged.

The older [Liu Jiayi], standing in the center of the room, met her gaze with an unreadable expression. Slowly, she spread her hands, then closed them into fists.

"Poison Fountain."

In an instant, the black mist thickened—solidifying into a liquid mass—and erupted from the ground, rushing forward to engulf Liu Jiayi!

Zone A

Mu Sicheng spat out a mouthful of dirt, grumbling as he pulled himself up. "Damn, the cemetery buildings in Area A are way too crowded! And full of big family plots, too."

He dusted himself off with a scowl. "Do rich people really like keeping their whole family together from life to death? So many monsters around—how the hell am I supposed to find that rotten cemetery building Bai Liu mentioned…?"

Muttering to himself, he pushed off the ground with one hand, flipping upright with practiced ease, ready to land firmly—

A slow, teasing whistle cut through the air behind him.

"Hey, is this what you're looking for, kid?"

The moment Mu Sicheng's foot touched the ground, his hands morphed into sharp claws. Instinct kicked in—he flipped back, retreating a dozen meters in an instant, widening the space between himself and the voice. His eyes locked onto the source. "Show yourself!"

A chuckle followed, dripping with amusement. "Nice reflexes. I thought the little boss of this world was so pampered he'd turn you soft."

Mu Sicheng's gaze snapped to a figure crouched lazily on a gravestone.

The moonlight silhouetted the man’s form, casting his features in partial shadow. All that was visible was the curve of a smirk and one eye, gleaming red under the pale glow.

That face—it was familiar. And yet, unnervingly foreign.

The man leaped down effortlessly, striding toward Mu Sicheng with one hand tucked in his pocket. With the other, he waved a piece of paper.

"You’re looking for the land certificate, right?" He smirked. "I've got it."

As he stepped fully into the moonlight, Mu Sicheng's breath hitched. His entire stance stiffened before he barked, "Who the fuck are you?!"

The man was draped in an oversized brown fleece, the hem of his dark yellow woolen coat flaring as the wind caught it. It was unbuttoned, revealing a sports-style top underneath—a mismatched combination as if he'd grabbed whatever was closest in his wardrobe.

His canvas pants were tucked neatly into high boots, and his hands glinted with seven or eight silver rings, each bearing a reverse cross turned at different angles.

"Who am I?" The man laughed like he'd just heard the funniest joke in the world. "You’re looking right at me, and you’re still asking?"

He took another step forward.

The night breeze ruffled his coat as he walked with a lazy, unhurried gait, but every movement was precise. His muscles shifted beneath his clothes, the kind of controlled strength that reminded Mu Sicheng of a lion—casual, but always ready to strike.

Then, in the moonlight, his red eyes gleamed like embers.

"Obviously, I'm you, Mu Sicheng."

A crushing wave of pressure rolled off the man, instinctively forcing Mu Sicheng back two cautious steps. His mind raced.

If I can't fight, I have to run.

That was Bai Liu's first rule for survival—preserve your strength. Find an escape route. With his speed, he could still make it out—

The man tilted his head, watching him with amusement. "Running off would be boring. I'm not here to fight you."

Mu Sicheng faltered mid-step, eyeing him warily.

The man smirked, lifting the land certificate between two fingers—then let go.

Mu Sicheng's eyes followed it as it fluttered toward the ground. Then the man's boot came down on it.

It felt like the sole of his shoe had pressed right onto Mu Sicheng's nerves.

"I haven't had a fun run-in with a boss like this in a while," the man mused, his grin sharpening. "Meeting in the guild every day is getting dull. How about we play a game?"

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes. "What kind of game?"

The man's grin widened. "One that you and I would both enjoy."

"Steal the Game."

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched slightly. His pupils darkened, and this time, he fully turned to face the other man. "How do we play?"

"Simple." The other [Mu Sicheng] rolled his shoulders, stretching like he was just getting comfortable. He exhaled a slow, relaxed breath before meeting Mu Sicheng's gaze.

"I'll stand right here. No skills, no monster book form, no moving my feet. I'll only use my hands."

He pointed at the ground beneath his boot. "And you—" his smirk turned downright taunting, "—can use any trick you want. If you manage to steal the land certificate from under my foot, I'll let you go. Deal?"

Mu Sicheng hesitated for a beat. Then he rolled up his sleeves, a sharp grin breaking across his face.

"Alright then," he said, eyes burning with challenge. "Let's play."

Zone C

The two whips, one black and one white, collided mid-air for a moment before bouncing off to either side with tremendous force. They slammed into the sides of the building, creating two deep dents. The building struck by the black whip cracked along its fracture and slowly collapsed, like tofu being sliced in half with a knife.

Dust and debris filled the air as buildings around the clearing toppled inward, adding to the chaos.

In the center of the destruction, two men flew toward each other. They whipped their weapons through the thick smoke and dust, creating a clear space around them. In the next instant, they met on the ground, their whips clashing with such force that a black crack appeared in the air, quickly closing again.

Bai Liu and Bai Six, both wearing leather gloves, gripped their whips in one hand while using the other to block their opponent's attack.

The black and white whips nearly ignited as they met. In the faint glow of the fire, Bai Six raised his eyes, catching sight of the cold-faced Bai Liu. He suddenly let out a soft laugh.

"How about we make a bet?" Bai Six suggested. "How about a bet on which of my team members will kill your team member first?"

As soon as the words left his mouth, Bai Six slid upward, retracting his whip. In one swift motion, he dropped his body low and thrust upwards, aiming to strike Bai Liu.

The whip in Bai Liu's hand vanished, and his gloved hands transformed into sharp monkey claws. His fingers meshed together to form a clawed blade that grazed diagonally across Bai Liu's shoulder.

Bai Six narrowly avoided the blow, then swiftly countered with a claw strike. He dropped his gaze to Bai Liu, his smile softening. "I'd guess the first one will be Mu Sicheng."

Bai Liu's evasion speed wasn't fast enough to avoid Bai Six's attack. The claw pierced his shoulder, and before he could react, Bai Liu swung his whip outward, forcing the claw from his flesh.

The monkey claw was violently pulled from Bai Liu's shoulder, and blood instantly soaked through his shirt at the wound.

Bai Six, now a distance away from the swing of Bai Liu's whip, nonchalantly withdrew his dripping bloodied monkey paw. He continued his approach through the dust, asking casually, "Who do you think will be the first to die?"

Bai Liu didn't answer. The only sound in the haze was the steady drip of his blood falling to the ground.

[System Warning: Player Mu Sicheng's life expectancy continues to drop, now at 27!]

Mu Sicheng was thrown, crashing into four or five tombstones. He coughed up a mouthful of blood and staggered, clutching at the tombstones to pull himself up. His knees were weak, and he failed to stand twice, eventually collapsing into a half-kneel. His blood-stained eyes locked onto the distant figure of his other self, who carelessly stepped on a land certificate.

"...This is terrifying," he thought, barely able to grasp the extent of the power behind the hands that had just struck him. Can his hands really have this much strength?

Across from him, his other self stood—left foot on the land certificate, the ground beneath him untouched, even as he yawned, a tear leaking from his eye. "71 attempts… still going?" he muttered.

Mu Sicheng swallowed the blood rising in his throat, and with difficulty, he forced himself to his feet. His head hung low, and his fists clenched. What would Bai Liu do? he wondered. If he were here, after losing forty points of health, would he keep fighting or retreat?

Was the decision I just made the right one? Should I keep going?

"Hey, no choice, huh?" Across the room, his other self waved lazily. "I'll fall asleep if I don't get this over with."

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, drawing a deep breath, and just about turned away.

"Running away?" the other [Mu Sicheng] taunted, hands behind his head. "Not so smart to know how to defend yourself. If it were me, I wouldn't be dumb enough to complete Bai Six's mission."

"He's an inhumane guy, just like Liu Huai. They're not worth all the effort you've put in."

"Don't waste your time with people like that."

Mu Sicheng, half-turned, froze. His eyes flared with anger as he snapped his head up. His fist clenched tight, and he charged forward. "Don't you dare talk about my friend like that!"

"They're not the ones who suck!" he shouted.

[System Alert: Assassins and thieves, what a lousy name!]

[Eh? Does it suck? I think it's fine!]

Liu Huai scratched his head, smiling awkwardly at Mu Sicheng. "I thought it'd be cool to bring along Fourth Brother's Thief for the title."

[Rangers and Monkeys, what a shitty name. Bai Liu, go to hell!]

[Can we even win in the end?]

Bai Liu, calm as ever, turned to him. "That's not for you to worry about."

"Just do what you need to do. I'll take care of the rest."

"We're going to win."

"I don't care! Let's bet on it! Just die already!!!"

Bai Liu was always able to find a way to save the situation.

Tears filled Mu Sicheng's eyes as he lifted his fist and hurled it at the other [Mu Sicheng's] face. "For the 72nd time!!!"

The older [Mu Sicheng] easily dodged, his shoulder shaking with the movement. When Mu Sicheng's fist landed, it shifted into a monkey's paw. His eyes burned with focus as he aimed for the land certificate beneath his opponent's feet.

This was just a diversion—his real goal was still to steal the certificate.

The older [Mu Sicheng] raised an eyebrow, squatted down, and moved his knee to block Mu Sicheng's paw. He grabbed it effortlessly, folding Mu Sicheng's arm inwards as if snapping chopsticks.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng's life value has dropped to 20!]

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, blood rushing in his throat. He rolled over to try again, but the older [Mu Sicheng] swiftly grabbed his monkey paw and threw him out, just as he had before.

One more throw, and Mu Sicheng might be dead.

But as he was thrown, Mu Sicheng managed to cling to the older [Mu Sicheng's] shirt, the pain from his broken monkey paw unbearable.

The older [Mu Sicheng] raised an eyebrow and then seized Mu Sicheng's shoulders, twisting them as if to snap him in half.

"All those times your arms have been broken, and you still haven't learned," the older [Mu Sicheng] said coldly. "This time, I'll teach you a hard lesson."

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, his body squirming. He dug deep and bucked against the older [Mu Sicheng's] grip, his shoulders dislocated by the force. When they came free, Mu Sicheng's pupils widened, and he fell straight to the ground.

"You've had your monkey paw taken so many times by your so-called friends, and you still don't get it. Now you don't have one at all," the older [Mu Sicheng] said, crouching over him and poking his face in boredom. "The game is over."

Mu Sicheng's shoulders brushed the ground as he struggled to move, inching forward toward the older [Mu Sicheng] as if he planned to try again.

The older [Mu Sicheng] finally looked mildly bored. "I'm sick of your so-called friends. Come at me again, and I'll really kill you."

Bruised and battered, Mu Sicheng looked up, a smug grin on his face despite the dirt that covered him. He had the land certificate in his mouth. "I stole the land certificate from under your feet. I won!"

The older [Mu Sicheng's] pupils narrowed in shock.

He did it on purpose.

Mu Sicheng knew that the breaking of his arms was a psychological weakness between them. Every time his arms were broken, not only did he suffer, but his tormentor did too.

And in that moment of psychological negligence, Mu Sicheng had played dead, gnawing at the dirt beneath him with his mouth, all to retrieve the land certificate.

Mu Sicheng knew that no version of himself, no matter the timeline, would ever lie at another's feet to let Bai Six claim a land certificate from under him.

But in this worldline, how had he become so willing to do this to Bai Liu?

The older [Mu Sicheng] pondered for a moment.

When he didn't respond, Mu Sicheng—still lying on the ground—grew uneasy. He clenched his teeth, still fearful of losing the land certificate. He called out, "Hey! Are you going to let this slide?"

Across the room, the older [Mu Sicheng] snapped back to his senses. He lowered his head, locking eyes with the slumped Mu Sicheng. After a few seconds, he broke into a low, disdainful laugh. "I may be a fool, but you did win."

Mu Sicheng's eyes lit up as the older [Mu Sicheng] slapped him on the head, stood up, and turned away, casually waving at him with one hand in his pocket.

"I failed my mission. I'll go collect my punishment from my boss. He's probably going to whip me to death."

"Your boss is good," [Mu Sicheng] muttered.

The older [Mu Sicheng] glanced back at him. "He taught you well. Even after what you did, you pulled it off quite handsomely."

Mu Sicheng blinked in confusion. "????"

Is that a fucking compliment or is that a slur?

Zone C

The black whip slithered like a cobra, its head raised, slipping between Bai Liu's cuff and the skin of his wrist. It wound its way from his wrist bone up to his shoulder. With a swift motion, bone spines shot out from both sides, embedding into his flesh and bone.

Bai Six yanked the end of the whip, pulling it forward with a downward pressure of his wrist. It seemed gentle at first, but the force was enough to lift Bai Liu's entire body off the ground.

The whip tightened instantly around Bai Liu's arm, spinning like a leaf blade in a juicer, tearing the flesh and bone of his left arm to shreds.

Dragged toward Bai Six, Bai Liu was forced to meet his gaze. Bai Six smiled softly and spoke, “The first step is to disarm and pull out your opponent’s arms, right?”

This was what Bai Liu and Yuan Guang had discussed before, but now Bai Six said it with a casual, almost teasing tone.

“But surrendering our weapons won't do much for us, will it?”

As Bai Six’s words left his lips, Bai Liu darted away. Bai Six smoothly sidled up to him, producing a bottle of antidote from his shirt pocket. He drank it down coolly, and in moments, his shattered arm began to heal.

“It’s hard to make an enemy of yourself,” Bai Liu said, his smile thin as he watched Bai Six retract his bloodied black bone whip. "I can usually get the upper hand with experience, but it doesn’t seem easy to beat you.”

“I’m sure you feel the same way.”

Bai Liu wiped the blood from his lips, returning a faint, “Fine.”

The smile on Bai Six’s face deepened. “Because you knew from the start you couldn’t beat me, so you didn’t even try, right?”

“You’re just stalling for time. What are you waiting for?”

“You didn’t use your own team’s moves from the start, leaving room for them to survive. You’re not waiting for them to win and come to your aid, are you?”

Bai Liu didn’t deny it. His voice remained calm. “They’re more likely to beat your men than I am to beat you, at least.”

Bai Six’s expression turned playful. “You think they’re better than my players?”

“No,” Bai Liu replied steadily. “I think they’re nowhere near as strong as your players—no comparison at all. But compared to the difference between you and me before, if this match must be a bet—”

“I’m betting on them to win.”

“So that’s it?” Bai Six chuckled, his lips curling with amusement as the whip in his hand morphed into a short, dark dagger. He twirled it casually between his fingers before holding it firmly in a backhand grip. “That sounds like a pretty good plan.”

Bai Liu’s gaze flicked to the dagger. He recognized it. It was Liu Huai’s dagger.

In this world, Bai Six hadn’t passed Liu Huai’s skills on to Muke, but had instead claimed them for himself.

Bai Six smirked. “I thought it was you who had developed a strange sense of protectiveness over these useless players who sold their souls to you?”

Bai Liu met his gaze without flinching. “Isn’t it natural for an owner to protect their property?”

Bai Six took a step closer, his expression hidden as dust kicked up around them. His soft laugh filtered through the air.

“Is it just a desire to protect property?”

“Property is most valuable when it’s properly consumed, just like money,” Bai Six mused. “Circulation and consumption give it value.”

His laughter seemed to echo from all directions.

“I’ve never seen a Bai Six who just collects possessions without spending them. That kind of miserliness isn't something a smart person would do. You know that better than anyone—"

"The intense protectiveness you feel goes beyond that. It's irrational. It stops you from seeing them as mere property."

[System Alert: Player Bai Six has loaded player Liu Huai's panel. Note: Player Liu Huai is in a death ghost state in reality, self-aware, and can use this player's panel. Bai Six can use Liu Huai's personal skill, Flash Strike, to instantly move anywhere on the map.]

As the words faded into the air, Bai Liu heard the crack of something sharp cutting through the air from just behind his ear.

A black-gloved right hand rested lightly on Bai Liu's shoulder. Bai Liu's face broke through the fog, and his eyes locked with Bai Six's, a smile lingering just behind his ear.

Bai Liu's left hand gripped his neck as the tip of the dagger rested against his skin. Bai Six slowly raised the blade, forcing Bai Liu to lean back against his shoulder, forcing him to listen.

Bai Six whispered, his voice tinged with amusement. "You don't want to spend these possessions, do you?"

"You've got feelings for them, Bai Liu."

Before Bai Six could finish his sentence, Bai Liu's hand snapped back, gripping the dagger. Warm blood gushed, staining the crooked reverse cross pattern drawn on his collarbone.

The pattern absorbed the blood, faintly glowing, turning ever so slowly.

Bai Liu swiped the dagger upwards behind him, breaking free from Bai Six's hold. Without missing a beat, he followed through, using the whip to smash through the five surrounding buildings.

In the chaos that followed, Bai Liu took shelter in one of the buildings, clutching his bleeding throat. He leaned against the wall, calmly pouring the last bottle of antidote into his mouth.

This was his final antidote. If he needed more, he'd have to access Liu Jiayi's panel—meaning Liu Jiayi couldn't use her skills.

Bai Liu closed his eyes and took two deep breaths, hearing Bai Six's footsteps growing closer as he entered the building.

Bai Six wiped the blood from his dagger, his tone casual. “Still stalling?”

“If I’m right, that antidote was your last. But of course, you could always use one of your teammates’ skills to get more.”

Bai Six’s laughter was almost mocking. “But I can’t guarantee your little teammate’s survival. She doesn’t seem too good at poison skills, does she?”

Bai Liu remained silent.

“That’s pretty cool,” Bai Six continued, his tone almost complimentary. “You’re clearly driven by emotion, but you look so calm, as though you don’t care about her at all. If I weren’t you, I might even believe you.”

“But this choice of yours—letting your players go against me—is the only one that could flip the tables and win me over.”

“They have a weakness. I don’t anymore.”

Bai Six smiled. “God has no weaknesses, and what has no weaknesses is invincible. You’ve made the right call.”

“But do you want to hear my judgment?”

Bai Six moved closer, the dagger vanishing once more and turning back into the black bone whip. Bai Liu stepped slightly aside from the wall, his eyes darkening. He gripped the bone whip firmly, and as Bai Six spoke again, Bai Liu struck the wall with a brutal swing.

A black and white bone whip lashed out almost simultaneously, shattering the wall with a deafening crash. The force of the impact sent the whips meeting in midair as the wall crumbled.

Bai Liu yanked the bone whip back sharply, his eyes cold. His left hand moved swiftly, blocking the whip’s trajectory just in time. Bai Six, however, was quick—he spun the whip, launching it at Bai Liu with a speed almost too fast to follow.

The impact slammed Bai Liu into the wall, a deep dent forming in the structure behind him. Blood pooled rapidly, staining his shirt a dark red.

Bai Six dragged the whip toward Bai Liu, who now lay with his head bowed, blood pouring from his wounds. Pools of it gathered around him.

“My verdict,” Bai Six mused, “is that your second dead teammate will be Muke.”

Zone D

Muke was struck by a powerful backhand to the sternum, sending him crashing into the wall. After two violent coughing fits, he staggered, struggling to get back on his feet.

Before Muke could even rise, [Muke] stepped on his shoulder with a crushing force. His leather shoe pressed down little by little, forcing Muke's shoulder to the ground. Eventually, the pressure was so intense that Muke's entire body was pinned, his face forced into the floor, and [Muke] didn't stop, still pushing harder.

Muke's shoulder cracked audibly under the weight, and spasms of pain shot through his back. He braced himself against the floor, gritting his teeth as he tried to push himself up, only to be stomped on again by [Muke].

Looking down at Muke’s struggling form, [Muke] sneered, his voice cold and contemptuous. "What a fragile, ugly body. So worthless it makes me sick just looking at it."

He continued with a mocking tone, "I don't know how you had the nerve to stand next to the president with that pathetic body, reaching for the dagger he handed you."

Still pressing down hard, [Muke] crushed Muke's shoulder further. In agony, Muke curled up, choking and coughing twice.

The pain surged through Muke's body, clouding his thoughts. His vision blurred, and he felt his consciousness slipping away.

Without warning, [Muke] grabbed Muke by the hair, yanking him up so their eyes met. His voice was icy. "Where is your dagger? Show it to me."

"You better take it out now, or I'll end your worthless life quickly," [Muke] threatened.

Muke, battered and bloodied, was momentarily disoriented. His hazy vision flickered across the room as he tried to focus. Then, he remembered—his dagger, his weapon of skill.

If he could just draw it, he could fight back.

Muke fumbled desperately for his dagger, but his movements were sluggish and uncoordinated compared to [Muke's] speed and combat experience. Before he could make his first strike, the dagger was ripped from his hands, already in [Muke's] possession.

Realizing the dagger was nothing more than a weapon taken by [Muke], Muke stopped trying to summon it. His opponent was far more skilled, and the dagger, in his hands, was useless.

It was a gift from Bai Liu. And yet, it had been taken from him over and over again.

The realization hit Muke: he truly was as worthless as [Muke] claimed.

The broken fingers of Muke's right hand twitched weakly, blood dripping from his shirt as he spat a mouthful of blood into [Muke]'s face. With a hoarse voice, he growled, "I will never use the dagger again. You can torture me all you want."

"Even if you torture me to death, I'll never let you touch the dagger Bai Liu gave me."

The sneer on [Muke's] face deepened as he tilted his chin slightly, staring down at the bloodied Muke.

Muke struggled to twist his lips into a cruel grin. "Because that's what Bai Liu gave me."

"The one you don't deserve in that world, and the one you don't deserve to touch in this one."

"Bai Liu thinks I have something worthy of it. So I do." Muke's laughter grew louder, more unrestrained. "You, jealous and unskilled, are worth no more to your president than one of my daggers, aren't you?"

The look on [Muke]'s face darkened, his expression icy with rage. But, as if mastering himself, he returned to his calm demeanor. He slowly took a silk scarf from his suit pocket and wiped the blood from his face. His eyes narrowed dangerously. "It seems my patience has given you the confidence to speak out of turn."

"In that case, the game ends here."

With a swift motion, [Muke] ripped the bandage from around his neck, using it to wrap around Muke's throat. His gaze burned with fury. "Die."

Muke clutched at the tightening bandage around his neck, his airway constricting as the pressure nearly crushed his slender neck. His vision darkened, his struggles becoming weaker.

The shadows on the walls shifted as Muke's feet thrashed in a desperate attempt to break free. But slowly, those movements faded.

And then—

The headless body of the shadow collapsed, its head rolling twice across the floor before it came to rest near the leg of a mahogany table. Blood poured from the severed neck, pooling beneath the lifeless torso.

Unmoved, [Muke] lowered his gaze, retrieving the bandage and speaking softly into his cufflinks, now adorned with jeweled gems. "Chairman, mission accomplished. I'll be back shortly."

The headless body, still lying in a pool of blood, twitched twice. The hand of the corpse moved feebly as if trying to grasp something.

[System Alert: Player Muke's life expectancy is rapidly decreasing! 22... 17... 13... Warning! Player's life expectancy is below 10!]

Muke's head rested against the table leg as he stared deathly at the retreating [Muke]. His eyelids fluttered, slowly closing, as a thousand memories collided in his mind.

"What are the essentials of an assassin?" Muke nervously folded his legs together, sitting in the conference room at the Wandering Circus. "Sorry to waste your time, but I'd love to ask: what does Bai Liu think makes the best assassin? I want to know where I fit in."

The meeting room was empty except for Muke and Bai Liu, sitting across from him.

Bai Liu leaned back in his chair, his hand resting thoughtfully on his chin. "I don't really like assassins."

Muke was about to tear up. "Eh? Bai Liu doesn't like assassins?!"

"Well, most of the time, an assassin means sacrifice," Bai Liu continued, meeting Muke's gaze. "Using everything to lower your opponent's guard, waiting for the final blow in humiliation. Even the best assassins often end up in the same boat." He paused, then added, "That's not my style. I wish there was more left to it."

Muke bit his lower lip. "Then... I'll give up... being an assassin, I guess... for a different path."

Bai Liu interrupted him calmly. "Do you like being an assassin?"

Muke froze, lowering his head. Slowly, he clenched his hands on his knees and whispered, "I didn't like it before... because it meant living a little longer..."

He paused, his voice faltering. "But seeing Liu Huai fighting so desperately for what he wanted... It made me think..."

Muke hesitated again, his tone softening. "The person I was before never had anyone or anything I wanted to fight for... I just lived in fear of death." His voice dropped lower, barely audible. "But... if I could give everything to protect the people I cared about, like Liu Huai did... I don't think death would seem so terrible."

A tear slipped down Muke's cheek, landing on his hand. "I think being an assassin like that is... handsome," he whispered, almost to himself. "Not like me, so cowardly, so afraid of death... shining. I want to be the kind of assassin who faces death bravely for something important."

"Hmm." Bai Liu responded flatly, "Then go ahead and become one."

An assassin must be inconspicuous, unnoticed—minimizing the enemy's awareness, making them feel harmless, and then—one strike.

There is nothing like a headless corpse to put others on their guard.

[System Warning: Player Muke's life expectancy continues to drop... 8... 6...]

The headless body rose slowly from the ground, smoke swirling from its hands, forming a short, sharp black blade.

With no head, it was devoid of sight, hearing, and smell. The only thing that allowed it to sense its surroundings was touch.

The ground trembled with each step of [Muke] as he walked away, holding the dagger in one hand, his other palm flat on the ground, sensing vibrations. His twisted index finger pointed toward his target.

Muke counted silently in his mind—one step, two steps...

Patience was key. The assassin waits for the right moment.

The layout of the room was clear in Muke's mind. He knew that [Muke] had gone to retrieve the land certificate from the southeast corner, where a monster lay. Based on [Muke]'s style, Muke knew that the monster and its body would be completely destroyed before leaving. This meant [Muke] would eventually return.

Before [Muke] could turn back to deal with the headless corpse, he would first deal with the monster.

Muke paused. Now.

[System Alert: Player Muke uses Flash Strike! The player’s blood triggers a blast, doubling the damage!]

The headless body leaped from the ground, its blade driving into the adult man’s back, striking hard into his heart. [Muke]'s pupils widened in shock, an overwhelming pain spreading through his chest, causing him to freeze for a brief moment.

Sure enough!!!

He didn't treat his heart condition! That was [his] weakness, and Muke had won the bet.

Muke twisted the dagger in vengeance. If he had a head, he would have screamed, but he didn’t. Instead, he silently delivered the final blow, his entire body shaking with the force of it.

Only when [Muke] was completely motionless did Muke roll limply off his back.

Weakly, he crawled to his headless body, lying down beside it. He rummaged through his pockets until he found a half-empty bottle of antidote, pouring it down his neck.

The wound at the base of the head began to heal slowly. Muke choked and coughed, his face pale as he collapsed to the ground. The system beeped in his ears.

[System Alert: Player Muke has killed (Summoned Muke) with Muke's skill.]

Muke exhaled deeply, gripping the dagger tightly. A small, satisfied smile crept across his face as he closed his eyes.

How to Own Five Building

The black bone whip grazed the side of Bai Liu's face, leaving a large gash across the lower half of his left cheek, staining it with crimson.

Bai Liu casually wiped the blood away, a faint laugh escaping him as he raised his eyes to meet Bai Six's gaze, responding to his earlier words. "Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda, won't you continue with your prediction?"

Bai Six smiled. "So pleased to be on the receiving end of your dominant subject?"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "As far as Captain Tang is concerned, yes, it's true. His physical condition is top-notch, he's mentally stable and determined—he's at the peak of his game."

He continued, his tone shifting slightly. "With his suicide bullet skill aimed at me, it looked like he was in perfect shape to take me down, so I made sure to send him away first."

Bai Six chuckled softly. "I've never seen Captain Tang fight so well before. It's hard to look away, and you can't help but—"

He flicked his whip, which turned into smoke and dissipated into the air. Four test tubes filled with poison materialized in his fingers. He lifted his gaze to Bai Liu, his smile growing darker. "—covet such fine property you have."

With a quick flick of his wrist, he released the test tubes, which spun rapidly in the air before landing at the four corners of Bai Liu's feet, one in each direction: southeast, northwest, southwest, and northeast. The test tubes exploded on impact, releasing a dense black fog that spread and confined Bai Liu's movement.

"It's enviable," Bai Six's voice echoed from the poisonous mist, his words dripping with malice. Like a predator savoring its prey, he toyed with Bai Liu, aiming to provoke him with insults and irritation.

"Your witch seems to listen to you well enough, but mine? She's incredibly hostile toward me, and believes men are the most disgusting embodiment of desire in the world."

He paused, his smile widening. "And I'm the worst of them all."

A sharp sound sliced through the air from the left. Without glancing away, Bai Liu raised his left hand, using the handle of his whip to block the black whip that lashed out from his blind side.

The clash sent a burst of air sweeping through the poisonous fog, clearing it momentarily.

Bai Six stood less than a meter away, a relaxed smile on his face. Both hands gripped his whip, pressing it down toward Bai Liu. "It's rare that you're willing to speak with me. Although these two predictions didn't go the way I wanted, I'll share them for your benefit."

He leaned forward slightly. "The odds are that Captain Tang and the Little Witch will be seriously injured, but in the end, your Captain Tang will prevail. And as for [Jiayi], she won't kill the Little Witch."

Bai Six's smile softened, his eyes lowering. "Because [Jiayi] doesn't kill girls."

Inside the magic space.

Both Tang Erda and [Tang Erda] had gunshot wounds, but [Tang Erda] was obviously much more seriously injured.

With a complicated look in his eyes, Tang Erda glanced at his defiant self before slowly lowering his gun.

[Tang Erda]'s gun shattered and fell to the ground. He covered his right shoulder, still bleeding from the shot. His eyes darkened, and his voice became hoarse. "…Don't look at your enemy with those pitiful eyes. If you're going to do it, just kill me and get it over with!"

Tang Erda bowed his head in silence for a long time before speaking abruptly, "Su Yang's baby is 100 days old."

"I... went to see it. It was so light to hold. It didn't feel as heavy as my gun. The eyes—just like his. It was quite cute."

[Tang Erda]'s pupils contracted in disbelief, his eyes reddening almost instantly. "What are you talking about?!"

"No one from Team Three is in the game, either." Tang Erda took a deep breath, letting out a low chuckle as if something amusing had occurred to him. "These brats have been living too comfortably.

They’re a bit useless. When I had them catch the humanoid heretics before, they struggled all night and almost blew up the main office."

"Bai Liu saved the survivors from the Love Welfare Home, blew up the Rose Factory, and is now handling this copy."

Tang Erda lifted his head, locking eyes with [Tang Erda], his gaze firm. He smiled softly. "Nothing you feared ever happened."

"Everyone’s living happily, unaware of anything."

"It’s because of this happiness that I sold my soul to Bai Liu."

[Tang Erda] sneered. "This fleeting happiness is nothing more than a sugar-coated bomb Bai Six uses to buy your soul... One day, it will be taken back and shatter."

Before he could finish, tears streamed down his face.

"But even so..." Tang Erda slowly raised his gun toward [Tang Erda]. "It’s the first time I’ve seen this kind of happiness, the kind I can only dream of."

Tang Erda smiled with relief, as if he’d let go of everything. "Did I pay the price of my soul, traveling through time, hoping it would bring such fleeting happiness to everyone?"

[Tang Erda] closed his eyes, tears slipping from the corners of his eyes. He scoffed. "…You’re pathetic. I can’t believe you let... what’s his name, in the end?"

Tang Erda replied seriously, "Bai Liu."

[Tang Erda] scoffed again. "Let this Bai Liu solve all your problems for you."

"Maybe." Tang Erda smiled as he opened his clear, dark blue eyes and pulled the trigger without hesitation. "So I’m going to rush over there and fix him up now too."

"I’m sorry."

"Bang-!"

Zone B.

As the mist cleared, Liu Jiayi slumped to the ground, her face pale. She coughed weakly, her elbows propped on the ground as she struggled to rise.

[Liu Jiayi] crouched beside her, poking her forehead in annoyance and confusion, knocking her back down. "Hey, what the hell are you holding on to, you little blind girl? Just admit defeat."

Liu Jiayi glared up obstinately with her grey eyes, her mouth still defiantly moving. "Then why are you insisting on this? You've been fooling me all this time, showing me mercy more than once."

[Liu Jiayi] rolled her eyes and looked at Liu Jiayi. She suddenly saw the dirty little blind girl grin wickedly and shout in a long, drawn-out tone.

"You don’t even want to kill me, do you, big sister?"

The moment Liu Jiayi called out "Big Sister," the little girl, who had been pretending not to fight back, flung a spray of poison at [Liu Jiayi]'s face.

In response, [Liu Jiayi] pinched the spray's nozzle with a grimace, yanking it aside and tossing it away.

Liu Jiayi slammed her fist into the ground in frustration.

"You really think you can sneak attack me? And is it fun comparing poisons with me?" [Liu Jiayi] sat down, crossing her legs and dragging her cheeks with her hand. "Sure, I'm a killer, but my usual targets are grown men like Bai Six—guys with a stench of lust. I don’t kill girls."

Her eyes shifted down, locking onto Liu Jiayi’s. "And I’m not like that psycho Bai Six. I’m not interested in torturing my other self."

Sensing a chance for communication, Liu Jiayi quickly sat up, raising her hand as if to ask a question. "So why did you make such a big deal out of it in the first place?"

[Liu Jiayi] rolled his eyes. "Little sister, I’m an adult. I have to work to survive, and I work for that old beast Bai Six. He told me to kill you, and I need to give him something in return, right?"

With a click, she brought up the system panel. Liu Jiayi noticed it was playing a video—one showing [Liu Jiayi] trying to kill her.

Bored, [Liu Jiayi] gestured toward Liu Jiayi. "No, as long as you admit defeat, I'll be able to deliver soon enough."

Liu Jiayi fell into a deep silence for a moment. She subtly sensed something in [Liu Jiayi] that reminded her of Bai Liu's attitude when he was slacking off at work, doing something random just to please his boss...

"Your Bai Six would've noticed that you didn't kill me, right?" Liu Jiayi asked rhetorically. "Aren't you worried he'll come after you?"

[Liu Jiayi] shrugged, unconcerned. "Big deal, I'll die. If my soul weren't in Bai Six's hands, I wouldn't want to work for him."

"Eh." [Liu Jiayi] sighed with a weary air and continued, speaking as if recounting an old, painful memory. "When I was younger, I didn't know any better. I was so simple, tricked by that dog of a man, working my ass off for him in the league for years. All I did was earn money for his sick career, and in the end, people like me and the monkey couldn't even live freely. We couldn't escape."

Liu Jiayi's sharp eyes caught a key detail. "Monkey?"

"Yeah." [Liu Jiayi] rested his chin on his hand, humming lazily. "Mu Sicheng, my team's on good terms with him. We both want to escape. A while back, the monkey tried to sneak up on Bai Six, trying to steal back his soul note. Almost got killed by Bai Six. He was smoked and spent two months in bed."

Liu Jiayi was shocked. She tried to piece together the situation, asking with a complex tone, "Mu Sicheng, stealing Bai Six's soul note? That's crazy."

[Liu Jiayi] nodded, letting out a sultry tsk. "Only a monkey would do something that stupid. After that, I gave up completely."

Liu Jiayi narrowed her eyes. "Mu Sicheng did this, and you didn't instigate it, did you?"

[Liu Jiayi] shot her a playful look. "How can you call it reckless when it's between teammates? I just gave the monkey some 'sound advice.'"

Liu Jiayi: "…"

It was definitely something she could've done herself.

Liu Jiayi tilted her head slightly as she studied [Liu Jiayi], her gaze sharp as if searching for something. "There's something off about what you just said."

"Even if you didn't get the soul note, with your abilities—especially Mu Sicheng's movement skills—it wouldn't be hard to escape from Bai Six, would it? Why would you need your soul note stolen in order to run? It doesn't make sense."

"You're even turning away from death," Liu Jiayi pressed. "It's impossible to make a mistake here, right?"

Without missing a beat, [Liu Jiayi] turned her face slightly, resting one hand casually on her knee. She began to play with the poison test tube as if to distract herself, her lips parting slightly as she spoke.

Her long, curly eyelashes were half-lidded, obscuring the strange clarity in her eyes. Her hair fluttered gently in the breeze, and her voice, soft and almost fragile, whispered, "… It wasn't our soul notes the monkeys went after."

Liu Jiayi paused, sensing something, and abruptly looked up. "Is it my brother's?"

[Liu Jiayi] twirled the test tube in her hand, her head down, expression unreadable. Her voice was flat, devoid of emotion.

"At first, the monkey and I... we attacked Liu Huai in a fit of rage, stirred up by Bai Six. I gouged out his eyes, and the monkey cut off his hands."

"There was no regret, just the thirst for revenge, and then... emptiness."

[Liu Jiayi] slowly clenched the test tube, her voice so quiet it seemed to be carried away by the wind.

"… The emptiness, the confusion, it stretched on, lasting until we died, yet we never wanted to bring him back. But... always feeling like... something was missing…"

[Liu Jiayi] curled up on her knees, hugging herself as she murmured, "It felt like from that point on, I was living in a world where no one would ever love me again."

"We were lost in that void for years, until Bai Six found this copy of the Five Buildings, and logged us into it. The copy covered the original campus where the monkey and I had been living..."

[Liu Jiayi] slowly raised her head, her face emotionless. "That's when the monkey and I encountered a ghost—Liu Huai, with his eyes gouged out and hands severed."

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips, asking, "And then, what did he... say to you?"

"The monkey and I expected him to curse at us, or at least run away in fear, since we'd killed him so horribly," [Liu Jiayi] said, her voice trailing off as if recalling something amusing. "But instead…"

"He couldn't see or use his hands and was bullied by other ghosts. The monkey and I chased them off, and he kept bowing to us, saying thank you."

"He didn't recognize us."

"Then the monkey stepped forward and said, 'Hey Liu Huai, even after you died, you still have some spirit. I brought your sister to see you.' And that's when he broke down, crying so desperately that he could hardly stand. He asked, 'How did you die?'"

"And I said, 'You're the one who died. We're still alive and well.'"

[Liu Jiayi] lowered her head, her voice muffled as she buried her face in her lap. "Then, he laughed through his tears and said, 'It's good that you're alive. It doesn't matter if I die... as long as you're okay.'"

"The monkey and I didn't say anything on our way back. Then, suddenly, he asked me, 'Can we bring him back to life?' And I told him that Liu Huai's soul was in Bai Six's hands, and there was no way he would give it to us."

"The monkey said, 'I can't stand seeing him like this, being a ghost, a bum. I'll steal it—big deal, I'll get killed.'"

[Liu Jiayi] was quiet for a long time, her gaze fixed on Liu Jiayi, who seemed shocked. "Bai Six also came to me after the monkey was beaten, but he didn't hurt me. He knew that this kind of punishment wouldn't affect me."

She closed her eyes. "He brought Liu Huai's ghost back and handed it over to Daniel's men, so they could torture him. I watched through the glass as he was tortured in the chamber, screaming in agony the whole time."

[Liu Jiayi's] voice trembled. "He never screamed like that when I killed him."

"Bai Six stood next to me, watching calmly, and said, 'Jiayi, I know this was your idea. It won't happen again.'"

When she finished speaking, they both fell silent, the weight of the words hanging in the air.

[Liu Jiayi] let out a breath and suddenly burst into laughter. "Here's some advice, little sister: Don't work for Bai Six. It never ends well."

"But… between that and the fact that I sold my soul to him too quickly in every world line, I guess there's no point in talking to you now. It doesn't seem to help."

"Enough talking. I've had my fill of fish for today. I'll leave first."

She stood up, patting her back as if shaking off the conversation, but just as she began to walk away, Liu Jiayi grabbed her coat from behind.

[Liu Jiayi] turned around, confusion in her eyes. "What are you doing...?"

Liu Jiayi rushed up to her and hugged her tightly.

[Liu Jiayi] froze for a moment, then quickly tried to push Liu Jiayi away, teasing, "Hey, hey, little sister, don't fawn over strange big sisters. I'm a cold killer, the type who killed her own father and gouged out her brother's eyes..."

"I have a lot of people who love me now," Liu Jiayi interrupted quickly. "When I was in the orphanage, everyone called me 'Little Blind.' No one wanted to adopt me. My brother was always worried like he might leave me at any moment."

"It felt like living in constant fear of being abandoned."

"But!" Liu Jiayi exclaimed. "After meeting Bai Liu, two families fought over me, wanting me as their daughter. There is no Daniel in the team like you said, but there was a silly monkey who would buy me dresses, and a very rich young master. I had a brother from the regiment of Hearts, and they all cried when I left the team."

"They were all so nice to me. They loved me a lot."

Liu Jiayi hugged [Liu Jiayi] around the neck. "So, big sister, you're not unloved."

"You just haven't met them yet. Live well, and you will."

"Sounds..." [Liu Jiayi] responded softly, returning the hug slowly. She lowered her head and laughed quietly. "What a happy life."

"You're the happiest of all the [my] stories I've heard."

She closed her eyes. "Then, for a moment, I'll reluctantly trust you."

Zone C

Amid the rubble, Bai Six stands unharmed, his white shirt untouched by dust or blood, smiling. At a distance, Bai Liu stands with bruises marking his skin, the collars and hems of their shirts fluttering in the turbulent wind.

Around them, the buildings are collapsing slowly, steel and concrete crumbling to the ground. Dust fills the air, creating a surreal effect as the earth seems to lift while the sky falls—an apocalyptic scene, the world unraveling.

The building they are in gives way to the daylight, and golden rays of sunlight slice through the fine dust and smoke, bathing Bai Liu and Bai Six in an ethereal beam. Their faces glow in the radiant light, creating an almost unreal reflection in their eyes.

The mists behind them part.

[Mu Sicheng] and [Liu Jiayi] appear behind Bai Six—Mu Sicheng with his hands in his pockets, Liu Jiayi rubbing the back of her neck. Neither reports on their mission.

Bai Six doesn't seem surprised by their return. He simply smiles, remarking, "Looks like you didn't finish."

"MuKe should go back under the death-free card's effect. Hard work for him," he adds.

[Mu Sicheng] glances at Bai Six, yawns, and then looks away indifferently. "Been tired from sleeping too much lately. No strength to fight, so didn't finish. Boss, you gonna punish me?"

[Mu Sicheng] barely waits for a response before turning away, clearly uninterested. Liu Jiayi, on the other hand, is more respectful. She bows her head slightly, admitting fault, "I couldn't use my ranged skills well because of Shi Qian and Yuan Guang, so the opponent escaped. Sorry, I only managed to bring back the land certificate."

"Hmm," Bai Six responds, unfazed, his smile widening. "It must be nice to interact with your younger self, huh?"

Both [Mu Sicheng] and [Liu Jiayi] shift uncomfortably.

"What are you talking about, boss?" [Mu Sicheng] mumbles sleepily, pretending not to care. "What's going on?"

[Liu Jiayi] silently judges [Mu Sicheng's] poor acting while continuing to bow. "There was no exchange on my side. The other side resisted fiercely."

"Is that so?" Bai Six's gaze drifts away slowly. "I thought you'd all be in a better mood in this world line."

His eyes flicker to Bai Liu, and his smile deepens. "At least I am."

"It's been a long time since I've met someone so interesting... so worthwhile."

The atmosphere shifts. [Mu Sicheng's] expression darkens completely.

Bai Six's judgment of a person often ends with either their soul being bought by him or their life extinguished. Or, as is often the case, both.

Behind Bai Liu, four other players emerge slowly. But these four are not as pristine as Bai Six and his crew, who remain spotless.

Tang Erda looks a little better, but Liu Jiayi's clothes are blackened from the poisonous mist, her face grimy. Muke and Mu Sicheng are in far worse condition, nearly covered in blood.

"They're all here," Bai Six says, lifting his eyes, his lips curving into a smirk. "The most interesting part of this game is about to begin."

[System Alert: Player Bai Six is using player Daniel's panel to access his opponent's personal weapon.]

The whip in his hand vanishes, replaced by a grass-green sniper rifle.

The moment the gun appears, Tang Erda, [Mu Sicheng], and [Liu Jiayi] all freeze, their faces shifting with alarm.

—This is Daniel's weapon, the Soul Crusher.

"This is a gun that shatters the soul of any player it hits, with no possibility of resurrection in any world line," Bai Six says, his smile growing eerie. Holding the gun, he mimics a 'bang' gesture with his hand. "Once you're hit like this... [bang], you're gone. You no longer exist."

"The cooldown for this gun is fifteen minutes."

Bai Six looked across at Bai Liu and the circus members behind him, his smile growing. "Bai Liu, how about we play a game?"

"I have a land certificate here, which means you can't end this game of five buildings by collecting all the land certificates. The only way to end this game is through reunion—either you reunite, or your opponent does."

"Now, I'll give you two options."

Bai six gestured at [Liu Jiayi], signaling her to throw Shi Qian and Yuan Guang—both unconscious—into the middle, then raised his gun, aiming at the two people, his smile still directed at Bai Liu.

"Every fifteen minutes until the end of the game, my gun will shatter the soul of one person. But you can make a choice."

"If you decide to shatter the souls of Yuan Guang and Shi Qian, I'll give you the gun. You can shoot them yourself. If you do, the game ends, you win, and I get what I want."

Bai Six's gaze flickered between Bai Liu and the tightly tense Tang Erda. "Or, if you choose not to kill them, then I'll pick one of your team members at random every fifteen minutes."

As soon as the words left his mouth, Tang Erda raised his gun to his head, glaring at Bai Six with burning, fierce eyes.

[System Alert: Player (Rose Hunter) uses skill (Suicide Bullet).]

The silver bullet flew through Tang Erda's head in a brilliant arc, striking Bai Six's skull.

His head jerked back from the blow, and for the first time, Bai Six's white shirt was stained with blood. However, he casually righted his head as if nothing had happened. With a tap of his finger on the gun's muzzle, he let [Liu Jiayi] cast a healing skill before smiling again, unfazed. "Alright, your turn is over. The Suicide Bullet skill is on cooldown. Now, it's my turn."

Bai Six raised his gun, pointing it directly at Bai Liu's emotionless face. "Choose."

"The countdown begins… 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, time's up."

Without hesitation, Bai Six raised his gun and aimed at Mu Sicheng.

But [Mu Sicheng] stepped forward, gripping the barrel of the gun and locking eyes with Bai six. "Boss, forget it."

Bai Six's eyes slid to him, a soft laugh escaping his lips. "That's interesting. The first time I've seen you plead for your other self."

"And what's the reason?"

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath. "It's not like they have any stake in us. There's no need to go this far."

Bai six's expression turned playful, eyes narrowing. "Is that really the reason? I thought it was more like, 'At least let me see a world line where I get the friends I want.'"

[Mu Sicheng] froze for a moment, then slowly raised his bloodshot eyes to meet Bai Six's. "Even if I think that, what's wrong with it?"

"At least have a world line where they're spared," [Mu Sicheng] added, his voice strained. "Bai six, you already have so much. Allow others a little too."

Before [Mu Sicheng] could finish his sentence, his hands morphed into deadly claws, launching toward Bai Six's throat with murderous intent.

Bai Six easily evaded and then looked at [Mu Sicheng] with pity. "Once you let feelings cloud your judgment, you become a pathetic creature, clinging to misplaced values."

His eyes grew cold. "And now, there's no value left to you."

Bai Six grabbed [Mu Sicheng's] shoulder with one hand and aimed the soul-crushing gun at his abdomen with the other. Then—

"Bang!"

"Monkey!" [Liu Jiayi] cried, her pupils shrinking in horror.

Blood sprayed across Bai Six's face.

[Mu Sicheng's] eyes widened as the impact of the shot turned part of his body grey, spreading like a fire consuming him. He collapsed to the ground, convulsing, his dry, raspy screams filling the air.

Bai six casually retrieved a shattered soul note from his glove, featuring [Mu Sicheng's] eyes, now bloodshot and full of anguish.

The note slowly crumbled into dust, just like [Mu Sicheng], who dissolved into nothing.

Letting the powdery remains fall from his fingers, Bai Six said flatly, "Good work, Mu Sicheng."

[Liu Jiayi] stood frozen, her hands trembling, eyes brimming with unshed tears. Without thinking, she took a step forward.

Before she could move further, the sniper rifle in Bai Six's hand transformed into a dagger, silently pressing against her neck.

Bai six raised his eyes, offering no emotion. "Jiayi, I said it would never happen again."

The cold steel of the dagger was a sharp reminder.

—This was Liu Huai's dagger.

Bai six's silent warning hung heavy in the air.

[Liu Jiayi] clenched her fists, struggling to maintain her composure. Her voice barely steadied as she lowered her head, replying respectfully, "…Yes."

Bai six turned his attention back to the quiet team, his smile unwavering, as if the pile of ashes before him meant nothing. "One of my team members just bought you another fifteen minutes to think."

"Bai Liu, you now have fifteen minutes to choose who to kill."

How to Own Five Building

"Then you have fifteen minutes to think about it." Bai Six's wrist dropped, releasing the gun from his hand. It hit the ground and bounced slightly before he looked up at Bai Liu with a smile. "Let's play another game."

The gun struck the ground, bouncing and dissipating in a flash. In its place, a multitude of thorns erupted from the earth, growing in all directions to form a circular wall around Bai Liu and the others.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six loads player Fang Hongye's panel, using personal skill (Cage of Thorns)]

[Map-wide capture skill. Can capture all living creatures on the map and attach them to the thorns, restricting their movement for one hour.]

The weakened Liu Jiayi, Mu Sicheng, and Muke were all ensnared by the thorns, which burst from the ground and bound their limbs.

Tang Erda reacted quickly, dodging out of the way in time and drawing his gun to shoot at the thorns that had bound the wrists and ankles of the other team members.

Bai Six gave Tang Erda a disinterested glance, then twirled his index finger in the air. A pair of handcuffs appeared above him, spinning through the air.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six loads player Su Yang's panel, using personal skill (Seal Handcuffs)]

[This skill blocks all of a player's skills, reduces the panel value to half, and restricts movement for thirty minutes.]

The moment Tang Erda holstered his gun, Bai Six appeared behind him.

Before Tang Erda could react, Bai Six grabbed both of his shoulders, sliding his hands down his arms before gently pulling them back.

The handcuffs snapped with a sharp click, and Bai Six smiled. "Sorry, Captain Tang. You're under arrest for now."

Tang Erda's shoulders popped with a sickening crunch as his joints were twisted out of place. His hands were locked behind him at an impossible angle, his left hand jammed into the right-hand cuff, and his right hand tightly bound in the left-hand cuff, rendering him immobile.

The muscles in his forehead tensed as he tried to bend backward, stomping his heels into the ground in a desperate attempt to free himself. But before he could move, a thorn shot from the wall of thorns behind him, wrapping around his hands and binding him further.

Tang Erda was dragged into the thorny wall, hanging from his bound arms. A dark, hateful fire burned in his eyes as he glared at Bai Liu, who stood calmly on the ground, approaching Bai Six. He hissed, "Bai Six—! Bai Six—!"

These skills—the Thorn Cage and the Sealing Cuffs—belonged to members of the Heresy Handling Bureau! They were created to capture heretics and seal away evil. And now, Bai Six had taken them from them, using them to torment his own comrades.

Bai Six walked toward Bai Liu, his smile widening as he asked, "I haven't restricted your movement. Are you still not going to run this time?"

Bai Liu didn’t respond, merely staring at him with a quiet, steady gaze.

Bai Six nodded as if in a daze, his eyes wandering over the team members struggling in the thorny wall. His smile grew even wider. "There are no physical shackles to hold you back, but there are mental ones, aren't there?"

"You can't leave without your team."

"Bai Liu!!!" Mu Sicheng shouted from the wall of thorns, his voice frantic. He stomped his feet in rage, his face contorted. "Whatever this idiot wants to play, don't play along! It's all about death!"

Muke, bound by the thorns around his neck, struggled for breath, his body weakening. He could barely open one eye to look at Bai Liu. "Bai Liu... leave me..."

Liu Jiayi, her eyes fixed on the dissipating ashes of Mu Sicheng's form on the ground, spoke through clenched teeth. "Bai Liu, we can abstain."

“The little witch has come up with a good idea—abstain.” Bai Six nodded approvingly, his eyes crinkling into a smile. “What do you think, Bai Liu?”

There was a cacophony of voices around him, but Bai Liu slowly lifted his blood-stained eyelids and calmly ordered, “Stop struggling.”

The struggle ceased immediately. Everyone on the wall held their breath, waiting for Bai Liu’s decision.

Bai Liu paused for less than a second. “What game do you want to play?”

Mu Sicheng’s voice broke as he roared in excitement, “Bai Liu—!!!”

“A wise choice,” Bai Six said, gazing at Bai Liu with a smile. “Indeed, you could have avoided me for a moment by abstaining, so why didn’t you choose that path?”

“But as long as we’re still in this game, you’ll always be able to find us through Yuan Guang, right?” Bai Liu responded calmly. “As long as Yuan Guang exists in this world line, even if he dies, once the copy of the five buildings hits reality, you can still manipulate Yuan Guang’s panel after he becomes a ghost, and then use him to summon you. There’s no point in escaping if it doesn’t solve the problem completely.”

Bai Six raised an eyebrow, his smile widening. “But there’s a permanent solution, isn’t there?”

The green sniper rifle appeared in his hand again, and he aimed it at the head of Yuan Guang, who lay unconscious on the ground.

Bai Six smiled. “If you choose to shatter his soul, this world line of yours will escape my control forever.”

Bai Liu’s gaze briefly lingered on Yuan Guang’s face before he withdrew his eyes and asked flatly, “This choice is for the game in fifteen minutes. What’s the game now?”

Bai Six repeated Bai Liu’s words with a smirk. “There’s no point in running away from a problem that can’t be solved completely?”

Bai Liu stared at him, unmoved.

Bai Six raised his hands in a friendly gesture of surrender and smiled.

“I didn’t use the soul note you lack when we sparred earlier, out of fairness. But now—” Bai Six slowly and methodically took off his gloves, flipping them inside out to put them on. “I find that practice of holding back some of your strength disrespectful.”

Bai Liu glanced down at the gloves.

One side of the gloves gleamed slightly, as if it had been used regularly. A faint streak of blood could be seen near the silver buckle on the back of the hand, as though it hadn’t been wiped off properly.

Bai Six raised the back of his hand to Bai Liu’s face and smiled. “You may now draw a random soul note from my wallet as if it were a card.”

“You have two choices—”

Bai Six’s eyes lifted. “The first option is for me to use the skills on this soul note on your players.”

“The second option is for me to use the skills on this soul note on you.”

He offered a friendly reminder. “Don’t worry. No matter how offensive the skills on this soul note are, I’ll make sure each of you survives before the next game.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, touching the edge of his glove and pulling out a note.

He smiled, holding the note between two fingers and standing it up for Bai Liu to see. “It’s a Queen’s card, which I prefer.”

Bai Liu saw the face of Hearts on the note.

“Now, choose. Is it your teammate—” Bai Six asked with a smile, as the soul note in his hand morphed into a sharp-edged playing card, “—or yourself?”

Bai Liu looked at him calmly.

“Although I had guessed it,” Bai Six sighed, “I have to say, what a regrettable decision.”

“Do you know how poker can make people suffer the most?”

Without missing a beat, Bai Six changed the subject, his flawless smile still intact. He spoke in a tone as if sharing knowledge. “There are 78 joints in the human body, each thick enough to insert a playing card, and a dozen of those can be instantly fatal if touched.”

“A 52-card deck is just perfect for inserting into the body’s non-lethal joints.”

“What a natural, perfect set of torture tools.”

In the next moment, cards flew from the wall of thorns, their edges flashing and spinning as Bai Six’s fingertips elegantly lifted towards the center, sending the cards hurtling toward Bai Liu.

Muke’s pupils dilated.

Liu Jiayi and Tang Erda stood frozen, wide-eyed.

Mu Sicheng’s heart-wrenching voice echoed across the map: “Bai Liu —!!!”

Mid-Season Viewing Pool

At the big screen, the host was commentating rapidly, his voice edged with tension:

"We can see that the situation on the field is incredibly tight. The Killer Sequence has been employing a multi-pinning strategy since the start of the match, consistently keeping at least two players on the Deer Hunters' Joker. It’s clear they are wary of his skill weapon—the Soul Crusher."

"So far, with constant skill interruptions, the Joker has yet to land a single successful Soul Crusher strike."

The host’s eyes stayed locked on the screen as his voice rose with urgency:

"The Killer Sequence has switched defenders! They've assigned the Joker’s containment to Invincible and Spades—the most powerful and popular duo in the entire mid-season tournament. This time, they’re going all in to take him down!"

"But with sixty-three life points remaining, the Joker still holds the highest HP on the Deer Hunters’ side. While the entire Killer Sequence is focusing their fire on him, the Deer Hunters are desperately covering him, absorbing most of the damage to keep him in play."

"In a rare tactical move reminiscent of Russell Cemetery's infamous forfeit last season, the Killer Sequence has opted to bypass the one-on-one matches, heading straight into the team battle. This is likely a strategic decision to preserve their team’s immunity for the final showdown."

"After all, a player’s immunity can only be used once per tournament. If expended in a single match, it won’t be available for the team fight. But in this era of star-driven gameplay, it takes guts for Reverse God to make a tactical call that prioritizes the team over individual spectacle."

"Audiences typically prefer to see star players in high-stakes one-on-one duels, and such a direct forfeiture risks hurting popularity—a stark contrast to Russell Cemetery’s strategy last year, which resulted in a high win rate but abysmal audience appeal."

"For spectators, a match where a top player is eliminated in dramatic fashion is far more thrilling than a clean sweep. A high-profile takedown spikes engagement and instantly affects the betting pool—doubling or tanking it within moments."

"The reason the Deer Hunters' stakes remain so high this year is largely due to the Joker's ability to bypass the Death-Free Gold Medal and directly shatter souls—a skill that delivers pure, adrenaline-pumping spectacle."

"Now, in this decisive game leading into the playoffs, the Killer Sequence is betting everything on their team cohesion. Whether Reverse God and Spades can land the finishing blow on the Joker could very well determine the trajectory of their entire postseason run!"

The host barely blinked, eyes darting across the screen before he suddenly shouted—

"Reverse God is making his move!"

Inside the big screen.

Amid the shifting yellow sands, The Reverse God and Spades encircled Daniel. The Reverse God backhanded his heavy sword with a cold gaze, while Spades calmly drew his whip, the two of them cutting off all of Daniel's escape points. Then, in perfect sync, they struck.

[System Alert: Player Daniel's life value has dropped to 33.]

The announcer shouted excitedly, "Beautiful! Both attacks landed! It's a success! The clown's life has been cut straight to half!"

Daniel was sent flying into a dune, crashing hard before bouncing against the sand. Blood smeared his face mask. A strained, low laugh rattled from beneath it as he stretched out his broken arm. In his grip, a green sniper rifle materialized, the muzzle swirling with gathering points of light.

"Joker is building up his Soul Shattering Gun again! Will he succeed this time?" The host's eyes locked onto the screen. "If he does, he'll be able to shatter the soul of one of the Slayer Sequence's top players or tacticians—essentially deciding the fate of the Slayer Sequence in the playoffs!"

Without hesitation, Spades flicked his whip forward, cracking it like a lizard's tail against the gun in Daniel's hand.

At the moment of impact, Cen Buming burst out from the sand in front of Daniel, dropping to one knee. With one hand, he caught Spades' whip midair, the force of the blow driving him half a meter into the ground. His other hand pressed into the sand as he slowly lifted his gaze to meet The Reverse God and Spades.

[System Alert: Player (Buming's Executioner) uses Personal Skill (Water Well).]

[This skill traps a prisoner identified by the player in a deep well, torturing them endlessly in darkness. The prisoner remains bound until the executioner retrieves them for judgment. No prisoner has ever escaped. Judgment skill. No time limit.]

The ring on Cen Buming's middle finger flickered with an eerie black sheen, spreading outward in a circular formation.

Without warning, the sand beneath The Reverse God and Spades collapsed, revealing a deep, bottomless well. They plummeted into the abyss with a double thud.

Dark water rippled below, and an unsettling hissing sound rose from the depths.

"It's the Executioner's Water Well skill!" the host roared. "The situation has shifted once again!"

"According to public records, this well binds players, restricts movement, and drains mental value. Players who enter either die, abandon the game, or are driven to zero mental value—transforming into monsters!"

"The Executioner had never used this skill before this year, but now he's unleashed it on the mid-season circuit! His popularity has soared to fifth place!"

"Last year, Spades barely survived a similar skill from Russell's rookie player. But this—this is on a whole different level. Can Spades withstand it?"

Daniel, still grinning beneath his bloodstained clown mask, staggered toward the well. He leveled his sniper rifle at the water, about to fire —

But before he could, Cen Buming reached over and gripped the muzzle.

Daniel raised an eyebrow. Cen Buming didn't look at him. His gaze remained fixed on the well.

"Wait," he said.

The host hesitated.

"With both the Slayer Sequence's Ace and Tactician trapped, and Joker free to act, the Deer Hunters hold a complete advantage… so why is the Executioner stopping him?"

The presenter's eyes widened in sudden realization.

"Could it be… the Executioner doesn't want to kill his former tactician?!"

"Is he waiting for him to escape the well?!"

"Are the Executioners trying to poach The Reverse God back to the Deer Hunters before next season?!"

"No one has ever escaped an Executioner's well while its user was still alive… But maybe—maybe he's waiting for the well to do the killing for him?"

A hand emerged from the water.

It opened.

A heavy sword materialized in its grip.

With a single, thunderous spin, the blade cut through the well's depths in a sweeping 360-degree arc, sending all the dark water hurtling over the edges. The monsters lurking below shrieked as they were exposed, their grotesque forms writhing at the bottom.

Standing atop the heap of twisted creatures, their wet hair clinging to their faces, were Spades and The Reverse God—whip and sword poised for battle.

The Reverse God lifted his gaze, locking eyes with Cen Buming.

Cen Buming's expression was unreadable. "At my side," he said, voice low but steady. "Brother, you were never meant to be a prisoner. The well cannot hold you."

In response, The Reverse God didn't hesitate. With cold determination, he swung his sword down at Cen Buming.

Cen Buming tilted back, dodging the strike. He released his grip on the Joker's rifle, his voice cutting through the chaos—

"Kill Spades."

Instantly, Cen Buming raised his left hand. The well water surged upward, submerging the pit once more and trapping Spades beneath the rising flood.

Daniel grinned lazily. "Okay," he said, lifting his gun. Without hesitation, he pulled the trigger.

The Reverse God flinched, pivoting to intercept the shot. But Cen Buming's ringed hand locked onto the edge of his heavy sword, holding it back.

The Reverse God's gaze sharpened. With a burst of strength, he wrenched the sword free. The blade scraped against Cen Buming's ring, igniting a small burst of sparks.

Cen Buming's eyes remained cold. Without missing a beat, he lunged forward, fingers forming an eagle-claw strike aimed at The Reverse God's throat.

"Brother," he murmured.

"Didn't you teach me that basic execution etiquette demands silence? That the condemned should not interrupt their own judgment?"

The Reverse God ducked low, narrowly evading Cen Buming's attack. His sword slipped from his grip, sinking into the sand.

Gritting his teeth, he kicked the hilt—sending the heavy blade hurtling upward in a diagonal spin. The sharp edge arced through the air, aimed straight for Daniel's outstretched hand.

But Daniel only laughed.

"You fool," he teased, tilting his head just enough to dodge the incoming blade. His rifle, once aimed at the well, shifted direction in an instant—now pointing directly at The Reverse God.

"You really thought I'd just follow orders?" Daniel smirked, finger tightening on the trigger.

"Naturally, it's much more fun to kill whoever they don't want me to kill."

A green bullet shot from the chamber, hurtling straight for The Reverse God's face.

Cen Buming's pupils constricted. Without thinking, he lunged—

The Reverse God, however, didn't move.

He simply stood there, watching.

His expression remained unchanged. Calm. Almost amused.

That faint, knowing smile unsettled Daniel more than he cared to admit.

For the first time in the match, he realized—

He hadn't landed a single shot since the second half started.

It was as if…

As if The Reverse God had known all along.

As if he had already foreseen that, at this moment—

Cen Buming would step in to take the hit for him.

The Reverse God's blade slashed through empty air, missing Daniel's neck by a fraction. The heavy sword spun away with barely a pause, as if he had never aimed for Daniel in the first place. Without hesitation, the Reverse God dipped his head, letting the massive blade arc over his shoulder in another half-circle.

The sheer speed of the rotation whipped his hair across his face, obscuring his eyes. Only the faintest smile curved the corners of his mouth.

A split second before the bullet could strike Cen Buming, the Reverse God's blade, now swinging down from his left shoulder, collided with it midair. A deafening metallic clang rang out.

The green bullet split cleanly in two and fell harmlessly to the sand.

The sword's momentum didn't stop there. It carried through, slicing relentlessly forward until it plunged straight into Cen Buming's chest, pinning him to the ground.

Cen Buming grasped at the heavy sword embedded in his torso, blood seeping from the wound. His gaze, dark and unwilling, lifted to the Reverse God—the man who had just killed him.

Blood spattered across his face, the Reverse God lowered his eyes and murmured, "Rest well for now, senior brother."

[System Alert: Player (Judge Against God) has killed player (Buming's Executioner)]

A one-dimensional silence stretched across the viewing pool. The host stared, dumbfounded, at the big screen, momentarily lost for words. When he finally found his voice, it stumbled slightly, "Jedi—Jedi comeback!"

"A double kill for the Reverse God! He slashed through Soul Crusher's bullet—one of Joker's fifteen-minute skill CDs—and took down the Deer Hunter's Tactician at the same time!"

The presenter's voice shook with excitement. "All this time, we thought the Reverse God was limiting the Executioner's play, but now it seems the Deer Hunter was just as much of a restriction on him!"

"We've never seen the Reverse God this aggressive before."

"And that heavy sword—it's just... just—" The host struggled for the right word. "Its attack determination is insane! It cut through Soul Crusher's bullet! You know, Spades' bone whip is the strongest weapon known to do that, and even it can't!"

"Given the results of this match, the Reverse God's transfer was clearly beneficial for both sides. But I wonder—why did he change his name? Was it just to fit the Killer Sequence's theme? Is that why he became [Reverse Cross Cultist]...?"

The Reverse God turned his gaze toward the fleeing Daniel. Drawing his heavy sword free, he smiled kindly. "Minors really shouldn't play with dangerous heavy equipment."

[System Alert: Player (Judge Against God) has killed player (Joker)]

The well that had trapped Spades vanished. Drenched from head to toe, Spades turned to the Reverse God with his usual impassive expression. "Is it over?"

"More or less," the Reverse God replied, smiling faintly. "But the real main event isn't happening on this side."

Spades paused. The careless posture he'd held all match disappeared as he straightened, fixing the Reverse God with an unblinking stare. "Can we go there now?"

The Reverse God: "..."

Whose team are you even on?

One month earlier – The Killer Sequence Office

The Reverse God lounged on the sofa, tapping a piece of paper against his knee. His half-lidded eyes scanned the document as he muttered to himself, "Forty-one years old… Damn, that's tough. That's practically sending himself in person. This is just blatant cheating in Werewolf Killing - Bai Liu could end him..."

Suddenly, Spades' voice cut in from beside the couch. "What Bai Liu?"

The Reverse God nearly jumped. "The hell—?! Aren't you supposed to be training with the team in the play pool?!"

"I got away." Spades shook his head and stared intently at him, pressing the question. "What Bai Liu?"

The Reverse God: "..."

First time I've seen someone justify skipping training like this.

He sighed. "Fine. I do need your help if I'm going to interfere." He leaned back, rubbing his temples. "There's a big bad guy who's got his eyes on Bai Liu. I'm playing a game against him, trying to beat him at his own rules. We have an agreement—not to interfere in Bai Liu's affairs directly. I can only influence him using the cards I hold."

His expression darkened. "But that bastard exploited the system. He cheated—adjusted the world line, forced an ordinary person into the game, and backed Bai Liu into a corner until he had no choice but to summon him to win. And in doing so, he managed to interfere with Bai Liu."

Spades nodded as if he understood, then said flatly, "Then kill him."

"No," the Reverse God murmured, his gaze turning distant. "That's exactly what he wants—to be killed by Bai Liu, so Bai Liu can take his place."

Spades frowned. "Is he sick?"

The Reverse God choked on a laugh before sighing. "Not exactly. His real goal is to find the most valuable version of himself across all world lines—to have that version replace him."

The paper in his hand crinkled as he lowered it over his eyes. His voice dropped to a whisper.

"The Evil God's standard for a worthy successor isn't desire or evil—it's pain."

"But he can only create evil and desire. Every successor he's chosen was flawed, riddled with black-hole-like greed. They all failed. Corrupted. Fell into monstrosity before they could replace him. And he's sick of it."

"He wants something better—a human soul with insatiable ambition, but one that never falls for it."

"In this world line, he finally found one." The Reverse God's fingers tightened over the prophecy. "That person is Bai Liu."

"So he's going to keep pushing Bai Liu, torturing him, refining his soul through suffering. Testing him. Seeing if he can resist temptation—if his desires can be honed into something worthy enough to replace him."

"He never wanted to be an Evil God in the first place. But an existence like his—where all world lines converge into the most extreme embodiment of desire and sin—can only be replaced by something even greater."

A pause.

Spades, silent until now, finally asked, "And did he ask Bai Liu if he wanted to become an Evil God?"

The Reverse God blinked.

Spades' gaze was calm and steady. "If Bai Liu doesn't want to, then kill him."

"If Bai Liu can't kill him—then I will."

For a moment, the Reverse God just stared at him. Then, he let out a breath of laughter.

"You really are something else. No wonder Bai Liu has no idea what to do with you..." He smirked. "Hua Ganzhong told me you're so desperate to compensate Bai Liu for a Reverse Cross that it's driving him insane."

Then, abruptly, he changed the subject. "Do you know why I changed my name to [Reverse Cross Cultist]?"

Spades thought for a second, then deadpanned, "What does it have to do with me if you change your name?"

The Reverse God: "..."

It's a miracle Bai Liu puts up with this guy.

"Does my reverse cross mean a reverse cross?" The Reverse God sat up, casually grabbing a marker. He drew an inverted cross on a piece of paper, then transformed it into a standard cross with a few strokes. Smiling, he turned to Spades. "My reverse cross means to reverse the cross."

"I have a skill I haven't used in a long time. It's called [Worldline Overlap]. It's probably not all that useful anymore..."

The Reverse God's gaze dropped, his voice trailing off into a daze. "After all, the man who passed this skill on to me before he died... I can barely remember his face."

"Over six hundred worldlines... That's a long time."

He quickly snapped back to reality, turning his attention to Spades. "That's why I need your cooperation. I can't break the rules of Werewolf Killing and deliberately interfere with Bai Liu. The game needs an element of surprise—just like the other side."

"So, you tear open a spatial rift, I activate the skill, and for a brief moment, Bai Liu's game worldline overlaps with ours. That's how we break through."

"The skill only lasts about six or seven minutes in the overlapping dimension. And since I haven't used it in ages, it'll be even shorter—probably down to three or four minutes."

Spades looked at him. "What do you need me to do?"

The Reverse God smirked, spinning the marker between his fingers. "This skill needs coordinates to work." He tilted his head. "If you're so eager to give Bai Liu a reverse cross… why not draw one for him?"

End of recollection.

The Reverse God looked at Spades. "Three to four minutes—that's all you'll have. That guy is a god, and he's dangerous. He has the same sniper rifle as the Joker, but he's much better with it. I'm not sure if it'll work on you, so you'd better be careful."

He took a deep breath. "But he's forcing his way into the worldline process, which means he's more restricted than we are. Hopefully, the two of us can handle it."

"Are you ready?"

Spades didn't respond. His gaze remained cold as he swung his whip down, tearing a massive black rift through the air.

Inside the Five-Building Copy Bai Liu lay collapsed at the bottom of the aquarium, his eyelids barely open. Tiny, transparent bubbles drifted from his face, his wounds soaked pale—so bloodless that nothing leaked into the water.

"This is the thirty-eighth skill," Bai Six murmured, watching Bai Liu beneath the water. He lowered his eyes. "I remember you hating water. It's impressive you've endured this long."

The four teammates hanging on the thorn wall had gone from anger to despair, sinking into a deathlike silence. Only their eyes moved, locked on Bai Liu in the aquarium.

Liu Jiayi had cried once—her eyes were still red. But Muke, usually a crybaby, hadn't shed a single tear. He only stared blankly.

"It's been fifteen minutes," Bai Six remarked, withdrawing the aquarium.

The moment Bai Liu spilled out of the water, nearly everyone let out a long, shuddering breath.

Bai Six's weapon shifted into a sniper rifle. He aimed it at Bai Liu, smiling. "Now, let's play the second game."

"I'll choose one of your teammates. Or you can pick—Shi Qian or Yuan Guang."

From the thorn wall, Muke suddenly spoke, his voice hoarse. "Bai Six, kill me."

"I'm the weakest member of his team. If you kill me, he'll get a better replacement. He'll be closer to your ideal—more perfect."

"Wow." Bai Six's smile deepened, his rifle never wavering from Bai Liu. "Someone already can't stand watching and would rather have their soul shattered to set you free, Bai Liu."

His gun shifted toward Muke. "Do you want me to grant his wish?"

Bai Liu slowly lifted his head, his face drained of all color. He reached up, gripping the barrel of Bai Six's rifle, and pushed it away as he stood. Then, with a measured motion, he turned the gun to aim squarely at Bai Six instead.

"There's a faster way than killing Yuan Guang," Bai Liu said coolly. "I can just kill you."

His index finger rested on the trigger, his expression unreadable. "Every game has an exploit, doesn't it, Bai Six?"

Bai Six raised his hands in mock surrender, his amusement undiminished. His gaze flicked to the crumpled soul note of Daniel, now held between Bai Liu's fingers, the Joker's mark faintly visible.

"You stole Daniel's soul note using Mu Sicheng's skill while I was playing with you?"

His grin widened. "You're really going to kill me? You're going to shatter my soul?"

"Then go ahead—try."

The players on the thorn wall were stunned by the reversal. Tang Erda immediately thrashed against his restraints, shouting, "Kill him, Bai Liu! Don't hesitate!"

"Kill him!"

A faint, unplaceable sense of wrongness gripped Bai Liu. He hesitated for a second—but then the dizziness from blood loss reminded him he couldn't afford to wait. He pulled the trigger.

The bullet struck Bai Six. He crumpled to the ground, blood quickly pooling beneath him. His eyes fluttered shut, a smile still etched on his face.

Muke looked dazed. Mu Sicheng leaned back, laughing uncontrollably. Liu Jiayi glanced toward herself—her gaze landing on [Liu Jiayi], who stared at Bai Six's body in shock, looking almost relieved.

Only Bai Liu remained standing, rigid and unmoving over Bai Six's body.

His pale face was unreadable as he raised his gun again. He fired several more shots into Bai Six, his pupils contracting with each pull of the trigger. In the expanding reflection of Bai Six's fallen form, something didn't add up.

This body…

Not turning to ash like [Mu Sicheng] before...

I don't think this guy…

Bai Six's eyes snapped open.

He sat up, unsteady, blood drenching his back. Raising both hands in a mock surprise gesture, he grinned. "Surprise!"

"I don't have a soul, Bai Liu."

In an instant, Bai Six lunged. Before Bai Liu could react, he snatched Daniel's soul note from his grasp. His hand morphed back into the green sniper rifle as he aimed it at Bai Liu's throat.

Lowering his gaze, he smiled. "I forgot to mention—evil gods don't have souls."

His voice softened into a chuckle. "Now it's my turn."

"Tell me, Bai Liu—do you have a soul?"

Bai Liu's pupils shrank. Bai Six pulled the trigger.

The [reverse cross] at Bai Liu's collarbone flashed, inverting into a true cross, emitting an intense white light. Within it, Bai Liu heard Bai Six's voice whispering in his ear, soft and close.

"I've decided the life and death of so many people… So why don't we end this with a game between us?"

"I hope it's me who dies."

How to Own Five Building

The moment the bullet was about to strike the cross at the center of Bai Liu's collarbone, a flash of white light emanated from it. A whip and a heavy sword materialized from the cross, intercepting the bullet before it could reach him.

The heavy sword cleaved the bullet in two and, without pause, slashed outward—straight toward Bai Six's neck.

Bai Six sidestepped, leaping back two steps. His gun slashed left, his right hand raised to intercept the weapon as it shifted into a black bone whip in his grip. His gaze flicked toward Spades and the Reverse God, who had suddenly appeared in the distorted air and were now plummeting toward the ground. He smirked.

"Coming?"

The moment his feet touched the ground, he lunged forward, his heavy sword flashing midair. Steel met bone with a fierce clash.

Bai Six, holding the bone whip in both hands, pressed it against the god's heavy sword and slowly raised it. A sly smile curled his lips.

"Aren't you always known for your mild-mannered tactics? Today, you reek of blood."

"Killed your master?"

The Reverse God's eyes flickered. He clenched his heavy sword, pressing down hard against Bai Six's whip, his false smile unwavering.

"That is none of your concern, Lord Evil God."

"Didn't you give me the prophecy so that I would come here?"

"I simply thought that, with a full house, Bai Liu might have a more... comprehensive set of choices." Bai Six glanced past the Reverse God, eyes landing on Bai Liu, who was being helped up by Spades. His voice was light, almost amused.

"Friends, family, people of interest—all present."

His smirk widened.

"This game about him is what makes it fun." Bai Six lifted his gaze to the Reverse God, whose expression had darkened. "Don't you think so, Prophet?"

The Reverse God suddenly released his heavy sword. It twisted midair around Bai Six's bone whip, its blade flipping upward in a deadly arc —aimed to stab straight through Bai Six's jaw.

Bai Six's neck snapped back at an unnatural angle as he abruptly let go of the whip. The weapon, borrowed from the Reverse God, vanished in a flash.

The Reverse God's gaze sharpened. He kicked off the heavy sword, flipping in midair as the weapon shot toward Bai Six. In one swift motion, he landed on it, using the momentum to propel himself forward—sword poised for a killing strike.

"How fierce," Bai Six remarked, half his body pinned down by the heavy sword. The blade pressed into his shoulder, blood seeping through his clothes. Yet, even as crimson spread, he still found the breath to tease. "It's rare to see you this angry."

Their conversation was eerily casual, like old friends catching up. Bai Six didn't even acknowledge the sharp dagger now gripped in his own hand. Instead, he used his wounded shoulder to trap the heavy sword in place—preventing it from moving—before angling the dagger under its cover, aiming straight for the Reverse God's eye.

Blood trickled down the gleaming blade.

But the Reverse God reacted instantly. Realizing he couldn't free the heavy sword from Bai Six's bones, he abandoned it altogether. He shifted into a tai chi stance, his eyes blazing as he jammed his hands against Bai Six's wrist, redirecting the dagger just moments before it could reach his eye.

The blade wrenched off course.

Yet, Bai Six moved with fluid precision. In a seamless motion, the dagger flipped in his grip. He shifted it to a backhanded hold and jerked it upwards—carving a deep, bone-deep gash across the Reverse God's jaw. Blood gushed out.

In the span of twenty seconds, they had exchanged blow after blow.

The Reverse God pulled back, breathing slow and steady despite the crimson beading at his jaw and dripping onto the ground.

"There aren't many in this world line who can fight me evenly," Bai Six remarked, stepping through the settling dust. Casually, he flicked blood from his shoulder, his smile sharp. "But, Prophet, making an enemy of me outside a game?"

His tone turned almost lazy.

"That's a mistake."

The moment those words left his lips, Bai Six vanished.

He reappeared before the Reverse God in a flash—dagger in hand, knees bent mid-air, his downcast eyes cold with intent. Without hesitation, he plunged the blade toward the Reverse God's heart.

The dagger met steel.

But just as it was about to make contact, it flickered—and transformed.

Between Bai Six's fingers, the blade turned into a playing card. He flipped it, revealing Fang Dian's face on its surface.

In an instant, Bai Six became Fang Dian.

The Reverse God instinctively turned his gaze to his sword, but the reflection in its snowy blade made his pupils constrict. Staring back at him was Bai Six—now Fang Dian.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six uses Player Hearts Queen's Personal Skill (Transformation Playing Card) with Charm and Stun effects.]

For a fraction of a second, his mind wavered.

And in that fraction of a second, Bai Six struck.

The Reverse God barely managed to react. He shoved Bai Six away—less than a second of hesitation, and yet...

Bai Six flicked the card between his fingers.

In the next heartbeat, his weapon changed again.

A thin thread unfurled in his grasp.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six uses Player Puppeteer's Personal Skill (Puppet Silk) to control the opponent's actions when inserted into a [System Alert: Player Bai Six attaches the (Evil God) panel, turning the (Puppet Silk) skill on full, covering the entire map.]

[You can manipulate everyone on the field to your heart's content.]

He smiled as he spread his hands wide, releasing threads that shot out in all directions. They burrowed into the joints of Shi Qian and Yuan Guang, unconscious on the ground, as well as into Tang Erda, Muke, and Mu Sicheng, still suspended against the walls.

Liu Jiayi, having been knocked off the thorn wall by Spades and Bai Liu, turned her head sharply. She stared at the rest of the team, now ensnared by puppet silk, the shock on her face barely concealed. Her gaze flicked toward Bai Six standing in the field—so unnerving that she couldn't help but cough.

It was terrifying.

This man had just been playing that game of skill selection with Bai Liu—thirty-eight skills in ten minutes, perfectly executing the most destructive combinations. And now, he was actually applying it.

He hadn't even used all his skills or panel values.

Was this man… a monster?!

Bai Six lowered his eyes as countless sharp, transparent threads crisscrossed around him. Then, as if playing a musical instrument, he raised his wrist slightly before pressing it down again, his fingers gracefully manipulating a few select strands.

In their unconscious state, Shi Qian and Yuan Guang clutched a utility knife and a caliper cone, their heads hanging limply. Meanwhile, Spades and Bai Liu were surrounded by Mu Sicheng, Muke, and Tang Erda—all under Bai Six's control.

"Reverse God," Bai Six said, amusement flickering in his eyes, "I recall you don't like harming ordinary people." He tilted his head. "And Bai Liu seems to hate hurting his teammates."

He smiled as he pressed down slightly on the puppet silk. "Your weaknesses are so blatantly exposed—don't you know that in the game of the Evil Gods…"

Bai Six's smirk deepened as he tugged on the threads.

"...weaknesses are meant to be exploited?"

Shi Qian and Yuan Guang surged forward, their weapons in hand. The Reverse God dodged, a scowl twisting his face.

Mu Sicheng's fingers moved against his will, tapping at the skill panel before him. He strained against the control, muscles bulging, veins standing out against his neck. He wanted to scream—curse, anything—but the puppet silk sealed his mouth shut.

Zhang Gui's puppet silk had once nearly ensnared him, but this—this was nothing like that.

Not even close!

Desperate, Mu Sicheng activated his skill, his hand shifting into a monkey's claw as it lashed toward Bai Liu's throat.

Muke turned his summoned dagger against himself.

Tang Erda clenched his teeth so hard his knuckles popped, but his gun remained unwaveringly aimed at Spades.

Spades sidestepped a bullet fired by Tang Erda, narrowly avoiding a thread that flicked past his ear. In the same instant, he caught sight of Muke lunging at Bai Liu from behind. Without hesitation, he swung his whip handle, effortlessly deflecting the attack.

The Reverse God, cornered by Shi Qian and Yuan Guang, dodged fluidly as he lifted his heavy sword. But—

Bai Six struck from the side.

A poker card sliced through the air, forcing the Reverse God to twist away at the last second. The afterimage swept past him, Bai Six smirking as he murmured, "Reverse God, if you were willing to kill these two yourself, you might actually be able to fight me on equal footing—even with me holding back."

"Pity." Bai Six's gaze darkened with something akin to regret. "You have weaknesses too."

As he severed a thread, Bai Six flicked his fingers without even glancing back. A new strand seamlessly replaced the broken one, gliding from his sleeve like a living thing.

"Now that everyone's here." Bai Six sidestepped the Reverse God's sword thrust and clapped his hands, his tone pleasant. He cast a courteous glance toward Bai Liu, who was now cornered.

"Let's continue the game."

As he clapped, the puppet silk quivered in response.

Tang Erda, Mu Sicheng, and Muke instantly converged, cutting Spades off from Bai Liu.

Spades frowned and was about to break through when Bai Six flicked his fingers again—Muke's grip slackened, and his dagger dropped.

A split second later, his body was sent hurtling toward Spades' bone whip.

The whip pierced through Muke's torso. Blood bloomed.

Muke gave a weak, relieved smile. "...Kill me."

"If we don't want them to die, we'd better not move carelessly." Bai Six reminded with a smile, his gaze settling on Bai Liu. "What do you think, Bai Liu?"

Bai Liu's face was pale as he met Spades' eyes, then shifted his focus to Bai Six.

"You want me to keep playing that game?"

Bai Six's grin widened. "Yes. What's your choice?"

"Of course, you could always choose to let me kill your teammates, Spades, and the Reverse God," Bai Six mused, idly tapping his fingers. "Or you could do it yourself—eliminate Shi Qian and Yuan Guang."

Bai Liu's voice was steady. "Your gun fired a minute ago. It's still on cooldown."

"Oh, that's no problem." Bai Six slowly lifted both hands—one with his index finger curled inward, the other mimicking the motion of drawing a bowstring.

"I'll make sure you have all the conditions necessary to make your choice," he said, "if you're willing to choose."

[System Alert: Player Bai Six loads player Georgia's panel and

A brilliant golden bow materialized in Bai Six's hands. With a flick of his wrist, he aimed the arrow at himself and let it loose.

The moment the golden arrow struck, it dissolved into shimmering dust. All of Bai Six's wounds vanished, leaving only the dried blood on his white shirt as evidence that they had ever existed.

"Three hours ago," Bai Six mused, flexing his fingers. "Skills are now available again."

A nightmare-green sniper rifle appeared in his grasp. He lifted it, aiming lazily across the room.

"Now," Bai Six said, his gaze gleaming with amusement, "who do you choose?"

"You had this skill before," Bai Liu observed, his voice level. "Its cooldown was reduced. Why didn't you use it sooner?"

Bai Six chuckled. "Because then, everyone important to you would have died at once."

His smile widened, eyes alight with malicious amusement. "And that would make our game much less fun, don't you think?"

He tilted his head. "Besides, our dear guests only have about five or six minutes left before they have to go."

The barrel of his gun hovered for a brief second over the Reverse God's head.

"It's only polite to let them finish the game before they leave, right?"

Even Tang Erda's expression turned utterly lifeless.

...This guy.

He actually obtained Georgia's soul.

With time reversal stacked onto the Soul Crusher, that meant—

Bai Six's sniper rifle no longer had a cooldown.

An unrestricted soul-crushing gun.

No wonder Bai Six only played with Bai Liu and didn't use the Soul Crusher until they returned. Bai Six had been stalling for three hours, ensuring that the Soul Crusher remained unused until the exact moment he needed it.

"Since my side started with Mu Sicheng, why don't your side start with..." Before Bai Six could finish his sentence, he abruptly raised his hand and turned his gun, aiming a shot at Mu Sicheng.

Bai Liu seemed to have expected this, raising his hand before Bai Six. He transformed into the Tang Erda skill, coldly lifting his revolver and firing at the still unaware Mu Sicheng.

The two bullets thundered from the chamber, flying out in fiery streaks.

Mu Sicheng, unable to discern who fired, leans forward and slowly collapses.

Bai Liu paused, his breath catching for a moment. His shoulders subtly tensed, his hand gripping the gun until he heard the system beep, signaling his release.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has killed player Mu Sicheng.]

"Nice judgment," Bai Six commented with approval. "You guessed I would kill him first, so you lowered Mu Sicheng's health during the siege, setting him up for a single fatal blow."

"With Mu Sicheng's immunity from death, it was indeed a smart move to have him killed first and removed from the field."

Bai Six smiled as he twirled the Soul Crusher, pointing it at Liu Jiayi. "So, want to guess who I'll target next?"

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi locked eyes across the Spades. Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, pointing to Yuan Guang across the room and giving him a subtle "OK" gesture. Bai Liu exhaled softly, feeling a cold sweat trickle down his back.

...There had never been anyone who gave him such a powerful sense of oppression.

"It's a bit boring to guess one by one," Bai Six smiled slightly, his hand sweeping through the air, sending three trajectories aimed at Spades, the Reverse God, and Bai Liu himself. "Let's do this together."

Everything after that unfolded in slow motion.

Three green bullets shot from the chamber as Liu Jiayi, with her head down, rushed towards Bai Liu, five land certificates gripped in her hands. Bai Liu also had a land certificate ready.

Bai Six's eyes caught the scene, his eyebrows raised slightly, and then he laughed lightly.

Well done, Bai Liu, distracting me and stealing the land certificates.

But—

Spades and the Reverse God moved from their original positions almost simultaneously. Spades' whip lashed out, intercepting the whip meant for Bai Liu, while the Reverse God's heavy sword descended from the sky, splitting one bullet in two.

"Bang! Bang!" Two more green bullets flew, both aimed at Bai Liu, while golem wires thickened and expanded, forming a dense, windless barrier that wrapped around the Reverse God's falling sword and Spades' renewed whip.

The Reverse God grits his teeth, recalling his weapon. His eyes darted to Bai Liu, who was about to be hit by the bullet—but it was too late to recall his weapon and block it again!

Spades' expression darkened as he released the whip and dashed through the cutting silk threads toward Bai Liu.

Bai Six swung his whip again, the force striking Bai Liu's wrist with precision, snapping it in one clean motion.

—Land certificates must remain concentrated in the hands of a strategist!

The next second, the little girl snatched up all five land certificates in a single, swift motion, not even glancing at Bai Liu, who was tangled in layers of puppet silk. Her eyes welled up with tears as she sprinted toward Yuan Guang.

She had to make it before the bullet hit!

Looking at Liu Jiayi, running toward Yuan Guang, and Bai Liu, whose expression remained cold and unmoved, a faint surprise flashed across Bai Six's face before he burst out laughing.

So that was it.

From the start, Bai Liu had been playing a game to let Yuan Guang win. That was the one thing that surprised Bai Six—Bai Liu was willing to forfeit his victory for someone else.

Having lost here, Bai Six now accepted that he hadn't guessed correctly.

Bai Liu stared at the bullet hurtling toward him, his expression indifferent. His hands and feet were tangled in puppet silk, leaving him unable to move.

The Reverse God rushed to him, summoning his heavy sword, his gaze determined as he raised it to block the first bullet that flew from the left.

The heavy sword shattered under the impact, grazing the Reverse God's shoulder. A greyish-white flame spread from the wound, creeping toward his heart.

Just as the second bullet was about to hit Bai Liu, Spades lunged, throwing himself at Bai Liu. He embraced him tightly, absorbing the impact of the bullet with his own body.

—It was the force of the bullet hitting Spades' body.

The Reverse God and Spades closed their eyes, collapsing slowly in front of Bai Liu, whose eyes had lost focus.

The grey on the Reverse God's shoulder spread to his neck, his brow furrowing in pain. Spades fell to the ground, motionless, like a frozen corpse, his body temperature plummeting, and frost forming around him.

Liu Jiayi gritted her teeth, shoving the five crumpled land certificates into Yuan Guang's hands.

[System Alert: Player Yuan Guang has obtained five land certificates and achieved the true end achievement. Game over.]

Everything on the ground dissolved instantly, and everyone was ejected from the game.

Bai Liu, his consciousness fading, heard a voice laughing in his ear. "That's the end of this game. I look forward to seeing you step forward to face me in the next one."

"I hope you keep winning in your games with me, Bai Liu."

Pre-season

Wang Shun stared at the big screen, his forehead slick with sweat, his hands clenched tightly in anxiety.

The moment Bai Liu cornered Yuan Guang and raised his whip to strike, the big screen suddenly flickered into a blurry snowstorm. A system prompt lagged on the screen, further adding to the confusion.

[System Alert: Due to the presence of a summoned item in the arena beyond the replica's capacity, the system is undergoing full maintenance. The content in the arena cannot be broadcast on the big screen for the time being.]

We apologize for the disruption to your viewing experience.

Since then, the big screen, which was supposed to broadcast the match, had been nothing but static.

Russell Cemetery's tendency to fog up the screen had already deterred many spectators from attending the game. Combined with the system glitch and the high-stakes mid-season match between the Deer Hunters and the Killer Sequence, half of the already sparse crowd had left.

Wang Shun's chest felt heavy with worry as he surveyed his surroundings. His gaze occasionally flickered over to Charles, who sat with his chin propped up in his hands, staring at the snowstorm on the screen.

What should he do? Even if the president won, Russell Cemetery's meager pool points wouldn't satisfy Charles...

It wasn't even close to what Charles had spent on Bai Liu's weapon modifications. Most of it was pool money generated by their diversions since the tournament began.

Wang Shun, full of concern, was frustrated by how much he cared about his opponent’s pool.

On top of that, there was another issue that weighed on his mind: popularity.

He had greatly underestimated the impact of Russell Cemetery's low popularity and unconventional tactics. The audience mainly consisted of the base board they had brought in, and even their pool growth was stunted. With such low betting odds, even if spectators bet on their win, the payout would be minimal. There weren't many new viewers betting either.

It was supposed to be a pre-season final, but the betting pool wasn't growing at even a tenth of the rate seen during the double-header against the Raging Lambs.

Wang Shun had entered the tournament optimistic, hoping to secure the popularity gold medal for the entire team right away, only to realize how naive he had been.

As the mid-season drew to a close, the top eight teams' points totals were more or less locked in. These teams had performed exceptionally well, their betting pools growing astronomically. The Killer Sequence and Deer Hunters had particularly impressive pools.

Compared to last year, the Killer Sequence's pool base had grown seven times, while the Deer Hunters' had grown eleven times. Teams like Golden Dawn and Kings Guild had attracted new players with impressive performances and looks, boosting their base by four to six times.

With the mid-season ending and playoffs fast approaching, it was nearly impossible for the popularity of pre-season teams to increase. The points circulating among players were bound to be absorbed by the top eight teams' betting pools.

To think that a pre-season game with a low-popularity team would somehow increase their popularity was foolish.

Wang Shun smiled bitterly, realizing how hasty he had been.

He couldn't even sleep at the thought of facing these monsters—fully equipped, supremely powerful, as if favored by the gods—while they held no death warrant.

As Wang Shun sighed and reflected, a commotion from the audience behind him broke his focus. The murmurs grew louder, and spectators began exchanging words.

“The screens over at the mid-season tournament are suddenly under maintenance...”

“WTF?! What happened to the league this year? The big screen rarely goes wrong unless there's a bug!"

"Who's playing in the mid-season match now?"

"Killer Sequence and Deer Hunters. During the fight, the screen went black halfway through. They said a player used a rules skill to force compatibility with multiple copies, which the system couldn't handle. The audience exploded, going crazy over it."

Wang Shun's curiosity piqued as he sensed a connection between the black screen in the mid-season match and the snowy screen here. He quickly opened the system panel to check on the tournament.

The moment he opened it, a blood-red headline jumped out at him.

[Damn! The results are in and I lost the bet! The Killer Sequence won! Shit! How could this happen?!]

At the same time, a mechanical beep echoed in Wang Shun's ears.

[System alert: Game over.]

Wang Shun's heart skipped a beat. He jerked his head up to look at the big screen, and the next moment, his breath caught in his throat.

[The (Roving Circus) vs (Russell Cemetery) match is over.]

[Congratulations to the (Russell Cemetery) team for winning the tournament.]

The members of Russell Cemetery stood frozen for a moment before exchanging stunned looks. Then, they embraced each other, tears of joy streaming down their faces, shouting in exhilaration.

"The President won!"

"I almost thought Yuan Guang and Shi Qian were going to die!"

"The President didn't lie to us! He said he would bring us back alive!"

The snowy screen flickered and faded into darkness, with figures slowly emerging on either side of the screen.

The crowd at Russell Cemetery rushed to greet Yuan Guang and Shi Qian as they appeared, disoriented. They were embraced by the crowd, lifted into the air amid cheers, tears, and jubilant wishes.

On the other side, the battered figures of Mu Sicheng, Muke, Tang Erda, and Liu Jiayi appeared, silent, with Bai Liu trailing behind them.

Wang Shun rushed forward in disbelief, his mind still numb from the unexpected outcome. The first question he asked, still stunned, was, "How did you lose?"

Bai Liu met Wang Shun's gaze for a brief moment, his lips parted as if to speak. But before he could, his eyelids fluttered shut, and his body collapsed toward the ground, as if drained of every last bit of energy.

"Bai Liu!!!"

"President!!!"

The panic-filled shouts from one side and the laughter from the other side mixed in Wang Shun's ears. Yuan Guang's eyes reflected the slow fall of Bai Liu, thrown into the air by the laughing team.

The memories that had blurred after using the skill began to resurface in Yuan Guang's aching mind.

His hands clenched, the texture of paper from the land certificates forced into his palms, and the heart-wrenching cry of a little girl echoed in his ears. "Bai Liu—"

Yuan Guang’s memories sharpened. He remembered the young man, draped in a bloodstained white shirt, his thin shoulder blades visible, standing calmly as he smiled, raising his gun. He had asked Yuan Guang to choose: kill him and Shi Qian, or kill his team members—choose no one.

Before the game ended, Yuan Guang recalled falling to the ground, seeing in the background of the dissipating ruins of the game, the young man who resembled him but older, smiling as he approached, speaking to him.

[One day, he will come to me of his own accord].

The man had looked down at Yuan Guang, pity in his eyes, a smile curling his lips.

[After all, in this world, it’s a big, big price to pay for a natural villain like him to try to be good].

Yuan Guang staggered violently from the hand that had held him up, rolled to the ground, then stood up in front of the astonished onlookers. He stumbled forward, toward Bai Liu, who had collapsed.

He remembered.

Yuan Guang's eyes turned red, his breath sharp as he gasped. The name tumbled from his throat.

The man had bowed his head, smiling as he whispered in Yuan Guang's ear, [Do you know why?]

[For God did not want to see him as a good man].

"Bai Liu---!!!"

Mid-season viewing pool.

The black screen blinked.

[The (Killer Sequence) vs (Deer Hunter) match is over.]

[Congratulations to the (Killer Sequence) team for winning the tournament].

As the big screen shifted, the Deer Hunter and Killer Sequence players emerged.

Cen Buming took a slow, grim step from behind the screen, his face dark, while Daniel seemed unaffected by the loss, still grinning lazily.

The atmosphere on the Killer Sequence side was surprisingly relaxed, even after their victory.

Bai Yi crossed his arms and pointed at Spades and Reverse God, "What did you two do? You disappeared from the field without even telling us about the strange skills you used."

Bai Jiamu, usually surprised by these things, frowned for the first time, "If it was a tactic, shouldn’t we have been informed in advance?"

Liao Ke, always the joker, smiled, "Well if you win, it means the tactics were fine, right? What do you think, Reverse God?"

They turned to look at Reverse God and Spades, who had been trailing at the back, motionless since they had logged out of the game.

Liao Ke was the first to notice something was wrong. He stepped forward, tapping the two on the shoulders. "Reverse God? Spades?"

The bodies of Reverse God and Spades collapsed through the gap in the screen as if unconscious.

Liao Ke quickly stopped Reverse God's fall with an open hand, and Bai Jiamu braced Spades' body. The weight of Spades' limp form caused Bai Jiamu's shoulders to sag.

Realization struck him suddenly, his face hardening. He barely managed a joke, "Hey?! You two don't have to fake it and play dead just because you got scolded, do you?!"

The Reverse God's body began to fade, becoming translucent from his shoulders. Meanwhile, frost spread quickly where Spades' body touched Bai Jiamu's, turning him as cold as ice, so much so that Bai Jiamu had to lower him gently to the ground.

Bai Yi froze, staring in disbelief. "What's going on?"

Liao Ke, the only one still composed, had a dark look on his face. "Move Spades back to the Killer Sequence warehouse. Hand him over to the Golden Dawn people. Don't let anyone touch him for now."

"I'll stay here with Reverse God."

Bai Yi finally panicked, his eyes darting to Reverse God, whose form had faded to a shadow. "What's wrong with Reverse God and Spades?"

"Spades' condition will have to be monitored further; his situation is unique, and I'm not sure for now." Liao Ke took a deep breath, trying to steady himself. He clenched his fist. "As for Reverse God... he must have carried over his serious injuries from the game, traumatized into an unconscious state, which is why he automatically logged out."

"He should... be fine."

Liao Ke glanced at Reverse God's fading form, his gaze darkening.

If you die here, your wife will surely remarry, Captain.

This was the last world line where you could've been with her.

Pre-season

Killer Sequence Warehouse

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu poked at Spades, who had collapsed on the ground, face down. With a long sigh, Bai Yi looked at the ice shards on his fingers and muttered, "...If this Spades guy wasn't normal, I'd almost suspect he'd be stiff as a corpse by now."

Bai Jiamu shot him a bemused glance. "Can you say something a little more uplifting?"

"That's the best I can come up with," Bai Yi replied, resting his face in his hands, his gaze drifting downward. "I really don't like seeing dead people."

"My wife was the same when she passed," Bai Jiamu said quietly. "One moment she was fine, and the next, she was just lying there, motionless."

"It's so sudden when someone's gone."

Bai Jiamu paused, then said, "Don't dwell on it."

"If I could stop thinking about it, I wouldn't be in this game now," Bai Yi murmured, tilting his head slightly. "Back then, I kept wondering what I'd do after she died, but I couldn't figure it out. So, I just ended up sitting by her grave every day, until the old man guarding it chased me away."

Bai Jiamu fell silent for a moment before asking, "Why didn't you go home?"

"I didn't want to go home," Bai Yi responded, his head bowed. "...A place without her isn't home, it's just a house."

"When Spades took us to win the tournament last year, each member of the team was granted a wish. Two of us made it, and I wanted to wish for her to come back... but Spades stopped me."

"Yeah," Bai Jiamu replied, lowering his gaze, "he stopped me too. It wasn't allowed."

Bai Yi let out a soft, indistinct chuckle. "...That guy's instincts are scarily sharp sometimes."

“The two who made wishes disappeared from the world not long after,” Bai Jiamu continued. “I spent a long time trying to find them—in the game, in reality— but no one seems to remember them, or even know they were part of last year’s championship team.”

“So, I went to investigate on my own,” Bai Yi said, his voice soft. “I didn’t find much, but I did make a general deduction—”

“—All the people from the championship teams who made wishes over the years have vanished without a trace,” Bai Jiamu interrupted. “Any information they left behind, whether in the game or in reality, has been erased. I can’t even find a single video from their time playing.”

Bai Yi sighed again. “Although I probably suspected this whole ‘wish’ business was a scam, it still feels pretty sad to confirm it. The god who made us wish said we could store our wishes if we didn’t want to make them right then.”

“The Deer Hunters, Golden Dawn, and the King’s Crown—champion guilds all—did the same thing,” Bai Yi added. “They must’ve sensed the risk of the wishes and decided to store them for now.”

“I’m not sure whether wishing is good or bad. We train so hard every day, and then we have to face the death of our teammates. Sometimes, I wonder…” Bai Yi turned to Bai Jiamu, his voice quiet, “Why do you think we keep going?”

“I’d really like to ask the Grand Guild presidents who got their wishes why they stick around,” he added.

Bai Jiamu tilted his head slightly, not meeting his gaze. He responded calmly, “Didn’t you ask the Reverse God? He was once considered half president of the Deer Hunters and had wishes in his hands.”

Bai Yi snapped his gaze back to him, falling into a long silence. Finally, he spoke. “The reason the Reverse God gave... is too strange.”

Bai Jiamu glanced at him, his curiosity piqued. “What did he say?”

“The only reason the Reverse God wants to keep getting wishes,” Bai Yi said slowly, looking up, “is to prevent someone else from getting a wish from God’s hands before he does.”

A hospital ward.

Bai Liu lies on the bed, eyes closed, breathing steadily. His complexion is almost as white as the sheets, with one hand resting on the quilt, palm facing up. A pulse pressure restraint is tied around one wrist, while an IV is attached to the back of his other hand.

The collar of his shirt is slightly open, and the connector attached to the ECG leads out from beneath it to the machine beside him. The waveform on the ECG screen ebbs and flows gently.

"It's been two days... why hasn't he woken up yet?" Mu Sicheng murmurs, lying beside Bai Liu's bed. "Didn't the doctor say it was nothing...?"

"Blood tests, brain CT, MRI... everything we could do," Muke responds, his fists clenched against his knees. Sitting up straight on the bench, his eyes fixed on Bai Liu in the bed, he continues, "Apart from some minor external injuries, there's not much to go on right now."

Mu Sicheng suddenly grows furious, shooting Muke a sidelong glance. "How can you say it's just minor injuries after all that torture?"

At that moment, Tang Erda, who had been leaning against the wall with his head down, speaks up abruptly. "Bai Six pushes people to the limit of both pain and mental capacity."

"It's just pain, nothing fatal. Not too many wounds. Even if someone's captured, it's hard to determine," he continues, his voice low. "Usually, people go mad from the torture."

The mention of Bai Six's name casts a heavy silence over the ward, and no one speaks for a moment.

Seeing the somber expressions around him, Tang Erda shifts uncomfortably and changes the subject. "Liu Jiayi, did you discuss making a game for Russell Cemetery to win with Bai Liu earlier?"

"Yeah," Liu Jiayi responds quietly, sitting on the bench with her head bowed, hiding her expression. "I don't know what Bai Liu and Charles talked about, but they came back and told me about it—about creating a game for Russell Cemetery to win."

"I didn't agree at first. It's too messy. A fake tournament like that can only be pulled off by a powerful guild like the Gamblers Club. A fledgling guild like ours would see a serious drop in popularity," she continues. "But Bai Liu eventually convinced me."

Liu Jiayi glances at Bai Liu in the hospital bed, takes a deep breath to focus, and then continues. "First, there's the issue of popularity. We need to gain immunity before the challenge, but practically, that's unlikely."

"Our last game was against Russell Cemetery. Their low popularity and cover-up tactics made it a game that, no matter how well we played, wouldn't draw much attention. In terms of profitability, we didn't get much for winning, just a five percent cut of Russell Cemetery's small pool."

"The most valuable part of the game was our own betting pool," Liu Jiayi explains. "When the challenge begins, both sides' pools will be emptied and recounted. The best way for Bai Liu to get our pool was to set up a game where he could secretly win against the opponent. But this is easy to detect, so to cover up the trick, Bai Liu decided to involve Charles."

Muke furrows his brow. "But Charles... can he even see our guild's pool?"

"Of course not. Charles's Gamblers Club has a pool hundreds of times larger than ours, and in terms of points, we're nowhere near his level." Liu Jiayi replies calmly. "But Charles isn't like Bai Liu."

"It's not the money he's after—it's the gamble itself. He enjoys the thrill of taking risks, flipping dozens of times, and winning big with little. Otherwise, he wouldn't be spending so many points every year discovering newcomers, instead of nurturing his own guild."

"From that perspective, Russell Cemetery's win over us perfectly matched Charles's gambling aesthetic. Once Bai Liu set the hook, Charles bit immediately."

"Bai Liu planned to open the game with a big match advantage, press the Russell Cemetery team to the limit, and create a difference between the two pools to give Charles a satisfying pre-season gamble. At the same time, he hoped to strike a deal with Russell Cemetery—a three-birds-with-one-stone plan."

Liu Jiayi pauses, then withdraws her gaze from Bai Liu's face and takes a deep breath. "Although, in the end, it turned out pretty much like Bai Liu expected... the process was just too far off."

Mu Sicheng suddenly realizes what happened and mutters, his voice filled with frustration. "Shit! No way! Is that why you said so little during the match? You and Bai Liu knew we'd lose?"

"You didn’t even consult with us about this huge deal?" he continues, his eyes stern. "That really shows you didn’t consider us at all!"

Liu Jiayi rolls her eyes. "Well, if one of you three adult males was a bit better at acting, Bai Liu wouldn’t have had to come to me, an eight-year-old girl, to help with his game."

The three adult males, all terrible at acting, fall silent in unison.

A quiet knock on the door breaks the tension.

"Knock, knock."

Tang Erda subconsciously glanced at Bai Liu in the hospital bed, his hand instinctively reaching for his gun. But he quickly realized this was reality, not a game, and no one would harm Bai Liu here.

Liu Jiayi noticed Tang Erda's movement as he reached for his weapon, and she paused for a moment. Even Tang Erda was affected by this.

After witnessing Bai Liu being tortured by Bai Six, it seemed that everyone needed some time to recover.

Tang Erda lowered his hand and spoke softly, "Come in."

The door slowly opened, and Yuan Guang stood awkwardly in the doorway, holding a large, heavy fruit basket in both hands. He bowed slightly, saying, "Excuse me, I'm here to visit Bai Liu."

The expressions on everyone's faces shifted when they saw Yuan Guang. Even Tang Erda, typically so easygoing, stared at him without any intention of inviting him in.

Under the weight of four intense glares, Yuan Guang internally thought, QAQ. I want to get down on my knees and apologize a million times!

It was Muke who finally broke the silence, speaking first. "Thanks for the visit. Come in."

Yuan Guang nodded stiffly, thanked them, and stepped inside as if walking on thin ice. He gently placed the fruit basket next to the bed, then looked at Bai Liu with a worried expression. "Still not awake? What did the doctor say?"

"Didn't you ask this yesterday?" Mu Sicheng snorted, not even looking at him. "The doctor said the same thing today that he said yesterday. Can't you remember after one day?"

"If you're going to play the good guy, at least commit to the act," he added, sarcastically.

Yuan Guang's face turned increasingly embarrassed, his fist clenched as he coughed awkwardly. Muke interrupted, speaking in a calm voice, "The doctor said that today's situation is similar to the previous one—nothing serious. But if he doesn't wake up soon and can't eat, they'll have to consider a gastric tube for nutrition."

"I'm still asking the doctor if there's anything else we can do at the moment," Muke continued. "We want to avoid the discomfort of a stomach tube if possible."

Yuan Guang fell silent. He opened his mouth as if to say something, but he knew that nothing he could say would be enough.

Now, he understood everything about Bai Liu.

This young man—three years younger than him—was a fellow worker in the internet industry, recently laid off, living in a small, rundown rental. His apartment was barely forty square feet, and he grew up in an orphanage.

Bai Liu’s favorite meal was cheap hotpot, often discounted by less than fifty percent. His phone was an old model, bought by a friend when he graduated three years ago. Two years ago, a speeding driver had shattered the screen, but Bai Liu hadn’t replaced it.

When one person is far better off than another, the one with more resources might help out of condescending sympathy or to balance things out. But when someone is doing much worse, and they still reach out to help...

What drives that?

Yuan Guang took a deep breath, recalling the blankness in his mind when he saw Bai Liu on the ground, pale and drained, slipping away in Tang Erda's arms.

He had called out Bai Liu's name, his tears falling uncontrollably, his mouth full of questions. But in the end, all he could do was cry and plead, "Don't die!"

He felt so ashamed.

"Mr. Charles came to see me," Yuan Guang continued, sitting on the bench with his head bowed, his hands clenched tightly on his knees. "He said Bai Liu bet on us and won his own pool. Since the initial betting ratio was three to seven, with Charles getting three and Bai Liu seven, the pool allocation was 70% for Bai Liu."

"He told me Bai Liu wanted to make a deal with me for the 70% of the points, to buy Russell Cemetery."

Yuan Guang paused, taking a deep breath before letting it out slowly. "I came here today to tell Bai Liu that I am not for sale."

Mu Sicheng's expression darkened instantly, and he opened his mouth to curse, "You fucking—"

Yuan Guang pressed on, "I spoke with the others at Russell Cemetery about what happened during the tournament. We've decided to take only 20% of the points to handle our real-life situation. We don't want the rest. We'll work hard to pay Bai Liu back later. We'll treat it as a loan from him."

"We don't want to be bought. We want to voluntarily merge with the Wandering Circus."

Mu Sicheng's angry words faltered, his surprise evident. "Well... that's actually pretty sensible."

Before leaving, Yuan Guang politely said goodbye to the others. He then took a long, meaningful look at Bai Liu in the hospital bed and said earnestly, "Good things come to those who are good."

"Bai Liu will wake up soon."

It was only after Yuan Guang had left that Mu Sicheng let out a grunt. "Now that's something human to say."

Muke's face softened slightly from his previous indifference as he looked over at Tang Erda. "How are things progressing on his side of the property?"

“Su Yang and I have already confirmed it's been handled,” Tang Erda nodded. “As soon as I stepped out, I instructed him to search every cemetery for the secondary contract certificates. They’ve all been destroyed so far. The land beneath the building is still being tested, but the heresy levels have dropped significantly. The patients who were drained are slowly recovering.”

“If nothing else, this copy of the Five Buildings shouldn’t spill over into reality.”

“True, but the problem of the dilapidated building is still tough to resolve. The Heretic Processing Bureau can only allocate a small portion of the funds to these people,” Tang Erda frowned. “Actually, Bai Liu’s contribution of 70% of the gambling pool credits should have been enough to resolve their issues without the Bureau’s intervention.”

“But from what I’m seeing, Yuan Guang and the others probably won’t take the other 50 percent.”

Muke’s eyes remained steady as he glanced over at Bai Liu lying in the hospital bed. “The funds approved by the Bureau of Heresy, along with the 20% of the pool points Bai Liu contributed, will be sufficient.”

Tang Erda blinked in surprise. “Sufficient for what?”

Muke smiled and looked at Tang Erda. “The rest of the money chain is enough for my side to benefit.”

Tang Erda furrowed his brow. “Isn’t that a substantial amount of money for your father to let you use?”

“But we're not just a small guild anymore,” Muke’s expression was stoic as he looked over at Bai Liu. “Simply put, we’re already a highly profitable public company, with the points flowing from our gambling pool converting into cash. From a business standpoint, in both numbers and size, we need a base in reality.”

“I can easily put together a report for my father based on our guild’s profitability and convince him to invest a sum into our company.”

“And I also think it’s about time our president moved out of that tiny rental house of his,” Muke added calmly.

Mu Sicheng, sitting nearby, was stunned by this statement, staring at Muke with wide eyes.

...Bought an entire plot of land just to get Bai Liu to move out... Is this what the world of the rich looks like?

“Your father won’t question what this company really is?” Tang Erda’s brow furrowed. “We don’t have anything in reality.”

Muke looked over, a smile playing on his lips with an enigmatic air. “He got to where he is because he never looks too closely into things, Captain Tang.”

“Sometimes, the fuzzy areas are the most profitable. He just needs to trust that I won’t harm him.”

Tang Erda: “...”

Mu Sicheng: “...”

Liu Jiayi: “...”

It always seems like... Muke has changed somehow, and it sends a chill down your spine.

Knock, knock, knock--

There was another knock on the ward door. This time, the person outside entered without waiting for an invitation.

Fang Dian came in holding a stainless steel lunchbox, smiling. “Good afternoon! I took a break to bring Bai Liu his lunch!”

Muke immediately stood up, offering Fang Dian a seat, but she raised her hand and gently pushed him back. “I don’t have time to sit. You can sit; I need to get back to work soon.”

She glanced at Bai Liu lying in bed, placing the lunchbox on the bedside table with mild surprise. “Didn’t the doctor say he was fine? Why hasn’t he woken up yet?”

“Oh, well.” Fang Dian shrugged. “Looks like I’m giving this meal away for nothing again today. You all can open it and eat it later.”

The group glanced wistfully at the lunchbox on Bai Liu’s bedside table, their tone wavering.

Fang Dian had come the past two days to deliver meals, and the menus had been...

- Spicy stir-fried watermelon rind (with a slight bitterness—Tang Erda's words).

- Steamed mango and tomato rice (steamed too badly, tomatoes not peeled, a bit... unappealing—Liu Jiayi's words).

- The skin was so chewy that Mu Sicheng finished a bowl of rice with a mouthful of pork skin and still hadn't managed to chew it.

...

If they didn't know that Fang Dian had no ill intentions toward Bai Liu, they'd almost suspect that she wasn't bringing him food, but trying to make him sick.

Fang Dian sat at the head of Bai Liu's bed for a while after placing the lunchbox, casually starting to talk to Bai Liu, who was still unconscious. "Mr. Lu's been away on a business trip, and I can't reach him on the phone. I don't know what he's up to..."

"But, you know, he's always so busy that he's hard to get in touch with. Don't blame him for not coming to see you. Your illness came on too suddenly."

"The last time you were hospitalized was in high school. Mr. Lu and I took turns watching over you. We stayed in the hospital for a week, spent three or four hundred dollars after reimbursement, and didn't even eat meat that month."

Fang Dian smiled softly as she looked at Bai Liu's pale face, his eyelids closed. "Now, so many people are watching over you, competing to spend money on you. I saw two fruit baskets by your bed just now—I don't know who brought them. Maybe I'm sick too, but honestly, it makes me happy to see you like this."

"Wake up, or you'll miss seeing them anxious for you."

She chuckled softly. "It makes me happy for you to see that look on their faces."

"So many people like you now, Bai Liu."

After chatting with the still-unconscious Bai Liu for a while, Fang Dian waved and left the ward to go back to work, smiling at the others and giving them a thumbs-up. “I saw you all finished your meals the other day. I made a little extra today!”

Once Fang Dian left, everyone turned their attention to the large four-layer stainless steel lunchbox she’d left behind on the bedside table. Their throats went dry as they swallowed in unison.

…This is at least half as much as yesterday…

It took a long moment before Mu Sicheng rolled up his sleeves, his eyes filled with determination. “I’ll be the first to test the poison today!”

The night after Bai Liu fell into a coma, Tang Erda stayed behind to keep watch.

Fang Dian had initially planned to stay as well. She didn't mind the gender difference at all. Back when Bai Liu was in high school, she and Lu Yizhan had taken turns keeping watch over him. However, she had work the next day. After a firm request from Tang Erda, Fang Dian smiled widely and agreed, assuring him that Bai Liu would be fine.

Muke went home to handle the handover of the Sunshine property, and Liu Jiayi was picked up. Mu Sicheng wanted to stay but—

"Shit, I have a make-up exam tomorrow?!" Mu Sicheng opened the group chat, and his face fell when he saw the timetable for his make-up exam sent by his tutor. "I haven’t finished studying for this subject yet. Damn it!"

The tutor had politely reminded him, "Mu Sicheng, your absenteeism this semester has been high. If you don't want to make up exams next semester, I suggest you play fewer games and attend classes properly."

Mu Sicheng clutched his head in agony and, with a frustrated scream, returned to his revision.

1:00 AM.

Tang Erda felt a sense of relief when the nurse came to remove Bai Liu’s IV. But his expression quickly darkened when he noticed a small white scar in the center of Bai Liu’s collarbone, just under his slightly open shirt.

The marker markings hadn’t faded yet, so the scar was barely visible under the black ink. Tang Erda had only spotted it by chance.

His frown deepened as he examined the scar, which formed the center of a black, reverse cross. It was unmistakably a burn mark—a sign that a bullet's heated tip had grazed Bai Liu's skin.

Bai Liu wasn't the type to remain unconscious after a minor injury, so the fact that he was still out cold raised suspicion. Tang Erda now suspected that the bullet might have grazed Bai Liu's heart when Bai Six fired the first shot at him, leaving this scar behind.

Had the gods and Spades not intervened in time, Bai Liu would have been struck by that bullet.

But even a grazed wound from that soul-crushing bullet… the effects would be incalculable.

... Bai Liu, don't you dare leave us.

Tang Erda rubbed his temples, one hand resting on the hospital bed and the other on the chair beside him. He leaned wearily against the bedside table, his eyes half-closed in shallow amusement.

Bai Liu's breathing was weak, and his right hand, resting on the quilt, was suddenly gripped by a cold, translucent hand, bruised all over.

Bai Liu's right finger twitched faintly.

But Tang Erda, ever vigilant and wide awake, didn't notice the sudden appearance of the ghostly Spades. The translucent figure didn't open his eyes.

Bai Liu's eyelids fluttered open, his gaze falling on Spades. His fingers curled slightly as though attempting to hold Spades' hand, but they passed through Spades' translucent form and only grasped at the empty air.

Spades bowed down, resting his head against the spot on Bai Liu's chest where the burn mark from the bullet remained. He rubbed against it, side to side, before closing his eyes in contentment.

Bai Liu could hear Spades' thoughts: "Is this what Bai Yi said about human dreaming?"

"So this is what dreaming is like… so dreaming can even be about Bai Liu…"

Spades closed his eyes again.

"Then I want to keep dreaming."

A faint glow emanated from Spades' body as his eyes closed and his form grew increasingly transparent, almost vanishing entirely. His ethereal body encircled Bai Liu, becoming more and more intangible.

"No." Bai Liu whispered hoarsely, his voice faint yet calm. Tears slipped from the corners of his eyes, but his expression remained composed. "I hate it when people sleep in front of me all the time."

"So, wake up and meet me, Spades."

Spades opened his dark eyes and gazed at Bai Liu, his voice serious: "Yes."

For a brief moment, Spades' transparent body solidified. The ward around him swirled into a cold, wind-like vortex. Then, with a sudden gust, Tang Erda was jolted awake as the whirlwind dissipated, and Spades' ghostly form disappeared into the air.

Tang Erda, startled, scanned the room, his hand instinctively reaching for his gun. His eyes quickly locked on Bai Liu, who, to his surprise, was now sitting up in the hospital bed.

Bai Liu, still looking a bit frail, smiled at Tang Erda. "Good evening, Captain Tang."

Tang Erda, still on high alert, slowly lowered his gun as he let out a long sigh. "Not exactly a good night. You woke up really late."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu glanced toward the spot where Spades' ghost had just stood next to his bed and let out a soft chuckle. "I probably just had a rather time-consuming beauty dream."

Killer Sequence Warehouse.

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu, who had been poking the frozen Spades one by one, seemed to have realized something.

Bai Jiamu narrowed his eyes at Bai Yi. "Didn't Liao Ke tell us never to let anyone near Spades?"

"Yeah." Bai Yi poked at the ice cube on Spades' shoulder with a bored expression. "But how are we supposed to stop people from getting close if we don't keep watch?"

Bai Jiamu's forehead twitched, and he took a deep breath. "I mean, aren't we human? Shouldn't we be keeping our distance from Spades too?"

Bai Yi suddenly paused as the realization hit him. "Right!"

But just as they had this thought, it was too late.

A blast of frost exploded from Spades' body, swirling around in a storm that sent Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu flying into the air. The wind ripped at the warehouse door before they were both slammed against the wall.

Bai Yi's mouth was caught in the gust of wind, making it puff out into a jiggling, wavy pocket of air, and he couldn't help but make chortling sounds. "Fuck~ so~ cold~ ah~!"

Bai Jiamu grit his teeth, turning sideways against the wall, trying to shield himself from the freezing frost with one hand. He squinted at Spades, who was slowly rising in the center of the blizzard.

He could hear the unmistakable crack of the ice crust on Spades' body as it shattered and fell to the ground.

By the time Bai Yi felt his face freeze solid, the wind finally subsided. He shook off the ice covering his face and looked curiously at Spades, who stood unmoved in the center.

Bai Jiamu brushed the broken ice off his shoulder and grabbed Bai Yi, who was about to walk toward Spades, pulling him back with a wary shout. "Spades?"

Spades turned around, his expression neutral. "Bai Yi, I just had a dream."

Bai Yi and Bai Jiamu froze—one shocked by the abruptness of the conversation, and the other by the content of it.

"Wait—Spades, you're actually dreaming?!" Bai Yi exclaimed in disbelief. "You're a lizard! How can you dream?!"

Bai Jiamu rolled his eyes, exasperated.

Sometimes, Bai Jiamu wondered if Bai Yi really had the basic intelligence of an adult.

—The only person in the entire Killer Sequence who truly believes that Spades is really a lizard is Bai Yi.

But Bai Jiamu did find it odd that Spades was talking about dreaming. He had always been aware that Spades' status was different. Unlike their human-formed counterparts, Spades were more like monster-formed players—no origins, no home, no access to reality.

Bai Jiamu sometimes woke up in the middle of the night only to find Spades staring wide-eyed at something in the room, thinking that a monster had attacked. It wasn't until later that he realized Spades couldn't sleep with his eyes closed.

It had taken Spades quite some time to learn how to sleep with his eyes closed, but even now, he sometimes fell asleep with his eyes wide open, staring straight ahead in an eerie way.

For someone who had to learn how to sleep, dreaming was an entirely foreign concept.

There had been one time, during a game involving monsters and dreams, when several of them entered the dream world and were chased half to death by terrifying creatures. But Spades couldn't dream and wasn't able to join them in the dream world. He had to stay awake and keep watch over their bodies while they were tormented by the dream monsters.

Spades concluded that humans looked ugly when they dreamed.

So when Spades mentioned having a dream, both Bai Jiamu and Bai Yi's first reaction was disbelief.

Bai Yi immediately asked about Spades' health, and after confirming he was okay, his eyes narrowed. Given that Spades was known for having the ugliest sleeping posture, Bai Yi couldn't help but make a jab. "Dreaming is complicated—it's a higher level of human consciousness. You're a lizard, how are you even dreaming?"

Bai Yi smirked. "First off, what did you dream about?"

Spades paused, recalling the dream. "I dreamed that Bai Liu was lying in front of me in very loose clothes, his collar open. I took his hand, and he took mine. I was lying on top of him, and he held me and smiled at me. Then, I buried my head in his shoulder..."

Bai Yi immediately cut him off. "That's enough! You're supposed to be dreaming. We have minors here, you need to pause."

Pre-season

Private Practice of a Community Psychologist Consultation

Liao Ke smiled as he sent the last patient away for counseling, closing the door behind them. He removed his white coat, hanging it on the back of the door. As the smile faded from his face, he turned toward the back of the clinic and pulled aside a blue sanitary curtain.

Behind the curtain was a cramped, narrow compartment.

The small space contained an old trundle bed, barely 80cm wide, its wheels rusted. Piles of debris were scattered beside it, obscuring the face of the person lying on the bed.

The man lay so still, his breathing so faint that it was nearly undetectable, hidden behind the curtain.

Liao Ke gently pulled the curtain back, revealing Lu Yizhan, unconscious on the trundle bed. He sighed deeply.

Lu Yizhan’s face was half buried in a pillow. The exposed half was so pale that it lacked any color, his lips dry and cracked. His eyes were sunken, and his body trembled uncontrollably. The quilt covering his shoulders had been pushed aside, and blood continued to seep through.

In silence, Liao Ke undressed Lu Yizhan, noticing that the bandages on his shoulders, which he had changed earlier in the day, were soaked with blood.

The bed was too small for comfort, and Lu Yizhan’s left hand hung limply over the side. Liao Ke carefully placed it back on the bed, then adjusted the anti-inflammatory drip and placed an ice pack on Lu Yizhan's forehead. He sat on the opposite bench, hands resting on his knees, letting out another long sigh.

"You can't go to the hospital, you can't go home, you can't let anyone know you're hurt. You have to stay here, in my little clinic, and hide your injuries," Liao Ke muttered to himself.

As he shifted Lu Yizhan's shoulder to change the bandage, he sighed again. "Fang Dian never had it this bad when she was captain of a detachment working directly against Bai Liu."

He shook his head, looking at Lu Yizhan's unconscious form. "It's still your own fault, Lu Yizhan..."

"Why did you have to try to save everyone?" he continued, his voice tinged with frustration. "You're just one person. It's enough to save most people. But no, you had to go and try to save even the heretics, the monsters, the gods—especially that Bai Liu. You tried to bring him back."

Liao Ke discarded the bloodstained bandages into the medical bin and found a clean piece of gauze to wipe the sweat from Lu Yizhan's face. After turning off the clinic lights, he sat quietly, watching over Lu Yizhan in the dim, quiet night. His gaze was distant, lost in thought, as he murmured to himself.

"There's no way for a human to do all that, Lu Yizhan."

"If you don't stop Bai Liu from winning the league this time, even if you don't die now, you'll meet a horrible fate in the future."

"Lu Yizhan, do you even realize what you're doing?"

Lu Yizhan remained motionless on the trundle bed, deep in sleep, offering no answer.

Deer Hunter Guild Meeting Room

After the game, it is customary to review the footage to analyze the results, but this process has already been completed.

Now, the meeting has ended, and only Cen Buming remains, sitting alone at the far end of the room.

The lights are off, leaving the room in darkness except for the glow from the front screen. Cen Buming, his eyes shadowed, watches the clip of the Reverse God killing him over and over again. His right hand rests on the back of his chair, while his left hand absentmindedly turns the ring on his finger.

Brother, why did you defect from the Heretical Authority?

The eight Inquisitors led by Captain Fang Dian were reduced to seven failures. Over the course of more than six hundred rounds, these seven Inquisitors were repeatedly seduced, deceived, and tortured by Bai

Liu. The evil gods reveled in their suffering, pushing them to the brink until they could bear no more.

Ultimately, the seven Inquisitors lost the game and surrendered, shedding tears and selling their souls to Bai Liu. Their agony transformed them into the seven stone statues that Bai Liu used to decorate his temple.

Brother, you are the last Inquisitor.

Are you going to follow the same path as the first seven? Kneel before some world-line evil god, sell your soul, and become just another ornament in Bai Liu's collection?

I can't believe you've made it this far, brother. You're the only Inquisitor to survive more than six hundred games against Bai Liu.

So, brother—

Cen Buming taps the system panel, and the screen shifts to a snowy backdrop. The video of the [Wandering Circus vs. Russell Cemetery] appears in the bottom right corner. He watches it intently as it reaches its end, and the system prompt flashes: [Russell Cemetery won the match].

Were you really so close to Bai Liu that you'd set him up to lose?

The Temple of Laleje

In the sound of endless dark waves, the stone-speckled seer sits on a stone bench, eyes closed, head bowed. Across from him sits the evil god in his hood, idly teasing seabirds that have landed on the stone table, the cards in front of him rustling in the breeze.

The cards flutter but remain in place, held by an unseen magical force. The prophet’s side is empty, while the evil god's side is piled high with cards. The top card depicts a grand, retro opera house perched on the sea, resembling the Temple of Lalaye.

“All it takes is one win for Bai Liu, and our game is over, Prophet,” the evil god sighs with a hint of regret. “Unfortunately, you no longer have the cards to stop him from securing his victory.”

He looks up at the sleeping prophet with a mocking smile. “Except for yourself.”

“But it’s hard to say how much your crippled prophet card will do to prevent Bai Liu’s inevitable win.”

The prophet's head remains bowed. The evil god gently raises the seabird's beak, and it flaps its wings, briefly taking to the air before landing again, its feet gripping the prophet’s now petrified shoulder.

The stone shoulder cracks, splintering like a bullet had struck it, mirroring the soul-shattering wound inflicted on the Reverse God by the soul-shattering gun.

The seabird tosses its head back with a hiss and flaps away, disappearing into the dark clouds.

The evil god extends his slender finger and places it on the forehead of the stone statue. He whispers softly, eyes lowered.

“The game isn’t over between us. Wake up from your dreams, Prophet.”

A drop of water falls from the prophet’s hair, rolling down the side of his neck.

The sea breeze blows fiercely, carrying the droplet away just before it hits the table. The seabirds cry out from the clouds, their wings spreading as if to break the faint sunlight that shines through the Temple of Laleje.

The prophet’s eyelids twitch.

It’s as if the wind, carrying the drop of water, sweeps him away, sending him through time and space. He sails across more than six hundred dark timelines, finally returning to where it all began.

The very first line of the world.

“Lu Yizhan!” Someone calls out from a distance, cupping their hands around their mouth to amplify their voice. “The training registration point for the first branch of the Bureau of Heresy Processing is here! You’re going the wrong way!”

He stops, turning as the landscape shifts and reverses around him. Time flows backward, pulling everything into colored, abstract lines. Lu Yizhan runs through this tunnel until everything snaps back into place.

He halts in his tracks.

Turning his head, Lu Yizhan now appears to be seventeen or eighteen, scratching his head in confusion. “Am I going the wrong way?”

The man sighs helplessly. “Of course, you’re going the wrong way! The second team registration office is over there. The first team is here.”

Lu Yizhan glances curiously at the second team registration desk. There, he sees a stern-faced but youthful boy, standing with perfect posture. The boy looks up at the desk and reports, “Cen Buming, seventeen years old.”

“My ambition is to join the second team, and once I do, I will assist you in eliminating all the heretics in the area.”

Lu Yizhan turns away as the man beside him whispers, “Team Two is a field team—high risk. The kids who aspire to it are usually those who’ve been severely persecuted by the heretics, had their families torn apart, and were left on their own. They’re adopted by the Heresy Bureau and placed in training camps.”

“This Cen Buming is probably one of those.”

“I prefer the first team,” the man continues. “Your ambition is the first team, right?” He nods approvingly. “The first team isn’t as dangerous.”

Lu Yizhan thinks for a moment before asking, “Aren’t both Team 1 and Team 2 field teams? Aren’t they both dangerous?”

“It’s not the same!” the man exclaims, his arms flailing in excitement. “The captain of Team One is incredibly strong! She takes us on missions that are nowhere near as dangerous as those on Team Two. Her squad is top-notch—the best in the whole Bureau of Heresy Processing.”

“They’re called The Army of the Righteous Cross of Judgment.”

The man places a hand over his heart, his face full of admiration. “I only wish I could join the Crusaders one day.”

Lu Yizhan smiles slightly and pats the man on the shoulder. “If we work hard, we can make it!”

The man instantly dropped to the ground in frustration. "How is that possible? Ordinary members like us are lucky just to squeeze into the first team and go on missions with the Cross Judgement Army!"

"Do you want to join the first team that badly?" Lu Yizhan scratched his head and smiled indifferently. "I don't have any particular attachment. I can go anywhere."

The man glanced over at the registration desk for the other detachments and spoke in a low voice. "Lu Yizhan, you should try for the first team if you can. I heard from them that the culture in the other teams isn’t great. Unlike the first team captain, who looks out for newcomers, they’ll just bully them."

"Go for the first team's written exam, huh?"

Lu Yizhan nodded but quickly dismissed the matter from his mind, not giving it a second thought.

It wasn't until after lunch that he was blocked in the alley behind the canteen by a group of people with disgruntled looks on their faces. Lu Yizhan, not wanting to cause trouble, scanned their faces briefly and immediately recognized them. They were from the group that had been brushed off during the written test earlier that morning.

The first team didn't want trainers with bad records, and these trainees had likely been involved in more than a few fights. They were upset about being eliminated and decided to target Lu Yizhan, who had passed the exam with high marks.

"Well, well," one man said, his hands casually tucked in his pockets, eyeing Lu Yizhan with scorn. "I can’t believe it, Lu Yizhan. You’re still a schoolteacher."

Lu Yizhan raised his hands in a gesture of surrender, smiling as he responded, "Just lucky."

"If you guys just hate the idea of me being in the first team, I can change my mind this afternoon and join the second team instead," he added.

The group paused, clearly taken aback. They hadn’t expected him to give in so quickly. However, they weren’t ready to let it go just yet and picked another bone with him. "How do we know you’ll actually change?"

"Here's an idea," Lu Yizhan suggested, "The captain of the first team is conducting interviews this afternoon. She doesn't like players who smoke, so if she smells smoke on you, she probably won't let you through."

One of the men pulled out a crumpled cigarette and handed it to Lu Yizhan with an evil smile. "Smoke it, and we'll let you go."

Lu Yizhan, who had never smoked before, glanced at the cigarette and weighed his options: smoke it or spend more time with these people. He sighed and accepted it, leaning forward to signal to light it for him.

The man lit the cigarette, but as soon as Lu Yizhan took his first puff, he began choking and coughing violently. He had never smoked before, and the taste was worse than he had imagined.

Should've known better than to pick smoking.

As he struggled, the group jeered. By his third puff, Lu Yizhan couldn't continue, but they wouldn't let up and forced him to keep smoking.

"Hey, what's going on over there?" A lazy female voice called from the alley entrance.

The group froze. Lu Yizhan, still holding the cigarette and blinking through his tears, looked up at the figure standing in the light. The woman was tall and muscular, carrying a heavy sword that was almost as tall as she was. She stood there casually, leaning against the wall, but her presence was so imposing that Lu Yizhan could almost smell the bloodlust emanating from her.

One man shook and stammered, "Captain Fang! Yes!"

The others quickly shifted uncomfortably, and the woman responded with a lazy, "Good day," as she walked into the alley, dragging her heavy sword behind her.

When the light shifted, revealing her fully, Lu Yizhan could see her distinct features. Captain Fang was striking, with an effortless beauty that seemed to radiate danger. She had a languid, almost bored aura, yet there was something about her—like she was ready to draw her sword at any moment.

Her gaze swept over Lu Yizhan's watery eyes and the half-smoked cigarette in his hand before settling on the shivering trainees. "I'm considering sending your files to the Third Branch."

(The Third Branch was notorious for its terrible conditions.)

The group fell silent, but one brave soul spoke up. "Captain Fang, we were just teaching him how to smoke. We didn't break any rules. Why should our files be sent to the Third Branch?"

Fang Dian chuckled, leaning against the wall. She turned to Lu Yizhan. "They said they taught you to smoke. Is that true?"

Lu Yizhan met the men's glares and, adhering to his usual principle of avoiding further conflict, paused for a moment before reluctantly agreeing. "Yes."

"But I don't think they've taught you properly," Fang Dian said, turning her attention to the cigarette in Lu Yizhan's hand. "Looks like they didn't do a great job. Let me show you how it's done."

She casually plucked the cigarette from Lu Yizhan's lips, took a puff, and exhaled slowly.

Lu Yizhan's eyes widened, fixated on the way she held the cigarette.

"If you want to learn, you should demonstrate first," Fang Dian said, lifting her eyes and meeting the group's gazes. "Anyone who wants to learn in the future, come to me personally. Don't try teaching people yourselves."

She gave the group a cold look. "And if I catch anyone forcing someone to smoke again, I won't hesitate to help them quit."

The group stared in stunned silence before hastily agreeing and scampering off like frightened rats.

After her lecture, Fang Dian didn't wait for any further response from Lu Yizhan. She casually handed him the cigarette back, which he still hadn't smoked, and turned to leave. As she walked away, she waved at him casually, almost as if it were an afterthought.

Lu Yizhan suddenly called out, "Captain Fang!"

Fang Dian stopped and turned back, raising an eyebrow. "What is it?"

Lu Yizhan, his face flushed, took a deep breath and straightened his back. Holding the now-extinguished cigarette in his hand, he tried to speak clearly. "My name is Lu Yizhan. I’m eighteen years old."

He paused briefly, then continued, "Since I was a trainee, my ambition has always been to join the first team. I was first in the written test this morning, and I’ve always looked up to you, Captain Fang."

Fang Dian smiled slightly. "That’s good. That’s excellent."

"The first team welcomes you."

The First World Line

Lu Yizhan sat in the cafeteria for an hour, his cheeks flushed, his mind replaying the image of Fang Dian: the way he smiled softly, pursed his cigarette, and exhaled a puff of smoke. Then, in the afternoon, before his interview, he gave himself a quick primping and donned a formal-looking posture... only to find that—

The interviewer was not Fang Dian.

Lu Yizhan could barely contain his disappointment when he saw the large, burly interviewer slump his shoulders in a way that almost made him sigh inwardly.

The interviewer, Dong Chenglong, was a member of the [Cross Judgement Army], tasked with assault duty. He wielded a pair of meteor hammers, said to weigh a ton and a half, and stood at an imposing 2.21 meters tall. His body was so muscular that he could probably run a horse on his biceps. His eyes glared at everyone, and his hair was wild, spreading in all directions like a sunflower in full bloom.

During training, Dong Chenglong often complained privately about his hyperthyroidism, which caused his bulging eyes.

...He’s nothing like Captain Fang.

Dong Chenglong gave Lu Yizhan a brief nod and gestured for him to step forward. "I’m handling all the newcomers this year. Come up and introduce yourself."

Lu Yizhan, wearing a dejected expression, introduced himself: "Hello, my name is Lu Yizhan. I’m eighteen, and I’m subject to transfer."

"No spirit!" Dong Chenglong frowned as he looked at the slumped figure of Lu Yizhan. Then, glancing down at Lu Yizhan’s file, his expression subtly shifted before returning to the downcast trainee.

Lu Yizhan's previous training results had been unremarkable, but there was something oddly consistent about his mediocrity.

For example, if he scored 80 in a shooting class, he would consistently score between 80 and 85 in every session. If he aced a heresy information recording class with a score of 85, he'd maintain grades between 85 and 90. All his subjects fluctuated by five points or less, except for the actual vs. Heresy training session, where his scores varied a bit more.

His results were shockingly consistent.

The highest-scoring trainee this year was Cen Buming, who had been assigned to the second team, though his performance had been less steady.

Dong Chenglong folded his hands on the table and looked solemnly at Lu Yizhan. "I see that your grades are average, but you came first in this year's written exam with a perfect score—two points higher than Cen Buming, who had the highest overall score before."

Lu Yizhan scratched his head and giggled awkwardly. "Good luck, instructor."

Dong Chenglong's eyes widened, and he tapped his fingers on the table twice before asking sharply, "Lucky enough to get a perfect score? Stop pretending, Lu Yizhan. Why do you usually act so mediocre?"

Lu Yizhan quickly shook his head, his voice rising in denial. "No, no! That's not it!"

"The Bureau of Heresy Processing doesn't force anyone to hide their abilities, does it?" Dong Chenglong pressed.

"No, no!" Lu Yizhan quickly corrected himself.

"The captains here are all very level-headed," Lu Yizhan said, thinking it over. "Honestly, I expected to be noticed, so I'm not embarrassed. But... the Bureau of Heresy Processing doesn't really need me to be excellent, does it?"

Dong Chenglong blinked, taken aback by the unexpected reply.

Lu Yizhan smiled faintly. "There are enough talented people here. As for someone like me—just a little clever but without big ambitions or a desire to save the world—I should just be ordinary and make space for people like Cen Buming, who really have big goals."

Dong Chenglong stared at Lu Yizhan for a long moment. Then, with a firm motion, he picked up the large seal beside him and stamped it on Lu Yizhan's file with a resounding thud: "The interview was not approved."

"An ordinary person has no place in a detachment."

Dong Chenglong's voice rose with fury as he slammed his hand on the table, standing up with such force that the floor seemed to tremble.

"Anyone who stays in a team, even if they're just a loser, must have the resolve to save the world!"

Lu Yizhan flinched at the noise, and as he glanced at the huge red "NOT APPROVED" stamped on his file, he sighed inwardly. Yet, with acceptance, he rose, took his file, and bowed to Dong Chenglong.

"Thank you for your guidance, instructor. I'll take the initiative and join the third team in logistics."

Dong Chenglong fixed him with a piercing gaze. "Only in a world without God are there ordinary people."

"In a world that can be turned upside down at any moment, there are only heretics and those who fight them. There's no place for ordinary people."

"One day, you will regret your inaction, Lu Yizhan."

Lu Yizhan waved in farewell, unmoved. As he walked away, he thought quietly to himself:

--Let's wait for that day to come.

But that day came much sooner than Lu Yizhan had expected.

While staying at the third detachment, Lu Yizhan had been clearing heretics from the warehouses, one by one. After finishing with a particularly slimy one, he stepped out, shaking his hands, only to see people running through the corridors in a panic, talking loudly.

"What is dried rose leaf gas?!"
"None of the men from the second detachment who went there have returned!"
"The large force of the Cross Judgement Army hasn't returned from their field trip! Now there's no way out. It'll have to rotate to the three detachments for cover!"
"Oh my God, I'm not ready to go out in the field—are we going to die...?"

Fear spread like wildfire.

Lu Yizhan, who had been cleaning heretical warehouses, was hastily transferred to an impromptu squad that was about to go into battle.

The team consisted of fifty-three men, seven of whom were from the third detachment, including Lu Yizhan. The man leading the team was none other than—

Dong Chenglong.

Dong Chenglong, dressed in his bulging, muscular Heretic's Authority uniform, scowled at everyone, his arms crossed. His imposing presence exuded both pressure and—a sense of security.

Lu Yizhan clearly overheard three of his teammates sigh in relief. "What? So, it's Instructor Dong from the [Cross Judgement Army] leading the team? Then it's okay."

Dong Chenglong's voice, deep and commanding, rang out. "A group from the second detachment encountered a special heresy in a perfume factory. By the time they discovered it, the perfume heresy had already spread on a large scale throughout the city."

"The Cen Buming crew risked their lives investigating a potential link to something buried beneath the field of roses in front of the perfume factory. At that point, contact between them and us was completely cut off."

Dong Chenglong's eyes widened. "Our mission has three objectives—"

"First, capture the heretic known as Rose Dried Leaf."

"Second, bring back the entire second detachment."

"And lastly—" Dong Chenglong shouted, "Whatever happens, come back alive! Do you hear me?!"

Everyone responded loudly, "I hear you, instructor!"

Dong Chenglong growled, "No spirit! Speak louder! Do you hear me?!"

The team took a deep breath and shouted in unison, "I hear you—!!!"

By the time they arrived outside the perfume factory, night had fallen.

The factory was shrouded in a rose-colored haze. With breathing masks on and carrying multiple oxygen tanks, they cautiously marched through the flower fields, careful not to alert anyone inside the factory or inhale the bizarre perfume fumes.

The men of the third detachment, including Lu Yizhan, were tasked with avoiding the heretics in the flower fields and instead searching around the factory for the missing members of the second detachment.

It seemed like a simple enough task, but as Lu Yizhan searched intently, the whereabouts of the missing men grew increasingly mysterious. Based on the clues he uncovered, it became clear that the second detachment had most likely been captured inside the perfume factory.

An uneasy feeling settled in as Lu Yizhan made contact with the team about the scent paper.

These team members... Could they have been taken to make the so-called fragrance testing paper?

Pausing his search, Lu Yizhan contacted Dong Chenglong, who was dealing with the heretics: "Captain Dong, we've reached the outer entrance of the perfume factory. We suspect the second detachment may be in the basement, imprisoned by the people here. Should we continue the search?"

Dong Chenglong's voice came back sternly, "Stop searching. Wait for me to come."

But before his voice had fully faded, a slow, unhurried sound of leather boots echoed from the entrance, followed by a man's slightly amused voice: "It's rather rude to show up uninvited at someone's factory this late, isn't it?"

Lu Yizhan instinctively took a cautious step back, his gaze locking onto a grotesque creature at the entrance. Its limbs and head were covered in a sticky substance as it held a paraffin lamp in its tentacles, lighting the way for the man approaching.

The creature was wearing a factory uniform with a sign pinned to its chest: [Generation Director of the Rose Perfume Factory].

The man's face slowly emerged from the shadows, his long hair tied loosely in a ponytail, cascading down his back. He was dressed in a long black trench coat, holding a black bone whip. His dark eyes curved into a smile, the dim light from the paraffin lamp reflecting in them.

Lu Yizhan stepped back warily while trying to keep the man's attention. "You're not from here either, are you? Aren't you just another guest like us?"

The man smiled. "Me? I'm not uninvited. I'm a guest of the factory manager."

The creature that was apparently the factory manager wriggled its tentacles and, with an unsettling laugh, spoke through multiple mouths: "Yes, Mr. Bai Six is my honored guest."

"If I hadn't happened to find what Mr. Bai Six left in the harbor and planted it in my rose fields, my fields wouldn't have grown such beautiful roses. I wouldn't have been able to make such wonderful perfume, and the factory wouldn't have been able to operate."

The creature's face dripped mucus as it laughed more unnervingly. "I had to invite Mr. Bai Six over to thank him for such a big favor."

Bai Six smiled, his expression dim and ambiguous in the dim light. "Personally, I'm not a big fan of the deal," he said, lowering his eyes and waving a finger in the air.

Lu Yizhan's pupils dilated. Immediately, he turned to the team with a sharp command, "Protect the oxygen tanks and masks!"

But it was too late.

Except for Lu Yizhan, who quickly shielded the oxygen tank on his back, the other men's tanks were all wrapped in thorny tentacles, slowly shrinking inward as the tanks deflated. The edges hissed with gas leaks, and the rose-colored perfume fumes instantly poured back into their masks.

In the blink of an eye, the pupils of the other six men, excluding Lu Yizhan, turned to roses, their eyes dropping in disbelief as they collapsed to their knees.

Lu Yizhan jumped back twice to avoid the constant barrage of thorns rising from the ground. Gritting his teeth, he gasped, his eyes locking on Bai Six's dimly lit face. He quickly pulled out his communicator. "Captain Dong! There are people here! Team 3 has failed in their mission to rescue the members of Team 2…"

Before he could finish, a sledgehammer narrowly brushed past his side and came crashing down on Bai Six, who stood at the entrance. A deep, angry male voice snapped a rebuke, “No spirit—!”

“—No aborting the mission before the lead man has arrived!”

Bai Six deftly sidestepped the sledgehammer, which struck the factory manager's head with such force that it reduced him to a pile of writhing flesh, his screams echoing.

Dong Chenglong stood before Lu Yizhan, legs apart in a defensive stance, holding an unconscious Cen Buming in his left arm. He tossed Cen Buming to Lu Yizhan, then grabbed the sledgehammer with both hands, straightening his back. He locked eyes with Bai Six and bellowed, “Bai Six—!”

Bai Six smiled politely. “Captain Dong, it’s been a long time. You’re still in good spirits.”

Dong Chenglong, without a word, prepared to throw the sledgehammer again. But just as he moved, Bai Six reached out with his left hand. In the dim light from a paraffin lamp, he revealed a still-beating heart in his glove.

He grinned at Dong Chenglong. “Captain Dong, this is the heretic at the heart of the rose perfume you’ve been looking for. If you strike now, the heart will shatter along with me.”

“—And in that moment, the world will be tainted by the rich rose-scented water flowing from this heart.”

Dong Chenglong paused, lowering the sledgehammer. His glare at Bai Six was fierce. “What game are you playing this time?”

Bai Six laughed lightly. “Captain Dong, you know me well.”

“You have two choices,” Bai Six continued. “The first: Eat this heart, and let the rose thorns permeate your body, turning you into a vessel for this heresy.”

“Second option—” He glanced over at Lu Yizhan, who stood quietly by his side. He smiled. “—Let the little player next to you swallow it.”

“My personal advice? Let the junior member swallow it. After all, you’re the main attacker of the [Cross Judgement Army]. You’re far more valuable than that junior member. If you die and become a vessel—" Bai Six shook his head with a mock-pitying expression. "—Your captain, Fang Dian, will have a difficult time against me in the future without a main attacker."

"I'm sure your little team member agrees." Bai Six flashed a knowing smile at Lu Yizhan, who kept his head down, silent. "Letting this ordinary junior member die here might be the most productive use of his time for you."

Lu Yizhan clenched his fist, feeling the oxygen in his tank running low. He knew that if they continued, both he and Dong Chenglong would die here.

Bai Six was right. An ordinary team member like him would have been a valuable sacrifice for the Heretic Authority.

A main attacker of the [Judgemental Army of the Right Cross] and a caretaker of the third detachment—any fool could see how this would play out.

Lu Yizhan slowly rose to his feet, only to be immediately shoved back down by a heavy slap from Dong Chenglong.

Dong Chenglong, looking as hale and hearty as ever, swung his hammer and charged at Bai Six. He snatched the heart from Bai Six's hand, tilted his head, and swallowed it in one swift motion. After a slight roll of his throat, he raised his hammer and hissed, "I've finished!"

Bai Six laughed. "What a... surprising choice."

His shadow and voice vanished into the rose-colored smoke the instant the sledgehammer struck him.

The thorns erupted from the ground, wrapping around Dong Chenglong's ankles and pulling him back, immobilizing him. More thorns hovered in the air, their sharp points aimed at him, and then they rained down like a million arrows, piercing him.

Lu Yizhan's pupils contracted into tiny dots, his face splattered with Dong Chenglong's blood, his own oxygen tank nearly empty as he struggled to breathe.

Dong Chenglong was nailed to the ground by the barrage of thorns, his body crisscrossed with the lethal strikes. With his bloodied palms, he removed his face mask and inserted his oxygen tank into Lu Yizhan's.

"Why..." Lu Yizhan asked, his voice hollow, "Am I just a... worthless common... waste?"

Dong Chenglong lifted his blood-streaked face, his eyes once full of anger now unfocused. With a final, rasping breath, he spoke in a hoarse voice.

"... The only value of our existence is so that you, one day, will have the freedom to choose to be an ordinary person."

"Now—" Dong Chenglong's voice grew louder as he roared with his final breath, "—Run like a normal person under my protection, Lu Yizhan!"

"Use all your strength and run like a wreck!!!"

The First World Line

Lu Yizhan had never run so fast in his life. He panted heavily, sucking in the oxygen Dong Chenglong had hooked up to him, all while carrying an unconscious Cen Buming on his back.

The rose-colored smoke blurred the world around him, turning his frantic sprint into a fever dream.

Then, through the haze, he saw the familiar figure—the one carrying the heavy sword.

Lu Yizhan's legs nearly gave out. He stumbled forward, barely staying upright before collapsing into Fang Dian’s waiting hand.

His breath came in ragged gasps, and only now did he realize that tears had begun to fall, silent and uncontrollable. He couldn't find his voice.

Fang Dian’s order rang loud and clear in his ear.

"Lu Yizhan, member of the third detachment led by Dong Chenglong, of the [Cross Judgement Army], has successfully rescued members of the second detachment!"

Then, without hesitation, Fang Dian turned toward the Rose Factory. Dust-covered, battle-worn, her grip on the heavy sword was firm as she drove it into the ground.

"Mission handover!" she declared.

"[Cross Judgement Army], clear the battlefield!"

Lu Yizhan didn’t remember how he made it back to the Heresy Bureau. He must have blacked out. But no—he remembered everything. Every detail was burned into his mind as if he were a hollow shell, his soul drawn out of him.

Cen Buming was taken from his back and placed on a stretcher. Lu Yizhan himself was bedridden for only half a day before he forced himself to return to the main office.

Chaos reigned within the Bureau. The air was thick with the scent of roses, their reflection visible in the dazed, pain-stricken eyes of those who had inhaled the gas. Everywhere, people writhed in agony.

With every step against the wall for support, Lu Yizhan felt as though he was crushing petals of flesh and blood beneath his feet. The building echoed with cries of pain, a cacophony of suffering that made it feel like he had stepped into hell itself.

It felt like the end of the world.

And Fang Dian was the one standing between them and that end.

She returned like an unshakable pillar, her presence alone calming the storm. Standing tall, her bloodstained heavy sword in hand, she met the eyes of every soldier in the room.

"We took care of the Rose Factory," she announced, voice unwavering. "And we've found a way to contain the dried leaf rose gas."

She didn't wait for a reaction.

"Get the team members who are mentally stable and resistant to heresy over here. We need to extract the antidote—now."

Hands shot up, but Lu Yizhan's was the first.

He followed behind Fang Dian, his head bowed, steps quick to match hers. His throat tightened around the question he had been afraid to ask. He opened his mouth, hesitated, and then finally forced the words out.

"Captain Fang… has Captain Dong… come back yet?"

Fang Dian's grip on her sword clenched violently. She lowered her head, strands of hair falling over her face, her expression unreadable.

"...Back."

Lu Yizhan soon learned exactly what she meant.

He stared, numb and silent, at the body of Dong Chenglong in the heretical storage room. His eyes, once so full of life, had faded to a stormy grey. His mouth was frozen open in a silent scream. His heart had been pierced—no, consumed—by a thousand rose thorns.

A voice recited the grim report.

"Heresy 6071, Dried Rose Leaf Gas. Reception: the body of Dong Chenglong, member of the [Cross Judgement Army]."

Fang Dian hesitated for only a moment before continuing.

"Weakness and mitigation. Weakness: the heart. Mitigation: stripping the rose thorns growing from the corpse and having contaminated members ingest them."

Lu Yizhan barely heard the rest.

"One hundred and twelve members of the Heresy Processing Bureau have been contaminated," Fang Dian said, voice clipped and firm. "Retrieve the thorns from Captain Dong's body and transport them to the hospital for administration."

A sharp pause. Then—

"Do not tell them where the thorns came from. I'll classify the Rose Perfume file as a first-class secret."

"Move quickly."

She turned to leave.

Lu Yizhan stood frozen, fingers clenched so tightly around the oxygen mask in his pocket that the plastic bent under the pressure.

"Captain Fang." His voice came out hoarse, barely above a whisper. "If you had to choose… between me and Captain Dong… who would you have saved?"

Fang Dian's steps halted.

"I have no right to make that choice," she said quietly.

Then, after a moment—

"But Dong already made his."

Her voice softened, carrying the weight of something unspoken.

"Don't question his decision in front of his body." A wry smile, barely there. "Besides… if you do, he might just come back to scold you for it."

She glanced back, eyes unreadable.

"Because you were worth it."

Lu Yizhan bit down hard, trying to hold back the tears burning in his eyes.

Then, before anyone else could move, he reached for his knife.

And with shaking hands, he sliced open Dong Chenglong's skin, extracting the still-writhing thorns from his fallen captain's body.

"Come on, cut it out!" Lu Yizhan turned his head and snapped at the team members who stood frozen in place. "No spirit!"

Three days later, the Rose Factory incident had settled.

Lu Yizhan lingered at the corner of a hallway for a long time, hesitating. When he finally saw Fang Dian passing by after dinner, he took a deep breath, mustered his courage, and stepped forward, holding out a file. "Captain Fang, I want to join the First Team!"

Fang Dian raised an eyebrow in mild surprise. "But recruitment season is over for this year."

"I'm not applying through the usual channels." Lu Yizhan straightened his back. "I want to enlist directly into the [Cross Judgement Army] to fill Captain Dong's vacant position."

Fang Dian glanced at him, then smirked as she waved another file in her hand. "That's rare. [The Cross Judgement Army] hasn't received a single application in years, and now, suddenly, we have two."

Lu Yizhan blinked. "Two?"

"Apart from you, Cen Buming from the Second Team has also applied," Fang Dian explained. "And we can only take one this year. You might want to talk it over with him first."

So, Lu Yizhan made his way to Cen Buming's ward.

Just before he stepped inside, he overheard voices from within. A young, dry-sounding voice spoke first.

"...Am I the only one who made it back from the Second Team?"

Lu Yizhan recognized Cen Buming's voice immediately.

A moment of silence followed before another, more mature voice answered hesitantly.

"...The others didn't survive the incense test paper. They didn't last until reinforcements arrived. They were alienated into monsters... and killed by the [Cross Judgement Army]."

A breathless pause. Then, the second voice added gently, "Cheer up." A pat on the shoulder, the sound of footsteps approaching—Lu Yizhan quickly stepped aside as a man exited the ward.

Just as Lu Yizhan was about to enter, he heard the sounds inside. Suppressed, ragged cries. Desperate fists hammering the bed, muffled sobs barely holding back anguish.

Lu Yizhan hesitated at the door. "..."

He understood the feeling. He had been through the same thing just days before. If anything, his own crying had been even less dignified.

But after twenty minutes, when the sounds still hadn't stopped, Lu Yizhan began to reconsider his timing. Just as he turned to leave, his foot landed on a loose tile, making an audible crack.

Inside, the crying abruptly stopped.

"Who's there?" Cen Buming's voice was sharp, alert.

Lu Yizhan exhaled and, pretending he had just arrived, pushed open the door. "Hello, Cen Buming. I'm the other candidate competing for the [Cross Judgement Army] alternate spot. Lu Yizhan, Third Team."

He extended a hand in greeting.

Cen Buming glanced at him coolly and didn't take it. "You're the one who scored two points higher than me on the written test."

Lu Yizhan picked up on the edge in his voice and sighed inwardly. Clearly, this wasn't the best timing. "Yeah, pure coincidence."

"Coincidence?" Cen Buming scoffed. "You 'coincidentally' passed me on the written test? And 'coincidentally' got a perfect score? Even though you usually only get 70 or 80?"

Lu Yizhan replied matter-of-factly, "Yeah, it's a coincidence. Because if it weren't, I would've beaten you in every exam."

Cen Buming: "..."

His red-rimmed eyes darkened. Meanwhile, Lu Yizhan, who had barely held back his own tears moments ago, scratched his head and added, "I didn't mean to insult you. I just thought the test was easy. I figured you'd get a perfect score too."

His brow furrowed slightly. "Didn't you usually get full marks? How'd you end up with 98?"

Cen Buming, who had, in fact, barely missed two points, clenched his jaw in fury. His bloodshot eyes sharpened as he spat, "Get out."

Lu Yizhan figured this probably wasn't the best day to talk, so he gave Cen Buming a pat on the shoulder. "Get some rest," he said before turning to leave.

"Wait."

Cen Buming's voice stopped him, his tone suddenly dark and heavy. "I just spoke to someone from the Second Team. They told me... you were the first to run from the factory. That you left Captain Dong behind."

Lu Yizhan stilled.

"Captain Dong got me out," Cen Buming continued, voice shaking. "I was too unconscious to help him. But you—" He took a step forward, fists clenched. "Why did you run? When you had the strength to fight?"

His red eyes bore into Lu Yizhan, filled with grief and accusation. "If you had stayed, maybe you could've saved another from the Second Team."

"Maybe Captain Dong wouldn't have had to protect me alone. Maybe he wouldn't have had to die in that place!"

Lu Yizhan opened his mouth but hesitated.

Cen Buming didn't know the truth. He thought Dong Chenglong had sacrificed himself for Lu Yizhan. That was why he was so desperate to join the [Cross Judgement Army]—to make up for what he believed was his own failure.

But looking at the raw, self-loathing pain on Cen Buming's face, Lu

Yizhan swallowed back the truth. [I couldn't have saved anyone behind your back.]

Instead, he gave a small, tired smile. "Because I'm just an ordinary coward." He scratched his head. "I ran away out of fear. Guess I'm just greedy for my own life."

Cen Buming's breath hitched. His face contorted with rage. "Coward! Deserter! Get the hell out!!!"

Lu Yizhan barely dodged the water cup thrown at him, quickly shutting the door behind him before it could hit his head. He patted his chest, exhaled, and walked away.

Much later, Cen Buming would ask, "Brother, why didn't you tell me you were the one who carried me out?"

But back then, standing outside his ward and listening to his heartbreaking cries, Lu Yizhan had only thought—

[If you keep hating yourself like this, you won't last much longer.]

[So why not hate me instead?]

The First World Line

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

While Lu Yizhan was waiting for Cen Buming to calm down before attempting a more peaceful conversation, he overheard Cen Buming applying to Fang Dian for a duel, citing a "fair decision."

Whenever there are multiple individuals vying for a position or task, the [Cross Judges] are responsible for assigning the challenge. The process involves a set of questions, and ten randomly selected members of the Board serve as the [Jury] to ensure fairness and prevent cheating.

The first person to solve the puzzle is awarded the position or task.

This method has been the standard for selecting members of the Crusaders, so Fang Dian quickly approved it.

Soon, Lu Yizhan received his set of questions.

The task was straightforward—complete it on his own within half an hour. Whoever finished first would secure a place in the Crusaders.

If an emergency arose, a team member would intervene to assist, and the affected participant would be disqualified.

Upon receiving the challenge, Lu Yizhan’s expression darkened slightly. The dried-leaf rose was classified as a heretic of the red danger class.

The test was clear: it would assess their familiarity with the heretic’s weaknesses, their adaptability, and possibly... a psychological profile.

Cen Buming didn't hesitate and submitted his consent form on the same day he received the exam questions.

The next day, Lu Yizhan also submitted his form.

On the third day, the test began. The Crusader member assigned as the safety officer was Yu Fu, the team’s medical expert in charge of accidents. Yu Fu was well-known for her skill with scalpels and surgical threads. With her sweet, gentle demeanor, she often wore a close-fitting white coat or sometimes a nurse’s uniform. Her shoulder-length hair completed her caring appearance.

Lu Yizhan, who wasn't particularly fond of such situations, was well aware that Yu Fu had earned a reputation as the "flower" of the Heretics Authority, with many crushes on her.

Though Yu Fu always greeted people with a saintly, concerned look, her first words to a new patient were typically: "Why are you hurt again? Come, let me take a look."

The team members, not keen on her treatment methods, would usually try to excuse themselves, but Yu Fu would simply smile and say, "I'm a doctor; it's my job to treat you." And before they could protest, she would drag them into her treatment room.

After a thorough (and often painful) treatment, the members would leave Yu Fu's care, healed but emotionally exhausted. With a cheerful wave, she'd always say, "See you next time."

Yu Fu had a peculiar habit: she refused to use anesthesia when treating patients.

Captain Fang, who preferred to remain anonymous, once asked Yu Fu why she avoided anesthesia, knowing it made the treatments so much more painful. Her response was simple: "Only pain, real, deep pain, will make one remember not to repeat their mistakes."

"Pain is not fatal, but mistakes can be," she added.

On the day of the trial, Fang Dian was the one to release the heretic. The venue for this was the Heretics Directorate's field practice base.

When Lu Yizhan was a trainee, he had handled various heretics released by instructors for training purposes, as part of a field exercise for new trainees in the Bureau of Heresy.

The heretics at that time were relatively tame, with the most dangerous ones being of the orange danger class. The instructor leading them then was still Dong Chenglong.

But now, everything had changed.

As Lu Yizhan donned his protective gear and secured his gun on his belt, he glanced over at Cen Buming, who was also preparing in his gear at the other end.

Yu Fu approached them to introduce the jury members: four from the third branch, three from the second, one from the first branch, and finally, two trainees who appeared to be around 15 or 16 years old.

The gentle smile on Yu Fu's face shifted to a look of mild helplessness. "Captain Fang insisted on adding them in. She said the quality of this year's trainees was outstanding and that they should get exposure to the battlefield earlier. So, she chose two of them to come and, uh, watch the show—no, I mean, watch the battle."

She covered her mouth, giggling softly. "Sorry, slip of the tongue. You guys don't mind, do you?"

Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming exchanged glances.

Lu Yizhan: "..."

Cen Buming: "..."

We actually don't mind too much, Captain Yu.

Cen Buming, however, continued speaking to the second team. One of them was the same person Lu Yizhan had seen earlier, visiting him in the ward and telling him that the Crusaders had killed his alienated teammate.

The man tapped Cen Buming on the shoulder, speaking to him with a complicated expression.

When Lu Yizhan witnessed this exchange, a strange feeling flashed through his heart.

...Would a normal Heresy Authority Team 2 member use the [Cross Judgment Army] to kill someone like that?

The two trainees seemed to sense that they weren't very well-liked, and both looked a little tense and unsure. The slightly taller trainee was the first to step forward, introducing himself: "Tang Erda, sixteen years old. My current ambition is to join the second team. I want to kill all the heretics in the world who hurt people."

The other trainee took a deep breath before introducing himself: "Su Yang, sixteen years old. My current ambition is to join the third team."

Lu Yizhan, a former member of the third team, smiled warmly at Su

Yang. “The third team is a great place to be. Keep at it, you can do it.”

Su Yang let out a long sigh of relief and nodded shyly at Lu Yizhan. “Thank you, Brother.”

Cen Buming returned at that moment, clutching his chest, casting a sorrowful glance at the trainee named Tang Erda before sneering. “The second team doesn’t welcome over-ambitious fools who talk about saving the world.”

Lu Yizhan vaguely remembered when Cen Buming had volunteered for the same reason.

Tang Erda raised an eyebrow and opened his mouth to retort, but Yu Fu intervened, smiling at Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming. “Enough pleasantries. Let’s head in.”

Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming exchanged a brief glance. Cen Buming turned away coldly and entered the training ground.

The field was shrouded in artificial fog, with shrubs and low grasses scattered across the terrain. Visibility was limited, and cameras and speakers were hidden throughout the area, broadcasting the sounds of insects and birds, effectively masking the sounds of any heretics approaching. This made both sight and hearing unreliable, leaving them with only their knowledge of heretics and their combat reflexes to rely on.

Lu Yizhan crouched on the grass and lowered his head, sniffing a blade of grass. It had a distinct fishy smell, with a milky white substance clinging to it, resembling mucus secreted by human eyes.

It was bitter and slightly salty, reminiscent of the taste of tears.

There were over a hundred heretics with eyes, and about thirty-two heretics who shed tears.

With his features fixed, Lu Yizhan drew out a forked probe and began carefully tapping the grass beneath him.

Excluding the six plant-like heretics growing nearby, he focused on the animal heretics next.

Yu Fu, observing from the safety room via the big screen, gave a small, appreciative smile. “Excellent knowledge of theory and a very thorough detection procedure.”

“How can he be so fast?” Yu Fu turned her head toward the screen, her expression shifting as she saw what Cen Buming was holding. “Cen Buming, how is he using that?! Who gave that to him?!”

In Cen Buming’s hand was a mirror, roughly the size of his palm. He was using its reflection to locate something wriggling nearby, about to approach it for further inspection.

From the surveillance footage, it was clear that the back of the mirror featured a subtle, raised square cross.

Yu Fu immediately recognized it: it was because Cen Buming was holding the mirror backward. The person who gave it to him must have instructed him to use the reverse side, with the cross relief on the front and back.

—This was Bai Six’s item, known as the Murphy Theorem Magic Mirror, which allowed the user to see their worst fears.

Yu Fu wasted no time in pressing the alarm. “Test aborted! Call the Commander of the Crusading Army!”

A frantic, jumbled reply came over the communication link: “Captain Fang can’t be reached right now!”

“The Directorate is in chaos! Something has caused all the heretics to flee simultaneously! The Crusaders are dealing with the incident, please have Captain Yu handle it on your own for now!”

Yu Fu immediately ended the call, closed her eyes for a moment, and then opened them, scanning the faces of the eight team members and two trainees behind her. With a calm, steady voice, she issued orders: “I’ll go into the training ground to handle the heretics. Stay put and don’t move, no matter what happens.”

“And especially... don’t look into the mirror.”

She put on her uniform and briskly headed toward the training ground, intercom in hand. “Cen Buming, put the mirror face down in your hand—”

Inside the Training Ground

As the loudspeakers around Cen Buming crackled into an ear-splitting tinkle of static, blocking all sound from the control room, he gripped the mirror in his hand warily. His eyes fixed on the heretic in front of him, who had its back turned. Cen Buming took two cautious steps back, closed his eyes, and blended into the grass, trying to hide.

With its bulging, tear-filled eyes and unsettling ocular discharge, Cen Buming immediately identified the heretic.

Heresy 0573: Eyetun Food.

This heretic's entire body was covered in eyeballs. The moment any of its eyes met yours, your own eyeballs would vanish, appearing in its body instead. But this wasn't the most dangerous part of the heretic. The true threat was that the stolen eyes remained connected to the victim's nervous system. The stolen eye could still feel pain, as if it were still on your own body. If all the eyes of the Eyetun Food focused on you at once, they would parasitize you in an instant.

No one knew exactly what happened to a host once parasitized, but the screams of the last victim, recorded in the Heretic Authority's sound files, were said to be unbearable, with victims dying in agony within an hour.

The heretic's main weakness was obvious: if you didn't look it in the eyes, it couldn't detect you.

Cen Buming crouched low in the grass, eyes shut tight. He could feel the heretic crawling closer, its massive form writhing, its eyes desperately searching for his. But it was clear the heretic hadn't found him yet and seemed ready to move on.

His breathing slowed, ready to slip away undetected, but then something changed. The heretic darted toward him suddenly, its many eyes locked in his direction. Cen Buming's heart raced.

He soon realized the cause—his mirror had somehow turned around. Now, the reversed cross on its back faced the heretic. As the heretic saw its reflection, it mistook it for an eye, wild and disorienting.

In a flash, Cen Buming tossed the mirror aside. It flipped through the air, landing on the ground with a soft thud. It transformed into a large, ornate antique mirror, the size of a dressing mirror. In the reflection, a figure of Lu Yizhan appeared in the distance, faintly visible through the mirror's surface.

By the time Lu Yizhan saw the strange mirror in the exam room, it was too late. Despite his quick reflexes, the mirror's rippling mercury surface had already caught his attention.

A ripple spread from the center of the mirror, and what it reflected was something entirely out of place. A man, dressed in leather boots and a white shirt, with a black whip in hand, stepped through the mirror's surface with a smile.

"Thank you for summoning me here with your fear," he greeted, his voice smooth.

Lu Yizhan's pupils dilated as realization hit him. This man had used his fear—and the mirror—to infiltrate the Bureau of Heresy Processing.

Behind him, a sharp silver scalpel flew at the man, who dodged it with a swift dip.

"Your metaphorical examiner is as good as ever at destroying my personal belongings," the man, Bai Six, said, his smile never fading.

Yu Fu, watching from a distance, smiled warmly in return. "Mr. Bai Six, still as adept at dirty tricks as ever."

"Now even the fear of our trainee team members is being exploited," Yu Fu mused, her eyes closed. A faint smile played on her lips. "You've been setting this up since Big Dragon's death, haven't you?"

"If you're referring to the current riots in the Bureau and my arrival here, then yes," Bai Six replied, his grin widening. "One game has to be linked to another to make it interesting, doesn't it, Captain Yu?"

Yu Fu remained calm for a long moment before speaking. "What game do you want to play with me?"

"The game between a quality player like you and me is best saved for last," Bai Six responded, turning his attention to Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming standing nearby. "Why not let your Crusaders' reserves have a go at me first? I've been a villain you've been targeting for so long."

He waved a hand as if choosing a game. "Let's see who gets to play the next round with me."

Yu Fu raised her hand and shot another scalpel, but Bai Six quickly raised his own hand, creating a wall of shifting water patterns that absorbed the scalpel before it could reach him. The other side of the wall remained faintly visible, revealing Bai Six's calm smile.

"Best seat in the house for game viewing, Captain Yu," Bai Six remarked.

"Since you're new players, let's play something simple," he continued, clapping his hands together. He turned his gaze toward Cen Buming and Lu Yizhan. "The game is called 'Please Open Your Eyes in the Dark.'"

He explained the rules: "I count one, two, three, and then say it's dark. Whoever opens their eyes first wins."

"You two novice players will be playing this game, along with the heretic [0573]. We'll all close our eyes and sit face to face."

The scalpel that Yu Fu had previously shot disappeared into the water wall and emerged from within it, now aimed directly at Cen Buming. It passed through his shoulder blade, pinning him to the ground.

Cen Buming's anger flared, but before he could react, Lu Yizhan's calm voice reached his ears: "We'll play with you."

"How does that count for us?" Bai Six's eyes scanned Lu Yizhan, who, like Cen Buming, had his eyes closed. The smile on Bai Six's face deepened with amusement. "It's simple. If one of you opens your eyes before the heretic [0573], the moment I say it's dark, you win."

"But it also means that one of you will lose an eye."

Bai Six tapped his chin thoughtfully. "It would certainly be impressive if the player who lost both eyes still won the game and protected the other. But at the same time, that person would never be able to join the [Cross Judgment Army] again."

He grinned wider. "And they'd be forced to leave the Bureau of Heresy Processing entirely, becoming nothing more than an ordinary, worthless person."

Cen Buming and Lu Yizhan's breaths hitched as the weight of his words sank in.

"So," Bai Six said with a small smile, "the game is on. It's dark, time for bed. Everyone, please close your eyes."

The eyes above seemed hypnotized by Bai Six's words, closing one after the other.

"Now, on the count of one, two, three, werewolves, open your eyes."

Cen Buming, pinned to the ground by a scalpel, opened his crimson eyes without hesitation. But before he could see the [eyeball-tuned food], a man darted to his feet, blocking his path right in front of the eyeball-filled monster.

Cen Buming's mind went blank. All he could hear was a "buzzing kong" sound, like something being gouged out. Blood steadily dripped from the left side of Lu Yizhan's face, seeping into the grass around him.

"Now that the game is over, do I win?" Lu Yizhan asked in a hoarse voice.

Bai Six glanced at Lu Yizhan, who was in Cen Buming's way, raising an eyebrow slightly with a smile. "You win."

Lu Yizhan was breathing heavily, his right eye tightly shut, his left open—gouged out, leaving only broken blood vessels leaking steadily from the empty socket, dripping down his jaw.

"That was quite a warm-up game," Bai Six said, snapping his fingers. The water wall that had stood between Yu Fu and him rippled and fell away. He turned to Yu Fu with a grin. "Now it's the official game, Captain Yu."

He snapped his fingers again, and the ten members of the [Jury] who had been watching from the communications room appeared on the training ground.

"Captain Yu, have you ever played Werewolf?" Bai Six asked, stepping toward the group. His smile grew friendlier. "It's a game I really like."

"We're going to play a variant of Werewolf called [Open Your Eyes When It's Dark], which has different rules from the game we just played."

"Since Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming, two new players, just cleared the first game, they'll be spectators for now. We'll play with just the twelve of you."

Bai Six looked up and smiled. "There's one heretic among your twelve players, a God Zhang card. Captain Yu, that's you, and the rest of you are villagers."

"You may choose to sacrifice yourselves and allow the heretic to parasitize you, ending the game. Or, you can actively become werewolves and kill the God Zhang or slaughter all the villagers. The game ends when one side is wiped out."

Bai Six's smile became almost misty. "Either way, you don't have to worry about the consequences. As the judge, I'll erase everyone's memory after the game ends. No one will remember who killed who, and you can still remain an innocent survivor in the Heretic Authority."

"Or, after becoming a werewolf, you can choose to leave with me, away from this dangerous Heretic Authority, and become an evil villain, free to make others feel dangerous."

"Bai Six—!!!" Cen Buming braced his bruised shoulder and tried to stand.

Bai Six raised a hand gently without looking back, and the watery wall separated them. He said with a soft smile, "This is the wall that isolates all attacks. Heretics' attacks are ineffective here, so you can watch Heretic 0573 from behind the wall."

"Now, stay well back as a spectator and watch everything."

Lu Yizhan felt himself being pulled downward, forced to sit on the floor. He looked up at the blurry view beyond the watery wall, feeling like he was watching a small television show.

This is ridiculous.

Tang Erda scowled in anger. "Are you fucking serious? I'm not playing this game!"

Yu Fu calmly ordered, "Trainee Tang Erda, match his game."

Tang Erda turned sharply to Yu Fu, clenching her teeth before lowering her head in obedience. "…Yes, Captain Yu."

Bai Six smiled again. "So, the game begins. It's dark, everyone close your eyes, please."

The eyes of everyone, including Heretic 0573, closed.

Bai Six's eyes scanned the three members of the second team whose hands trembled. He smiled. "Now, open the wolves' eyes."

As Cen Buming watched in disbelief, the three second-team members opened their eyes one after the other, hesitantly standing up. They gripped their guns behind their waists and cautiously walked toward Yu Fu, raising them to point at her.

Yu Fu's breath caught, but she quickly calmed herself, her voice soft but steady.

"...Bai Six, the riot at the Heresy Handling Bureau—did you turn the second detachment's captain to get him to release all the heretics?"

"Before the Rose Factory, you had the second detachment investigate it. You lured Captain Dong Chenglong there, killed him, and deliberately freed Cen Buming and Lu Yizhan. Through Lu Yizhan's fear of what you planted in the Rose Factory, and the magic mirror given to Cen Buming by the second team, you managed to get inside the Bureau of Heresy, didn't you?"

Cen Buming's breath stopped.

Yes. When the second team came to see him earlier, they gave him a mirror with a cross engraving, claiming it was a relic from Captain Dong related to the [Positive Cross Judgement Army], meant to check for heretics. They told him to use it well—to honor Captain Dong for saving his life.

He never imagined that everything he had endured was just part of a game orchestrated by Bai Six and the second detachment's men, that he was nothing more than an NPC.

Bai Six smiled. "Yes, very clever, Captain Yu. But I followed the rules of the game with Captain Fang and didn't force my way into the Heretic Authority."

"Not everyone is as dedicated to their ideals as the people in [the Crusaders]. Some just want to be ordinary."

"But ordinary people have such easily satisfied desires, and it's too simple to betray them. I'm honestly amazed at how much trust you put in them."

"Evil and lust, after all, have a natural attraction for humans."

Bai Six lowered his eyes to Yu Fu, almost sighing as he whispered, "Wolves, kill."

The three second-team members raised their guns at Yu Fu. She opened her eyes just before they could shoot, slashing at the closed-eyed Heretic 0573 before Bai Six could order, [Violate the rules of the game, kill everyone].

Heretic 0573 opened all her eyes to look at Yu Fu. The moment their gazes met, Yu Fu's gentle smile vanished. She collapsed to her knees, her body bloating and deforming, with oddly shaped eyeballs sprouting from her skin. Still, her smile remained, her tone light and graceful as she whispered, "I'm sorry."

"I'll go with God's brand of self-destruction."

The next second, Yu Fu was fully parasitized, her beautiful face transforming into a mass of eyeballs. Blood spilled from her mouth, and she became disoriented, thinking of Fang Dian.

The big-hearted captain had sat before her, bruised, and asked, "Yu Fu, what's the most painful way to die?"

Yu Fu had smiled gently and replied, "Of course, when it hurts, Captain."

Fang Dian, grimacing as her face was twisted by Yu Fu's treatment, gave a thumbs up and smiled brightly. "Yu Fu, you only make people die in pain. How can you die in pain yourself?"

"You're our healer, and I'll always protect you."

Yu Fu slowly closed her vacant eyes, about to speak, but no words came out before an eyeball grew violently in her throat.

She had always believed that mistakes were fatal. And that it was pain that could kill.

Bai Six clapped his hands together, smiling at everyone. "That was quite a nice comeback."

"The God's mark explodes, saving everyone. As expected of a healer, Captain Yu."

"Even the traitors want to save them." Bai Six glanced sideways at the three second-team members whose expressions were blank. He smirked. "Not bad for the [Cross Judgment Army]."

Chapter End Notes

I know that both games have the same name. The author made it that way.
One is Please Open your Eyes When it's Dark and the other is the same game with a Werewolf variant.

The First World Line

Cen Buming was readmitted to the hospital the day after his discharge, this time in the same ward as Lu Yizhan.

The two men lay there, staring at the ceiling in silence from the darkness of night to the break of dawn. The faint noise of soldiers' cries and commands drifted in from outside the ward.

"Third detachment, second small regiment killed!"

"Where did the men of the 5th Regiment of the 1st Detachment go?!"

"2nd New Regiment, 3rd Defection!"

Lu Yizhan eventually drifted into sleep, the distant noise playing like a backdrop. He was abruptly awoken by the urgent shouts of Cen Buming, who, dazed and unaware of his surroundings, called out Yu Fu’s name hoarsely in his sleep.

Lu Yizhan sighed inwardly, rolled over, and covered his head with the blanket. My roommate's having Captain Yu’s wet dreams again, he thought.

But Captain Yu is dead.

The thought hit Lu Yizhan like a bolt of lightning, dragging him from a peaceful routine into a nightmare. He sat up with a cold sweat on his back.

He slowly turned his head to glance at Cen Buming in the other bed. His eyes were closed, his brow furrowed, and sweat beaded on his forehead. Cen Buming was clearly trapped in a nightmare.

Though Lu Yizhan didn’t know the specifics of Cen Buming’s dream, the sound of his hoarse, dry voice calling for Yu Fu—Captain Yu—broke through the silence. Cen Buming’s hands clenched and unclenched as if trying to hold onto something. Tears slipped from the corners of his eyes.

"Captain Yu..." Cen Buming murmured hoarsely, his voice laced with a sob. "Don’t die..."

"Lu Yizhan, don’t you die..."

Lu Yizhan was silent for a long moment before calmly replying to Cen Buming's dream, "Well, I'm not dead."

After Cen Buming settled back into sleep, Lu Yizhan tossed and turned, unable to rest. The bandage around his left eye was still bleeding, and the doctor had sternly warned him not to move around. Yet, sleep eluded him, and he eventually got up to wander the medical ward.

The corridors were filled with injured soldiers, and the sharp smell of disinfectant hung heavy in the air, though it did little to mask the overpowering scent of blood.

Lu Yizhan overheard whispered conversations from the injured team members.

"The fleeing heretics are basically under control... Things should be over soon."

"The head of the second team of traitors, the captain of the second team, has been captured and will be tried by Captain Fang himself tomorrow."

"The captain of the second team... he's a contemporary of Captain Fang, right? I remember they were quite close before."

"The contemporaries who had the best relationship with Captain Fang were Captain Yu, right? Eh... now one defected to be tried, and one..."

"Captain Yu is dead, Captain Fang is seriously injured... I don't know what face I'll be able to show when I walk past Captain Yu's medical office."

Lu Yizhan paused, then turned toward Yu Fu's medical office.

The area around the office was eerily quiet, save for the door, which was slightly ajar. As he wondered who had used the key to open it, he overheard Fang Dian's cheerful laughter from inside.

"Yu Fu, I've come to see you for treatment. I was especially badly injured this time; that animal from the second team nearly severed my arm. I'm lucky I had you, or this broken arm probably wouldn't have healed."

"When we were trainees, that animal and I always fought, and you were the one who helped stitch us up. You always moved so gently, then sewed us up while we grimaced in pain. Ha."

"Tomorrow," Fang Dian's voice faltered, the amusement draining from her tone. "I'm going to cut that animal's head off."

"He betrayed the Heretical Authority."

"The fool who talked big about going into the second team to slay evil, yet defected to Bai Six."

Fang Dian's voice dropped to a near whisper, her frustration palpable. "Yu Fu, what do you think he was thinking? He hated Bai Six so much, hated the heretics so much, but he told me the heretics are impossible to defeat and Bai Six is undefeatable."

"He said... I'm just filling the black hole of heresy with the lives of second team members, and he asked me if I knew how many of them died every time we went out. He called me a cruel bitch."

"He yelled at me, questioned me, said those who didn't understand were insulting our team members, the ones whose lives were being sacrificed for the sake of ordinary people. He asked me why I should sacrifice these young men's lives to save the lives of people who are 'worthless.'"

Fang Dian's voice was nearly inaudible now: "Yu Fu, you're a doctor, you've been saving lives... Tell me, please. I want to know..."

"Why would someone feel such hatred for the one who saved them?"

Lu Yizhan hesitated at the door, unsure whether to enter or leave.

A gust of wind blew the door open, and Fang Dian turned around, startled. "Who is it?"

Lu Yizhan stood there, uncertain. Was this my luck? It always seemed to happen.

But as his eyes landed on Fang Dian, all his thoughts fell silent, and he stood frozen.

Fang Dian's hair was loose, dark and damp, partially covering her face. Her lips and face were unmistakably pale, and her eyes were slightly red from crying. Her left arm was in a triangular bandage, and she wore a captain's uniform draped over her shoulders with a blue-and-white striped hospital gown underneath, making her appear much thinner than when she was in full uniform.

Hanging next to Fang Dian was Yu Fu's white coat, the badge pinned to it.

Fang Dian seemed to be pouring out her confusion over the uniform that had lost its owner.

The faint light of dawn struck her shoulders, but it no longer gave Lu Yizhan the same sense of oppressive strength she once had. Instead, it seemed as if... the all-powerful Captain Fang was about to shatter in the first light of day.

"It's Little Lu," Fang Dian smiled again. "I heard you had an eye injury. Why don't you take a rest and come here?"

Lu Yizhan clenched his fist, bowing his head before speaking, "Captain Yu and Captain Dong died because of me, Captain Fang, I—"

"There's no need to apologize," Fang Dian interrupted calmly, her gaze fixed on the empty white coat hanging across the room. "This goes back to the beginning. It's Bai Six's fault, it's my fault, and anyone involved in this world's accidents is to blame for you bearing the responsibility for both of their deaths."

"But it's not your fault, Lu Yizhan. You're a victim too."

Fang Dian continued, her voice softening. "One thing to remember when dealing with Bai Six is that you don't have to defeat him to win. The victory for us is simply about surviving. Yu Fu did her part perfectly, and the fact that you survived is the greatest tribute to her. That's her win."

She smiled, her teeth glinting as she patted Lu Yizhan on the shoulder. Her long hair caught the light, shining as it moved. "You've done well."

"Keep it up, Lu Yizhan."

Lu Yizhan's fists clenched, his fingertips going white as he held back a choked sob, responding loudly, "Yes, Captain Fang!"

The next day, the second team of rebels was tried, with both Lu Yizhan and Cen Buming staying in the ward.

Cen Buming stared blankly at the ceiling. Lu Yizhan, concerned that his companion might be losing his mind, decided to strike up a conversation. "What kind of rules do you think Bai Six plays by in these games?"

Lu Yizhan wasn't sure what kind of response he would get, but to his surprise, Cen Buming answered almost immediately.

"Disgustingly regular," Cen Buming replied, his eyes glazed over.

"Uh..." Lu Yizhan tried to keep the conversation going, "What's so disgusting about it?"

Cen Buming snorted in a daze. "Those three divisions that wanted to kill Captain Yu, the traitors... they thought no one would remember them. They assumed Bai Six would erase everyone's memories, but in this case, Bai Six forgot to erase his own audience."

"The memories of our two viewers weren't erased, so in the end, we came forward and identified the three traitors. They deserved to die anyway."

Cen Buming took the lead in identifying the traitors, with Lu Yizhan adding details as they went.

Lu Yizhan paused for a moment. "These three men from the second detachment, they were close to you, weren't they?"

"Bai Six erased everyone else's memories. As long as you and I stay quiet, those three could have escaped punishment. They wouldn't have been found out and could have avoided trial, they could live."

"But Bai Six erased the memories of those three traitors too. They didn't even know what they'd done and thought you were framing them when you identified them. They kept looking at you, confused, wondering if it was you..." Cen Buming clenched his teeth and fell silent.

After a long pause, Lu Yizhan spoke again. "I don't think they're bad. Maybe they wouldn't have done what they did if Bai Six hadn't forced their hands. Ultimately, they didn't do anything worse, and if you hadn't identified them, maybe they would have slowly turned...?"

Cen Buming, his fists still clenched on the bed, slammed them down hard, turning to stare at Lu Yizhan with bloodshot eyes. "But what's done is done!"

"Even if they forget, even if everyone else forgets, I won't forget!!!"

"Would it be fair to Captain Yu Fu, who's dead, if we let them go? Is it fair to all the team members who were seriously injured or killed in this incident?!"

Lu Yizhan remained silent for a long time, the only sound in the ward the harshness of Cen Buming's ragged breathing. Finally, Lu Yizhan spoke calmly, "But they didn't do it. They didn't cause this—Bai Six did."

"Captain Yu did what she did to keep them alive. It always felt wrong to punish them for something they didn't do."

"But in my mind, it's already done!" Cen Buming retorted bitterly. "Lu Yizhan, I really still hate you."

With those words, Cen Buming leapt off the bed and stormed out, slamming the door behind him.

Alone now, Lu Yizhan stood with his back to the incessant gunfire echoing from the courtroom. Cen Buming ran frantically, his shoulders trembling with each gunshot as he fled the sounds of violence, moving through the wards, the training ground, and finally to the heretics' shelter.

Cen Buming came to a stop, panting heavily, his expression vacant.

A team member guarding the shelter recognized Cen Buming and asked him what he was doing there. Cen Buming was silent for a long time before answering, "I came to see Captain Yu."

The guard, confused, replied, "You came to see Captain Yu here at the heresy shelter?"

Cen Buming hesitated, then realized the ordinary team members knew nothing. He spoke again, "I came to see the heretics—[0573]—whom Captain Yu took in."

The guard hesitated for a moment, glancing at Cen Buming. He recalled Fang Dian's instructions not to treat the remaining members of Team 2 too harshly and added, "Due to the previous incident, for security reasons, any entry to the heresy shelter requires direct approval from Captain Fang. For anyone from the second team, that means Captain Fang's explicit permission."

He paused before continuing, "However, you're technically only half a member of the second team right now, since you're still in the assessment period for the [Cross Judgement Army]. You've also taken it upon yourself to report your mutinous team members. So, if you're eager to enter, you can do so with restricted movement handcuffs, but you'll be limited in what you can do."

Cen Buming fell silent for a long moment, then slowly extended his hands. "Cuff me," he murmured.

Led by a guard, Cen Buming walked through several winding corridors. He was blindfolded before being brought to the heretic [0573].

The guard, also blindfolded to protect against being seen by [0573], explained, "As a reserve member of the [Cross Judgement Army], you have fifteen minutes to observe each high-risk red heretic. After that, I'll have to forcibly remove you."

Cen Buming nodded, still wearing the black blindfold, and the guard left. He opened the door to the room where [0573] was being held, stepped inside, and removed Cen Buming's blindfold.

Inside the glass case, [0573] was housed behind one-way visible glass, meaning Cen Buming could see the heretic's movements, but it couldn’t see him. This setup ensured a measure of safety for the observer.

Cen Buming stood in silence, staring at the heretic for a long time. Then, with his hands still cuffed, he reached out and gently touched the glass, his voice hoarse as he spoke quietly, "Captain Yu, do you want them to survive?"

He paused before asking, almost pleading, "Did I do wrong when I did that?"

Inside the glass case, more than half of the eyeballs on the eye-tunnel food were closed, the heretic's fat body undulating rhythmically as if in deep sleep.

Cen Buming bent slightly, pressing his closed eyes against the glass. If he pressed close enough, the heretic inside would sense his presence. Sure enough, all the eyeballs suddenly opened, and the heretic began to stir inside the glass case.

The glass case clicked open with a crunch, and the heretic inside slowly began to step out.

Cen Buming took a deep breath, closing his eyes as he backed away, his hands held up in a defensive posture. His voice trembled as he spoke, "Captain Yu, you know how to open this glass case... You still have some consciousness, right?"

The heretic's many eyes blinked slowly, as if contemplating Cen Buming's words.

"If Captain Yu thinks what I'm doing is wrong," Cen Buming's voice grew calmer despite the tremor in his words, "I'll open my eyes later, and you can parasitize me."

"On the count of one, two, three—"

Cen Buming opened his eyes.

All the eyes of the heretic blinked, but none seemed to harm him. Instead, they twitched, trying to open but held shut by some internal force.

Slowly, an eyeball, growing from the end of one of its tentacles, was pushed out of its body and reached out toward Cen Buming. The eye was closed, peaceful, almost as if it didn't want to open at all, preferring to remain unseen and dormant within the heretic's body.

It was Lu Yizhan's left eyeball—the one that had been taken from him.

Now, Captain Yu wanted to return it.

"I'll exchange this eyeball with you," Cen Buming said slowly, tears streaming down his face. "Please, Captain Yu... take my eyeball."

As he received Lu Yizhan's eyeball, Cen Buming felt an emptiness in his left eye. Tears and blood dripped down his face.

So this was the pain that Captain Yu and Lu Yizhan had felt?

With the eyeball in hand, Cen Buming rushed Lu Yizhan into surgery, hoping to return his lost eye using the unconventional powers of the heretic.

Later, Cen Buming found himself alone in the courtroom, his freshly bandaged, bleeding left eye burning with pain. He gazed at the pigeons, startled by the sound of distant gunfire, their snowy wings fluttering in the rising morning sun. Slowly, he turned and walked toward Fang Dian, who had just emerged from the courtroom after the execution.

"Captain Fang," Cen Buming said quietly, looking up at her, "I want to stay with the second team."

"I renounce my entry into the [Cross Judgement Army]."

After Lu Yizhan's eye healed, one competitor was no longer a threat in the Judgement of the Cross.

Now, there was one-eyed Cen Buming, who had become the deputy leader of the second detachment.

Lu Yizhan had also risen from a junior member in charge of cleaning to a full-fledged member of the third detachment. His rapid advancement, including a triple jump after two major accidents, had helped him pass the [Cross Trial Army] test.

However, there was gossip behind Lu Yizhan's back. Many felt his new position was undeserved. Had it not been for the loss of two top Crusaders and Cen Buming's decision to take over as second vice-captain during the Second Brigade's collapse, Lu Yizhan would never have earned his promotion.

But Lu Yizhan paid little attention to the rumors. There was simply too much information to absorb.

"Listen carefully," Wu Ruishu, the deputy leader of the first detachment, said seriously as he sat across from Lu Yizhan. "The appearance of the [heretics] is a game between Bai Six, an evil god, and us."

Wu Ruishu, responsible for paperwork, logistics, and organizing all heretical data for the First Squad and Crusaders, had become an unlikely mentor to Lu Yizhan.

Despite his position, Wu Ruishu wasn't very coordinated. Lu Yizhan had learned that the man could accidentally drop his glasses while sitting on a toilet or slip into a seated position when standing.

That day, Lu Yizhan witnessed Wu Ruishu's glasses being taken from his posterior, only to be rushed to the medical room. The moment drained Lu Yizhan's admiration for him.

Wu Ruishu's weapon was said to be a pair of family heirlooms, but Lu Yizhan had never seen him use them. Most of the month, Wu Ruishu had been telling Lu Yizhan about their primary enemy, Bai Six, instead of joining field operations.

"Originally," Wu Ruishu began, "the Bai Six devolved heretics randomly, causing widespread casualties. We had to house them and clean up their messes. But one day, Fang Dian caught Bai Six on the trail!"

Wu Ruishu pushed up his glasses, his tone excited, and his eyes sparkled when speaking of Fang Dian. "Fang Dian and Bai Six agreed to a game: if Fang Dian won, Bai Six would no longer be able to devolve heretics at will."

Lu Yizhan leaned forward. "What kind of game?"

Wu Ruishu hesitated. "...A tower defense game. Ever heard of it?"

"The Heretic Authority is our side's tower, and Bai Six has his own towers. Whoever breaches the other's tower first wins."

Lu Yizhan's curiosity deepened. "Where is Bai Six's tower?"

"We're trying to find that out," Wu Ruishu said softly. "Each time Bai Six devolves a heretic, he gives us a clue, a hint to locate his tower."

"The more dangerous the heretic, the more detailed the information about the tower."

"Information?" Lu Yizhan asked, frowning.

Wu Ruishu's eyes remained calm. "It's coordinates. Some special heretics have numerical data encoded into them after being interred. We've gathered twelve digits. After some experiments and speculations, I suspect these represent the coordinates of Bai Six's tower. If we arrange them properly, we should be able to pinpoint the location."

"We'll help Captain Fang win this game and put an end to this madness."

Wu Ruishu exhaled deeply, a smile creeping across his face.

"What's so funny?" Fang Dian appeared in the doorway, putting on her coat. Upon seeing Wu Ruishu's smile, she grinned. "So happy?"

Wu Ruishu immediately straightened up, his body tense as he gave a stereotypical nod. "Hello, Captain Fang."

Lu Yizhan did the same, straightening his posture nervously. "Good morning, Captain Fang!"

Fang Dian smiled, casually arranging her half-length hair and tying it back. She patted their chests with enthusiasm. "You too!"

As Fang Dian left, Lu Yizhan, still blushing from the pat on the chest, covered his heart. He glanced at Wu Ruishu, who was also flushed red.

"..."

The people who loved Captain Fang.

Lu Yizhan wasn't surprised. Before joining the Crossroads, he'd heard Wu Ruishu's path to the team was unusual. Wu Ruishu was from a well-off family, his father a collector who had once bought a strange auction item—a stalk of blood lingzhi, said to grant immortality when consumed.

The blood lingzhi was divided into eight pieces and auctioned off. Wu Ruishu's father obtained one. Since then, Wu Ruishu has been determined to join the Heretics Board.

Although a nerd by nature, Wu Ruishu had endured the hardships of being a trainee in the Heretic's Bureau. His intelligence and determination had earned him a place as Fang Dian's second-in-command.

However, Wu Ruishu's admiration for Fang Dian was more akin to an idol's worship than romantic love—a deep faith, an unconditional hope. It was more amusing than anything to Lu Yizhan, who never felt jealous.

"Captain Fang will lead us to defeat Bai Six!" Wu Ruishu said, shaking his fist with glowing eyes. "Good will triumph over evil!"

Lu Yizhan couldn't help but think, "...Right now, for example."

Although it was a bit rude for Vice-Captain Wu to laugh out loud, he couldn't help himself.

"Lieutenant Wu, the Cross Judges are incredibly strong. It almost feels like their abilities go beyond what a normal human can achieve," Lu Yizhan said humbly, seeking advice. "Is there some kind of special training involved? Should I be undergoing similar training?"

Wu Ruishu paused for a moment. "No, the reason we can do things that seem beyond the norm is because we have personal skills."

"Personal skills?" Lu Yizhan furrowed his brow. "What does that mean?"

Wu Ruishu was quiet for a moment before responding. "It's a certain power that Bai Six has granted us, based on our desires."

"When Fang Dian found Bai Six, she fought him with everything she had and almost died. Bai Six saved her, saying that he hadn't seen a human with such a strong desire in a long time—one that approached the level of a [god]."

Wu Ruishu paused, then continued. "If you weren't so good and pure in your desires, you might have already killed me and become the next evil god. That's how Bai Six described Captain Fang."

Wu Ruishu took a deep breath. "Captain Fang says that good will always triumph over evil and that we can defeat him with our desire for goodness."

"Bai Six agreed to play a game with her," Wu Ruishu went on. "He told her that if she won, he would withdraw from this world line. He materialized her desires for good and gave her the power to resist him."

Wu Ruishu clenched his fist. "Captain Fang will win!"

Lu Yizhan opened his mouth to ask what would happen if they lost, but when he saw the intense expression on Wu Ruishu's face, he decided not to ask.

Wu Ruishu was a good lieutenant. In the year since Lu Yizhan joined the Crusaders, Wu Ruishu had identified twelve coordinates around the world that could be the [tower] of Bai Six. The Crusaders had then taken turns eliminating them one by one.

But even when they didn't find Bai Six's tower at these coordinates, they were still forced to play a "game" with him when they arrived.

The casualties from the game were heavy, but it wasn't all bad. During one of these encounters, Bai Six recognized Lu Yizhan as a Crusader and granted him skills derived from his desires.

However, Lu Yizhan wasn't entirely thrilled about this. He felt a little embarrassed.

That was because his skill weapon turned out to be a heavy sword—exactly like Fang Dian's.

After winning the game with Bai Six, Lu Yizhan was awarded his skill. The heavy sword snapped out of Bai Six's hand and struck Lu Yizhan in the face. Bai Six raised an eyebrow, subtly observing before the weapon vanished.

Lu Yizhan was knocked to the ground by the heavy sword. Struggling to lift it off, he turned his head and saw Fang Dian crouching next to him, poking at the sword that was almost deflating him. "Lu Yizhan, why do you have the same weapon as me?"

Almost everyone in the Crusaders, including Wu Ruishu, wore knowing smiles.

Lu Yizhan scratched the back of his head, his face turning red. He hurriedly hid the heavy sword behind him. "Ah! It's because... I'm envious of Captain Fang's weapon! I really admire Captain Fang!"

Fang Dian looked puzzled. "But Wu Ruishu already worships me enough, and his weapon is a taijitu, not a heavy sword."

"Ahem," Wu Ruishu interjected with a straight face, "Maybe it's a weapon born from a deeper level of worship and desire."

Lu Yizhan could only sigh internally. There's no need to explain it to me, Lieutenant Wu.

Fang Dian rubbed her chin thoughtfully. "But my heavy sword is heavy. Lu Yizhan, can you even lift it?"

Lu Yizhan, straining under the weight of the sword, could barely respond. "..."

Damn it! I just can't lift it! I'm such a loser!

"Well then," Fang Dian smiled, walking over to him. She casually took his hand and, with ease, drew the heavy sword, swinging it smoothly forward. The night breeze tousled her hair, and she looked back with a playful smile. "You'll train with me later. I'll teach you how to use the heavy sword!"

Lu Yizhan's mind went blank for five full minutes before he finally muttered, "Good."

That night, Lu Yizhan fell asleep with the heavy sword in his arms, tears of happiness in his eyes.

"Now it's down to the last two coordinates," Wu Ruishu said solemnly, pushing up his glasses. "My personal preference is to target this isolated island on the surface. That will be our next mission."

"If my suspicions are correct, we'll face Bai Six and his captive heretics directly on this island," Wu Ruishu continued. "So, I hope you'll be prepared. Get some rest tonight—we leave tomorrow."

"Yes!" came the collective response.

Once the meeting adjourned, Lu Yizhan was left alone with his thoughts.

After more than two years of relentless searching, Lu Yizhan had grown accustomed to the rhythm of his life—always jumping from bed to battle-ready in an instant. There was barely a second to himself.

But tonight, when he finally had a chance to rest, Lu Yizhan found himself at a loss for what to do.

Without thinking, he walked toward Yu Fu’s infirmary.

The infirmary was empty now. Lu Yizhan occasionally came by to tidy up, stand quietly, and smoke a cigarette to calm his nerves.

Yes, that’s right—he’d learned to smoke.

Fang Dian once caught Lu Yizhan in the infirmary, hiding behind a corner with a cigarette. She stood still, silently observing him for a moment, as if sizing him up.

Lu Yizhan froze, terrified that he might be reprimanded. But after a few seconds, Fang Dian reached out and smiled. "Got any more? Give me one."

She took the cigarette, lit it with ease, and leaned back against the wall of the infirmary. They smoked together in silence, the smoke curling up around them, drifting past her uniform’s lapels in a hazy cloud.

After a while, Fang Dian spoke softly, a smile tugging at her lips. "The order to ban smoking in the first detachment came from Yu Fu and the others, behind my back."

She paused, looking at the cigarette between her fingers. "They actually gave me that order because they thought I smoked too much. They always said I wasn't done in by the heretics but by my own smoking."

Fang Dian turned to Lu Yizhan with a smirk. "Didn't expect that, huh? They were taken out by the heretics before I could smoke them to death."

She finished the cigarette quickly, then held her hand out to Lu Yizhan. "Have another one."

"No, no more," Lu Yizhan stuttered, waving his hand. "That one was the last one."

Fang Dian raised an eyebrow, her smile faint as she looked at the untouched cigarette in his mouth. Then, without a word, she took it from him and waved it in front of his face. "Mind if I smoke this one?"

"Uh, no! I don't mind!" Lu Yizhan's expression went blank, feeling almost lightheaded.

"Thanks!" Fang Dian gave him a broad grin, clapping him on the shoulder before taking the cigarette and gently holding it between her teeth. She lowered her head and lit it with a lighter.

The flickering light of the flame cast a soft glow on her face, giving her a serene, almost ethereal look.

"Smoking is a pretty degenerate act," Fang Dian murmured softly. "I often wonder if cigarettes are a low-risk, addictive heresy, a gift from Bai Six, slowly and silently corrupting people."

She exhaled a puff of white smoke. "Like me."

Fang Dian lowered her head and laughed quietly to herself. "It's hard for people to fight their negative desires. I understand that. It's a bit ridiculous to think we can defeat Bai Six when I can't even quit smoking."

Her laughter was gentle as she added, "But as long as there's someone in this world who wants me to quit smoking, there's someone for everyone who smokes. As long as that person exists, I won't lose."

She took the last drag, smiled, and waved her hand at Lu Yizhan. "Quit smoking, Lu Yizhan."

After that, Lu Yizhan didn't sneak a cigarette for a long time. But perhaps because the night before they left was so chaotic, Lu Yizhan couldn't resist and found himself back in the infirmary, lighting up.

As he turned around with a cigarette between his lips, he saw Fang Dian standing there with a smile, walking up to him effortlessly. "Got any more? I want one."

Lu Yizhan: "....."

Why did this woman, who claimed she was going to quit smoking, always take it for granted to ask him for a cigarette?

Fang Dian looked up at him, her eyes reflecting the moonlight outside the window, bright and shining, a faint smile playing on her lips. The wind gently ruffled the ponytail at the back of her head as she spoke. "You've grown a lot, Lu Yizhan. When you first joined the team, you were about the same height as Little Wu. Now, I have to look up to you."

"The team's done well, too," she added. "You've really grown."

Expecting Fang Dian to ask for a cigarette, Lu Yizhan had brought a pack with him. But when he heard her words, he quickly checked his pack and muttered, "I'm out. There's only one left."

He knew exactly what Fang Dian would do when there was only one cigarette left.

She would take it right from his lips to smoke it, thus indirectly claiming...

But before he could finish the thought, Lu Yizhan's pupils widened in shock.

Fang Dian reached out with two fingers to draw the cigarette from his lips, then stepped forward. Standing on tiptoe, she wrapped one arm around the back of his neck and closed her eyes, kissing him.

Kissed.

The wind blew in through the window, brushing against Lu Yizhan's blank face and Fang Dian's closed eyes for about fifteen seconds. Then, she pulled back, casually lifted her hand from his pocket to retrieve the new cigarette he'd brought, and put it to her lips, taking a slow drag before tucking the cigarette back into Lu Yizhan's mouth.

Lu Yizhan stood dazed, his thoughts slowly catching up.

Ah, Fang Dian must have seen that I brought new cigarettes...

So she must have known I lied when I said there was only one left. She must've figured that out and decided to kiss me directly instead of indirectly with the cigarette...

This doesn't make sense! What kind of logic is this?!

So, why kiss me?!!

"How long have you liked me?" Fang Dian suddenly asked.

Lu Yizhan stood up straight without thinking. "Two years, three months, and eight days!"

Fang Dian rubbed her chin thoughtfully. "So, at that time... you fell in love with me at first sight?"

Lu Yizhan broke into a cold sweat, his face turning red. "Yes, yes! When did you know, Captain Fang?"

Fang Dian glanced down, pondering. "When you joined the team, I think."

Lu Yizhan: "!!!"

That early?!

A strange sense of shame rushed through him, and he covered his burning face with both hands, wishing he could disappear into the ground. "Then why did you pretend not to know I liked you, especially when my weapon was that heavy sword...?"

"It's not like you were saying it outright," Fang Dian scratched her head. "And you didn't seem like you wanted to. I've never been in a relationship, so I wasn't sure if I should respect your space and not poke around."

"So... that was just...?" Lu Yizhan trailed off.

Fang Dian gave a straight-faced reply, "I kissed you because I thought I might die tomorrow, and you seemed so willing."

Lu Yizhan froze, covering his face, motionless and silent.

Fang Dian held the cigarette next to her, not smoking it, and after a long pause, she lowered her eyes and whispered, "I'm sorry, if you don't want me to say sorry to you."

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath and slowly exhaled. "There's no reluctance..."

He was the one who had his heart set on it first—Fang Dian just noticed it...

Get out of your head! How embarrassing!

Fang Dian glanced at him sideways for a moment. "Want to kiss again? In case you die tomorrow and don't get one?"

Lu Yizhan dropped his arms, pulled Fang Dian close, and kissed her, cutting her off mid-sentence.

Fang Dian went quiet for a moment, slowly closing her eyes.

After she left, Lu Yizhan opened the window of Yu Fu's infirmary, letting the cold breeze in to cool down. But it didn't help. He ended up walking out of the medical room, trying to reassure himself that it was just a kiss, no big deal.

As soon as Lu Yizhan stepped out of the infirmary, he saw Cen Buming waiting outside, a subtle expression on his face.

Lu Yizhan: "..."

Seeing that Lu Yizhan was about to embarrass himself, Cen Buming mercifully averted his gaze. "Tomorrow, the second team will be responsible for clearing the perimeter of the stronghold coordinates you're headed to."

Lu Yizhan snapped back to business. "What do you need from me?"

Cen Buming paused for a moment, then asked, "What are the chances of you surviving tomorrow?"

Lu Yizhan froze.

Cen Buming had been working with him for a while now, but their interactions had always been strictly professional. They had shared a few experiences together, but they never really saw eye to eye. Lu Yizhan usually didn't socialize with people he didn't click with, and Cen Buming was one of those people.

That's why Lu Yizhan was surprised by the personal nature of Cen Buming's question.

Cen Buming put his hand over his chest and turned his face away, his tone cold. "Don't give me that look. I'm just checking if I'll need to collect your body on the way."

Lu Yizhan smiled, thinking for a moment before replying, "Chances of survival? Honestly, for now, we haven't found a chance of survival yet."

Cen Buming was silent for a moment, his hands tightening around his body. "… Lu Yizhan, if you don't want to go tomorrow, I can apply for a transfer to replace you…"

"Lieutenant Cen, why are you suddenly doing this for me?" Lu Yizhan asked, scratching his head in confusion. "I don't think we… have reached this point in our relationship yet, have we?"

Cen Buming snapped his head around, stepping forward to grab Lu Yizhan by the collar and pin him against the wall, his voice seething with anger. "Then why did you carry me out of the Rose Factory in the first place? Why did you stand in my way during the trial?"

"Why did you lie to me and make me hate you, even though you saved me back then?"

"Our relationship back then wasn't anything like this, Captain Lu Yizhan!"

Lu Yizhan looked down at Cen Buming, who was wearing a blindfold over his left eye, his face flushed with anger. Slowly, Lu Yizhan pushed Cen Buming off his chest and leaned back against the wall, speaking softly, "You knew?"

"I've known for a long time," Cen Buming replied, looking away, his tone icy. "I still hate you, Lu Yizhan, but I can't stand owing people. If you need me to die for you, I can take your place."

Lu Yizhan raised his head slowly. "What if I need you to live well for me?"

Cen Buming's pupils twitched.

"It's true that we were strangers at first, but I'm a year older than you, so I'm at least half your senior brother." Lu Yizhan straightened his uniform and smiled warmly. "It's only natural for a senior brother to save a junior brother, right?"

Cen Buming scoffed. "One term senior? Lu Yizhan, you're shameless. My real senior brothers should all be from the second team, according to the rules…"

Both men faltered as they spoke.

Almost all of Cen Buming's brothers had been executed during the rebellion.

"And I'm not forcing you to acknowledge me as your senior brother," Lu Yizhan continued, looking up with a smile. "If your real senior brother isn't around, then if you don't mind, let me fill that role for you, even if it's just temporarily."

Cen Buming slapped Lu Yizhan's hand off his shoulder with a cold look. "Go away, don't take advantage of me with your words. Who needs a brother?"

Lu Yizhan pondered for a moment. "Really? I was in the same ward as you back then, and I'd hear you crying at night, wishing you had a brother to come and take you with him…"

Cen Buming narrowed his right eye. "I'll kill you if you spread any more rumors."

"Eh, you used to be someone who cried under the covers. Why are you like this now?" Lu Yizhan shook his head in mock regret. "It's true—children become mean when they grow up."

Cen Buming, feeling manipulated by Lu Yizhan, sighed in exasperation. "…"

He shouldn't have bothered to care about this man.

After Lu Yizhan finished speaking, he turned to leave. Midway, he heard a soft voice from behind.

"Brother."

The sound of Cen Buming's voice made Lu Yizhan stop in his tracks.

Cen Buming remained quiet for a moment before continuing, "If you die, I won't cry for you."

Lu Yizhan smiled without turning around and waved his hand. "That's good."

The following day, the Judgment of the True Cross army flew to the island. One team was tasked with clearing the inner perimeter, while another team cleared the outer perimeter.

The island stood isolated in the vast black sea, surrounded by fierce waves and winds that prevented any ships from approaching. Beneath the surface, enormous, unidentifiable creatures swam, capable of swallowing a yacht whole.

By the time Fang Dian landed on the island, many had already been killed or injured.

The island housed a magnificent temple, where Bai Six sat with his chin propped up on a rocky card table in front of it, smirking at them. "You're here at last. I was starting to fall asleep waiting for you."

Fang Dian fixed her gaze on Bai Six and stepped forward. "We won the game against you."

"No," Bai Six replied, raising his eyes with a smile. "You've lost. The condition for winning was capturing my 'tower,' and you've only just arrived."

"This is my temple. You cannot take it, and I, myself, cannot destroy it."

Wu Ruishu's face flushed with anger. "You're cheating! That wasn't even a way to win!"

Bai Six lazily fiddled with the cards on his table. "No, I was hoping you'd beat me and destroy this temple. Unfortunately, you failed."

"But I didn't lose either," Fang Dian replied calmly. "You can't take over the Heresy Handling Bureau because I've brought all the heretics and players here."

"Are you trying to say that you've moved the Bureau of Heresy Handling into my temple, risking so many lives?" Bai Six's grin widened. "I can't destroy my temple, so you haven't lost the game either."

"Beautiful game, Fang Dian," he continued. "You are the finest human I've ever seen—cruel and merciful in equal measure."

"You've never won against me, but you've never lost either. You've always been determined in your goals." Bai Six's smile widened. "You want to keep me, the evil god, trapped in this game so that more people from other world lines can survive."

"I'm curious—when did you know about the other world lines? You've already entered the realm of [God's] sphere, how did you know about it?"

Fang Dian grinned broadly. "Guess so! Seeing as you keep trying to run, I figured there must be other places for you to have more fun."

"Even though the people from these other world lines have never met you and have no emotional connection to you, you still want to save them." Bai Six took a step down from the high stairs of the temple, looking at Fang Dian with a sardonic smile. "You're risking your life and the lives of those around you to save them."

"Why is that, Fang Dian?"

"You have no basis for empathy for them. Why would you have such a strong desire to save everyone when you're so close to becoming a god?"

Fang Dian met Bai Six's gaze as he descended the stairs. She tilted her head, looking him directly in the eye. "I don't actually want to save them."

"I just don't think they should be reduced to your playthings."

"But what if this is what they want?" Bai Six spread his hands. "I receive countless prayers every day, asking me to go to that world and fulfill their desires by bringing evil."

The sea breeze whipped through Fang Dian's long hair as she replied calmly, "Want to play a game with me?"

Bai Six raised an eyebrow. "What game?"

Fang Dian laughed. "Even if you let everyone in the world enter your game, derive weapons from their desires, let them kill each other, encourage them to gamble, commit crimes, and fill the game with as many heretics as you like—eventually—"

"You'll lose to them," Bai Six interrupted, "to their humanity."

Bai Six fell silent for a moment, then curled his lips into a smile. "Fine, I'll grant your wish and play this game with you."

"I'll take the game out of reality and bring them into it only when someone in their heart desires it and prays to me, the evil god, for their wishes to be granted. I'll grant them personal skills, allowing those good-quality humans, like yourself, to survive in my dangerous game for a long time."

"And to facilitate what you, Captain Fang, call mutual help among humans, I'll let them see each other's games and share their resources to help one another."

Bai Six smiled. "From now on, all world lines will devolve into this game."

"The rules will be simple. If any of the heretics in the game enter reality and taint the world, I win. If not, you win. The entire world will be the [Tower] for both of us. How does that sound?"

Fang Dian retorted shrewdly, "Winning this game is harder for us because there's no time limit on the defensive period."

Bai Six nodded. "That's true." He propped up his jaw thoughtfully for a moment before smiling again. "Tell you what, I'll take myself out of the game. I won't be entering any of the games or reality."

Fang Dian's eyes lit up. "Really?"

It would be so much easier without Bai Six's bug-like presence!

"Yes, but with a condition." Bai Six turned his head and smiled. "I'll place a coordinate-derived creation of mine in each world line. Like you, this derivative will have a mortal body with mortal fighting abilities, and it will look exactly like me so you can easily find it."

"This derivative is the hourglass for both of us. He is your time limit—the game ends when you kill him. If, by that time, the world hasn't been tainted, you win. Otherwise, I win."

The terms of the game seemed almost too good to be true, but Fang Dian knew Bai Six's cunning ways. She asked warily, "What's the catch for us?"

"A request?" Bai Six smiled with arched eyebrows. "Naturally, you must sit across from me—the evil god who has descended—and play the game."

"In all world lines, I'll ensure your presence. Normally, each of you will have a different role, but I will unify your souls. This means—" Bai Six smiled mysteriously. "You will experience the reincarnation of all world lines with one soul."

"If any of you is tempted by one of my derivatives and sells your soul to him, your soul will be nullified, turned to stone, and placed in my temple, never to return."

"I'll project your souls into the world lines as if they were my derivatives, but you'll be like NPCs—your archives erased and your memories wiped. Each world line will be a brand-new game."

Bai Six stood on the dais, his gaze fixed on Fang Dian below. "Captain Fang, as a reward for invoking the gods, and to add to the fun of this game, I can grant the members of your [Cross Judgment Army] skills that only gods possess, to help them fight me."

"But each world line will come with a price, and you'll pay a price for each world line in which your people gain these godly skills."

Fang Dian asked, "What price do I have to pay?"

Bai Six smiled. "Pain."

Wu Ruishu and Lu Yizhan exchanged a quick glance, but Fang Dian silenced them with a raised hand. She nodded, "Yes, I accept your terms."

"Then give us the skills," she commanded.

Bai Six nodded slightly, addressing the air. "Wu Ruishu, I grant you the skill of Taiji, a force that nullifies all attacks and strikes with powerful force."

"Su Lan, I grant you the skill of Worldline Overlap. You can briefly merge two worldlines that you know."

"Ren Yuxin, I grant you a memory fold that alters the memories of all creatures in a worldline, completely erasing the memory of an event. However, it can only be used three times per worldline."

"…"

"Lastly," Bai Six's smile deepened, "I grant you two rule skills that can determine the course of the game."

"The first, [Listen to Just a Word from God]."

"For each worldline, though I won't be playing, I will design a game script, using heretics to guide the entire worldline on my predetermined path."

"But it would be boring to always follow my path," Bai Six added, nudging Lu Yizhan. "So you can use this skill to spy on my actions and stop me. It's essentially a prophetic skill."

"The second skill—Judgment of the Evil God."

"This skill can be used to judge any heretics associated with me in every worldline, including me."

"After the trial, the heretic's weakness will be exposed to you, leaving them vulnerable. No matter how strong they are, you can use this skill to defeat them."

Wu Ruishu quickly responded, staring at Bai Six. "You just mentioned six skills, but you didn't give Captain Fang any."

Bai Six's lips curled. "She gets no skills."

"Because, like me, she is in the [God] position and doesn't enter the game."

As if expecting this, Fang Dian gripped her heavy sword and stepped forward onto the steps of the temple. "You grant good skills, and I will pay the price."

"Captain Fang—!!" Wu Ruishu, in a hurry, tried to follow.

Fang Dian didn't turn around. "Lieutenant Wu, stay here. I'll be back soon."

Wu Ruishu stopped, clenching his teeth.

"This Worldline game hasn't started yet. I'll let you and Captain Fang take the cost after a proper goodbye," Bai Six yawned slightly. "Please."

Lu Yizhan stood motionless, watching Fang Dian's back as she ascended the temple steps. The sea breeze tousled her ponytail, and it reminded him of the wind he felt last night.

He clenched his fists slowly.

Inside the darkened shrine, a vast swimming pool connected to the deep sea spread before them, filled with unknown underwater creatures. Pillars surrounded the pool, chains hanging from them.

"It's been so long," Bai Six remarked, "You're the first person, besides me, to have the right to step foot in here."

Fang Dian looked out over the pool and asked calmly, "Is this where you plan to keep me?"

"Of course not," Bai Six smiled. "That would be disrespectful to a being as close to a god as you. I wouldn't lock you in a pool at the bottom of the ocean."

"Of course, this physical torture won't hurt you at all, Captain Fang," Bai Six continued. "You're incredibly tough. The death of close teammates, betrayal, the endless stream of heretics—you've endured it all and still persisted."

Bai Six's tone turned slightly wistful. "I thought long and hard about a game that would bring you pain."

Fang Dian looked up at Bai Six with bemusement in her eyes. "What game is it?"

"In each worldline, I will erase your memories and make you appear as a normal person, with loving parents, a perfect appearance, an excellent mind, and everything a normal person would desire."

Bai Six's smile widened. "Then, I will make you lose again."

"At the end of each worldline, if the Crusaders lose, and you have someone you love at that time, I will bring that person here, to the temple. Their soul will be trapped at the bottom of the sea with yours. I'll tell them that because you love them, I'll shatter their soul and turn them to ashes—"

"—and they'll never be reincarnated, for all eternity."

Bai Six watched Fang Dian as she hung her head, unreadable. He smiled. "And at the start of the next worldline, I'll wipe your memory again and make you fall in love with someone new, only for me to destroy their soul as well."

"I'll stand by, enjoying your pain as the next round begins."

Bai Six smiled. "Captain Fang, are you willing to pay the price?"

Fang Dian looked up, her face emotionless. "Fine, I'll pay the price."

Lu Yizhan waited outside the temple for what felt like an eternity, finally seeing Fang Dian emerge from the temple, her expression calm.

He saw her ponytail swing lightly in the air, but when she reached the bottom of the steps, she suddenly darted up, jumping into his arms.

Lu Yizhan stumbled back several steps but caught her steadily.

Fang Dian held him so tightly, burying her head in his shoulder. Lu Yizhan felt pain from the hug, but at that moment, he realized that Fang Dian's pain was a million times greater than his own.

But that feeling was fleeting, and Fang Dian eased her grip on him.

She whispered softly in his ear, "Lu Yizhan..."

"You must remember to hide from me when you see me in the future worldlines."

"Never, ever let me fall in love with you again."

Chapter End Notes

And so the system was born

The First World Line

Bai Six stood at the highest step of the temple. Lu Yizhan held Fang Dian in his arms, staring up at him in a daze. Bai Six's expression was hidden beneath the collar of his shirt, which was tossed by the wind and his long, flowing hair.

Lu Yizhan could only smile, chuckling softly. "I'll design archive points in each world line and drop you off there."

"Are you ready?"

Lu Yizhan heard Fang Dian whisper softly in his arms, "Get ready."

Bai Six smiled. "Then, the game begins."

"Worldline 0002, landing."

The temple beneath Lu Yizhan's feet sank into the sea. They all fell into the water, and as Fang Dian drifted from his grasp, Lu Yizhan struggled to hold onto her hands. No matter how hard he tried, he couldn't.

He always felt that if he let go now, he would never be able to be with her again.

When Lu Yizhan regained his senses, he found himself sitting in the office of the Bureau of Heresy.

Everything around him was both familiar and foreign, like a dream he couldn't quite grasp. His mind went blank. He stood up, stumbling as though something important was slipping through his mind, but he couldn't remember what.

Around him, players hurried past. When they saw him, they nodded and bowed respectfully. "Hello, Lieutenant Lu!"

Lu Yizhan blinked, his gaze drawn to the badge pinned to the left breast of his uniform: [First Detachment Vice Captain: Lu Yizhan].

Something didn't seem right.

He didn't feel like he should be a vice-captain.

Who was the vice-captain again?

Confused, Lu Yizhan entered the office of the First Detachment captain. As the door swung open, he saw Wu Ruishu sitting behind his desk, which bore the sign: [Captain of the First Detachment: Wu Ruishu].

“Deputy Lu, what can I do for you?” Wu Ruishu asked, adjusting his glasses with a serious look.

Lu Yizhan shook his head in confusion and withdrew, a strange electronic tone buzzing through his mind.

[System Alert: Desire detected. Congratulations to player Lu Yizhan for logging into the game.]

[Game loading...]

By the time Lu Yizhan cleared the first game after nine deaths and earned his personal skill, he sat in the crowded lobby, a dazed expression on his face as tears slid down his cheeks.

He remembered everything.

Fang Dian’s presence was completely erased by Bai Six.

The army of the Cross of Judgement no longer existed in this world. He didn’t even know where the rest of the team had gone. Everyone he encountered seemed to be enjoying the game with the evil god who smiled while writing the prophecy handed to him.

[At the 658th worldline, all of you Inquisitors will sell your souls to my derivatives, Bai Six.]

[– That will be your last world line.]

Lu Yizhan stood on his knees, head bowed, eyes red.

He had to find Bai Six and kill him immediately.

He would never let this prophecy come true.

“Lieutenant Lu.” Wu Ruishu turned toward him with a serious expression. “Focus. We’re searching for a major heretic with a danger rating close to red today, at the orphanage.”

Lu Yizhan, still exhausted from an all-night gaming session, nodded vigorously. “Yes!”

Wu Ruishu frowned at him. “Lu Yizhan, have you been working too hard lately?”

“After leading a team that captured 127 high-risk red-level heretics in a week, maybe you should rest if you’re not feeling well?”

“No way!” Lu Yizhan interrupted, his voice tinged with frustration. “I absolutely cannot rest!”

He knew the most about Bai Six’s plan. If he rested, everyone could be in danger because of it.

Wu Ruishu pushed his glasses up in silence. “As your captain, I still hope you’ll find a reasonable work-life balance. And besides, I’ve compiled the information you requested about [Bai Six] and sent it to you.”

“There’s a child named Bai Six at the orphanage we’re visiting today. I’m not sure if it’s the person you’re looking for.”

Lu Yizhan frowned. “Do you have a photo?”

“All I have are group photos, and they’re from four or five years ago,” Wu Ruishu explained. “If you go today, you can check in person.”

Lu Yizhan nodded, still frowning.

Wu Ruishu paused as he opened the door to leave. He turned to Lu Yizhan with a serious expression. “I sense that you harbor great ill will toward this person you’re searching for, Bai Six. I need you to verify if this child is truly the one you’re looking for.”

“Whatever Bai Six has done, remember, you have a duty as the captain of the first detachment,” Wu Ruishu continued, his voice firm. “Don’t let your hatred and malice spill over onto innocent people.”

“Never let yourself become a heretic, Lu Yizhan, consumed by hatred.”

Lu Yizhan stood frozen, taken aback by Wu Ruishu's words.

With a final glance, Wu Ruishu calmly exited, leaving Lu Yizhan to reflect.

Outside the Caring Orphanage, Wu Ruishu and Lu Yizhan, along with three other team members, slipped in through a side door. In the distance, they spotted a church, the strong stench of blood unmistakable in the air.

Lu Yizhan's heart raced as his eyes fixed on the inverted cross atop the church.

Wu Ruishu explained quietly, "This orphanage is a private one. The Bureau of Heresy discovered that children and other items were being auctioned off here in stages, but what exactly was being sold is unclear. The auctions tend to happen on Wednesdays."

He paused, giving orders to his team. "Lieutenant Lu, the auction is behind the church. Our first priority is to save lives; we'll deal with the rest later."

Lu Yizhan nodded, his focus intense.

As they entered the church, the sight that greeted them shocked Lu Yizhan to his core. Investors, dressed in human-like attire but with grotesquely long limbs, sat as if waiting for something. Deformed children in white christening gowns stood at the baptismal font, holding candles, connected to tubes that siphoned their blood.

The largest pool of blood was in the baptismal font, where a teenager, his wrist slashed, bled profusely.

Without hesitation, Lu Yizhan charged into battle against the monstrous investors.

Wu Ruishu, meanwhile, jumped onto the platform. He quickly instructed the team to evacuate the remaining children, then rushed to the baptismal pool. Gently lifting the frail teenager from the blood-soaked font, he hurried outside. "Call an ambulance!" he shouted anxiously.

The weak teen in Wu Ruishu's arms opened one eye, his voice dry and barely audible. "Uncle, are you here to save me?"

Wu Ruishu's jaw tightened as he reassured him, "It'll be okay. You'll be alright."

But as he spoke, Lu Yizhan's mind went blank, overwhelmed by a series of evil prophecies echoing in his ears.

"[The evil god's derivative pretends to be weak, curling into the arms of the judgment army that's lost its memory—what a righteous soul, a greedy smile...]"

"[So he stole the other man's soul.]"

Lu Yizhan's pupils contracted as he heard the boy speak again, his voice a faint whisper. "This is all the money I have. I'll give it all to my uncle... Thank you, Uncle Xie, for saving me."

Wu Ruishu took the money with a calm smile, saying, "You're welcome. It's what I should do."

Then, the bloodied child's smile turned sinister. "Then ask your uncle to take the money."

"Just sell your soul to me."

In an instant, Lu Yizhan's gun was drawn, aimed at the child. "Wu Ruishu! Let him go! Let me kill him!"

"He's the one I'm looking for—Bai Six!"

Without waiting, Lu Yizhan fired, but Wu Ruishu, quick as ever, threw himself in front of Bai Six, using his own body to shield him from the shot.

Blood splattered as the bullet struck Wu Ruishu in the back.

Bai Six, agile as ever, leaped from Wu Ruishu's arms, raised an eyebrow, and held up a soul note before him. With a derisive laugh, he vanished into the game, leaving behind only the words:

"Stupid lord who thinks he can save everything."

Lu Yizhan rushed to lift Wu Ruishu's body, running out of the church, his forehead beaded with sweat and tears. "Captain Wu, hold on! The ambulance will be here soon!"

But Wu Ruishu's weak smile was all too knowing. "It's no use, is it?"

"I remember, Lu Yizhan. I went to the shrine when my deal with Bai Six succeeded. He unsealed my memory and made me remember everything."

"I saw my soul begin to petrify," Wu Ruishu's voice softened. "Bai Six is so cunning. It's not fair for you to be the only one to remember all of this."

Lu Yizhan clenched his teeth. “It’s all my fault. If I’d known earlier that the child was Bai Six—if I had realized sooner—this wouldn’t have happened.”

Wu Ruishu stopped him, smiling faintly. “I don’t regret saving him.”

Lu Yizhan faltered.

“I was a bad kid in my family. When Fang Dian saved me, the Quan family gave up on me. They all said I was worthless and would end up in jail, so I might as well use my blood to create the Lingzhi to extend my father’s life. It was the only contribution I could make.”

Lu Yizhan felt the warmth of blood seeping through Wu Ruishu’s chest, his voice faltering as he stopped him. “Stop…”

Wu Ruishu’s smile remained, even as he continued. “But Captain Fang saved me.”

“She and I decided that if we didn’t bring the person down, how would we know if they were good or bad?”

“There’s no good or bad in the dead.”

“From that point on, I hoped I could be like Captain Fang—one day, I’d be able to save people others thought couldn’t be saved.”

His voice, almost a whisper now, was fading. “... If I had to do it all over again, I would still save him, too.”

“What if Bai Six in this worldline is a good person?”

“Until he kills me and proves to be a bad person, I want to believe he’s a good guy.”

With his final breath, Wu Ruishu closed his eyes and drifted away from Lu Yizhan, his body sliding from his shoulder.

“... Don’t let hatred change your beliefs.”

“Good will surely triumph over evil.”

Lu Yizhan’s expression blanked, his body stiff as he fell to his knees beside Wu Ruishu’s lifeless form. A system beep sounded in his ears.

[System Alert: Inquisitor Wu Ruishu's soul is petrified, confirmed dead, disqualified from the game.]

[Before death, Inquisitor Wu Ruishu transfers his rules skill (Taiji Bagua) to player Lu Yizhan.]

The First World Line

Less than a week after Wu Ruishu's death, Lu Yizhan discovered that the blood lingzhi, which had been circulating from the Love Welfare Home, was spreading around the world at an alarming rate. Despite all of Lu Yizhan's efforts to stop it—despite warning people that it was made from the blood of children and was a dangerous heresy—his efforts were in vain.

The planters simply looked at him lazily, shrugging. "What? The blood of a child was used? We thought it was pig's blood. Honestly, we don't know anything about it."

"All we know," they added with a grin, "is that it's worth a lot of money."

No one would cooperate with Lu Yizhan's investigation. Even if he had managed to find all the blood lingzhi, there were always hidden spores being cultivated again, spreading further. The world, it seemed, was being silently transformed into a vast, invisible network—a blood vessel carrying the lives of abandoned children, feeding into the hands of wealthy investors.

These children, for their part, were strangely grateful to their investors, who had given them a "good life" before they were chosen as "blood bags."

No matter how much Lu Yizhan tried to stop it—how many times he tried to sever this bloodline—countless people continued to support it. They looked at him with arrogance, sneering at his attempts to intervene, dismissing him as insensitive and foolish. They scoffed, saying, "Do you even know how much this is worth?"

The chosen "blood bags" had no objections. It was their choice, after all. Most of these children lived in relatively good conditions. They didn't resist at all—just endured a little pain each week in exchange for good food, fun toys, and soft beds.

"Mr. Investor is very nice," said a child with small pinpricks on his hands and a thin face, smiling sweetly at Lu Yizhan. "He buys us milkshakes."

Lu Yizhan stood alone outside the orphanage, staring at the sign for so long that the sunlight almost made him dizzy. He heard a beep in his ear.

……

By the time the fifth world line failed, only Lu Yizhan and two other Inquisitors remained alive. It was then that he returned to the Temple for the first time since the tournament.

Bai Six sat at the card table, propping his chin up with one hand, smiling at him. Surrounding him were five grotesque stone statues, all completely petrified.

Lu Yizhan calmly took a seat across from Bai Six. "What do you want from me?"

"There are only two Inquisitors left." Bai Six smirked. "The game ended faster than I expected. Your unwavering execution of justice—sometimes bordering on stupidity—is so useful for keeping things in check."

Lu Yizhan met Bai Six's gaze without flinching. "So, what do you want to play?"

"Can you play werewolf?" Bai Six placed a pack of cards on the stone table, still smiling at Lu Yizhan. "How about we play an identity-set version of werewolf?"

"I'll set up the characters with werewolf identities, assign them to a certain number of people in the next world line, and then we'll see who they're drawn to, who they'll gather next to."

"The deck includes witches, hunters, thieves, and others," Bai Six continued, nodding toward a card depicting a little girl in a witch's costume. "From what I know about your tastes, you'll be partial to fringe characters who've had a miserable time. So, to keep you in the game, I'll choose such characters—those who haven't had it easy and whose experiences and skills fit the werewolf kill-card set."

"And, according to the logic you believe in, these marginalized figures will naturally be more attracted to the light."

Bai Six raised an eyebrow, smiling wickedly. "Let's see if they are more drawn to your light or my evil."

Lu Yizhan regarded him coolly. "How do you want to play?"

"How about a team match?" Bai Six placed a few cards face down on the stone table, his smile widening. "We'll add an in-game team competition to the existing rules."

"If you lose the world-line match but win the in-game team match against my derivatives, I'll grant you a wish."

Bai Six lazily lowered his eyes. "In simpler terms, it's a rivalry between villains, and I want you to be competent enough to sharpen my team of villains to a fine point."

"Otherwise, this game will be boring. The sooner it ends, the better."

Lu Yizhan was quiet for a few seconds before finally agreeing. "Okay."

But Lu Yizhan had no idea that Bai Six would choose the hunter's deck.

Lu Yizhan's pupils contracted as he saw Cen Buming standing in front of him, his eyes intact. He clearly heard a cold, mechanical beep in his head.

[System Alert: You have found the (Hunter) deck. Please take him under your wing as soon as possible.]

Cen Buming frowned at him. "Lu Yizhan, you're the leader of the first detachment now. Don't make me scold you. Why are you staring at me like that?"

Lu Yizhan quickly looked away, his silence betraying a moment of hesitation. He clenched his fists and opened his mouth as though about to speak, but ultimately said nothing. "Nothing..."

Cen Buming grunted and swept him off his feet. "I lost the competition for the First Squad Leader position, but I won't hold it against you. Any position is for those who can handle it. Now I'm the Second Squad Leader, so I'll do my part."

Cen Buming lowered his head, starting to read some paperwork. "Recently, we discovered that students in the high school have suddenly had their eyes gouged out. Afterward, these students scream in pain, claiming they feel something. Someone reported this to us. I suspect it's a red-level heresy. It may require a captain to lead a team and apprehend the heretic."

"Are you going, or should I?" Cen Buming asked.

"I'll go with you!" Lu Yizhan immediately responded.

"A red-level heretic, that's all." Cen Buming began to grow irritated. "One detachment leader is enough. Are you insulting me, Lu Yizhan?"

Lu Yizhan struggled to voice what he truly thought—that if this heresy, this message, hadn't been deliberately arranged by Bai Six, he would have torn his own eyes out on the spot.

But Cen Buming was stubborn—one of those men who would dig up Lu Yizhan's ancestors' graves if he dared say anything beyond his rank.

Actually, telling Cen Buming everything wouldn't be impossible...

But Lu Yizhan hadn't yet decided whether to bring Cen Buming into the fold.

Cen Buming narrowed his eyes at Lu Yizhan, who seemed torn and hesitant. "Captain Lu, do you know something you're not telling me?"

Lu Yizhan immediately waved his hands, panicking. "No, no, no!"

Cen Buming stared at him for a moment before sneering. "You'd better be telling the truth."

With that, Cen Buming turned and walked away. Lu Yizhan sighed, conflicted. As Cen Buming's back stopped, he added, "I'll handle this heresy. You can follow if you want, but don't cause any trouble."

Lu Yizhan blinked, then nodded. "Okay, Captain Cen."

The next day, Lu Yizhan, accompanied by a group from the second team led by Cen Buming, went to the high school where the incident had occurred.

Lu Yizhan sat nervously among the second team members, cold sweat covering his body.

Many of the people here had rebelled in the first world line. Could it be true that nothing would happen to him if he stayed among them?

He stole a glance at the three men standing beside Cen Buming.

Cen Buming was whispering to them, his head down. Lu Yizhan felt somewhat detached from the world around him.

These three men had been executed in the First World Line after being reported by Cen Buming's brother.

Sometimes, Lu Yizhan thought that reincarnation wasn't all pain—there were brief moments that made him feel as though nothing had happened, and that there might still be a chance to start over.

For example, right now.

It was a Sunday, and Lu Yizhan had already contacted the school to clear the site.

The sound of footsteps at this hour felt out of place.

Lu Yizhan turned warily. The footsteps came from different parts of the school, echoing intermittently. The scrape of soles against the ground suggested they belonged to the same pair of shoes—running with slightly deeper thuds and a faster pace.

But then—

A high-pitched "squeak" of footsteps echoed above his head. The sound quickly moved to the third floor of the opposite building, and Lu Yizhan's eyes narrowed.

If he was right, the heretic here would be 0573, the Eyeball Tuner Eater. But what was this strange footstep noise?

The heresy value was 0, indicating this was likely not a heretic, but a human.

A man appeared above him, ran two steps, and then reappeared on the opposite side?

That could only mean one thing.

The moment the footsteps reappeared on the first floor, Lu Yizhan leaped, flipping over and landing on the first floor, his feet meeting the ground with a soft thud. The area was empty, save for a few footprints. Lu Yizhan’s eyes scanned the ground as he spoke calmly, "You’re a player, aren't you?"

"You’re logging into the game from different locations around this school," he continued, "using the coordinates of those locations to move freely around the building."

"Why disturb us with the sound of footsteps?"

Before he could react, the air in front of Lu Yizhan twisted, and a black, hole-like gap appeared.

First, a head with monkey-themed headphones emerged from the gap, followed by a young man in a school uniform. The man grinned wickedly, his eyes glinting maliciously. "Of course, it’s because the boss ordered that you should never leave here alive."

"You think I’ve only sent one heretic into the school?"

Lu Yizhan’s pupils contracted.

[System Alert: You have found the (Thief) deck. Regrettably, (Thief) has been subsumed into the Bai Six camp.]

The loud sound of a bombardment filled his ears, and without thinking, Lu Yizhan jumped off the building, rushing towards the area where Cen Buming and the second detachment were.

Behind him, the twisting eyeball tunnels of the food heretic floated, and a small toy helicopter slowly ascended. At its lower end, miniature toy bombs dropped, each growing larger as they hit the ground, exploding with splashes of mud and dirt.

Lu Yizhan's expression stiffened when he saw the toy helicopter—Heresy [0922]!

[Equally scaled bomber]!

The higher the helicopter ascended, the more destructive the bombs would be when they fell. If it was far enough from the ground, the explosions would be strong enough to obliterate the campus and leave no trace of the people inside.

"Shit!" Lu Yizhan couldn't help but swear.

The helicopter must have just been released by the [Thief] card. The second detachment's earlier investigation didn't reveal any information about Heresy 0922, leaving them completely unprepared for the blast. They were almost wiped out on the spot.

Cen Buming managed to react in time to shield them, but he was impaled by a steel bar that shot through his lung, blood pouring from his mouth as he choked.

At the same time, a host of eyes slowly rose behind him—eyes not looking at Lu Yizhan, but at Cen Buming.

If all the eyes locked onto Cen Buming, he would have been parasitized immediately!

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath, then shouted, "Cen Buming, close your eyes!!!" With that, he closed his own eyes, drawing his heavy sword and swinging it down at the two heretics.

[System Alert: Player Lu Yizhan uses Evil God's Judgment.]

[Heresy 0922, 0573 have stopped moving and are in a brief sheltered state. After using Evil God's Judgment, player Lu Yizhan will enter a seven-day stasis.]

Lu Yizhan rushed toward Cen Buming, his eyes cold as he thrust his sword at the eyed heretic behind him. After both heretics stopped moving, his mind went blank. He released his grip on the sword and slowly collapsed forward.

Cen Buming, still pinned by the steel bar, caught him. His mouth was covered in blood, and as he glanced at the unconscious Lu Yizhan and the heavy sword beside him, as well as the two motionless heretics, he coughed and sneered, "You really are hiding something from me, Captain Lu."

Seven days later.

Lu Yizhan awoke with a start, sitting up in bed as he noticed Cen Buming watching over him with a bandage over his left eye.

Before Lu Yizhan could speak, Cen Buming spoke first, as if simply reporting a task: "The heretics have been contained. When I sensed something was wrong, I called for backup, and they arrived quickly."

"What's wrong with your left eye?" Lu Yizhan asked, concerned.

Cen Buming absentmindedly touched the bandage over his left eye. "I'm blind in that eye. A piece of cement pierced through it when the explosion hit."

Lu Yizhan was about to respond, but Cen Buming shifted his gaze toward him, his right eye sharp and piercing. "Now it's my turn to ask. You said you're a hunter—what does that mean?"

Lu Yizhan's scalp tingled at the sudden question. "How did you know?" he asked.

Cen Buming shrugged. "I've been watching over you for the past seven days. You had nightmares every night, shouting about no hunters."

Lu Yizhan fell silent, realizing further concealment was pointless. With a deep sigh, he scratched his head. "I'll leave the decision to you. You can decide whether you want to join after you hear what I have to say."

Cen Buming sneered, his voice dripping with sarcasm. "You think I'll call you 'brother'? You're dreaming."

Lu Yizhan could only blink in surprise at his response. This man has such strange priorities.

After a brief pause, Cen Buming turned his gaze to the window, silently watching the world outside. He waited until Lu Yizhan was almost asleep before speaking again, his tone thoughtful. "So, you're saying the Hunter card is something that both you and Bai Six can compete for?"

Lu Yizhan nodded slowly, still processing the information. "That's how the game works."

Cen Buming's voice was steady as he continued, "And if I don't join you and instead go over to Bai Six... you'll kill me, won't you?"

Lu Yizhan froze, fully awake now. "Why would you have to be killed?"

Cen Buming didn't look at him. His gaze remained fixed on the window. "Because I find it disgusting—being used like that, trapped in a camp. Those who serve the tiger deserve to be tortured."

He stood up, his posture resolute. "But right now, I'm in your camp, Captain Lu. I'll be a good card in your hand, a skilled trap hunter."

Without another word, Cen Buming turned and left, closing the door behind him.

Lu Yizhan lay back in bed, staring at the closed door. He muttered quietly to himself, "Fang Dian... Is this really the right choice for me?"

Unsurprisingly, the sixth worldline continued to fail.

Lu Yizhan was summoned back to the temple.

Bai Six was sitting at the stone table, idly playing with cards when he saw Lu Yizhan approach. He smiled. "Long time no see, Prophet."

Lu Yizhan responded without skipping a beat, "Actually, I just met with your derivative three minutes ago. I killed him."

Bai Six's smile widened, his eyes curling. "The first time you've killed one of my derivatives, isn't it? It feels different when you have a hunter's help, doesn't it?"

Lu Yizhan didn't respond, the unease in his chest growing.

Bai Six tapped the cards on the table. "Hunters are not like the absolute righteous Inquisitors. Once they understand everything, they actively interfere with the world line."

He paused, his tone turning serious. "But, it's hard for me to influence something like the Inquisitors—those who don't change their beliefs due to events outside my design. The hunters, however, I can affect."

Bai Six leaned back, smiling. "Protect your hunter's faith. Don't ever let him fall away."

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath, staring directly at Bai Six. "That's none of your concern."

Bai Six chuckled softly and stood. "As a reward for your first kill of one of my derivatives, I'll take you to meet someone you've been wanting to see."

Lu Yizhan froze, his heart skipping a beat. "What are you talking about?"

Bai Six's smile deepened. "I know you've been listening to her, even though you've never checked on her during these worldlines, no matter how much you miss her. Now, we're outside the worldlines."

"You can see her now."

Lu Yizhan followed Bai Six silently up the temple steps. It was the first time he'd ever entered this place, and with each step, a creeping fear settled in his gut. The unknown, the uncertainty, was the most terrifying thing of all.

The thought of meeting Fang Dian, the one who had paid the painful price and was now beyond his reach, sent a shudder through him. What could possibly make Fang Dian suffer like this?

Bai Six's voice broke the silence. "Are you wondering what could cause someone like Captain Fang pain?" He smiled, a knowing tone in his voice. "I've wondered the same. What could make someone close to God experience pain?"

They arrived at the dark, underwater pool within the temple. Bai Six raised a hand, parting the waters to reveal a strange green marble pathway beneath the surface. The sounds of distant waves echoed, empty and haunting, adding to the eerie silence. The darkness was suffocating, and being trapped here was a torture in itself.

Lu Yizhan's heart thudded in his chest as they approached.

There, in the depths of the pool, hung Fang Dian by her hands in chains, her head drooping, her hair cascading to the ground.

Bai Six raised his hand again, and the sea floor lit with an eerie white glow. A wall of water appeared between Lu Yizhan and Fang Dian, allowing Bai Six to walk through.

Fang Dian slowly lifted her head, her eyes unfocused. She saw Bai Six and opened her mouth as if trying to speak.

But before she could say anything, Bai Six chuckled. "Captain Fang, I regret to inform you that your team lost another Worldline."

He snapped his fingers, and with a sudden flash of gray-white flame, the man who had been pulling at Fang Dian's chains screamed in agony before bursting into ash.

Fang Dian’s clenched fists tightened as she lowered her head toward the ashes, tears slowly dripping down her face.

Lu Yizhan stood motionless, his face blank, his mind in turmoil. His eyes glazed with confusion and disbelief.

Bai Six’s voice broke through the silence. "That’s the price Fang Dian pays," he said, almost casually. "I found it."

He smiled coldly. "Only something like [love] can make [God] feel pain."

The First Word Line

"Lu Yizhan, do you know why I'm taking you into the temple today?" Bai Six chuckled softly, enjoying himself. "Only those with desires at the level of [God] can enter this place."

"Both you and Fang Dian share such desires, though yours are not evil. You are almost qualified to replace me as the next generation of evil gods."

Bai Six sighed regretfully, raising his hand. A wall of water formed between them and Fang Dian, who hung her head in silence.

"It's a pity you don't wish to become an evil god."

"Then I'll have to charge you the price for participating in this game of evil."

Lu Yizhan slowly looked up, starting to realize something.

Bai Six smiled, continuing, "Lu Yizhan, if you win a world line, it will continue on as it did after your victory."

"That is, if in that world line, Fang Dian fell in love with someone and even married him..."

Lu Yizhan's eyes widened slowly, and tears welled up at the corners of his eyes.

Bai Six added, "Then she'll live happily ever after with this man. She won't remember you. You'll be just another irrelevant person who won the game."

"If you lose the game, you'll witness her suffering as her soul is destroyed before you, and you'll suffer because she suffers." Bai Six's smile grew colder. "If you win, you'll lose her, and she'll live happily ever after with someone else."

Lu Yizhan's voice came out hoarsely, "...That's the price you want me to pay for the pain, isn't it? You've set all this up from the beginning, to make Fang Dian and me pay for it."

Bai Six smiled faintly, "Yes."

"In a sense, I'm charging every judge with [pain], but only your soul and Fang Dian's have been hardened in it. The pain you two have given me is the most valuable."

Bai Six turned his head slightly, his smile light. "I'm curious what you'll choose." He paused. "Will you continue trying to win by any means necessary, or will you choose to lose the game and possess the one you love?"

"Will you truly lose because you can't win, or is there a part of you deep down that desires to lose?"

Lu Yizhan remained silent.

When the next world line began, Lu Yizhan was in a daze, having been pulled from his mission by Cen Buming, who had been injured and was now recovering in a hospital room.

Cen Buming frowned at Lu Yizhan, who was clutching his chest while sitting on the bed. "What's wrong with you?"

Only then did Lu Yizhan realize that the world line had been won as soon as he landed.

Lu Yizhan used [World Line Memory Overlap] on Cen Buming, letting him know everything that had happened from the first world line to the present. Now, Cen Buming had memories of the first world line and all the others—except for what happened at the shrine.

Lu Yizhan kept his head down in silence.

Cen Buming raised an eyebrow. "Something to do with Fang Dian?"

Lu Yizhan's fingers curled for a moment.

Cen Buming grew impatient. "Don't make me torture you with heresy to get you to talk. Be honest, I'm busy saving the world, Captain Lu."

Understanding Cen Buming's personality, Lu Yizhan took a deep breath and finally gave a full account.

Cen Buming grimaced as he commented on Bai Six's behavior. "Bitch."

Lu Yizhan nodded in sympathy.

"You don't care, do you?" Cen Buming shot Lu Yizhan a cold look. "And you wonder if you're mean enough not to want to win? Do you even have what it takes to win?"

Lu Yizhan winced, feeling the sting of the words. "..."

"It's not about doubting yourself, is it?" Cen Buming pressed. "Isn't it that time when you heard Fang Dian was getting married and saw that man burn to ashes because of her love..."

"There was actually a moment—ridiculous as it was—when I felt... jealous of those ashes." Lu Yizhan's voice dropped, his gaze turning inward. "Because I'm not even qualified to be turned into ashes. I can't... get close to her."

He was the last of the Inquisitors.

"So sometimes, I'm not sure whether I was affected by that moment of emotion," Lu Yizhan continued, forcing a smile. "After all, it's hard enough for a loser like me to beat Bai Six. One moment of emotional turmoil could be enough to make me lose."

Cen Buming fell silent for a moment, then suddenly said coldly, "I'm taking a day off to go with you to see Fang Dian in this world line."

Lu Yizhan's eyes widened. "What?!"

"Emotional choices, that kind of thing." Cen Buming gave Lu Yizhan a cold stare. "You'll understand once you see it, won't you?"

Day 2.

Despite Lu Yizhan's reluctance, Cen Buming dragged him along.

"Captain Fang in this world is still in high school, in her senior year, and she has a boyfriend," Cen Buming said flatly, describing the gossip he'd gathered. "Captain Fang chased after someone. Her boyfriend is a popular high school student. She fell in love with him at first sight and pursued him for two months. He didn't say yes, so she gave up."

Lu Yizhan couldn't help himself. "Aren't you supposed to be studying in your senior year? Why fall in love?" He held back a laugh. "How handsome must he be for her to chase him for two months?"

"And yet, she gave up—so why is he her boyfriend now?"

Cen Buming glanced at Lu Yizhan, raising an eyebrow. "Because he started falling in love with her."

“The other party seemed to come to their senses, realized they loved Captain Fang, let go of all pretensions, and pursued her relentlessly for four months. Before the second module, Fang Dian said she’d consider it if the other person could match her grades. So, the other party studied hard.”

“The results came out, and he was only ten points behind Captain Fang, who took first place. So, Fang Dian agreed.”

Lu Yizhan was stunned. “…Damn it! Why the sudden awakening?!”

Cen Buming dragged him up a hill near the school, and from the top, they could look down on the high school playground.

Cen Buming crossed his arms and coldly explained, “I asked about their class schedule. The next class is PE. You should see Captain Fang here.”

As soon as the bell rang, Lu Yizhan tensed.

He saw Fang Dian—her hair tied up in a high ponytail, wearing a fitted white T-shirt, gym shorts, and white socks that rose slightly above her sneakers. She held a volleyball and wore a bright, sunny smile.

Lu Yizhan remained frozen, eyes fixed on her.

It’s a smiling Fang Dian.

As Fang Dian walked down the steps, someone called her name from the playground. She turned, her ponytail swishing in the air as she looked back, her smile widening when she saw someone. She handed the volleyball to the person next to her and seemed to respond to them.

She ran up and, in three steps, leapt off the high steps, smiling and opening her arms wide.

Without thinking, Lu Yizhan instinctively stepped forward, opening his own arms at the same time as the man at the bottom of the steps.

Fang Dian landed in the man’s arms, her bright and joyful smile lighting up her face as he lifted her high and spun her around.

Lu Yizhan slowly lowered his arms, staring blankly at Fang Dian.

Cen Buming asked calmly, “What does it feel like? Jealousy so painful it makes you want to lose the game?”

“It’s jealousy,” Lu Yizhan said, his voice calm, yet his eyes flickered with a faint light. “But she’s happy.”

“Seeing her happy brings me more joy than the pain jealousy causes.”

Lu Yizhan turned away. “Let’s go back.”

His expression hardened. “Even if I’m the only one left, I’ll keep going.”

“Brother.” Cen Buming’s voice cut through the moment as he called out behind him. Lu Yizhan turned to see him, his voice quiet. “You won’t be alone. I’ll be with you until the last world line.”

“Until then, no matter what, I won’t admit defeat to Bai Six.”

Lu Yizhan smiled and turned back. “Well, thank you in advance, hunter friend.”

Cen Buming noticed the tear stains on Lu Yizhan’s face for a moment before snorting. “The prophet cries at every turn. So, I guess you do need to rely on the hunter.”

“Don’t laugh at me…” Lu Yizhan wiped his face helplessly and muttered softly, “Anyone in this situation would cry, right?”

The First World Line

The world line continued to move forward.

In the next world line, Cen Buming became his lieutenant—calm, stern, and possessing an exceptional memory, remarkable information processing skills, and the deadly expertise of an executioner.

With Cen Buming's help, the time required to lose each timeline began to stretch backward, and the chances of killing Bai Six grew increasingly likely. Though they didn't win the game in the end, they were getting infinitely closer to that moment.

Yet, Lu Yizhan always carried a deep-seated unease.

Cen Buming adapted swiftly after each world jump, quickly synthesizing the information from the entire world line once given the prophecy. He would then detect the heresies Bai Six had planted in advance, waiting to spread from the prophecy—and deal with them decisively.

Or, in many cases, decimate them.

Lu Yizhan frowned deeply as he walked briskly toward the interrogation room.

From a distance, he could hear hysterical screams from inside the torture chamber, followed by the weak voice of a man, choking and coughing. "I really... don't know anything."

"I didn't do anything. Please, leave me alone."

Lu Yizhan pushed the door open violently.

Cen Buming leaned back in his chair, legs crossed, his stiff, thick-soled black boots pressed against the face of a dying man on his knees. A bloodied thorn fork was held loosely in his hand.

When Lu Yizhan entered, Cen Buming glanced up, greeted him casually, and then returned to his work. "Captain."

Lu Yizhan's expression darkened as he glared at Cen Buming. "Cen Buming, you've gone too far! Let him go!"

"Good." Cen Buming obediently withdrew his foot and shot Lu Yizhan a meaningful look. "I hope you won't regret this in a week."

"This man was the factory manager of the former Worldline Rose perfume factory."

Lu Yizhan met Cen Buming's gaze, unwavering. "But not anymore."

Cen Buming raised his hands with a sarcastic smile as he lifted his shoes, his tone dripping with mockery. "Yes, whatever, brother."

"Don't come looking for me to clean up your mess when things go wrong." Cen Buming gave Lu Yizhan a cold, unfeeling look. "Sometimes, I wish you'd stop with this untimely benevolence. Maybe we'd actually win."

Lu Yizhan's fists clenched, his frustration evident.

This wasn't the first time such an argument had broken out between them. The further back Cen Buming was able to trace the heresies Bai Six planted, the more ruthless his methods became. And the more Lu Yizhan disagreed, the harsher his actions were.

Lu Yizhan had suggested monitoring potential heretics instead of erasing them, believing that the team could oversee those who might bring the heresies into reality. Cen Buming had mercilessly mocked him for the idea—Captain, how many people do you think are in the Bureau of Heresy Processing who could actually oversee Bai Six's heretics? Thousands?

"If we had handled the heretics with more players than they had, we wouldn't have lost so badly every time."

Cen Buming was right. There was no way they could handle the heresy Bai Six threw at them with their current manpower.

There were so many ways, or people, that a heretic could land in reality that normal surveillance was impossible. No one could predict who might be compelled by the heretic to bring evil to the world.

Lu Yizhan's idea was nothing more than a fantasy—there were no conditions for its implementation.

Cen Buming's voice turned cold. "Captain, your self-righteous, unrealistic approach is just a sacrifice of the Bureau's team members to fill the endless black hole of heresy."

"Do you know how many of our people die every time we go out into the field when the heretics land in reality?"

He shot a brief, sharp glance at Lu Yizhan, who stood silent, before his voice turned mocking. "Is this the hypocrisy and cruelty of those in power?"

[He said... I'd sacrifice the lives of the second-team members of the Bureau of Heresy to fill the black hole of heresy that could never be filled…]

[He asked me if I knew how many second-team members had to die every time we went out into the field.]

[He called me a cruel bitch.]

Lu Yizhan's pupils contracted. Without thinking, he grabbed Cen Buming's wrist, his voice low. "...Don't go down that road."

Cen Buming shook off Lu Yizhan's grip and brushed past his shoulder. Lu Yizhan stood still, unable to move, and without another word, Cen Buming lowered his eyes and pushed open the door, leaving without a glance back.

A week later, the Rose Factory appeared.

After much difficulty, the director of the Rose Factory was finally captured.

Lu Yizhan had sent people to monitor the situation, but Bai Six was too quick, dropping heretics and concealing them with various tricks.

Lu Yizhan personally brought the factory manager back. As before, the man pleaded for mercy, crying and kneeling on the ground, repeating, "I didn't do anything, I know nothing."

Lu Yizhan remained silent for a long time before asking, "Did you know that perfume, when broken, can kill a person?"

"You were told about the dangers of this perfume when Lieutenant Cen interrogated you. So why did you take it once you were free?"

The factory manager's eyes shifted nervously for a moment.

An absurd thought rose in Lu Yizhan's mind, and he asked incredulously, "You didn't know what rose perfume was at first, but after hearing Deputy Cen's description, you saw the profit in it. So, as soon as you got out, you immediately started growing roses, intending to make the same perfume?"

The factory manager lowered his head and suddenly laughed twice. "Profitable, is it human nature?"

"Besides, I don't kill people. As long as they keep buying my perfume, nothing will happen."

"Don't blame me. Change places with anyone, tell them about the profits of this perfume, then send them the recipe, and see if they don't start growing roses."

Cen Buming took the man from Lu Yizhan's presence.

Before leaving, Cen Buming turned back to look at Lu Yizhan, who was sitting silently at his desk. "Brother, you must wait until the other side has caused irreversible damage to know that this man will be a threat."

"Is this the justice you believe in?"

Lu Yizhan slowly lifted his gaze. "Pre-emptive execution is unfair to those who haven't done anything wrong yet."

Cen Buming raised an eyebrow mockingly. "But it would be equally unfair to those who die from these people's wrongdoings if we don't act first."

Cen Buming was about to leave when Lu Yizhan suddenly called after him, "The prophecy Bai Six showed us... is not necessarily true."

Cen Buming's voice was cold as he replied, "His prophecies are always more accurate than your theories, Captain."

With that, Cen Buming closed the door and left.

Left alone in his office, Lu Yizhan slowly slid out of his chair and stared blankly at the ceiling. He muttered, "Did I really make the right choice, Fang Dian..."

He always felt that Bai Six's prophecies were becoming more relevant.

It was as if Cen Buming, who could have detected these traps and heresies, was unknowingly being driven to eradicate them himself.

And with each step of the eradication, Cen Buming grew more paranoid, cold, and... like the second team leader who had defected to Bai Six's side.

Lu Yizhan closed his eyes, slowly reaching behind him to grip the gun at his back. He took a deep breath, then slowly released it, as if all his strength had been drained.

...If that day comes...

Can he really do it to Cen Buming?

Fang Dian, what was it like when you killed the captain of the second team?

That night, Lu Yizhan worked the second half of the night shift at the Heretic's Bureau. He could have rested earlier, but he couldn't stop thinking. Realizing he wouldn't be able to sleep, Lu Yizhan took the first half of the night off and went on patrol after dinner.

He finished patrolling the heresy shelter and somehow found himself at the training ground.

Lu Yizhan stared at the training ground, feeling a sense of nostalgia. It felt like he had just graduated from this place in this world, but he hadn't been there for a long time.

The detachment leaders didn't handle training duties—the deputy team leaders were responsible for coaching.

Lu Yizhan had just withdrawn his gaze and was about to leave when he saw a group of panting trainees running across the training ground. He paused, surprised.

It was almost midnight—long past the time for night training. Why were these trainees still practicing?

He soon found out. The group lay on the ground after running laps, gasping for breath and complaining.

"What's wrong with Cen Jiao? He just showed up with a grim face to give us extra night training? Does he even know what time it is?"

"Ugh, the old devil instructor, Cen Jiao, isn't this always extra practice?"

"But this extra practice has been outrageous lately! Is he the one running it?"

Lu Yizhan couldn't help but chuckle. His own trainers in his first year used to do the same thing with Dong Chenglong.

Now it was Cen Buming's turn.

A gentle boy interrupted another's tirade with a mixture of amusement and helplessness, "Tang Erda, you talk too much. Cen Jiao is doing it for our own good."

Tang Erda snorted, "Bullshit, Su Yang. Don't defend him. He's just taking it out on us because he's pissed at his senior brother!"

"I love it when Captain Lu gives him a hard time! Fuck, it's better to piss him off!" Tang Erda, still angry from the training, punched the ground.

Both Su Yang and Lu Yizhan couldn't help but laugh.

Su Yang, increasingly frustrated, added, "Why do you always call yourself 'Brother' like Cen Jiao?"

"He always yells at Captain Lu every time." Tang Erda, lying on all fours, gasped for air, his chest muscles bulging, sleeves soaked through. "It's so unpleasant to watch. Captain Lu is so nice, capable, and kind, but Cen Jiao looks like he wants to take his place. Watch me..."

At that moment, Cen Buming's calm voice interrupted, "How does it look to you?"

Tang Erda jumped in surprise. "Holy shit!"

Lu Yizhan, who had been listening with great interest, was also taken aback. "Holy shit!"

"Are you two having a nice chat?" Cen Buming's gaze swept over the two men who had screamed in terror, his expression barely shifting.

Lu Yizhan sheepishly stood beside Tang Erda, and together they bowed their heads in silent apology.

Cen Buming clutched his chest, his voice flat. "Slandering your instructor behind his back while adding your own training, huh?"

Tang Erda gritted her teeth and stormed off. Lu Yizhan instinctively tried to follow, but Cen Buming's eyes flicked over to him, and with a swift tug, he yanked Lu Yizhan back by the collar. His anger was barely restrained. “You’re not a trainee anymore, Captain Lu.”

Lu Yizhan scratched his head, offering a nervous smile. “I thought you were talking to me.”

Cen Buming stared at him for a moment, then sighed, clearly questioning why he had worked with people like this for three hundred worldlines.

Cen Buming and Lu Yizhan stood off to the side, watching the trainees run laps with weights.

Lu Yizhan’s eyes landed on Tang Erda, who was gritting her teeth as she pushed through the laps. He smiled suddenly. “You remind me of the Dong Cult.”

He paused, his smile growing. “I didn’t particularly enjoy teaching Dong as a trainee either, but now, I think maybe having one of those instructors wouldn’t be such a bad thing.”

Cen Buming finished the thought flatly. “There’s nothing wrong with that, is there?”

“If an obnoxious instructor increases survival rates for everyone,” Cen Buming continued, “then it’s fine for me to be the obnoxious instructor.”

“If an annoying lieutenant can keep more people alive,” he added, “then it’s fine for me to be the annoying lieutenant.”

Lu Yizhan was taken aback.

Cen Buming’s tone remained light. “Captain Lu doesn’t need to be so bitter about me. I know what I’m doing.”

“In a game of werewolf killing, the seer is the card that doesn’t stain its hands with blood but only tests the werewolf; it’s always the hunter who shoots and executes.”

Cen Buming’s eyes lowered slightly, and the cool night breeze ruffled his hair. His expression was difficult to read.

“So, I, the hunter, will do everything I can to keep you, the foolish prophet who wants to protect everyone, alive until the end.”

“I won’t mess with the principles of the Dong Cult, Captain Yu, or all those who’ve died for us.”

Cen Buming's voice dropped. "I didn't torture the factory manager. I simply asked if he'd had any contact with Bai Six. When he said no, I threatened him with a thorn fork soaked in the blood of a team member who'd used it before. Not his."

Lu Yizhan fell silent for a long moment.

From that point on, he never visited Cen Buming's torture chamber again.

The worldlines continued to spiral forward.

Lu Yizhan thought that the fragile peace they had managed to maintain might last for a few dozen more worldlines, but in worldline 0317, the peace—held together by little more than a spider's thread—finally shattered.

In this worldline, Lu Yizhan captured Bai Six alive for the first time.

Cen Buming immediately moved to interrogate him, but Lu Yizhan stopped him, insisting on speaking with Bai Six first. Cen Buming, though reluctant, agreed.

This was the first time Lu Yizhan was so close to Bai Six's alleged derivative—a young man of twenty-four, with a clear, handsome face, a gentle smile, and an unsettling air of both danger and familiarity.

It felt strangely familiar—the same feeling Bai Six, the evil god, had once given him.

"You're Lu Yizhan, aren't you?" Bai Six said, his hands cuffed and folded neatly in front of him. Despite being in the position of the interrogated, he sat with an air of casual relaxation, almost as if he were the one doing the questioning.

He smiled and continued, "I've got the rules, skills, and worldline props in the game. I've become a believer in the evil gods, and I know about your bet—and everything that's happened between you."

Lu Yizhan's instincts kicked in. "You came to us voluntarily."

Bai Six smiled more meaningfully. "In what I see," he said, "You're quite the intriguing man, Captain Lu."

Bai Six's smile deepened. "I know you have a lot of questions you want to ask. So, how about we play a game?"

Lu Yizhan hesitated. “What game?”

“Truth or Dare,” Bai Six said, the corners of his mouth lifting lazily. “If you win, I’ll answer one question truthfully. If you lose—or refuse to do what I ask—then I won’t answer.”

Lu Yizhan agreed.

“Okay, round one. Truth or Dare?” Bai Six tilted his head and leaned back, propping himself up on the interrogation table.

“Truth,” Lu Yizhan replied.

Bai Six lowered his gaze, his smile still present. “In this worldline, have you ever been to Fang Dian?”

Lu Yizhan’s jaw tightened. After a long pause, he answered hoarsely, “…I’ve seen it.”

He had watched from the sidelines for a long time before leaving.

“It’s your turn,” Bai Six said with a smile. “Does Captain Lu want me to be truthful or daring?”

Lu Yizhan’s gaze seemed distant. “How is it that you’re so composed in every worldline?”

“Composed?” Bai Six absentmindedly toyed with the handcuffs hanging from his wrists. “Composed enough to do something that would undermine human values in this worldline?”

“If that’s what you’re asking, I’ll give you a little hint,” Bai Six added, his smile widening.

He leaned in slightly. “In terms of human society, there are key age points where personalities and tendencies are shaped. The first is from 0 to 4 years old, the second from 6 to 8, then 14, 18, and 24.”

“As a derivative creation, I just need to keep my experiences stable at these age points. Then my character remains stable.”

Lu Yizhan’s eyes narrowed. “I won’t continue if you don’t give me a clear answer.”

Bai Six sighed dramatically, as if regretful. “Alright, alright. Let me explain a little more so Captain Lu can play another round with me, the poor prisoner.”

“For instance, Captain Lu, your kind nature developed because of key people and experiences at the age of 18. As long as those things stay the same, and your overall experiences fluctuate without affecting your core character, you’ll remain the same person.”

“You’ve kept that character even after everything you’ve endured from me.”

“In simple terms, these people and experiences are your [anchor]. As long as your [anchor] stays the same, you won’t change.”

Lu Yizhan responded almost immediately, “What’s your [anchor]?”

Bai Six smiled, “That’s your next question.”

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath. “You ask first.”

“No, this round is a dare,” Bai Six said, his grin deepening as he looked up at Lu Yizhan. “Now, I want Captain Lu to open the doors to the torture chambers where all prisoners, like me, have been brought in and are suspected of crimes but not yet convicted.”

Lu Yizhan met his gaze steadily for a moment, then stood up to give the order. “Make sure to watch them, but don’t harm them.”

Cen Buming furrowed his brow. “Release them all? Most of these are people who are prophesied to be linked with major heretics.”

“What are you doing with Bai Six?” Cen Buming’s sharp instincts kicked in as he quickly stepped in front of Lu Yizhan, who was heading back to the torture room. “Don’t play his game.”

Lu Yizhan gave Cen Buming a brief look before pushing him aside and continuing toward the door.

Cen Buming stopped him again, his eyes dark. “Brother, you know all too well that playing games with him comes with a price.”

“I’ll pay for it,” Lu Yizhan said with a long sigh. “I’m on the brink of finding the breaking point.”

Cen Buming was silent for a moment before stepping aside and allowing Lu Yizhan to pass. “If there’s a [pain] price to be paid for this game, I’ll take it for you.”

“Thanks,” Lu Yizhan waved a hand. “But I’d rather have done it myself.”

Once inside, Lu Yizhan sat down and immediately asked, “What’s your [anchor]?”

Bai Six raised his eyes, smiling faintly. “My [anchor] formed at the age of fourteen, in the body of someone named [Xie Ta]. He was a creation cast by the evil god Bai Six to determine the course of my character.”

“Once he dies, my character’s direction is largely set.”

Bai Six observed Lu Yizhan’s agitation, resting his chin on one hand as his eyes softened in mock compassion. “But alas, Captain Lu will never be able to touch my [anchor].”

Lu Yizhan paused. “Why not?”

Bai Six smiled, his eyes gleaming. “Haven’t you noticed? The evil god doesn’t allow you to land in the worldline before I was fourteen.”

“By the time you arrive in the worldline, my [anchor] has already been destroyed by the evil gods. The moment that happens, I log into the game and start bringing the heretics into reality.”

“Now, it’s my turn,” Bai Six said, shifting his focus. “And this one’s a dare too.”

Lu Yizhan’s gaze darkened. “What do you want me to do?”

Bai Six smirked at the one-way glass of the interrogation room, then looked directly at Cen Buming through it, as if seeing him on the other side. He grinned. “Not Captain Lu this time.”

“The one who’ll complete this Dare is Deputy Cen.”

The First World Line

The moment Lu Yizhan heard Bai Six's words, he turned sharply and reached for the door of the interrogation room.

Bai Six, propped up on the torture table with one hand, snapped his fingers with a smile.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six has used a Magic Space on player Lu Yizhan, restricting his range of movement to the current torture chamber.]

Lu Yizhan froze when he realized he couldn't escape. He turned to face Bai Six, still behind the table, and said, "You broke the rules of the game."

"I never said it was a game between the two of us," Bai Six smiled. "And Lieutenant Cen agreed to pay the price and join me."

Trapped within the magic space, Lu Yizhan stared at Bai Six through the transparent walls. He took a slow breath, then asked, "What dare are you going to make me do this time?"

Bai Six twitched his fingers, and Lu Yizhan noticed several transparent threads wrapped around his fingers. The threads stretched from his hands, reaching out toward whoever was standing outside the door.

Lu Yizhan's heart sank. He realized what Bai Six was trying to do. "Trapping an opponent is no way to play a game," he warned, his voice steady.

"But it's not your turn, Captain Lu." Bai Six grinned, looking up at the ceiling. "It's Deputy Cen's turn."

Bai Six casually flicked his index finger, and the threads began to tighten. "This is a skill I've been using a lot lately—puppet strings. I've attached them to all the suspects you, Captain Lu, have put out there."

He looked back at Lu Yizhan, a smirk on his lips. "Now, Captain Lu, imagine this: What if I open the door and use these puppet strings to incite a riot, with the suspects attacking you while you're trapped in the Magic Space, unable to resist?"

Bai Six's grin deepened as the door to the chamber began to creak open. "I promise these suspects won't hurt you. But I can't guarantee what Lieutenant Cen will do with them."

Lu Yizhan’s pupils constricted in realization.

As the door opened, chaos erupted outside. The suspects, drawn by the puppet strings, were yanked into the room. Their faces twisted in greed and malice—some already transformed into heretics, weapons raised high, ready to strike.

Outside, Cen Buming raised his gun without hesitation. His eyes were cold, filled with a sharp, lethal bloodlust.

"Drop the gun, Cen Buming!!!"

"Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang!"

Lu Yizhan watched, his pupils unfocused, as the figures in front of him fell under Cen Buming's fire, blood splattering across the floor. The warm liquid spread toward his feet.

Lu Yizhan remained silent, staring blankly at Cen Buming, who still held the smoking gun, unwavering.

"Call a doctor..." Lu Yizhan gasped. "Call a doctor...!!!"

Cen Buming’s voice was calm. "There’s no need for a doctor. Every shot I fired was fatal."

Lu Yizhan’s breath faltered. Slowly, he sank to his knees, closing his eyes in defeat.

Cen Buming, still alert, did not drop his weapon. He was fully aware of what he had just done.

Bai Six folded his arms, satisfied with the outcome. "Game over. Props recovered. Players, please leave the field."

Lu Yizhan thought he would break down, shout at Cen Buming, maybe even fight with him. But when he stepped out of Bai Six’s magic space and looked up at Cen Buming, his mind was blank. He couldn’t find the words.

The agreement they had maintained across countless world lines, something they had both worked so hard to preserve, had finally shattered.

For a long time, Lu Yizhan stood alone on the training ground, watching the trainees running laps. His mind was empty, yet full at the same time—like he was thinking of everything and nothing all at once.

Then, Cen Buming appeared at his side.

Cen Buming's voice was steady. "I killed Bai Six."

"This world line is ending soon."

"But we won't win," Lu Yizhan replied, his gaze distant. "He must have set something up. When I captured him, there must have been some heresy already spreading in the world."

Cen Buming nodded, acknowledging the grim truth.

After a moment, he added, "Five of the six men I killed that day were involved in the heretical smuggling for Bai Six."

"There's one left who wasn't."

Lu Yizhan fell silent, his fingers curling into fists. He spoke quietly, "If you had to do it again, would you still shoot?"

Without hesitation, Cen Buming answered, "Yes."

"In my case," he continued, "the lives of good people are more valuable than the lives of these bad people."

Cen Buming looked away, his gaze fixed on the training ground. "Lu Yizhan, I may not be able to do what you do. I hate these people who skirt the line, where one wrong move can cost the lives of countless innocents just trying to survive."

"If it wasn't for their own greed, they would never have crossed paths with Bai Six. And they wouldn't have ended up with us."

"Once more, I would shoot."

His gaze hardened as he stared at the fluttering flags of the Bureau of Heresy Disposal. "Because your life is more important to me than the lives of these six men."

Lu Yizhan looked at him for a moment before replying softly, "My life is no more important than any of theirs... especially when we all face death at the same time."

He turned to leave.

Cen Buming's voice called after him, but Lu Yizhan didn't stop. "Brother."

Lu Yizhan paused briefly, but didn't turn back.

Cen Buming fell silent for a moment before speaking again. "You won't come for me in the next world line, will you?"

Lu Yizhan didn't answer, standing still without turning around.

"Then kill me," Cen Buming said with a dark chuckle. "A hunter who can't stand in the prophet's camp, I'm just a monster wandering the grey fringe."

Lu Yizhan continued walking, his back never wavering.

Cen Buming remained in place, his eyes slowly closing as he watched the trainees running beneath him.

After the world line ended, Lu Yizhan sat in the temple. For the first time, he took the initiative to propose a deal that could change the course of things: "I want to revoke Cen Buming's hunter status."

"Revoke his hunter status?" Bai six raised an eyebrow and smiled slightly. "It can be revoked, but you must have noticed by now that Cen Buming has been reincarnating with you across so many world lines."

He leaned back, continuing, "Cen Buming has already paid the price for his involvement in this game. He has long since become a heretic. Each world line regains the memory of all past lines when you arrive and loses the memory of all past lines when you leave. Cen Buming has become a piece of consciousness that can only follow you, the prophet."

Bai six smirked, "If you revoke his hunter status now, you'll need to ensure you can house him properly, preventing him from interfering directly with my game or meddling with my plans. Otherwise, I'll simply erase his consciousness."

Lu Yizhan took a deep breath. "I'll shelter him and make sure he doesn't interfere with the game."

"Well then," Bai six said, reaching for his deck of cards, "I'll choose a second-generation Hunter card for you." But before he could shuffle, Lu Yizhan stopped him.

With a determined look in his eyes, Lu Yizhan addressed Bai six directly, "I know you're deliberately interfering with Cen Buming's hunter card, pushing him to break down mentally and descend into heresy without self-awareness."

He leaned forward slightly. "Bai six, don't you want the game to be more interesting? How about I make a deal with you this time? I won't interfere directly with the second-generation hunter cards, and you won't either. Let's see how he chooses his camp."

Bai six smiled softly, his eyes downcast. "Interesting. I promise."

"The second-generation hunter I've chosen is very hunter-like," Bai six continued, "I won't directly interfere with torturing him. I'll simply give him the qualification to become a hunter and let him reincarnate through the world line with you."

Lu Yizhan's voice was quiet but resolute. "I'll give him my prophetic authority directly, but I will never see him or interfere with him."

"Then we'll see what this wild-growing hunter will become?" Bai six raised his gaze, his smile widening. "But Captain Lu, you're all that's left."

"There are still over three hundred world lines," Bai six said, his tone taunting. "Are you going to face it alone?"

Lu Yizhan nodded. "I can."

Bai six's choice for the second-generation hunter was Tang Erda, a trainee Lu Yizhan had met twice before.

Tang Erda quickly surpassed Lu Yizhan's expectations, growing rapidly and even managing to win a game against Bai six in a later World Series, qualifying as a hunter at the start of the round.

However, Lu Yizhan soon realized that, even if Bai six kept his promise not to directly interfere, Tang Erda was becoming paranoid and irritable. As she reincarnated through the timeline, she started to hate those who were about to commit crimes in the previous world.

Tang Erda was becoming more and more like a carbon copy of Cen

Buming's original self.

And Lu Yizhan soon discovered why.

Bai six never directly tortured Tang Erda. Even when he caught her, he let her go on purpose. But he tortured Su Yang, Tang Erda's second-in-command. Tang Erda fell deeper into the trap as she witnessed Su Yang being tortured and killed by Bai six again and again.

By the time the countdown of world lines was nearing its end, Tang Erda was nearing the breaking point.

Lu Yizhan sat next to the stone table, looking at Bai six with flat, emotionless eyes. "You've driven Tang Erda crazy."

Bai six smiled, unbothered. "I haven't touched a second-generation hunter."

"But you've touched his [anchor]," Lu Yizhan retorted.

Bai six lowered his gaze, and the smile on his face became even clearer. "It seems you've fully grasped the definition of [anchor]."

"Yes," Lu Yizhan said calmly, "The derivatives of each of my world lines continue to torment the hunter who's chosen you. By torturing Su Yang, you drive him to mentally descend. He can last at most one more world line."

Bai six's eyes gleamed with amusement. "Are you going to change hunters again, prophet?"

Lu Yizhan was silent for a moment. "No more changes."

"And rightly so," Bai six said, crossing his arms with a satisfied smile. "There are only three world lines left, and there's no point in changing them now."

For the first time in the penultimate worldline, Lu Yizhan tracked down Fang Dian's location and went to see her before she logged into the game, before she became entangled with the Heresy Authority.

It was raining heavily when he arrived. With a black umbrella shielding him from the downpour, he searched for her through the endless sea of umbrellas, each one blending into the curtain of rain.

He found her soon enough—standing outside a grocery store without an umbrella, holding her briefcase over her head in a half-hearted attempt to stay dry. But she didn't keep it up for long. Within moments, she let out an exasperated sigh, dropped her briefcase, rolled up her sleeves, and prepared to dash straight into the rain.

Lu Yizhan chuckled at the sight and took a step forward, intending to walk over to her—but then he stopped.

Through the veil of rain, the shifting umbrellas, and the endless crowd, he stood frozen, watching.

Fang Dian ran past him without noticing, her briefcase clutched in one hand, her head slightly bowed, a carefree smile on her lips. She didn't look back. And beside her—when had he appeared?—was a man laughing as he ran with her, matching her reckless dash into the rain.

Lu Yizhan remained standing in the middle of the bustling street, his black umbrella still open above him. He did not turn to watch her go. Rain slid down his jaw, mixing with something he couldn't name.

Memories flickered in his mind—Fang Dian's bright, joyful smile, and that same face bowed in silent grief, worldline after worldline.

[Because Lu Yizhan lost the game this time, the person you love is going to die.]

[Because Lu Yizhan lost the game again, so…]

"Fang Dian…" His fingers tightened around the umbrella handle before he slowly lowered it, letting the rain wash over his face. He murmured to himself, "Was I really right to choose this path?"

"If you were still here… wouldn't you have already won?"

"I really do suck at this."

Over and over again, he lost. Over and over again, they all suffered because of his choices.

The rain blurred his vision, or maybe it was something else. His voice was so soft that the downpour nearly drowned it out:

"If only the people who met you… hadn't been losers like me."

"Just one last worldline left." Bai Six smiled at Lu Yizhan. "I can give you all the cards you had before—all over again."

Lu Yizhan raised his eyes. "What's the price?"

Bai Six let out a quiet laugh. "The price is simple—if you lose this game, the souls of all these cards will be destroyed."

He tilted his head slightly. "Of course, if you refuse, the outcome is the same. I don't accept worthless things like a loser's cards here."

Lu Yizhan exhaled slowly. Then, with quiet resolve, he said, "I'll pay the price. Let the game continue."

"The game continues only with the consent of both you and the other player," Bai Six reminded him, standing up. He glanced sideways at Lu Yizhan, raising an eyebrow. "Wanna go see her?"

Lu Yizhan was silent for a moment. Then, softly, he said, "Yeah."

Seafloor.

Through the shimmering wall of water, Lu Yizhan saw Fang Dian. Her hands hung limply at her sides, her head bowed.

Bai Six crouched before her. "The last worldline."

"The first 657 worldlines—you lost them all."

"The final worldline… will you keep paying the price to continue?"

Bai Six looked down at her. "If you stop now, you can still walk out of this temple. But if you lose the last worldline, then all your games are lost."

"Your soul will be mine."

"At this rate, Lu Yizhan isn't going to beat me on this last line, either."

Fang Dian suddenly lifted her head. Her long, unkempt hair tumbled over her face, half-hiding her exhaustion. She looked worn, frail. But her eyes still shone with an unshaken determination, and the smile on her lips did not waver.

"He'll win," she said.

Lu Yizhan, watching through the watery barrier, stared in shock.

Bai Six raised an eyebrow, amused. "Where does this blind faith of yours come from?"

"It doesn't cost anything to believe in Lu Yizhan, so why not?" Fang Dian arched a brow. "Let the game continue."

"I believe he'll beat you." Her voice was steady, unwavering.

"Just like I believe—"

Her gaze sharpened.

"—that good will always triumph over evil."

Bai Six stood up, his expression unreadable. Then he smiled.

"As you wish, then."

With a snap of his fingers, Lu Yizhan was sent hurtling backward.

For the 658th time, he descended onto a new worldline.

He braced himself, expecting the familiar sights of the Heresy Authority. But this time—

Something brushed past him in the water. A glimmering, silvery-blue tail.

The world tilted.

And instead of the Heresy Authority—

He landed in an orphanage.

Lu Yizhan blinked in disbelief at the figure sitting in the far corner of the orphanage's dining hall.

Thin. Pale. Dark-eyed. A small plate of food in front of him.

Bai Six.

Not the all-powerful Bai Six who ruled over the game.

A fourteen-year-old Bai Six.

A Bai Six who had not yet logged into the game.

This worldline was different. Strangely peaceful. The presence of heretics was minimal, as if it had been untouched by the corruption of the evil gods.

A miracle. A worldline untainted.

For days, Lu Yizhan quietly observed this version of Bai Six—a lonely, ostracized child.

And as time passed, an unbearable thought took root in his mind.

If he killed Bai Six now, before he ever entered the game…

He could win.

Lu Yizhan followed Bai Six to the small pond he visited daily, blade hidden behind his back, waiting for the boy to resurface.

But the water remained still.

Too still.

Something was wrong.

Lu Yizhan leaped into the pond—and found Bai Six at the bottom, unconscious, gripping something tightly.

Dragging him out of the water, Lu Yizhan saw what he was holding.

A body.

A beautiful, delicate-looking boy, eerily lifeless.

Then—

A voice, directly in his mind.

"My name is Xie Ta. I am the corpse before you."

"I used everything I had to pull you into this worldline early. I know you’re a good person, and I know you’ve suffered."

"But Bai Six—he’s different here. He’s not like the others. He’s a good kid."

"Please… don’t kill him."

Lu Yizhan's grip on the knife tightened.

Bai Six knelt beside Xie Ta's body, head bowed, drenched, pale as death itself.

He was choking on sobs.

Powerless. Defenseless.

An easy target.

Lu Yizhan stepped forward, fingers clenched around the hilt. Images of all the people he had lost—Tang Erda, Fang Dian, Cen Buming—flashed through his mind.

If he killed Bai Six now, their sacrifices wouldn't be in vain.

Then—

Softly, hoarsely, Bai Six whispered,

"…Whoever you are, please. Save Xie Ta."

"I'll pay any price."

His voice overlapped with Xie Ta's in Lu Yizhan's mind.

"Please, help Bai Six."

"I'll pay any price."

For the first time, Lu Yizhan saw Bai Six cry.

And after a long, long silence—

He let go of the knife. The blade hit the grass soundlessly.

Lu Yizhan exhaled.

And then, clear as day, he answered, "…Yes."

The Challenge

Drops of seawater, carried by the wind and restless waves, lashed against the decaying shrine on the lonely island.

The dark tide surged, the sky heavy with storm clouds, the air thick with the scent of impending rain.

Seated at a stone table, the evil god gazed across at the prophet, whose head hung low.

With his jaw propped against one hand and his body tilted slightly, the evil god lowered his eyes, devoid of emotion. "Six hundred and fifty-eight world lines—a long dream for humans."

"Lu Yizhan, three times you've altered the memories of everyone, even my devolved derivatives, covering up the tragedies that truly occurred in this world. You whitewashed a conflict on the verge of eruption, dressing it in the illusion of peace."

"Do you even remember what the world’s truest trajectory looked like?"

"Or have you, too, become so lost in this fabricated reality that you've forgotten everything that once was?"

Bai Six lifted his gaze, his voice calm. "No matter how long you delay or how much you hide, you will have to face it in the end."

"Wake up."

The prophet seated across from him inhaled sharply.

Lying on a narrow bed, Lu Yizhan's fingers twitched ever so slightly. His eyelids fluttered as though roused from a troubled dream. His dry lips parted, voice barely a whisper.

"... Don't go down that road."

"Bai Liu."

Bai Liu was discharged from the hospital the day after he woke up.

Of course, this decision was met with unanimous opposition. Everyone insisted he should stay a few more days, but Bai Liu—who had never been one to take advice on such matters—simply stated the night before that he wanted to be discharged. By the next morning, he was already gone.

By the time Mu Sicheng rushed to the hospital after his makeup exams, Bai Liu's bed was empty.

Furious, Mu Sicheng immediately called Tang Erda to voice his outrage.

"How could you let Bai Liu leave the hospital on his own? Why didn't you stop him?! If anything happens to him, can you even afford the consequences?! You were supposed to be his bedside companion! If it were me, I would've—"

Tang Erda's cold voice cut him off. "With how much you spoil Bai Liu, he probably would've been discharged last night instead."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

Fuck.

Tang Erda sighed, clearly exasperated. "I actually had to stop him from leaving even earlier. But you know how he is—when Bai Liu decides to do something, the only thing you can do is go along with it."

Mu Sicheng clicked his tongue. "Why the hell was he in such a rush to leave today?"

"There's a controlled explosion happening at the Bureau of Heresy Disposal. They're demolishing some rotting floors in the Sunshine Property complex where heretical traces were detected," Tang Erda explained. "According to the developer's son, after his father died, he had a bizarre dream. In it, if he mixed part of his father's ashes with the real estate contract and scattered the rest over the land, his father's vengeful spirit would bind to the property, ensuring their family would own it forever."

Mu Sicheng's expression darkened. "That's some next-level haunting."

"The contract was burned, and the Heresy Disposal Authority excavated and purified the ashes on the ground. But some of the remains ended up inside the building, and residual heretical readings were detected on the upper floors. Just in case, Su Yang and his team decided to carry out a targeted demolition."

"And Bai Liu wants to watch this demolition?"

"Yeah."

"Blasting?!" Mu Sicheng nearly choked. "What the hell is he doing getting involved in this? Isn't directional blasting dangerous and complicated? Can you even trust the Heretics to handle it properly?"

Tang Erda's voice remained steady. "In certain emergencies, we use special heretical abilities to ensure safety."

Mu Sicheng hummed in understanding. "So... unconventional methods, huh?"

Tang Erda paused for a moment before adding, "The developer's son had that dream... Bai Liu thinks it might have something to do with Bai Six. He wants to check it out himself."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Bai Six again? What's with that guy?"

Tang Erda fell silent before answering, "You'll realize soon enough—everything is connected to him."

"The world is just a game to him. And the Sunshine Property? It's just another map in his game."

Sunshine Property

The surrounding residential buildings had already been evacuated by the Heresy Disposal Authority. The buildings marked for demolition were cordoned off with yellow tape, and Heresy Authority personnel patrolled the perimeter, strictly preventing ordinary citizens from approaching.

Technically, Bai Liu should have been stopped outside the restricted zone. But Tang Erda made a call, and soon, Su Yang personally came to escort him in.

Su Yang shot a deep, assessing look at Bai Liu before offering his hand in greeting. "Mr. Bai, thank you for your insights. If not for your guidance, we would have only investigated the real estate contract and never considered the ashes."

Bai Liu smiled and shook Su Yang's hand. "No need to thank me. Captain Tang has helped me plenty as well."

Su Yang withdrew his hand and returned the smile. "What brings you here this time, Mr. Bai? Is there something I can do for you?"

Bai Liu glanced past him at the building slated for demolition, then turned back with a grin. "Captain Su, can I go inside before the blast?"

Su Yang hesitated. "That building isn't safe. It's already prepped for detonation."

"Don't worry," Bai Liu said easily. "Captain Su, your team has unconventional means to ensure a precise demolition. And I have unconventional means to ensure I get out safely."

Su Yang exchanged a look with Tang Erda. After a brief pause, Tang Erda gave him a subtle nod—an indication that Bai Liu could be trusted to handle himself.

Reluctantly, Su Yang stepped aside. "I strongly advise against this. But if you insist, you have at most thirty minutes. The blast is scheduled in an hour."

Bai Liu smiled. "Thank you, Captain Su."

Tang Erda escorted Bai Liu to the entrance of the building, frowning. "Are you sure you don't want me to come up with you?"

"No." Bai Liu's tone was calm. "The person I'm meeting wouldn't want you there."

Tang Erda hesitated before exhaling. "If anything happens, go straight into the game. I'll be waiting for you."

Bai Liu nodded, then turned and stepped into the dusty, decayed building, making his way up the stairs.

Su Yang watched him disappear into the darkness, his expression tense. He turned to Tang Erda with clear disapproval. "You should have stopped him. It's not safe."

Tang Erda let out a slow breath, fishing a cigarette from his pocket and lighting it. His dark blue eyes curved into a half-smile. "Nothing he does is safe."

Su Yang's frown deepened. "But you're his guardian, at least nominally. That means you should be keeping him from reckless decisions like this."

Tang Erda looked away subtly. "……He has his reasons. We'll talk about it if something actually goes wrong."

Su Yang let out a helpless laugh. "You're too soft on him! Where are your principles, Captain Tang?"

Before Tang Erda could reply, a team member rushed over. "Captain Su! The owner of the Sunshine Property is here. They're asking if we've seen their owner's group leader, Yuan Guang. He was supposed to come by this morning."

The team member's face was grim. "We checked the surveillance—he entered the site, but never left. Now he's nowhere to be found."

Su Yang's face paled. Tang Erda immediately pulled out his phone and called Bai Liu.

"Bai Liu, have you seen anyone in the—"

"Yuan Guang?" Bai Liu's voice interrupted, calm and detached. He was holding up his phone, eyes fixed on a man slumped motionless in a chair, head hanging down as if asleep. "I see him."

A pause.

"Don't worry, I'll handle it."

Bai Liu hung up and glanced around the dimly lit room.

"I'm already here," he said evenly. "Aren't you going to come out and greet me, Bai Six?"

A soft laugh echoed from Yuan Guang's arms.

"I kept my promise," came the low, familiar voice. "If you hadn't sought me out, I wouldn't have come to see you."

Across the room, Yuan Guang stirred. Slowly, he lifted his head, though his eyes remained closed. In his arms, he clutched a self-portrait.

The painting depicted Bai Six lounging in a chair, one leg crossed over the other, chin resting on his hand, amusement glinting in his eyes. In his gloved hands, he held puppet strings, trailing from the frame's edge and wrapped tightly around Yuan Guang's limbs.

From within the portrait, Bai Six smiled.

"I knew you'd come to find me eventually, but I must say, I didn't expect you to track me down so quickly." His voice was rich with amusement.

"How did you know it was me?" he asked. "Or rather, how did you figure out that I used Yuan Guang to cross into reality?"

Bai Liu's gaze lingered on the puppet strings. "You controlled Yuan Guang at the end of the last tournament. The strings didn't disappear when you left the game, which means you've had full control over him since then."

He continued, tone steady. "And since you also possess his soul note, you only needed to zero out his mental value to use him as a vessel in reality."

Bai Six chuckled. "Zeroing mental values with ease? You already know I can't directly interfere with the real world's timelines. What makes you think I can just erase someone's sanity like that?"

Bai Liu met his gaze without hesitation. "You already gave me the answer."

Bai Six's lips curled. "And what answer is that?"

"Dreams," Bai Liu replied.

"You manipulated the developer's son into dreaming that dream."

"That's not entirely accurate," Bai Six murmured, half-closing his eyes. "I can only influence the dreams of those who believe in me."

Bai Liu's eyes flickered toward Yuan Guang. "Yuan Guang doesn't believe in you."

"No." Bai Six's smile deepened. "But he believes in you."

"For an ordinary man like him, it's not so easy to tell, in a dream, whether it was me or you standing before him."

Bai Liu said nothing.

Bai Six tilted his head, amusement dancing in his gaze. "It's unpleasant, isn't it? Being backed into a corner like this?" His voice was soft, almost teasing. "Unless, of course, you kill Yuan Guang now."

"If it wasn't him, it would've been someone else," Bai Liu replied evenly. "If you wanted to find me, you would have found a way."

Bai Six laughed lightly, curling his fingers. "That's true."

Bai Liu's tone remained indifferent. "What do you want from me? Are you planning another game?"

"No." Bai Six lifted his gaze, his smile almost languid. "I just had a very long, very dull dream."

"I woke up feeling a little lonely. I simply wanted to see you."

Bai Liu, unfazed, glanced at the quivering walls around them, dust trickling from the ceiling. The building was shaking, the demolition imminent.

"In the middle of an explosion?" he asked dryly.

Bai Six, still within the portrait, raised a gloved hand and tugged on the strings.

Yuan Guang collapsed to the floor, the painting in his arms shifting back into a lifeless image, its colors frozen in a permanent, knowing smile.

"The more catastrophic the backdrop," Bai Six murmured, "the more interesting our game, don't you think?"

The Challenge

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Shortly after Bai Six was transformed into a portrait, Yuan Guang choked, coughed twice, and woke up in a daze. He propped himself up against the chair, trying twice to stand but failing.

Bai Liu stepped forward and extended a hand.

Yuan Guang, realizing someone else was in the room, blinked at him in confusion. "Bai Liu? What are you doing here?"

"You don't need to worry about that right now." Bai Liu's voice was calm. "What did you dream about last night?"

At the mention of his dream, a sharp pain lanced through Yuan Guang's head. He groaned, nearly collapsing backward, but caught Bai Liu's hand just in time. Bai Liu helped him up with an effortless pull.

"Thanks," Yuan Guang muttered, settling into the chair. He ran a hand through his hair, frowning. "A dream...?" He hesitated. "I think I had one after watching you leave last night."

Bai Liu's gaze remained steady. "What did you dream about?"

"I dreamt that..." Yuan Guang trailed off, rubbing his temples. "That you woke up and came to play a game with me. I lost. Then you controlled me, my mental value dropped to zero, and I turned into a monster. After that..." His brow furrowed. "I don't remember what happened next."

He paused, then asked, voice low, "Did I get controlled again? Did I summon Bai Six?"

"You did." Bai Liu confirmed, his tone unreadable. "I just saw him."

Silence stretched between them. Yuan Guang clenched his fists against the chair's backrest, his knuckles turning white. After a long moment, he lowered his head and murmured, "...I believe you can lead Russell Cemetery to victory."

His voice hardened with quiet resolve. "If Bai Six ever uses me to enter reality again, you have permission to kill me."

Before Bai Liu could respond, his phone rang. Tang Erda's voice came through, tense and urgent.

"Bai Liu, the building's going to explode. Get down here. Now."

Bai Liu remained unshaken. "I'll take Yuan Guang and go straight into the game. You can proceed with the detonation."

A brief pause. Then Tang Erda sighed. "...Alright. Take care of yourself."

In the background, Bai Liu could hear Su Yang's outraged yell: "We can't just blow it up before they're out!"

Tang Erda responded quickly, brushing him off. "Leave it to Bai Liu. He'll handle it."

Su Yang's frustration only grew. "You let him get away with too much! This is life and death! No—give me the phone, I need to—"

" Tang Erda!!"

The line went dead. Tang Erda had hung up.

Bai Liu pocketed his phone and turned to Yuan Guang. "You heard them. The building's about to go. Are you coming down?"

Yuan Guang shook his head. "No. I'll log into the game directly. You go ahead."

Bai Liu didn't move. Instead, he stepped toward a large opening in the crumbling wall. From there, he could see a glimpse of the thriving city beyond—the world continuing as if nothing was amiss.

"President Bai." Yuan Guang's voice was uncharacteristically quiet. "How did you know Bai Six would be here?"

Bai Liu didn't turn around. His voice was smooth, unhurried. "I didn't."

Yuan Guang stilled.

"I only guessed where you were going to kill yourself."

A sharp inhale. Yuan Guang's body locked up.

Bai Liu continued without a flicker of hesitation. "Bai Six can only manipulate dreams. But you? You climbed this building alone, awake. Then you fell asleep on the floor." His gaze didn't waver. "The only explanation for that is suicide."

Behind him, Yuan Guang didn't move, didn't make a sound.

"You only accepted twenty percent of the points I gave you," Bai Liu went on, his tone calm, clinical. "And I was told you spent it all instead of keeping anything for yourself. When Muke tried to help you, you refused and sent all the compensation for your house to your mother instead."

"You settled everything. Arranged for what came after. And now, you've come here—back to where it all started—to die."

Bai Liu finally turned, eyes meeting Yuan Guang's. "Everything is getting better. Why choose to die now?"

Yuan Guang slowly lifted his head. His eyes were red, the kind of red that came from unshed tears. His voice trembled when he spoke.

"All this—this turn for the better—we only got it after so many sacrifices."

His lips parted, his breath unsteady.

"Why am I the one who gets to enjoy it?"

The black-and-white photo of Uncle Wang on the tabletop behind Yuan Guang showed him smiling warmly, his expression generous and kind. In front of the photo, four sticks of incense had just burned out, leaving faint trails of smoke curling into the air. Yuan Guang's tears finally fell. He choked back a sob, clenching his fists.

"I'm just a worthless piece of shit who gave nothing!"

"They built all of this with their lives! Why should I be the one to have it?"

"I couldn't do anything. I killed all my teammates in my first league because of my skills. Even you—who ended up helping me—almost died at my hands!"

"I've worked so hard, but I'm still living such a pathetic existence. I can't make money, I can't help anyone, I can't even win a game when my opponent practically hands me victory! I've spent my whole life hurting people—what's the point of me being alive?"

His back was straight, but his voice cracked with raw grief.

"Why am I the one who's lived this long?"

Bai Liu, watching him cry in pain, spoke calmly. "If you take the world at face value, then yes, you are living for nothing."

Yuan Guang sobbed harder.

Then, Bai Liu suddenly chuckled, a quiet sound. "But the one who chose to keep you alive wasn't you."

"It was the people who made you president—the ones you think should be here instead, the ones who were willing to die for all of this. You took on their desire to live and never ran away from it. That's why you're still here."

"You're living for the very thing they wanted—for all of this to exist."

Bai Liu smiled faintly. "To carry the weight of so many people's desires and not break… in my book, that makes you incredibly valuable."

Yuan Guang looked at Bai Liu, tears spilling down his face. His voice was hoarse.

"I really… I really want to sell my soul to you."

"But it wouldn't work." Yuan Guang let out a pained laugh, lifting his arm to roughly wipe his face. "I've tried so many times before. But that damned system keeps telling me I've already sold it."

Bai Liu glanced at the offering table behind Yuan Guang. "Did you move all the ashes out?"

"Yeah." Yuan Guang's voice was low and drawn out. "But I left the offering table and the photos behind."

"Why?"

Yuan Guang was silent for a few moments before answering hoarsely, "Because everyone wanted the dead to see this—the rotting building finally being blown up."

"They've been waiting for this day for a long, long time."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow and looked out at the decaying structure, which had begun to tremble under the force of the detonation. "Then let's show them."

The neglected building shook violently as the explosion erupted, sending a thick cloud of smoke billowing into the sky. But strangely, the dust didn't spread beyond a certain area. The debris, instead of scattering freely, hit an invisible barrier and bounced back.

This was why the Heresy Disposal Authority had deemed the explosion hazardous.

The only thing that passed through that strange, controlled space was the wind.

A powerful gust, thick with the scent of gunpowder, rushed over them. It whipped Bai Liu and Yuan Guang's hair back from their foreheads, clearing the smoke in sharp streaks across the air.

The towering structure that had once blocked the sunlight came crashing down, and for the first time in years, golden light streamed through the wreckage. It poured into the forgotten corners of the city —into the broken, rotting rooms of the condemned building.

Sunlight illuminated every offering table, shining over the incense burners and black-and-white photos, as if, under its warmth, the people in those cold, lifeless portraits were smiling once again.

Yuan Guang squinted against the brightness, tears slipping down his face as he looked at Bai Liu standing at the edge. The wind whipped at Bai Liu's coat, making it look like he might be carried off at any moment.

Had sunlight always been this bright?

Then, at last, the explosion reached them.

The foundation of their building cracked with a deafening boom, and the entire structure began to sway.

Yuan Guang stepped up beside Bai Liu, taking a deep breath as he tilted his head slightly to let the sunlight touch his face. In a voice barely above a whisper, he asked,

"President Bai..."

"Yeah?" Bai Liu responded without turning around. "What is it?"

Yuan Guang hesitated, then finally asked, "...In our guild, do we follow the 996 work schedule?"

For a second, there was silence.

Then Bai Liu let out a soft laugh and finally turned to look at him.

"No," he said lightly. "We don’t use 996 here."

Yuan Guang exhaled, relief flooding his expression—

Until Bai Liu continued, his tone utterly steady:

"Our guild is 007."

Yuan Guang: "……"

A single tear fell.

> The 007 schedule is 0 am to 0 pm for 7 days a week.
> Under this work culture, an employee would have to work from 0 am to 0 pm 7 days per week, in other words, 24 hours a day, which means he or she would have to be available online all day.

In-Game: Wandering Circus Guild

Wang Shun sat in the conference room, waiting anxiously, his eyes fixed on the door. The moment Bai Liu pushed it open, he finally exhaled in relief and smiled.

"Welcome back, President."

His relief quickly turned into exasperation. "You and Charles really pulled a stunt with that plan," Wang Shun couldn't help but grumble. "It's a great way to completely wreck our guild's trust. Russell Guild got the lion's share of the bargain—it's hardly worth it—"

Before he could finish, Bai Liu stepped aside, revealing the nervous figure standing behind him.

"This is a new member of our guild," Bai Liu introduced with a smile. "Explain the rules to him."

Then, as if casually mentioning the weather, he added, "By the way, Russell Cemetery is merging into our guild."

Wang Shun's eyes flicked to Yuan Guang, who looked tense and unsure. He froze for a moment before laughing in disbelief. "Yes, President, I understand."

This was just...

He sighed inwardly, taking in Yuan Guang's nervous greeting.

Expecting their President Bai to take a loss? In another lifetime, maybe.

A mere mortal like him should just follow a god like Bai Liu.

Before leading Yuan Guang to familiarize himself with the guild, Wang Shun turned back. "Chairman, Captain Tang and the others have gone to the game pool for training."

"Are you planning to take a break, or...?"

Bai Liu was already rising from his seat with a natural ease. "I'll train with them."

"When's the challenge?"

Wang Shun hesitated. "President, if you're not feeling well, you can rest a few more days. There's been a rule change for this year's challenge, and the exact schedule hasn't been announced yet."

Bai Liu's gaze sharpened. "Rule change?"

Wang Shun nodded. "Yeah, the system sent out a notice last night. But there are always slight adjustments to the challenge and playoff rules each year—it's a normal process. Nothing to worry about."

"Got it." Bai Liu turned, pushing open the conference room door and heading straight for the game pool.

Wang Shun hesitated. "President... there's something else. Not about the competition, but I thought I should bring it up."

Bai Liu glanced back. "What is it?"

Looking away awkwardly, Wang Shun's eyes wandered, clearly reluctant to meet Bai Liu's gaze. "...Spades has been coming over every day for the past few days asking to see you."

Bai Liu remained silent.

"I wasn't sure whether to let him in or not, so I kept him outside," Wang Shun continued. "But then he... uh, loudly mentioned that he slept with you."

There was a heavy pause.

Wang Shun coughed, trying to maintain composure. "And, well, a lot of our members were around at the time. Including Spades' fellow players from the Killer Sequence. They probably overheard."

Another pause.

"Now there's a rumor going around that Spades is your lover."

Wang Shun forced a neutral tone. "Personally, I don't think it's a big deal. It shouldn't affect our schedule, so you don't need to worry, President."

Next to him, Yuan Guang—hearing all this on his first day—felt his pupils shrink in shock. He snuck a quick glance at Bai Liu before hurriedly lowering his head, cold sweat breaking out on his back.

...Holy shit.

His first day at work and he was already overhearing gossip like this?!

So the number one-ranked player and his new boss... on day two of the competition...?!

Serious injury ward gameplay??

Yuan Guang's head spun. This was way too exciting.

High-ranked players... were they all this unhinged?! Did they just play this wildly?!

Bai Liu was quiet for a few seconds, leaning against the door, eyes lowered. "Don't mind him."

"Next time he comes—"

"Should I just send him away?" Wang Shun suggested.

"No."

Bai Liu turned slightly, closing the door behind him with an almost imperceptible chuckle.

"Let him come next time. If he refuses to leave, let him wait inside for me."

The door clicked shut.

Wang Shun and Yuan Guang stood frozen in place for several minutes.

"…Just…" Wang Shun's pupils trembled as he gripped Yuan Guang's shoulders, his voice unsteady. "Did the Chairman just say to let Spades in?"

Yuan Guang frantically waved his hands, shaking his head in sheer horror. "What sleep? What serious injury ward gameplay? I didn't hear anything! I don't know anything!"

Wang Shun: "……"

Yuan Guang knew way too much.

Game Pool
By the time Bai Liu arrived, Tang Erda and the others were already training on their own.

The vast pool was empty, its surface reflecting shifting waves of multicolored light. Bai Liu didn't jump in. Instead, he sat at the edge, back against the pool's tiled wall, watching. Light danced on the water, casting fleeting colors across his half-lidded eyes and long, dark lashes.

For once, he indulged in a rare moment of idleness, neither eager to submerge himself in another horror game nor interested in joining the others. With his chin resting lightly on one hand, he looked as though he were either dozing off or waiting for someone.

Steady footsteps approached.

A figure stepped into Bai Liu's line of sight, casting a shadow that blocked out the pool's colorful glow and fully enveloped him.

Bai Liu tilted his head away as Spades bent down, leaning in to study him. His tone was light but pointed.

"I seem to remember putting up signs prohibiting Slayer Sequence players from entering the game pool."

"Oh." Spades knelt down, meeting Bai Liu's gaze without hesitation. "I'm not very good at reading."

Bai Liu: "……"

Right. He'd forgotten about that.

Spades could recognize the basic characters on the system's game panel, but anything beyond that was still a struggle.

"The words Slayer Sequence and game pool are ones you know," Bai Liu pointed out.

Spades nodded, then added, "But I didn't recognize the two characters in the middle."

Those two words? [Prohibited Entry].

Bai Liu's lips quirked up. "And what do you think they mean?"

Spades stared at him, utterly unfazed. "I don't know. I didn't think about it. I just saw you inside and came in."

Leaning in slightly, his deep gaze reflected nothing but Bai Liu. "So… does that mean I wasn't supposed to?"

Bai Liu was quiet for a few seconds, then averted his eyes and murmured, "…Not anymore."

At that, Spades settled against the pool wall beside Bai Liu without hesitation, their shoulders lightly touching.

"I went to your guild looking for you," he said. "They wouldn't let me in."

"You could've forced your way in," Bai Liu noted, shifting subtly to create some distance.

Spades moved just as naturally to close it. "Yeah. It would've been easy."

"But they said you weren't there, so I left."

Bai Liu stilled for a moment before sliding a little further away. "What do you want from me?"

This time, Spades didn't just follow. He leaned in, pressing one hand against the pool wall beside Bai Liu's head. His other hand held the black bone whip loosely as he bent his knee, bringing them even closer.

His voice dipped into a low murmur.

"I've learned how to dream, Bai Liu."

His eyes glimmered. "Only people dream, don't they? The people you like—they're human too, aren't they?"

With a rare, almost wistful softness, Spades asked, "Am I more human now? Closer to the kind of souvenir you wanted?"

Bai Liu's breath hitched. He instinctively shifted aside again.

Spades chased the distance effortlessly. His gaze flickered toward Bai Liu's lips, then lower. His tone was quiet, teasing, but unwavering.

"Can I claim my reward?"

"The same as last time."

His hand remained braced against the wall by Bai Liu's ear, but he leaned in further, his entire frame surrounding Bai Liu in a way that left little room to escape. With his eyes half-lidded, he brushed his lips lightly against Bai Liu's—cold, fleeting—before pressing a kiss against the side of his neck, then his collarbone.

"You never washed off the cross I drew for you," Spades murmured against his skin.

Bai Liu exhaled sharply, his breath unsteady. His fingers curled around Spades' shoulder in an attempt to push him away.

"…Enough."

But Spades didn't stop. Instead, he bit down—not hard, but deliberate—right where he had once traced that cross. Bai Liu's body jolted, his breath catching.

Instinctively, he tried again to shove Spades off.

Spades simply caught his wrist and pressed it against Bai Liu's chest, holding him there as he murmured, "No."

"You told me to wake up and find you. But I woke up ages ago, and you never came."

"You lied."

Bai Liu felt the hem of his shirt lift. A cold hand slipped underneath, pressing against his waist, pulling him closer.

This was getting out of hand. His skin flushed, his chest rising and falling harder than before as he opened his mouth to tell Spades to stop—

Then he heard Spades' next words.

"I dreamed that I held you like this… and was shot."

"I turned to ash and died next to you."

"And then—" Spades' voice was calm, but his grip tightened slightly. "You cried for me."

Bai Liu stiffened. His fingers brushed against a scar in the center of Spades' back—one from a bullet wound. A wound Spades had taken while standing in front of him.

Spades continued quietly, "I asked Bai Yi about dreams. They told me I don’t have a soul, that I wouldn’t die from that kind of gun."

A pause. Then, softly—almost contemplative:

"I never thought a soul was something I needed."

"But if I learned to be human properly—if I had a soul of my own—"

Spades tilted his head, watching Bai Liu intently.

"Would you cry for me if my soul was shattered?"

"I want you to cry for me."

Bai Liu closed his eyes. Then, to Spades’ surprise, he laughed. Soft. Amused.

"Then you’d better dream faster."

Spades frowned slightly, about to ask what that meant—

But Bai Liu shifted forward, threading his arms around Spades’ neck. He tilted his head up, closed his eyes—

And kissed him back.

For a moment, Spades forgot whatever question he was going to ask.

Instead, he lowered his head and focused entirely on embracing Bai Liu, deepening the kiss as their figures blurred in the shifting light of the game pool.

The Other Side of the Game Pool Tang Erda climbed out of the play pool after finishing his training, pushing himself up against the wall—only to freeze at the sight before him.

Spades had Bai Liu locked tightly in his arms, completely covering him.

If Tang Erda wasn’t mistaken, they were kissing. And Bai Liu wasn’t resisting.

Spades lifted his gaze and met Tang Erda's eyes, giving him a slow, deliberate, and undeniably provocative look.

Tang Erda: "……"

Without a word, Tang Erda sat back down in the pool, his mind utterly blank.

Five Minutes Later Muke emerged from the water, glancing suspiciously at Tang Erda, who was sitting unnervingly still. He was about to step out when—

Three seconds later.

Muke dropped back into the pool, his expression crumbling as if the world itself was collapsing. Clenching his fists, he muttered under his breath, "I have to get stronger. I must kill Spades…"

Another Three Minutes Later Mu Sicheng surfaced and immediately let out a string of curses—only for Muke and Tang Erda to slap their hands over his mouth the second he opened it.

Mu Sicheng's glare was murderous as he struggled against them, stomping his feet in the water, clearly about to storm out—

But then, mid-struggle, his gaze drifted toward the other side of the pool.

Mu Sicheng's pupils dilated.

Without another word, he sank back into the play pool, wearing the same shell-shocked expression as Tang Erda.

One More Minute Passes The moment Liu Jiayi emerged, three pairs of hands immediately covered her eyes and ears with unrelenting force.

Liu Jiayi stood still for almost ten seconds before speaking, completely deadpan.

"…With a reaction like this," she said, voice eerily calm, "Bai Liu isn't doing something with Spades, is he?"

Chapter End Notes

Tang Erda literally stared for 9 minutes straight

The Challenge

After sitting still for a few seconds, Tang Erda nearly bolted back into the pool.

By the time they came out again, Bai Liu was the only one still outside the play pool.

He gave them a calm nod, but Tang Erda had to fight to keep his gaze steady on Bai Liu's slightly red lips. He clenched his fist, coughed awkwardly, and quickly looked away. "...You should rest. You don't need to join the training right now."

Mu Sicheng stood there, his mouth still slightly open, his expression blank. Muke had his head down, silent, hands gripping a pair of bloodstained short knives—proof of his recent violent kill in the game pool.

Liu Jiayi raised a hand in greeting to Bai Liu, his tone odd. "Have you and Spades started talking?"

Mu Sicheng, Tang Erda, and Muke, all desperately wanting to avoid the subject, exchanged uncomfortable glances.

Bai Liu paused for a moment to think, then replied casually, without hesitation, "I think we've just started talking."

Liu Jiayi cupped his face in mock thought, moving closer, clearly enjoying the gossip. "I remember who tricked you into marrying Spades in the game of Forest's Edge. And once he came out of the game pool—"

Liu Jiayi's expression abruptly hardened. The smile that had been on his lips now shifted to a mix of coolness, sarcasm, and indifference. "—It's just a game. I don't take it seriously."

Bai Liu: "....."

Muke jerked his head up to look at Bai Liu, while Mu Sicheng's pupils flickered with confusion, stumbling over his words. "What marriage?!"

"You're married to that idiot, and you're just now talking?!" Mu Sicheng slapped the side of the pool in frustration. "What the hell, does a relationship start after marriage?"

Liu Jiayi casually grabbed the edge of the game pool, flipping out of it with a smooth motion, and landed gracefully on the ground. With a light tone, he replied to Mu Sicheng's outburst, "Marriage before love. Haven't you heard of it?"

Mu Sicheng: "....."

What the hell is this?!

This definitely isn't how relationships are supposed to work!

Tang Erda, clearly exhausted from all the noise, sighed and interrupted the chaotic chatter. "This is Bai Liu's personal matter. Let's focus on the task at hand."

"The challenge is coming up soon."

Everyone fell silent and turned to Bai Liu. He nodded in agreement. "Let's head back to the meeting room first. We'll go over the teams for this year's challenge."

Meeting Room of the Wandering Circus Guild

A few of the men who had finished training took showers, changed clothes, and sat down in the meeting room.

Wang Shun walked to the front of the room, his gaze steady as he clicked on the system panel and began explaining the rules and teams for the upcoming challenge.

"As in previous years, the first-place pre-season team will draw against a team from the eight playoff teams. After that, the second-place team —our team—will draw from the remaining seven teams to determine who we'll face."

"But this year's situation is special," Wang Shun continued, rubbing his temples with a weary expression. "The president of our guild... abducted the president of another team's first-place team into our guild."

"I just spoke with Yuan Guang, and he told me they weren't planning to compete this year and were going to forfeit. But—" Wang Shun looked over at Bai Liu, who was sitting at the end of the long table. "Chairman, did you tell Yuan Guang not to forfeit just yet?"

Bai Liu nodded. "I have other plans for him."

Wang Shun raised an eyebrow. "Are you trying to get Yuan Guang to forfeit after they win the challenge and enter the playoffs against us—like we did in the pre-season?" He shook his head disapprovingly. "President, that's unlikely."

"All eight teams this year are very strong. Yuan Guang will probably not win the challenge, and even if they do, the playoffs use a draw system, and it will be hard for them to face us."

Wang Shun glanced at the panel. "In the playoffs, the top four ranked guilds draw first to determine their matchups. Then, the winning teams in each round will draw for the next round's matchups."

"Unless Yuan Guang makes it all the way to the final, there's no way they'll end up playing against us in the playoffs."

Wang Shun frowned. "But you should know, President, that Yuan Guang and his team don't even have an exemption death warrant. It seems unlikely."

Mu Sicheng rested his chin in his hand, his eyes wandering as he snuck glances at Bai Liu. He casually asked, "Yuan Guang is so skilled—can we get him to join our team and help us out?"

"No," Wang Shun replied quickly. "All players who've signed up as independent guilds this year are not allowed to join another guild's team during the tournament."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Not even if we annex Russell Cemetery?"

"Nope." Wang Shun shook his head. "Even if we annex the Russell Cemetery guild completely, Yuan Guang and his teammates will still be considered former Russell Cemetery players. They can only sign up with us for next year, not this one."

Mu Sicheng scratched his head in frustration. "Damn, so Bai Liu's injured, hospitalized again, and in the end, we get nothing but a guild name."

"No," Bai Liu said, folding his hands together on the table and raising his gaze. "We've gained a chance for tolerance."

Wang Shun was puzzled. "What does 'tolerance chance' mean?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes. "I'm not sure my guess is right, but I started down this path hoping to gain a challenge tolerance opportunity from Russell Cemetery."

Liu Jiayi paused, then glanced sideways at Bai Liu, speaking thoughtfully. "After Russell merges with us, Russell Cemetery will become a subordinate guild of the Wandering Circus. All the spots will go to us—except for the warband members, who can't be used by us."

"It's like us being both first and second in the league at the same time. We'd have two chances at the challenge. Is that what you're after?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Yes, a place in the challenge is the most valuable thing Russell Cemetery can offer."

Liu Jiayi furrowed her brow, still confused. "But the effort and energy you've put into this opportunity seem to outweigh the reward."

"Aside from the twenty percent of the points, our squad has taken a dip in popularity since the last game, plus you're still injured. This opportunity doesn't seem worth the effort you've put into Russell Cemetery."

"Even though the playoff teams are strong, from what I've learned, our win rate against the bottom four teams isn't bad. I think we have around an eighty percent chance against two guilds, the Kabbalah and the Paradise Masons."

"If Du Sanying handles the draw, we'll easily get over ninety-five percent of these two bottom teams. We'll cruise into the playoffs with a challenge win."

Liu Jiayi looked up at Bai Liu. "I know you like to have a backup plan, but you wouldn't prepare one when the normal process has an eighty percent win rate."

"You usually reserve your backup plans when there's less than a one percent chance of winning."

"Why now..." Liu Jiayi met Bai Liu's calm eyes, a realization dawning on her. Her expression shifted. "Do you think...?"

She didn't finish her sentence under Bai Liu's watchful gaze, but her face grew unreadable.

If Bai Liu had gone this far, it could only mean one thing.

Their chances of winning the challenge were less than one percent.

Bai Liu's gaze dropped to the reflection of his shadow on the smooth tabletop. He lingered there for a moment before slowly lifting his eyes to meet the others.

"This time, I hope I'm wrong in my guess."

After the Meeting

Wang Shun remained behind with Bai Liu.

He looked at Bai Liu, sitting at the end of the table, a mixture of apprehension and confusion on his face. "President, I don't quite understand why our guild needs a second chance at the challenge so badly."

"And I agree with the little witch. In situations where the chances of winning are less than one percent, you rarely make backup plans. Why this time..."

Bai Liu rested his hands on his knees, his gaze distant for a long moment before he asked, "Looking at the major guilds this year, do you think the current Wandering Circus—"

"—Has a chance of winning against the killer sequence?"

Wang Shun's pupils dilated, and he froze, unable to breathe for a few seconds. It took him a long time before he responded hoarsely, "...The odds are no more than 0.5%."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu propped one hand on the backrest of his chair, his body lazily tilting to one side. He half-closed his eyes, his tone calm. "In that case, let's pursue maximum profit."

Wang Shun was stunned by Bai Liu's words. It took him a moment to react before he jumped up in a panic. "Chairman, we drew Du Sanying! No matter how unlucky we are, we couldn't have drawn the killer sequence!"

"How unlucky would that be?"

Bai Liu glanced at Wang Shun, a subtle, knowing look in his eyes. "It's possible if the captain draws the lots himself."

"Have the rules for the challenge been finalized yet?"

Wang Shun fell silent, his mind racing.

After a moment, goosebumps covered his arms. He stumbled back and fell into his chair, his voice low with disbelief. "...No, it can't be..."

Wang Shun sat alone in the conference room, as though struck by lightning, while Bai Liu calmly left the room.

Outside the door, Liu Jiayi stood waiting. She didn't look up when Bai Liu exited but nodded once, her tone serious. "Are we going to face the killer sequence?"

"It's just a guess," Bai Liu replied lightly.

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips. "Have you checked with Spades about Reverse God?"

"He'll be fine," Bai Liu said with a calm expression. "He's Bai Six's important bargaining chip, one that can restrain me. It won't be so easy."

Bai Liu's eyes turned cold as he continued. "From what Bai Six showed me in the future—"

"He would have wanted me to kill Reverse God on the field."

Liu Jiayi's breath caught.

Day 2

Wang Shun entered the conference room in a daze, his eyes unfocused. When he saw the team waiting, his voice was hoarse.

"The rules for the challenge have come down. No major changes."

"...But they've asked the presidents of the pre-season guilds to personally draw their playoff matchups."

"For our guild, it's President Bai."

Everyone turned to look at Bai Liu, who was sitting at the end of the table.

Bai Liu lifted his eyelids slightly, propping one hand on his jaw. He gave a faint hum.

Living Together (Extra)

＜6 AM.

Bai Liu was half asleep when the person next to him kissed his neck. He wasn't fully awake, but in his drowsy state, he lazily draped his arms around the man's neck, touching it and kissing him back naturally with his eyes still closed.

The other man rose, pinning Bai Liu's slender wrist against the bedside table. His body pressed down heavily on Bai Liu, who kissed him in return. The man's hand slid under the hem of Bai Liu's loose blouse.

"It's a little ticklish," Bai Liu murmured, his voice muffled with sleep. "What time is it?"

The man, breathing slightly faster now, responded with a steady voice. "Six eleven."

"I'm not working today." Bai Liu finally opened his eyes a little, his hand trailing down the man's back, pressing gently against his firm shoulder blade. He let out a soft gasp. "Want to do it?"

There was a pause before the man answered, his voice low but certain. "Yes."

Bai Liu chuckled softly, sitting up on his knees and stripping off his shirt, dropping it at the foot of the bed. He moved forward, positioning himself on the man's coiled knees. He lowered his eyes, then leaned down to kiss him gently.

Bai Liu's hands, large and steady, slid up Spade's waist as his feet curled around the man's waist, securing him in place.

With a dark, drowsy voice, Bai Liu said, "This position again…"

"You really like this one."

Bai Liu tilted his head back as the man buried his face in the crook of his neck, wrapping his arms tightly around him. His voice was muffled against Bai Liu's skin. "This way, I can touch you the most."

Bai Liu let out a small laugh, finding it amusing. He touched the side of the man's face, lowering his head to kiss him again, his eyes fluttering closed as he whispered, "And you care about the area of contact.”

"Childish," the man muttered, his breath hot against Bai Liu's skin.

9:30 AM.

Bai Liu wiped his hair and stepped out of the bathroom, shaking his head to clear the water from his ears. He dried his hair with the towel draped around his neck, lifting his eyes to see smoke rising from the kitchen.

Spades, freshly showered, was crouched outside the smoky kitchen, wearing a $30 black cotton vest that Bai Liu had bought him. He looked like a large dog that had gotten into trouble and didn’t know how to take responsibility.

Bai Liu quickly yanked the towel from his neck and covered Spades' smoke-blackened face. "I just got out of the shower. Don’t get me dirty."

Spades, his face pressed into the towel, let out a muffled "ooh," but still leaned into Bai Liu, his body tilting towards him.

Bai Liu held the towel in place for a few seconds before giving up and letting it fall.

Spades, still covered in smoke residue, was now pressed up against Bai Liu, who sighed with slight aggravation. "The kitchen is exploding again."

"What did you do this time?" Bai Liu asked, taking the lizard pendant hanging from his neck and using it to pull Spades toward the kitchen. "Microwaving Mu Sicheng's motorbike helmet again?"

"No." Spades subtly avoided Bai Liu’s gaze. "You and I both agreed the helmet isn’t edible."

"Hmm." Bai Liu lifted the pot lid, and a pungent smell immediately hit him. He raised an eyebrow at the blackened mess inside. "This is Tang Erda’s belt, isn't it?"

Spades wrapped his arms around Bai Liu’s waist and rested his head on his shoulder. Without saying a word, he gently stomped on Bai Liu's heel twice.

Bai Liu calmly used two chopsticks to remove the ruined belt from the pot, then picked away the blackened portions with careful precision. He turned and pushed Spades away, looking up at him with a raised brow. "Why are you taking revenge on Tang Erda this time?"

"Last time you retaliated against Mu Sicheng by blowing up his helmet, I understood. He provoked you by making fun of you for not being able to drive a Harrow bike while he could race one. But Tang Erda... he didn't mess with you, did he?"

Spades averted his eyes, staying silent.

Bai Liu crossed his arms, voice firm. "I told you, it's no use playing games. If you do it again, I won't even come home today or tomorrow. You'll be left alone to think it over before I return."

Spades shifted his eyes back to Bai Liu, his lips pressed into a thin line. Then, he collapsed against Bai Liu's shoulder, his body going limp like clay, before wrapping his arms around Bai Liu's waist and tilting his head against him. His voice was low, almost a whisper. "No."

"I don't like it when you don't come home," he muttered.

Bai Liu remained unfazed. He'd been fooled by Spades' antics before but had realized that the man could do anything if Bai Liu indulged him.

"So, why the revenge on Tang Erda?" Bai Liu asked, his voice quiet but persistent.

Spades was silent for a moment before replying in a barely audible voice, "He advised you to think about living with me."

Bai Liu paused, surprised. "You heard that?"

Spades nodded, mumbling, "Mm-hmm."

Tang Erda wasn't hostile toward Spades. He simply thought Bai Liu was too busy and that it would be inconvenient for someone as unstable as Spades to stay with him, even as a couple. In fact, Tang Erda had suggested Bai Liu ask Spades not to stay at home when he was free, or to leave him in the care of the Heretic Authority, fearing that Bai Liu's home would be torn apart by Spades once he returned.

"He did say that." Bai Liu replied calmly. "But did I promise?"

Spades hesitated. "No."

Bai Liu's gaze sharpened slightly. "What did I tell him?"

Spades was quiet for a few seconds. "You said I was a heretic to you alone."

"You said I would take good care of you, and no one else should bear the consequences of my presence in reality."

"Even though I'm not their captain anymore, I'm not the kind of person to be swayed by someone else's decisions," Bai Liu continued, leaning forward slightly to cup Spades' face. He kissed Spades softly, eyes half-closed. "I don't like you living in someone else's house either."

"You're my monster."

They cleaned up the kitchen quickly, with Bai Liu supervising while Spades, wearing an apron and dishwashing gloves, took care of the mess. Bai Liu firmly believed that whoever caused the trouble should clean it up, so Spades always took charge of the messes he created.

Even if Spades made a bigger mess than necessary, Bai Liu wouldn't intervene and would leave him to clean up on his own.

Afterward, Spades, now covered in grime from head to toe, looked at Bai Liu and gestured to himself. "Should I take a shower?"

Bai Liu paused as his eyes lingered on the smooth, strong lines of Spades' shoulders and neck muscles exposed by his vest. He met Spades' gaze and answered in a natural, even tone, "I'm going to take a shower too. You just got dirty again."

Spades' eyes twitched, and he looked at Bai Liu with a slightly more composed expression. "We'll wash together."

Bai Liu leaned casually against the edge of the kitchen, folding his arms and smirking at Spades. "Just washing? Or do you want to do it again?"

Spades didn't hesitate for a second. "To do it."

The Challenge

The Day of the Challenge
Mu Sicheng woke up in his dormitory, groggy from sleep. He dressed absentmindedly, squeezed toothpaste onto his toothbrush, and went through his morning routine with sluggish efficiency. After washing up, he yawned, a tear slipping from the corner of his eye. His gaze drifted to his cluttered desk—left in disarray after a late-night study session.

In the corner of the desk stood a small calendar, a gift from Liu Huai.

Mu Sicheng had never been one to keep track of dates, often forgetting even crucial exams. But Liu Huai, ever meticulous, had carefully marked deadlines for lab reports and tests in Mu Sicheng's calendar, placing it where he would see it.

The last marked date had long passed. Below it, in Mu Sicheng's own handwriting, was a note reminding him of the makeup exam.

He walked over, picked up a red pen, and tapped the date lightly. His lips moved as he counted under his breath.

"One, two... seven. Seven days."

Seven days since he had stolen anything in reality.

His pen hesitated.

Ever since meeting Bai Liu, his kleptomania had faded into the background, drowned out by all the chaos that had followed.

If Bai Liu were still around, he'd probably notice immediately that Mu Sicheng had gone a full week without stealing. And knowing him, he'd get all smug and childish about it—maybe even draw a little red flower in his discipline book as a reward.

Mu Sicheng's grip on the red pen tightened. He lowered his gaze, let out a quiet snort, and, on impulse, drew a small red flower under the date himself.

Then, pulling up the hood of his jacket, he pushed open the door and stepped out.

A breeze slipped in through the open window, rustling the pages of the calendar. The page with the hastily drawn red flower fluttered but didn't turn.

Beneath the flower, another note was scrawled in messy handwriting:

[Rangers and Monkeys] Challenge—First Show Date!

Muke sat at the dining table, sipping porridge with deliberate slowness. Across from him, his parents sat in uneasy silence, exchanging glances.

His father was the first to break the quiet. Clenching his fist slightly, he cleared his throat.

"Muke, about that money you asked for before—I gave it to your company. I don’t care if you make it back or not. As long as you're happy."

Then, after a pause, he added, "There's something else I want to talk to you about."

Muke set down his porcelain spoon, wiped his mouth with a tissue, and looked up at his father, who was watching him expectantly.

For as long as he could remember, his father had given him whatever he wanted, never holding him accountable for his choices. Even when he strayed into gray areas, into places that could bury a person, his father never stopped him.

Muke had once believed that such indulgence must mean love. That was what others told him, at least.

But another possibility existed—his father had never expected anything from him in the first place. He had simply laid out a safety net, prepared to let him fall however he pleased.

And yet, for the first time, his father was looking at him with something akin to hope.

"Muke," his father said slowly, "I have a child out there—a year younger than you. I want to bring him home."

Muke let out a soft laugh. "Only a year younger?"

His father coughed awkwardly. "Xiao Ke, don't misunderstand. I didn’t have this child because of your congenital heart disease. It was... an accident. I had too much to drink..."

Muke said nothing.

"Your mother knows," his father continued, glancing at his wife. "I admitted my mistake as soon as I got back. She was furious—wanted to divorce me. But in the end, she forgave me. She couldn't bring herself to let the other woman... get rid of the baby."

His mother finally spoke, her voice tinged with complex emotions. "He's a good boy. About your age. I just... couldn't bear it."

Muke lowered his eyelids, his tone light. "If you liked children a year younger than me so much, you could have just had another."

He lifted his eyes, smiling. "But you didn't, did you? Because you were afraid a second child would be another cripple like me. So you went and found someone else."

Silence blanketed the table.

His father took a deep breath. "Xiao Ke, you're our first child. We love you. We've given you everything. For years, we've raised that child in secret, shielding you from the truth, afraid that if you found out, you'd take it too hard. But now... now you're doing better. So I thought it was time to tell you."

"I've never denied you anything. I've given you money, supported your ambitions. Do you know how many people in my position would have done the same?" His father fixed him with a deep stare. "Do you know how many people with your condition have died long ago?"

Muke's smile widened. "If you ever considered denying me, it must have been at the very beginning—when I was born."

"You must have thought, more than once, that if only I had died young like the others..."

"Muke—!" His father slammed the table, his face twisting with anger. "How dare you say something so—!"

The slap landed hard.

Muke's face jerked to the side. Blood trickled from the corner of his mouth, and the skin on his cheek burned.

But he only let out a low laugh. Slowly, he ran his tongue over the blood, then turned back to face his father with an eerily gentle smile.

"But I didn’t die, did I?"

"That’s the real tragedy for you."

"You must have wished, over and over, that your illegitimate son had been as exceptional as I am. Then you wouldn’t have had to make such a painful choice."

"But unfortunately"—Muke rose from his chair, pushing it back with slow, deliberate ease—"he’s no match for me."

His voice was almost amused as he added, "In the end, the one who lived long was just a mediocre failure. And the one who lived short was too gifted to be allowed to exist."

"And yet, despite everything, you've made your choice."

Muke lowered his lashes, his tone steady.

"Longevity matters more, in the end."

"Go ahead. Bring him home."

With a small, polite bow, he turned toward the door.

"Xiao Ke." His father's voice, now slower and heavier, called after him. "I was wrong to hit you just now."

"But you have to understand... You don’t know which day will be your last. Your mother and I—how could we put all our hopes, all our emotions, on a dying man?"

"No one would bet too much on you, Xiao Ke."

"We have to think about the future."

His father’s voice trembled as he finished.

"You should be content."

Muke's back stiffened for a fraction of a second. Then he let out a quiet "hmm" and stepped forward.

"I’ll go find someone willing to bet on me."

With that, he opened the door and walked away.

Tang Erda was the first to arrive in the conference room.

Liu Jiayi followed shortly after, her entire appearance neat and put-together—except for the high ponytail on her head, pulled so tight that her eyes were practically stretched sideways.

Tang Erda hesitated for a moment before giving the ponytail two slightly awkward tugs.

Liu Jiayi immediately protested, sucking in a breath. "Pause! It's tight enough!" Her eyes had been reduced to two thin slits.

Xiang Chunhua adored this kind of high ponytail and had fussed over it for a full ten minutes, but Liu Jiayi wasn't nearly as enthusiastic. Still, every time Chunhua approached her with a comb in hand, eyes expectant, she found herself unable to refuse.

At the very least, it was better than when her brother tried to do it.

Three minutes later, Mu Sicheng kicked open the door. The moment his gaze landed on Liu Jiayi's tortured-looking ponytail, he burst out laughing. "You look ridiculous! What an unconventional fashion statement!"

Liu Jiayi shot him a deadpan look. "Blame Tang Erda. Come fix it for me—I have to go on stage with Bai Liu later for the lottery draw."

Mu Sicheng cast Tang Erda a look of disdain before rolling up his sleeves. "Captain Tang, you can't even tie a little girl's ponytail properly? Watch and learn!"

Fifteen minutes later.

Liu Jiayi stared at her reflection with a blank expression. Her hair was now a complete disaster—frizzed, tangled, and looking like a bird's nest. The corner of her mouth twitched. "You call this tying a braid?"

Mu Sicheng sheepishly stepped out of her line of sight, eyes shifting away. "Everyone has their weaknesses..."

Two minutes later, Muke pushed open the door.

Tang Erda and Mu Sicheng both turned to him with pleading looks.

Muke locked eyes with Liu Jiayi, who sat in the chair radiating an ominous aura, her hair a complete wreck. Without a word, he stepped forward. "Let me do it."

One hour later.

Liu Jiayi, now resting her chin on her hand, watched as Muke meticulously combed through her hair, strand by strand, with the patience of a saint. "Are you still not done?"

Muke shook his head solemnly. "Another three hours, at least. I'm applying a hair mask first. If I don't treat the split ends, it won't be smooth when I tie it up later."

"....."

Liu Jiayi slumped forward onto the table, staring hollowly ahead. "I just wanted a simple ponytail..."

Muke, unfazed, continued his careful work. "You're a public figure. Every strand of hair should be styled properly."

"I'll just wait for Bai Liu to do it." Liu Jiayi abruptly jumped out of the chair, spinning away from Muke. With a complicated expression, she sighed. "How is it possible that three grown men—average age over twenty-five, capable of killing monsters in seconds—can't even tie a decent ponytail for a kid?"

She crossed her arms. "Are all men this uncoordinated?"

Tang Erda frowned. "Su Yang's good at it."

"Yeah, well, he's married with kids. Of course, he's good at it," Liu Jiayi retorted. Then she paused, her expression shifting subtly. "...Inverse God is also good at this. He even ties different styles."

A realization dawned on her.

"Wait—is this a special skill only married men have?"

Right as she finished speaking, the door swung open, and Bai Liu walked in. His gaze flicked over to Liu Jiayi, who was sitting cross-legged in the chair, then trailed up to the state of her hair—a high ponytail yanked to the side by Tang Erda, nestled in the disaster Mu Sicheng had created.

Without a word, Bai Liu stepped forward, untangled the ponytail with ease, ran his fingers through Muke's half-finished conditioning job, gathered the strands, and deftly braided her hair.

In under three minutes, he was done—a simple, clean, and perfectly loose braid.

Liu Jiayi: "....."

Tang Erda: "....."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Muke: "....."

Bai Liu glanced at the entire room staring at him in stunned silence and raised an eyebrow. "Why are you all looking at me like I'm some kind of perfect housewife?"

The Challenge

Wang Shun was the last to enter the room. He took a deep breath, scanned the faces of his teammates, and finally fixed his gaze on Bai Liu.

“Chairman, we’ve received the match draw.”

The relaxed atmosphere in the conference room vanished.

Bai Liu gave a slight nod and said calmly, “Go on.”

Wang Shun stepped forward, gripping a pen and panel in both hands as he tried to steady his voice. “The draw will take place at the mid-season viewing pool, where all eight playoff teams will be present.”

“The pool will open immediately after the draw, and the matches will begin.”

“All of these teams are strong, and every one of them has an exeption Death Warrant.” Wang Shun hesitated before continuing, “But we only have you and God Mu.”

“There’s no mercy in the playoffs. Every team has fought their way here for their own core desires.” Wang Shun took another deep breath. “Going into a team match like this means risking everything—including death.”

“Unless…”

Bai Liu finished his sentence indifferently, “Unless I win my first solo match so spectacularly that I outshine the opponent’s star player, steal their popularity, and elevate myself to a high-ranking star player—granting our team a free pass.”

“But that’s nearly…” Wang Shun’s voice faltered, “…impossible.”

If Bai Liu was drawn for a solo match, he’d inevitably be up against the Killer Sequence. And if it was a singles match against the Killer Sequence…

He’d be facing their number one-ranked player.

Wang Shun forced himself to push that thought away. “Chairman, as I’ve mentioned before, the playoffs are different from the pre-season and mid-season."

"Playoff matches rarely consist of singles or duos."

"By this stage, most teams have already secured their individual benefits through the earlier rounds. Almost all of them have obtained an exception Death Warrant, which can only be used once in a match. If they use it in a singles or pairs match, they won't have it for the team match."

"As long as their team members don't drop below the top 100 in the popularity rankings, the major guilds follow a phased abandonment strategy—sacrificing singles and duos entirely to conserve all of their exception Death Warrant medals for the team matches."

Wang Shun turned back to Bai Liu. "That means if the Killer Sequence also forfeits singles and duos, we'll be forced straight into a team match—without exemptions for our three main players."

"And if they don't forfeit singles," Wang Shun's expression darkened, "you'll have to compete in both the solo and team matches back-to-back. Since you only have one forfeit, you'll have to choose one match to fight without protection."

"If you lose in a match without exemptions… you'll actually die."

Bai Liu's tone remained flat. "That's a possibility, but a worthwhile gamble is still worth taking."

"The odds of winning that gamble are slim!" Wang Shun was exasperated, his head pounding. "It's the Killer Sequence! If they don't forfeit, you'll be facing the strongest offensive player in the game—Spades—in the singles match. And in the team match, you'll be up against the top tactician— The Inverse God!"

"So should I give up now?" Bai Liu turned his head, his gaze steady. "Should I lead these people—who have given me everything, even their souls—into this match just to kneel and admit defeat?"

Wang Shun was stunned.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze, his dark eyes devoid of light. "Never."

"I'll keep winning until the end."

As they walked down the corridor leading to the mid-season viewing pool, Wang Shun paused in a daze. Bai Liu passed him, head slightly lowered, and in an uncharacteristically quiet tone, he murmured,

“The game between God and me… is just beginning.”

A flash of white light illuminated Bai Liu’s face as he stepped into the vast viewing pool. He narrowed his eyes slightly.

The deafening roar of the crowd surrounded them. The massive arena distorted under the weight of thousands of spectators, their figures overlapping in the packed space. Fireworks exploded in dazzling bursts across the sky, showering down onto the audience.

At the center of the viewing pool stood an enormous silver-white screen. Around it, eight teams sat in distinctive uniforms, their supporters behind them waving flags and chanting slogans in unison.

Mu Sicheng leaned toward Bai Liu, glancing around. He had seen his fair share of major matches, but the sheer scale of this one still shook him.

“…Is it just me, or is this viewing pool even bigger than during mid-season?”

Liu Jiayi answered coldly, arms crossed. “Obviously. After the pre-season and mid-season, all the viewing pools merge into one. Of course, it’s bigger.”

The presenter stood on an elevated platform above the massive screen, his arms gesturing animatedly as his passionate voice carried through the loudspeakers to every corner of the viewing pool.

“Today, the eight great teams that performed exceptionally well in the mid-season tournament are gathered here. However, the Tactician of the Killer Sequence, the Inquisitor of the Reverse God, is regrettably absent for unknown reasons. Still, this does not hinder the proceedings of our challenge…”

Bai Liu’s gaze swept past the Reverse Cross flag of the Killer Sequence, lingering briefly on the vacant tactician’s seat before shifting away. He turned to Spades, who was staring directly at him from the adjacent position. Bai Liu blinked softly.

Without hesitation, Spades leaped to his feet and dove toward the lower viewing pool. Liao Ke, having anticipated his reckless move, grabbed hold of him, pressing a hand to his forehead in exasperation while murmuring something under his breath. Spades, however, didn't seem to be listening—his head tilted, eyes locked on Bai Liu, the banner above him swaying gently.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze, choosing to ignore him.

The presenter carried on.

"I'm sure we're all excited for this year's playoffs! Unlike the stagnation of previous years and last season's one-and-done Killer Sequence, this year is a true spectacle. Talented newcomers have emerged across all the major teams."

He gestured dramatically.

"First up, the youngest newcomer—Phoebe of the King's Guild! Ranked 27th! A remarkably high ranking!"

With a flourish, he pointed toward the King's Guild. "Right from the mid-season, Phoebe captivated the audience with her stellar individual performance and doll-like appearance."

Phoebe curtsied gracefully, her nun's skirt held delicately in her hands. Her emerald-green eyes drifted toward Liu Jiayi in the Circus procession. With a sweet smile, she bowed slightly, then clasped her hands together under her chin, whispering a prayer with closed eyes.

"May the Lord grant that the witch may never go to hell."

Liu Jiayi's expression remained unreadable as her gaze shifted from Phoebe's face to the swaying white Crown Club banner before her. Beyond it, she locked eyes with the languid Hearts seated at the front.

Hearts lowered his eyes and lifted a fan, concealing his face. He did not look at Liu Jiayi again.

Liu Jiayi's lips pressed into a thin line.

The presenter's voice regained its liveliness.

"Next up—Golden Dawn's Armand! Sharing the same golden looks as President Georgia, yet wielding a butterfly that can create a hurricane in every match!"

"Ranked 21st!"

He chuckled. “But don’t be fooled by Golden Dawn’s president and vice president’s sunny appearances. These two are anything but warm. The last person who made light of their looks… well, let’s just say they were swiftly sent to another world.”

Dressed in a pristine white uniform trimmed with gold, a golden seven-stringed lyre nestled in his hair, Armand let his gaze drift past the fluttering golden banner—straight to Mu Sicheng, who was peeking nervously from behind Bai Liu.

The presenter, now visibly excited, continued.

“And finally, last but certainly not least—the strongest newcomer of the year!”

“The Joker, who has won thirteen consecutive singles matches! Ranked 11th!”

His words picked up speed and intensity. “This masked player made his debut by killing a spectator mid-match and declared that revealing his true face was beneath him. Ever since, he has appeared only with a clown mask, often painted with the blood of his last opponent. Even on such a grand occasion today, he refused to remove it—and almost killed a staff member for trying to make him do so…”

He trailed off suddenly, his voice faltering.

Something was wrong.

The presenter stared in disbelief as Daniel, seated among the Deer Hunters, slowly stood. Hands trembling as though suppressing excitement, he reached up and removed his bloodstained mask.

“…The clown has removed his mask,” the presenter murmured, bewildered.

Beneath it was a baby-faced youth with apple-green eyes, his stare fixed unwaveringly on Bai Liu, who was walking toward the stands.

Humming softly, Daniel propped himself up on the spectator’s fence with one hand. With a swift flip, he attempted to jump down—only for Cen Buming to intercept him, grabbing his collar mid-leap.

Daniel didn’t even glance back. With a smirk, he pulled out his sniper rifle, aiming it directly at Cen Buming’s head.

“Stop me from reaching him, and I’ll kill you.”

The presenter gawked. “Joker has a gun on his own tactician! The Deer Hunters have suddenly erupted into infighting!”

Unfazed, Cen Buming remained still. “No harm can come to anyone in the hall,” he stated evenly.

Then, in a casual tone, he added, “I already told you—I can make Bai Liu come to you on his own. Do you really need to rush this?”

Daniel hesitated before exhaling sharply. With an irritated scoff, he withdrew his gun, flipped back over the fence, and slumped back into his chair. He refused to look at Cen Buming, his voice petulant.

“You better be telling the truth.”

The presenter, somewhat shaken, forced himself to continue. “A-And next, we have the two pre-season teams.”

“One is Russell Cemetery, which forfeited last year after near-total destruction. They’re back with the same roster—no new stars, no major shakeups.”

“The other is a rookie team—respectable compared to Russell Cemetery but far from playoff material. Notably, two of their players received exemptions.”

“First, Mu Sicheng, the roaming player—ranked 97th. This is a precarious spot. If their single matches don’t perform well, they could be replaced by a reserve player from a playoff team.”

“And their tactician—Bai Liu. Ranked 67th.”

There was a beat of hesitation before the presenter muttered, “Though speculation suggests that this rookie tactician may very well have rule-type abilities.”

Then, with exaggerated flair, he announced, “Now, before we proceed with the challenge draw, we invite the tacticians of the eight playoff teams to engage in a friendly exchange with the tacticians of the two pre-season teams!”

His voice turned lazy. “Of course, an unfriendly exchange is fine too.”

Historically, playoff tacticians rarely bothered with this formality. Last year, when Spades had been the ultimate dark horse, most refused to even shake his hand.

And this year?

The presenter was prepared for similar indifference. Executioner, Hearts, and Georgia were all cold, distant figures—unmoved even by the adoration of millions. It was unthinkable that they would pay any mind to a newly risen tactician…

His eyes widened.

He rubbed them.

Then rubbed them again.

The scene before him remained unchanged.

"…What the hell?"

The presenter shut off his mic and collapsed onto his seat in a daze.

The notoriously arrogant presidents of the three major guilds were approaching Bai Liu.

And queuing up to shake his hand.

The audience, caught in the same state of disbelief, had fallen eerily silent.

Georgia stepped forward with dignified poise. He removed his white elbow gloves and extended a slender, bony hand.

"Golden Dawn President—Georgia."

Bai Liu's gaze lingered briefly before he smiled and took his hand. "The Wandering Circus—Bai Liu."

Hearts curved his lips, extending his hand with an elegant dip of the wrist.

"We've known each other for a long time. You may call me Hearts."

Bai Liu dipped his head slightly in acknowledgment. "I'm grateful to Queen for her willingness to bet on me that day. I hope you'll continue to enjoy my performance."

Cen Buming stepped forward last. He looked at Bai Liu for a long, long time before extending his hand.

His voice was hoarse. “Bai Liu. I am the Executioner.”

Bai Liu met his gaze. “Executioner. I am the Poor Vagrant.”

Their hands briefly clasped before Cen Buming turned away without another word.

Evil God Festival - Boathouse

The presidents of the major guilds shook hands with Bai Liu in turn before departing.

The moderator, still in shock, continued his commentary: "According to standard procedure, the first-place pre-season player should draw the team first. However, since the presidency of the first-place pre-season team, Russell Cemetery, is in transition, the president of the second-place team, Wandering Circus—"

"—Bai Liu, step forward to draw the team!"

In front of the massive screen in the viewing pool, a raffle table slowly emerged. At its center stood a black curtain-covered box with an opening just wide enough for an arm to reach through. Three steps led up to the dais where the table stood.

Bai Liu moved forward unhurriedly, stepping onto the platform. With his gaze lowered and the entire room holding its breath, he reached into the box, grasped a ping-pong ball, withdrew it, and handed it to the waiting staff member.

The staff member carefully cut open the elastic ball with a knife, extracting a small slip of paper. Without looking at it himself, he held it up and turned it toward the audience for all to see.

For a brief moment, the noisy crowd fell into stunned silence.

Even the guild members of the eight seated teams looked visibly shaken, some so dazed they dropped their banners.

Hearts raised an eyebrow slightly. Phoebe cupped her face and grinned playfully. Cen Buming, looking composed, clutched his chest as if he'd seen it coming. Daniel sat up straighter, his expression grim. Georgia tilted his head, whispering something to Armand, who looked equally serious beside him.

Charles, his arms crossed with his cane resting at his side, glanced away from Bai Liu. A rare flicker of intrigue crossed his face as he curled his lips.

This gamble was about to get interesting.

Liao Ke’s grip on Spades' shoulder tightened abruptly. Bai Yi, staring in disbelief at the label, muttered, "Shit, we can't be this unlucky..."

"The Reverse God isn't here," Bai Jiamu snapped his head toward Liao Ke, his expression dark. "How the hell are we supposed to fight without a tactician?!"

The host's voice trembled with barely contained excitement as he gestured wildly, his voice echoing across the viewing pool.

"What an unbelievable twist of fate! Our newly promoted team, stepping right into their first match, has drawn the number-one team —The Killer Sequence!!!"

On the slip of paper, a reversed cross was drawn—the unmistakable emblem of the Killer Sequence.

Regardless of the outcome, drawing the Killer Sequence guaranteed one thing: they would play. And whether they won or lost, the sheer volume of bets placed on this match would cause an explosion in the betting pools on opening day.

The crowd erupted into a frenzy!

"The battle is about to begin! Spectators, take your seats! Get your chips ready and place your bets!" The host's face contorted with excitement as he continued, "Now, the Tactician of the Killer Sequence will step forward for the traditional declaration of war against the Tactician of the Wandering Circus!"

Liao Ke took a deep breath and raised his hand to speak. "Our team's tactician is currently absent. I will be acting as the interim tactician for this match."

A beat of silence passed before the host and audience collectively lost their minds.

"The Reverse God isn't here?!"

"Changing tacticians at the last minute—what a disaster! This could sink the entire team!"

The host's voice cracked. "Ladies and gentlemen! Can our newly promoted team repeat last year's legend—Challenge the Dragon Slayer?!"

"If they succeed in slaying the dragon, the payout for bets on the Wandering Circus will skyrocket over a hundredfold! Seize this chance! The earlier you bet, the greater your return! Hurry! Place your bets!"

Seated in the aisle lounge chair, Wang Shun stared at his system panel, his eyes reflecting the rapidly rising numbers. Though he'd seen plenty while working under Hearts, he couldn't help but inhale sharply.

"…37 times the payout…"

"That's terrifying…"

With so many points being wagered, a loss in the first match would leave a damning impression on the audience. Retaliation would follow—people would refuse to bet on them in future matches, making it significantly harder to secure the popularity rush exemption.

Wang Shun cast a worried glance toward the players in the field before finally settling his gaze on Bai Liu.

"…President."

Liao Ke turned to head toward the back passage.

Bai Jiamu suddenly grabbed his wrist, his expression unreadable, his voice low. "The Reverse God… he's always planned ahead. He can foresee the future. He'll be fine, right?"

Liao Ke, already descending the steps, didn't look back. "He'll be fine."

"He said he'd come to stop Bai Liu from winning himself."

Liao Ke exhaled slowly, then stepped into the communication cubicle before the massive screen. With a complex expression, he extended a hand toward Bai Liu, who stood waiting.

"I didn't expect to face you this soon."

Bai Liu looked up calmly, taking his hand in a firm handshake. "Neither did I."

A pause.

Liao Ke hesitated, then said, "Thank you for letting us use the game pool earlier."

"You're welcome," Bai Liu replied flatly. "And thank you for putting me in a solo match. I needed this to boost my popularity."

Liao Ke's eyes darkened. "So you've already guessed our match strategy."

With the Reverse God absent, team matches couldn't proceed immediately. Problems would arise. As the interim tactician, Liao Ke would have to stall using singles and doubles matches.

Bai Liu was quiet for a moment before speaking. "The Reverse God will come, won't he?"

Liao Ke's tone was unwavering. "If the opponent is you, then yes. No matter how badly injured he is, he'll drag himself here to fight you."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze and withdrew his hand. "I know."

"I'll wait for him."

As Bai Liu turned to leave, Liao Ke called out, "This time, he won't let you win again. Even if it kills him, he'll make sure of it."

Bai Liu halted, let out a faint chuckle, then walked off the stage.

Liao Ke watched him go, then turned and exited the cubicle as well.

The host, practically vibrating with excitement, leaned forward. "Now that the tacticians have concluded their exchange, it's time to announce the singles matchup—"

"As expected from the Killer Sequence, their singles player will be none other than their ace starter—Spades!"

The moment the words left the host's mouth, Spades, who had been leaning on a fence with one hand, flipped over effortlessly and strode toward the stage. A black bone whip was loosely tied around his waist, and numerous props were strapped to his pants—several of which were already coming loose as he walked.

One fell off.

Spades glanced down at it. He didn't move.

Liao Ke groaned, covering his face. "…I know you hate carrying props, but for the love of god, just this once, don't throw them away on purpose. I saw you kick that off. Pick it up…"

—The props had just been forced onto Spades by Liao Ke.

Spades had never used any props in matches or games. His personal record for keeping them on? Fifteen minutes—tops—before they somehow “accidentally” fell off.

But this time, Liao Ke had insisted.

Their opponent was Bai Liu.

And against Bai Liu, any extra safeguard was necessary.

Liao Ke was propped up against the fence, his gaze locked onto Bai Liu, who approached with an unsettlingly calm expression.

Of all the formidable opponents he had faced, none had ever pressured him as much as Bai Liu—who strolled onto the field with an air of ease, as if the game itself bent to accommodate him.

Liao Ke's heart pounded so violently it felt like it might burst from his throat.

Wang Shun felt the same.

Clutching his pen and paper, his eyes remained fixed on Bai Liu, standing on the stage. He took deep, measured breaths, trying to steady the lightheadedness creeping in—as if he were the one about to enter the match, not Bai Liu.

Seated on the bench with the other players who were not yet on the field, Wang Shun still looked better than most of them.

Muke’s face was ghostly pale, his fingertips pressing into his palms unconsciously. Liu Jiayi's lips were pursed, her calves tensed. Tang Erda’s brow furrowed—his fingers twitched toward the gun on his back before he let out a slow, controlled exhale.

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and shook his leg frantically. "Fuck, I'm so nervous I might throw up."

Tang Erda clapped him on the shoulder. "Relax and get yourself together. You have a doubles match later, and Bai Liu has an exemption—this one won't be a big deal."

Liu Jiayi, however, did not look reassured. Instead, her tension only deepened. "Bai Liu does have an exemption," he admitted.

"But he won’t necessarily use it in this match."

Muke’s lips were bloodless. "Or rather, to take care of us—who don’t have an exemption in the regatta—and to add excitement and stakes to the game—"

He took a breath.

"—Bai Liu probably won’t use the get-out-of-jail-free card this time."

Mu Sicheng looked stunned. "What the hell does that mean?! This is a fucking fight against Spades! He’s not using the exemption?! Is he insane?!"

Muke shook his head grimly. "No. It’s because he’s fighting Spades that he won’t use it."

"He wants to break Spades' undefeated singles streak once and for all—and in doing so, catapult himself into stardom. The moment a team has a star player, the audience is far more likely to vote the entire group into the top 100 to ensure that their favorite player advances."

Muke turned to Mu Sicheng, whose pupils had shrunk in alarm.

"If he wins this high-risk match without the exemption, his popularity boost will all but guarantee that our entire team benefits—and we’ll all get a free pass into the next round."

Mu Sicheng's eyes reddened, his fists clenching. "This isn't eating his popularity bonus—this is eating Bai Liu's fucking life!"

The presenter’s voice rang out, almost trembling with excitement. "Here we go, here we go! Both contestants are stepping onto the stage!"

"Players, please declare war!"

Bai Liu stood across from Spades, meeting his gaze levelly. His face betrayed no emotion. "Do you want to win?"

Spades nodded without hesitation. "I'm going to beat you."

Bai Liu smiled. "I want to win too."

He reached up, grasping something at his collar. A golden medal slipped from the chain around his neck, catching the light. A similar medal, identical in design, gleamed against Spades’ chest.

The host clicked his tongue. "Oh? Both players have an exemption medal. Looks like they'll be using them—takes some of the excitement out of it."

Then Bai Liu calmly removed his medal.

A system notification flickered above him.

[System Alert: Does player Bai Liu choose to forfeit the use of the Exemption Medal for this match?]

The presenter's voice shot up an octave. "Oh my god! What did I just witness?! This is a standard move to waive immunity! This rookie tactician has just decided to give up his exemption against one of the most aggressive players in the league!"

"I take back my previous statement! While the outcome is still likely to favor Spades, this match is suddenly a hell of a lot more interesting!"

The host let out a low chuckle. "I just hope our rookie tactician doesn't live to regret this moment of recklessness—assuming he does live through this match."

Spades, expression unreadable, tugged the exemption medal from his own neck.

He raised his arm—then, just as Bai Liu had, moved to the side.

[System Alert: Does player Spades choose to forfeit the use of the Exemption Medal for this match?]

Silence hung in the air.

Then the host roared: "Spades has accepted the challenge! He's forfeiting immunity too!"

"IT'S A BATTLE TO THE DEATH!"

Liao Ke's expression twisted in horror as he slapped the railing. "SPADES! WHAT THE HELL ARE YOU DOING?!"

Spades ignored him. His gaze remained fixed on Bai Liu, his eyes carrying a strange weight. "I'm going to beat you—on equal terms."

Bai Liu smiled. "The guy I liked before used to say the same thing."

"I played countless horror games with him—but I never won. Not once. He was so good at them, and I could never get past the fact that he always, always beat me."

"I wanted to beat him—just once."

"But I never got the chance. He got away before I could."

Spades' gaze sharpened. "Then I'll win against you the same way."

Bai Liu's eyes glimmered. The smile on his lips deepened.

"Well, let's see if you're really good enough for that."

He let go of the medal.

At the same time, Spades did too.

"Ding—!"

The two medals hit the ground in unison, bouncing once before spinning midair—then, with a shimmer, dissolved into gold dust and vanished.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu and Player Spades confirm they will not be using their Exemption Medals in this match.]

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has acquired the identity of the duplicate (Heir to the Evil God).]

[Player Bai Liu activates the main quest.]

[Main Quest: The successor of the Evil God must find two anchor bodies carrying the spirit and flesh of the old Evil God within seven days and sacrifice them at the boathouse on the day of the Evil God Festival to complete the ritual.]

Bai Liu slowly opened his eyes.

He stood on the shore of a dark, endless sea. The waves lapped against the harbor, breaking with an eerie, rhythmic sound. Suddenly, from behind him, a heavy drumbeat echoed in the darkness.

"Thud—!"

To his left, a lantern flickered to life, its round belly glowing with flat white characters against a red background. The candle inside swayed, casting unsteady light. Then, the drumming intensified, a deep, resonant thumping, accompanied by a low, masculine voice humming an unfamiliar, haunting melody.

The scene brightened. What had been obscured in darkness emerged in the warm orange glow of candlelight.

Bai Liu glanced around. Above him, thin cords stretched across the sky, interwoven into a vast network, suspending countless lanterns at regular intervals. Well-cut confetti decorations dangled from the lanterns, fluttering in the sea breeze. They swayed and clinked like delicate bells, their flickering shadows blurring the bustling scene.

Flanking him on either side stood dozens of drummers—young, strong men with muscular builds. Thick white cloth ropes looped around their broad necks, trailing forward over their shoulders and securing to gilt rings on the red-bodied taiko drums in front of their waists, each drum as large as a grindstone.

The drummers chanted in unison, their voices reverberating in an odd, rhythmic cadence. As the chant intensified, they raised their drumsticks high and brought them crashing down with force.

One by one, the lanterns ignited, illuminating the sea like daylight in the dead of night.

The streets beyond were alive with activity. Stalls lined the roads, selling small bells tied with red threads, amulets of various blessings, scented candles, candy apples, and masks depicting gods and spirits. The finest among them was a mask of an Evil God—its expression compassionate yet eerie, with white hair and piercing blue eyes.

Vendors bustled about, hawking new and festive trinkets. Visitors in elaborate ceremonial dress strolled through the streets, laughing and chatting excitedly.

"This year's Evil God Festival is livelier than ever."

"Of course! The Evil God Festival is the grandest event in town every year. Thanks to the Evil God's blessings, our wishes come true, and life here keeps improving."

"It's already been ten years since the Evil God-sama came to our town, hasn't it? That's when we built the shrine for Him."

"This year marks the tenth anniversary of the festival, so it’s especially grand. And the one leading the ritual… they say he’s the most likely successor to the Evil God..."

"Wasn't he originally just a sacrificial offering sold off in town? And now he gets to preside over the ceremony? Talk about a meteoric rise. I even heard he tried to run away once. Can you believe it? The gods bestowed such favor upon him, and instead of cherishing it, he wanted to escape. Honestly..."

"Enough about him. I’m more interested in which children will be chosen for the sea shrine offering this year. I want to see for myself. Maybe I’ll even get lucky and draw one of my own offerings! I have so many wishes I want the Evil God to grant."

"Greedy much? Didn’t you get your wish granted last year?"

"Last year was last year. This year is this year. And it’s not like I have to pay anything for my wishes to come true, hehehe."

Bai Liu stood alone on a wooden platform near the sea, a stage meant for divine rituals. He was dressed in a ceremonial black-and-white robe, intricate and layered, reminiscent of a wabi-sabi kimono but far more elaborate.

In his hand, he held a kagura bell adorned with round golden chimes. The wide, flowing sleeves of his robes billowed as the cold sea breeze passed through, tousling the loose strands of his dark hair. The bell in his hand swayed with the wind, producing a crisp, melancholic chime.

The wind was cold.
The water was colder.
The golden bell trembled.

Below the high platform, festival-goers bustled about, laughing, arguing, calling out to one another. In the distance, beyond the endless black sea, faint orange lights flickered on the horizon—perhaps a ship anchored offshore.

"Knock, knock, knock—!"

A sudden movement—Bai Liu turned just in time to see a hand swinging toward his face in a fierce slap.

He moved instinctively, dodging to the side—

[System Warning: Resisting action is against the player's (Heir of the Evil God) identity setting. Please do not resist!]

Bai Liu felt his body freeze in place, unable to move. The man's slap landed hard across the left side of his face, splitting the corner of his pale lips. Beads of blood welled up, rolling down and dripping onto the ground.

"Useless bastard!" the man scolded sharply. "How dare you stop in the middle of a divine rehearsal? That is a grave disrespect to the Lord of Evil!"

Bai Liu lowered his gaze, head slightly bowed. He didn't raise a hand to wipe the blood from his lips, nor did he speak.

His silence only infuriated the man further. He lifted a foot, ready to kick Bai Liu's waist, but at the last moment, his eyes flicked to the sacred ceremonial robes Bai Liu wore—priceless garments embroidered with intricate patterns. He barely held back his kick, instead jabbing a finger at Bai Liu's face.

“The first act of the Evil God Festival’s ritual performance is in seven days, and you still can’t remember the steps of the opening dance. If anything goes wrong in this decade’s Great Evil Festival, even if you are the one most likely to inherit the title of the Evil God’s Heir, we will sink you in chains and use you as the shrine’s anchor at the bottom of the sea!”

The man sneered. “I know you fear water the most. If you don’t want to suffer that fate, practice properly.”

With that, he turned sharply on his heel, flinging his sleeves as he strode away. His voice was cold as he ordered the two young attendants at Bai Liu’s side, who stood with their heads bowed in quiet fear.

“Take him down, change his clothes, and treat the wound on his face.”

Then, his gaze darkened. “Don’t let him sleep tonight. Make him practice the divine sacrifice dance a thousand times. I want to see him perform it flawlessly before he steps onto the stage tomorrow.”

One of the young attendants hesitated, then gathered his courage and spoke, his voice trembling. “But Lord Gosho… Bai Six hasn’t rested in three days. And after being punished yesterday, he hasn’t had a single sip of water since. If he doesn’t rest now…”

Lord Gosho turned his head, casting the boy a cold, sidelong glance.

The attendant flinched, shoulders stiffening. He immediately bowed his head. “Understood. I will supervise Bai Six’s training through the night and ensure he meets your expectations, my lord.”

Satisfied, Gosho snorted and strode off the platform without another glance at Bai Liu. The two attendants stepped forward to support him.

The one who had spoken earlier hesitated, cautiously looking around to ensure Gosho had disappeared into the town. Only then did he let out a breath of relief and turn back to Bai Liu with visible concern.

“Are you alright? Can you still stand?”

Bai Liu shook his head slightly. “I’m fine.”

It was only after Gosho left that he regained control of his body. A moment ago, when he tried to resist, he had been forcibly immobilized.

This dungeon had stricter role-playing requirements than his previous one in Yinshan Village. Even the slightest deviation from his assigned role wasn't tolerated. If he acted out of character, the system would immediately override his movements.

They were forcing him to follow the designated path of the Evil God's Heir. And with the festival as the central theme… Bai Liu could guess what was coming.

"How can you be fine?" The attendant, now unrestrained by fear, started fussing over him. His worried face betrayed his frustration. "Yesterday, you stepped off beat, and Lord Gosho made you dance all day without food or water. Today, you didn't even close your eyes before going back on stage. You've been rehearsing since this afternoon—of course you swayed a few times. I thought you were going to collapse right then and there."

Now that he mentioned it, Bai Liu did feel lightheaded. The lack of sugar and water left a deep, gnawing weakness in his body, and a faint dizziness clouded his mind. He closed his eyes, taking slow, deep breaths while using the attendant's hand for balance.

The young attendant panicked at the sight of Bai Liu closing his eyes and quickly pulled something from his sleeve. "Here! This is golden flat candy I bought at the festival earlier. I hid it in my sleeve and snuck it up here. Eat some—it'll help."

Bai Liu's eyelashes fluttered as he opened his eyes slightly. He accepted the candies and swallowed a few.

The sticky sweetness of the sugar scraped against his dry throat, making him cough a few times as he swallowed. The attendant's expression twisted with concern. "Later, we'll sneak back to the boathouse where there's no supervision. You can rest and eat something there."

"The boathouse?" Bai Liu's eyes darkened slightly. "Where is that?"

The attendant frowned, reaching out to touch Bai Liu's forehead. "Bai Six, do you have a fever? Are you confused?"

"You don't remember the boathouse?"

"That's where we—where the bought offerings—lived as children." The attendant sighed. "I suppose it makes sense that you've forgotten. You haven't been back there since Lord Gosho took you away five years ago. You've lived in the shrine ever since, being trained as the Evil God's Heir."

Bai Liu's tone remained flat as he lied, "I remember. But wouldn't the boathouse, where the sacrifices are kept, be heavily guarded this close to the ritual? Why would it be unsupervised?"

"It is usually under strict guard." The attendant exhaled, shaking his head. "Bai Six, you've been so caught up in rehearsals that you forgot —tomorrow is the first day of the seven-day-long Evil God Festival."

His voice grew colder. "There won't be any supervision at the boathouse tonight."

Bai Liu's expression didn't change, but his fingers curled slightly around the golden bells in his hand.

The attendant lifted his gaze, his face unreadable.

"Because tonight, the entire town will go to the boathouse and steal the offerings like crazy."

"This is the true beginning of the Evil God Festival—the Funakamiya Night Jubilee."

Chapter End Notes

> Bai Liu and Bai Six are pronounced the same way in Chinese, and the only difference between them is in the written form. The two names are distinguished solely by a single character change in the writing, which is why people refer to him as Bai Six instead of Bai Liu.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Bai Liu was led by the junior valet to a coastal townhouse.

The building was a single-story structure—low but sprawling. It had a wooden and thatched spire, with teru teru bozu dolls and wind chimes hanging from the eaves. Beneath it, wooden beams and stone blocks lifted the house slightly off the ground, leaving a hollow space below. When Bai Liu peered into the darkness, a damp chill seeped up from the void, carrying the eerie sensation that something might crawl out at any moment.

The stone supports were moss-covered, the wooden frame blackened and rotting. As Bai Liu stepped forward, the floor creaked and trembled beneath his feet, making it clear just how old the structure was.

Inside, a row of rooms stretched along the corridor, resembling the hot spring lodges Bai Liu had seen in reality. Each room was divided by sliding doors made of pine wood and paper screens. In the upper right corner of every room, a wooden plaque hung—polished black with lacquer—bearing inscriptions that labeled the room's purpose, such as [So-and-so's Room], [Kitchen], or [Living Room].

As Bai Liu walked down the corridor, he could clearly hear the sounds coming from within—wailing cries of despair mixed with disjointed laughter. The paper doors cast faint silhouettes: figures slumped in disorderly heaps, half-dressed; some knelt, rhythmically banging their heads against the floor; others laughed as they unbuckled their belts, fastening them into loops and slipping them around their necks while whispering desperate prayers.

"It would be good to die… Let the evil god choose me as a sacrifice… I want to die this year…"

Soon, three or four figures entered the room, pulling the suicidal ones back. Their wailing and laughter twisted into a cacophony of sobs and choked screams.

"Haven't I suffered enough? Why won't the Lord of Evil choose me?!"

Bai Liu had stopped in his tracks, gazing sideways into the adjacent room. Noticing this, the valet leading him turned back. His expression tensed, his smile becoming forced.

"Oh, right. Bai Six, you don't know yet…" The valet hesitated before explaining, "There are three or four people assigned to restrain each sacrifice now. Back when you were here, there was only one. But more and more sacrifices broke down, so the town assigned more overseers to prevent escapes and suicides."

He glanced around before lowering his voice. "The sacrificial children who live here… they pity you." His tone was strange as he added, "You were chosen to be the heir of an evil god—never to be a sacrifice again."

With that, he lowered his head and continued walking. "Come with me. There's not much time for you to rest. Don't look at them."

After weaving through a long, winding corridor, the valet finally stopped at an old room. A wooden plaque outside read [Beiyuan Cang Tai]. Standing on tiptoe, he removed the sign and replaced it with a new one.

Bai Liu watched as the discarded plaque was flipped over, revealing its new inscription: [Imperial Boat Bai Six].

"This was the nameplate you used when you were housed in the boathouse for the offering," Beiyuan Cang Tai murmured as he slid open the door. A wave of damp air rushed out, thick and cloying. "I kept it. Now, I'm using it again for you."

The room was cramped and damp. In the center of the floor lay a narrow tatami mat, covered by an old, single-person bedding set. A wooden tray sat half a meter from the bed, bearing unwashed oil stains—likely remnants of past meals. Directly opposite the tatami was a short mahogany desk, about 40 or 50 centimeters high.

A large ukiyo-e-style painting hung on the wall beside the desk. The vibrant illustration depicted waves crashing against a shrine-like vessel, its mast partially obscured by a wind-tattered flag. Bai Liu recognized the symbol immediately—it was an inverted cross.

Beiyuan Cang Tai continued rambling as he stepped inside. "If you want to claim a room to rest in, you have to hang a wooden sign with your name outside. Otherwise, the overseers here at the boathouse will mistake you for a sacrifice later. And if it's your turn to be sent to the Bitter Chamber for training, well… let's just say you wouldn't want to be mistaken for one of them…"

Mid-sentence, he abruptly stopped. His words died in his throat, his gaze frozen on the interior of the paper door he had just pushed open. His face drained of color, turning deathly pale.

Bai Liu followed his line of sight and saw a piece of paper affixed to the door.

[As the sacrificial victim Beiyuan Xiaokui has completed the required level of Bitter Chamber Cultivation, today, the Beiyuan family transfers the training to the sacrificial victim Beiyuan Cang Tai.]

"Xiaokui… passed the standard?" Beiyuan Cang Tai reached out, peeling the notice from the door with trembling fingers. His entire body quivered, even his voice shaking. "I only trained yesterday… for half a day… and now they're sending me again today…?"

Bai Liu, kneeling on the tatami, gazed up at him calmly. "The Bitter Chamber Cultivation…" he asked. "What is it?"

"Oh, Bai Six, back when you made the sacrifice, you had never undergone training in the Bitter Chamber."

Beiyuan Cang Tai knelt naturally behind Bai Liu, his posture straight. He raised a hand and gently hooked his fingers through the dark ties fastened around Bai Liu's ears, his tone as light as his touch. "After you were captured and brought back from your escape, this side of the boathouse was reorganized—everything was restructured into the formal practice of the Bitter Chamber."

The dark cloth ties fluttered to the floor, and Bai Liu's long hair cascaded down to his waist.

It was only then that he realized—his hair wasn't the shoulder-length cut of the outside world. Instead, it had been gathered and tied up to make it appear shorter.

"It's been five years since you left the boathouse and became the heir of the Evil God. As His heir, you are responsible for divine rituals—your body and hair belong to the gods, so you are forbidden from cutting it."

Beiyuan murmured in a daze, running his fingers through Bai Liu's hair. "It's grown so long… even longer than Xiaokui's."

Bai Liu turned his head slightly, glancing at Beiyuan, who was kneeling behind him. "Beiyuan Xiaokui—she isn't actually your sister or elder, is she? You just share the same surname."

"No." Beiyuan shook his head with a gentle smile. He reached under the pillow, took out a wooden comb, and knelt back down behind Bai Liu, carefully brushing through the strands. "You've been away from the boathouse for too long—you've forgotten how we get our surnames."

"Don't move," Beiyuan murmured as he gently held Bai Liu in place, continuing to comb his hair with careful strokes. "If you do, you'll be punished again when the Lord of the Imperial Ship sees you."

"I haven't forgotten," Bai Liu replied lightly, his gaze fixed straight ahead. "Our surnames—the surnames of the people who chose us."

"My surname was Gifune. I was originally meant to be a sacrifice for someone from the Gifune family. Since you and Xiaokui both have the surname Beiyuan, it means you were both sacrifices chosen by the same Beiyuan family. All the children with the same surname were given to the same clan."

Beiyuan's hand stilled in the middle of combing. He paused for a long moment before continuing, his voice dropping to a near whisper.

"But you… you haven't been Gifune Bai Six for a long time. You were never successfully sacrificed. You became the heir to the Evil God, no longer a mere offering. They took the surname Gifune away from you."

His gaze lowered, the wooden comb following the downward motion of his eyes as it brushed against the floor. His voice was quiet but certain.

"You are the one chosen by the Evil Lord. You should bear no name but His. The surname Gifune is not worthy of you."

Beiyuan picked up a silk ribbon and hooked a strand of Bai Liu's hair from each temple with his little finger. He let the strands fall loosely over Bai Liu's ears, then tied them at the ends, finally securing both pieces together at the center of Bai Liu's head. The ribbon draped down over Bai Liu's ceremonial robe.

Bai Liu's gaze flicked upward, turning slightly to look at Beiyuan. The strands of hair caught in the ties slipped down, curling softly over his shoulders.

His eyelashes were long, his pupils dark. As he lifted his eyes, the golden paint dusted over the waves in the ukiyo-e painting behind Beiyuan caught the dim light, shimmering like the scales of a fish beneath the sea.

Softly, Bai Liu asked, "Is it done?"

Beiyuan stared at Bai Liu in quiet awe before suddenly smiling. "You're beautiful, Bai Six. No wonder God chose you from among us."

He pressed his forehead against Bai Liu's shoulder, careful not to let his tears stain the ceremonial robes. His arms wrapped around Bai Liu in a restrained but firm embrace, his voice shaking as he choked back a sob.

"…God is cruel."

"Why must the most beautiful child among us be made to suffer the most? Why must you be denied even the right to be a sacrifice?"

"For us, there is only one Bitter Chamber in this world."

"But for you, Bai Six, there is no escape. The whole world is your Bitter Chamber."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Bei Yuan rested his head against Bai Liu's shoulder, suppressing his sobs as he took two deep breaths. "...I won't keep you any longer. You need to rest—you still have to go to the Luming Shrine in the mountains to practice."

When he finished speaking, Bei Yuan took two steps back on his knees, bowed his head, pressed his hands together before his forehead, and slowly prostrated himself. His voice trembled slightly.

"Bai Six, if you truly are the Lord Heir of Evil… if your dance can really reach the Lord of Evil, then I beg you—please, ask Him to choose Xiaokui as the sacrifice this time."

"I can hold on for another two years, but Xiaokui… she's really running out of time."

Bei Yuan's voice choked up, but he quickly raised a hand to wipe away the tears gathering at the corners of his eyes. Without another word, he bowed once more to Bai Six, lifted the hem of his robe, and stepped toward the door. He reached up and peeled off the [Notice of Practice in the Suffering Room] posted on the inside, then shut the door behind him. His departing figure was bleak, his back turned to the peace room as he walked away.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze from the door Bei Yuan had closed, slowly shifting his attention to the painting of waves directly in front of him.

In horror games—especially Japanese ones—decorations inside narrow rooms often contained hidden clues, particularly in the innermost chambers where the inner walls didn't directly connect to the outer rooms.

Rising to his feet, Bai Liu reached out and touched the shrine-like vessel being tossed by the waves in the painting. His fingertips moved inch by inch over the ship's intricate details, studying its design with careful scrutiny, until they came to rest on a half-obscured, inverted cross emblazoned on its flag.

His fingers paused for a moment before he took down the painting, tracing the faint indentations left on the wall beneath it.

Expression unreadable, Bai Liu curled his fingers and pressed down firmly against the wall.

A concealed mechanism clicked—the wall where the painting had been mounted suddenly flipped, revealing a recessed, frame-sized shrine built into the surface.

At the center of the shrine stood an exquisitely carved statue of the Red God Mu.

The statue was aged—the mahogany wood at its knees and shoulders had been worn smooth and darkened by countless reverent touches. It wore a hunting suit similar to Bai Liu's, though more elaborate in its detailing.

The hem of its long, flowing robe draped down to its slender, crossed ankles, which were carved with faded golden chains, as if bound above the rippling sea beneath its feet.

The statue sat in a languid posture, its head tilted slightly beneath the raised eaves of the temple. In its hands, it held an open book, appearing deep in study. A coiled rope of rough twine encircled the top of its face, and a piece of soft, fluttering Gosho paper was threaded through the bindings, obscuring its features.

On the paper, two words were written in elegant brush strokes:

[Wishless]

An incense burner rested inside the shrine, its embers smoldering. With the faint breeze stirring in the room, the Gosho paper shifted slightly, as did the rising smoke curling from the burner. A clear, pleasant sandalwood scent filled the space.

Bai Liu's gaze lingered on the wooden book cradled in the idol's hands. His eyes narrowed slightly.

The pages of the book were cracked, bearing jagged, uneven grain—like they had once been roughly torn apart by hand, then pieced back together.

Bai Liu knew a book with this exact texture.

The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder.

He had placed it in Xie Ta's arms when he sank into the pond. It should have drifted away with him…

Yet now, it appeared in the hands of this idol. And given the theme of this copy…

This idol was likely Xie Ta. One of the old Evil God offerings within the game.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu reached out and lifted the Gosho paper covering the statue's face.

The instant the paper was pulled away, a deafening crash erupted from the waves in the painting he had set on the floor. A violent sea wind roared from within, billowing Bai Liu's kimono up over his eyes.

A raging storm and surging waves spilled out of the painting, swallowing Bai Liu whole.

By the time the storm settled, the painting had been restored to its place on the wall. The room looked exactly as it had before—except for one detail.

The great ship that had once been depicted on the rolling waves?

It was gone.

The room stood silent, untouched. Only the wooden plaque hanging beside the door of the peace room and the lingering scent of sandalwood remained.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has triggered the main storyline of (Old Evil Gods - Spirit Offerings) Collection Branch]

Bai Liu's eyes slowly opened, his consciousness swimming in a wave of dizziness so intense it nearly unsettled him to his core.

The dimly lit cabin before him was shrouded in darkness, the outlines of bunk beds barely visible. The air was thick with the sound of retching—people vomiting from seasickness—interspersed with the hysterical sobs of children breaking down.

"I want to go back!!!"

"I want to stay at the orphanage! I don't want to be here!!!"

"The people who bought us are crazy! They're going to abuse us! Let us off this boat!!!"

Bai Liu lowered his gaze to his hands—thinner, smaller than before. His body, too, felt shorter, compact enough to stretch his legs fully in the narrow confines of the bed.

A rough estimate, based on his current height, placed him at about sixteen or seventeen years old.

He shifted slightly, only to realize his hands and feet were tightly bound, secured to the bed frame. The boat rocked violently with the waves, his body rising and falling in rhythm with the sea, yet he remained completely immobilized.

A flash of lightning split the night sky. For a brief moment, the illumination seeped into the cabin, revealing the full extent of his surroundings.

Three rows of narrow bunks filled the space, densely packed with pale-faced children. Their ages ranged from barely a few years old to around seventeen or eighteen. Every single one of them was bound, wrists tied to the bed frame, just like him. Some curled up into themselves, whimpering. Others sat still, numb and motionless. Many were doubled over, overcome by nausea, retching from seasickness.

Behind Bai Liu, someone dry-heaved, their frail body shuddering from the exertion. Nothing came up—evidence that they hadn't eaten in a long time. Their labored gasps and exhausted coughing made it clear: they were growing weaker by the second.

Bai Liu's voice was calm, almost indifferent. "If you're seasick, you'd best give up on trying to escape."

His words seemed to catch the other person off guard.

"There's nowhere to run. No matter where you go, you'll still have to cross the sea. If you can't even handle the boat, you won't make it far."

The struggling behind him stopped. After a long pause, a hoarse voice finally spoke.

"My name is Cang Tai. What's yours?"

"Bai Liu."

Cang Tai hesitated, then asked in mild surprise, "Are you that Bai Six?"

Bai Liu's fingers twitched slightly. "You know me?"

"I wouldn't say I know you," Cang Tai admitted, voice uncertain. "But you're the most talked-about kid here. Everyone knows about you."

"Oh?" Bai Liu's tone was light, almost amused. "And what about me is so interesting that it warrants discussion?"

Cang Tai hesitated before lowering his voice. "They say… you killed a child named Xie Ta at the orphanage. Pushed him into a pond. Is that true?"

For a moment, Bai Liu was silent. When he finally spoke, his voice was detached, almost emotionless.

"As one of the main characters of this story, may I have the privilege of knowing how the tale is told?"

"So you didn't kill anyone? They're just making things up?" Cang Tai asked cautiously. He shifted, moving slightly closer, lowering his voice even further. "The version I heard goes like this: They say you were always a strange kid. That back at the orphanage, you liked playing with eerie things. That you—"

Cang Tai swallowed. "—killed small animals. A lot of them."

Bai Liu's expression remained unreadable. "For example?"

Cang Tai exhaled shakily. "Kittens, rabbits, hamsters. They said you'd skin them and tuck their pelts between the pages of fairy tale books."

"Always on the happiest page," he continued, voice wavering. "So when the kids turned the page, excited to see the ending, they'd find bloody animal skins falling into their laps instead. They'd scream in terror, and you—"

Cang Tai hesitated before finishing, "—you'd stand there. Head tilted. Laughing."

Something stirred in Bai Liu's memory. A long-buried fragment surfaced—strange yet familiar.

A long time ago, while cleaning the orphanage's library, he and Xie Ta had discussed pulling a prank like that. He remembered the mischievous spark in his own eyes, the idle amusement in his voice.

But Xie Ta had shut him down immediately.

Bai Liu could still recall those silver-blue pupils looking straight at him, calm and unwavering.

"You wouldn’t do that," Xie Ta had said.

"Why not?" Bai Liu had asked, tilting his head.

Xie Ta had been quiet for a moment before answering softly, "Because I’ve seen the Bai Six who would."

"That’s not you."

Bai Liu had smirked. "Is there another Bai Six in this world besides me?"

Bai Liu approached Xie Ta with amusement, "You don't seem to like this Bai six much."

Xie Ta lowered his gaze. "It’s not a matter of like or dislike."

"He and I were born as opposites. He chases desire—consumes it. He would draw power, wealth, and madness from anything he could sink his teeth into."

Bai Liu had hummed thoughtfully. "Sounds like me."

Xie Ta had met his gaze then, his expression unreadable. "No. You’re different."

"He would…" Xie Ta had hesitated, then spoken carefully, "…own me."

"You wouldn’t."

At that moment, something outside had interrupted them—a ball slamming against the window, the loud crack drowning out the rest of Xie Ta’s words.

When Bai Liu had tried to ask again, Xie Ta had only turned away, offering no answer.

Cang Tai’s voice pulled him back to the present.

"Then, after that, things got worse," Cang Tai murmured. "You became obsessed with Xie Ta. Followed him everywhere. But he never acknowledged you. It was like… you didn’t exist to him."

"One night, you went looking for him at the church. He was always there, reading by himself. That night was no different. He had this weird book with him…"

Cang Tai trailed off, struggling to remember.

Bai Liu's lips curled faintly. "A Documentary on the Murder of a Long, Thin, Ghostly Shadow."

"Yes, yes, yes! That's the name!" Cang Tai exclaimed excitedly, his words flowing smoothly. "They say you killed Xie Ta that very night and returned with a blood-stained copy of The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder, then sat alone by your bed, humming a little tune, as if you had been reading the book with pleasure all night—terrifying the boy who lived next to you."

"Then that boy, despite his fear, mustered up the courage to ask if you had really killed Xie Ta."

Cang Tai swallowed nervously before continuing. "You looked up at him, your face covered in blood, and smiled. Then, as if it were the most natural thing in the world, you said—'Yes. I killed him.'"

"The boy broke down, crying, and asked, 'Why? Why did you kill Xie Ta? He never did anything to hurt you!'"

Cang Tai's voice trembled as he spoke. "And then you said—"

His breath hitched.

"You said..."

'I wanted to read The Long, Thin, Ghostly Book of Murder too. I stood behind Xie Ta and waited for a long time, hoping he would turn around and invite me to read with him.'"

"'But he never did. It was as if I didn't exist to him—as if he couldn't even see me standing there, waiting.'"

Cang Tai's voice dropped to a whisper.

"And then you laughed. Almost regretfully. You spread your hands and said—"

"'So I had no choice but to kill him... and invite his corpse to read with me instead.'"

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Waves rose and fell, whispers trembled.

Cang Tai's voice grew thinner, as if he feared the Bai Six in this story. He dared not speak too loudly behind him. "...They said the teachers at the orphanage threw a huge tantrum when they couldn't find Xie Ta, but no one dared to accuse you of killing him. They were afraid you'd kill them too."

"And... as much as they're scared of you, they're also terrified of Xie Ta. They believe that after the two of you—like monsters—clashed, only the stronger one remained. So now, they're even more afraid to cross you."

"A while after Xie Ta's death, something happened at the orphanage where you lived. The investors withdrew almost entirely, refusing to continue funding it. The orphanage declined, and one by one, the children disappeared—no one knows if they ran away or..."

"Eventually, the orphanage shut down. Those of you who hadn't caused trouble were sent to this ship under the guise of charity. The director claimed an overseas orphanage would take you in."

"'Sent?'" Bai Liu echoed, his voice calm. "You mean trafficked."

Cang Tai sighed. "Sending sounds better, but in the end, it's the same. You're not being taken to an orphanage. Like me, you were trafficked —to a small seaside town called Luming County."

"This isn't your country anymore. It's always been poor. There's no such thing as an orphanage. You were probably bought to do hard labor."

"We weren't bought for hard labor."

A girl's voice—soft, trembling—came from the lower bunk.

Cang Tai was startled. He struggled forward, peering down. "Who are you...?"

"My name is Xiaokui."

A slim girl, about eleven or twelve, raised her pale face from the bunk. She looked clean, but there was a dazed, disoriented fear in her eyes.

"I'm from Luming County."

Cang Tai frowned. "Then how did you end up on this boat with us?"

"I escaped from Luming County... from being a sacrifice. But they took me back." Xiaokui's face was ashen. Desperation seeped into her voice. "This time, I won't get another chance. The torture is driving me insane."

Bai Liu asked, "Is Luming County poor?"

—It didn't match what he had seen before.

Even the abandoned boathouses along the coast had been well-maintained. It didn't look like a town so destitute it needed to sell people for labor.

Xiaokui shook her head, whispering in a daze, "Luming County was poor before. But not anymore."

"Ever since the shrine there began worshiping the evil gods three years ago, the town has been growing richer—wealthier by the day. When I escaped, they were even dressing the sacrifices in silk."

Cang Tai was stunned. "Silk clothes? They're treating the laborers they bought that well?"

"I told you—it's not labor." Xiaokui's voice weakened. "It's sacrifice."

Bai Liu pondered. "What happened three years ago? Why did Luming County suddenly start worshiping evil gods?"

"I don't know the details." Xiaokui struggled to sit up, looking at Bai Liu in the upper bunk. "But my mother told me it all started when the fishermen salvaged a young man's body from the sea."

"The corpse was... unnaturally beautiful. He had silver curls draped over his forehead, long, graceful limbs, and wore loose, flowing robes. He didn't breathe, but he didn't seem dead—more like a siren."

"My mother saw him too. She said she had never seen such a breathtaking man."

"And then?" Bai Liu asked. "Did they bury him?"

Xiaokui shook her head, her expression clouded. "No. All the adults opposed burying him. I didn't understand why they insisted on keeping the body, but my father said someone with that kind of appearance..."

Bai Liu's tone remained flat. "Even if it's just a corpse, they thought they could squeeze value out of it."

Xiaokui hesitated, then continued. "The governor saw it as a business opportunity. He proposed restoring the county's abandoned hotel and turning it into a museum—where they would display a wax figure or sculpture of the body. He suggested branding it as 'the captured siren' to attract tourists, boosting the town's economy."

"As soon as the proposal was made, everyone agreed enthusiastically. They even wanted to erect a statue of the governor in front of the museum to honor him for coming up with the idea."

...A poor, remote fishing town, struggling for generations, suddenly stumbles upon a beautiful 'siren.' The local officials seize the opportunity, planning to use his image to develop tourism, build a museum, and revitalize the economy.

The entire process—down to the mayor and governor's statues in front of the museum—was almost identical to Siren Town.

But for some reason, Luming County didn't follow through with that path.

Or rather, the original version of Siren Town might have been this—the 'Evil Ritual - Boathouse.'

The first copy Bai Liu was supposed to encounter in this worldline was The Evil God Ritual – The Boathouse. But at the last moment, for some reason, he altered his landing point, allowing the simpler and more distant Siren Town to take its place in his timeline.

It was only now, deep into the playoffs, that Bai Six was finally able to place The Evil Sacrifice – Boathouse onto him.

Bai Liu glanced sideways at Xiaokui, who lay in the bunk below. "You didn't actually go through with it, did you?"

Xiaokui tilted her head slightly, surprised. "How do you know?" She hesitated, then continued, "Everything was set to start at the museum in the prefecture. But the night before, something happened—something changed on the fly. By morning, everyone had made up their minds. They abandoned the museum and decided to restore the shrine instead."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "Did many of you dream?"

Xiaokui froze, utterly stunned. She strained to see his face, her voice growing agitated. "How do you know that?! Are you a sacrifice from Luming County too?"

Bai Liu's tone remained flat. "I'm not. But I've heard a few things about your county."

If an entire collective could be swayed overnight, then Bai Six must have been involved. And since the rules of the game prevent him from directly interfering with reality, there was only one explanation—

—Bai Six entered their dreams. He compelled them. He made Luming County follow the path he wanted the game to take.

Xiaokui's voice dropped to a whisper. "……That makes sense. It's well-known. Outsiders must've heard about it—the Luming County 'Gods in Dreams' phenomenon."

"Gods in dreams?" Bai Liu echoed. "What is that?"

Xiaokui hesitated. "The day before the museum's groundbreaking, many people gathered to observe the siren's corpse, which was meant to be displayed there. That night, every single person who had seen the siren during the day had the same dream."

"They dreamed of a divine being—dressed in white hunting robes, its face obscured—sitting high above the shores of Luming County. It looked down on them with a smile and spoke:

'I sense your evil desire for wealth. As a reward for capturing the Evil God, I will take a journey with you and grant you two choices.'

'The first option: I do not interfere. You follow your own path. Your town becomes a modest tourist attraction. Some of you leave this remote place and build new lives, while the rest remain—fishermen laboring at sea, entertaining fewer and fewer visitors, until this county withers and fades away.'

'At the same time, you will suffer the influence of the old Evil God's remains—the siren's corpse you have captured—and slowly become something… inhuman.'

‘The second option: I grant you the right to become my followers.’

‘You will restore my shrine in Luming County. Each year, you will make offerings to me. From among them, I will choose my favorite, and in return, I will grant a wish—equal in price to the sacrifice you offer.’”

Xiaokui’s voice turned hoarse. “Everyone chose the second option.”

“They knelt in their dreams. Lord Evil One, they asked, what is the sacrifice?”

“The Evil God laughed.

‘The sacrifice I desire is human suffering,’ it said. ‘The purer and more extreme the pain, the more valuable it is to me. And the greater the suffering, the greater the wish I will grant.’

“So they bowed again, looked up once more, and asked, Lord Evil One, what are you? How shall we offer ourselves to you?”

“The Evil God smiled.

‘My incarnation walks among you—the siren’s corpse you have captured.’

‘He is the embodiment of evil, the bearer of desire. At the sight of him, your flesh will overflow with greed, your humanity will decay, and your souls will be squeezed from your bodies—turned into notes I can collect with ease.’

‘You will enshrine his body in a shrine of the highest order. You will kneel before him, day and night, torturing sacrifices and offering them to him—so that he may taste every kind of pain this world has to offer.’

‘If he wakes from death to accept the agony you offer, I will come to grant your wish.’

‘If he does not, then your suffering is not yet enough to rouse him.’

“The Evil God laughed in delight. ‘Then,’ it said, ‘you must intensify the pain of your sacrifices—until this old, slumbering god finally opens his eyes, gazes upon this mortal world once more, and steps down from his high throne to receive the suffering you have prepared for him.’”

Xiaokui continued in a daze.

"Since then, the prefecture has held a grand annual festival for the evil gods. And because the gods of dreams demand pure suffering, the prefect and the village men deliberated for three days and nights before unanimously deciding that only a child's suffering was pure enough. So, the sacrifices had to be children."

"In the beginning, Luming County wasn't as wealthy. The sacrifices weren't purchased from outside but were chosen from among the village children—just like me."

Cang Tai, taken aback, asked, "You had parents. Didn't they stop you from being chosen as a sacrifice?"

Xiaokui's voice caught in her throat. "It was my parents who offered me and my brother up as sacrifices," she said, trembling. "The prefecture's rule was that if a family's child was chosen, that family was granted a wish."

"My father sacrificed me and one of my brothers, hoping that at least one of us would be chosen. That way, our family could make a wish—to never have to struggle for food again, to never be forced to go out fishing every day just to survive."

"At that time, nearly every poor family offered up their children. The wealthier ones, unwilling to sacrifice their own, bought children from the poor, trained them well, and used them as their own offerings."

"Since no one knew who the gods would choose, some families sold a 'spare' child, just in case."

Xiaokui's voice wavered. "I was sold by my father to the Bei Yuan family," she whispered. "My name is now Beiyuan Xiaokui."

Cang Tai sighed sympathetically. "A sacrifice to the evil gods? I wonder which is worse—this or hard labor."

Xiaokui turned her head slowly, wet strands of hair clinging to her gaunt, miserable face. Her gaze locked onto Bai Liu, who was leaning against the side of the bed.

"You have no idea what it means to be a sacrifice to an evil god."

"You will be whipped. Tortured. Left in agony—begging for life and death alike."

Cang Tai frowned, still puzzled. "But isn't hard labor the same? The moment you arrive, you're beaten and forced to work."

Xiaokui let out a short, nervous laugh. "Being a sacrifice doesn't start that way."

"At first, they give you a warm houseboat. A cute little dog or cat. Servants who treat you exceptionally well. Delicious meals. Parents who visit you every day."

"For a moment, you almost forget—you can't tell if you've been chosen as a sacrifice or a princess."

Cang Tai hesitated. "That... doesn't sound so bad?"

Xiaokui opened her mouth to respond, but before she could speak, the door to the boathouse was thrown open with a loud bang. She flinched, shoulders tensing.

The wind and rain carried in a deep, mellow voice, belonging to a middle-aged man.

"It's pouring. The perfect time for the newly chosen pups to feel unstable and insecure. Let's give them their animals first, so they can hold them through the storm—let them bond and develop feelings."

Another man, his voice thinner, echoed, "Yes, Lord Gosho."

A dim oil lamp flickered as seven or eight men entered, carrying a long, wide cage draped in black cloth. From within came the trembling cries of young animals.

"Mee-mee-mee-ooo!"

"Ow-ow-ow... woof!"

A man placed a gas lamp by Bai Liu's bedside, then reached out with a calloused, fish-scented hand and gave him a firm pat.

Bai Liu opened his eyes as if just waking, his gaze falling on the cage.

Inside, bathed in the dim glow, sat a strikingly beautiful white cat with silvery-blue eyes.

The kitten—no more than a few months old—was soft and fluffy, a golden bell jingling around its neck. Its pupils widened in the gray light as it sat upright, delicately lifting one paw to groom its slightly muddy fur, as if dissatisfied with its untidiness.

When Bai Liu looked at it, the cat tilted its head, its small pink nose pressing against the bars. It rubbed affectionately against Bai Liu's bound hand and let out a sweet, whiny mewl.

The man carrying the cage chuckled. "This one's been well-trained. Clings to people the moment it sees them."

He smirked. "I'll let it out now. If you can't hold it steady in this storm, well... such a cute little thing could tumble right off the bed and have its guts spilled open."

As soon as the cage door opened, the kitten wasted no time. It burrowed into Bai Liu's arms, kneading itself into the warmth of his chest until it found a perfect spot.

Purring in satisfaction, the kitten nuzzled against Bai Liu's chin, tail curling around his wrist, utterly content in his embrace.

The man, seeing this, nodded. "Good. They always take to their owners fast." He turned to leave but paused at the door, as if remembering something.

"Oh, right. Every animal has the same name as its owner."

"This cat—he's called Bai Six."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze.

The kitten nestled comfortably against his chest, eyes fluttering shut. But sensing Bai Liu watching, it let out a soft mewl and leaned forward, pressing its tiny head against Bai Liu's bound wrists.

It stretched out a paw, resting it against Bai Liu's palm, purring as it gently licked the tip of his nose.

A sudden, sharp cry shattered the moment.

"Don’t give me—!!!"

A woman's shrill voice rang out from the bunk beside Bai Liu.

"I don’t want this dog!!!"

The kitten’s eyes widened at the sound, and she and Bai Liu looked down together.

On the bed, Xiaokui thrashed desperately, her face blotchy with tears and snot, her voice sharp and hysterical, broken by ragged sobs. "I don’t want this dog!!!"

Beside her, a small, round-eyed Shiba Inu stood hesitantly. It was orange-colored, barely reaching a man's calf, with perked ears and an alert gaze. Though startled by Xiaokui’s outburst, the dog lingered by her leg, pausing before timidly licking her tears.

Xiaokui let out a cry of sheer devastation, flailing her hands mindlessly. "Get away! Don’t lick me! Don’t come near me!"

"I don’t want any more pain! I don’t want a dog!"

Her wild movements struck the little Shiba Inu, sending it stumbling back with a frightened yelp. It tried to seek refuge behind a man’s legs —only to be kicked away with chilling indifference. The force of the blow sent the puppy crashing into the bedpost with a sickening thud, as if a tiny boat had been flung into a raging wave.

A sharp, brittle crack echoed through the room.

The puppy let out a short, pitiful whimper—then fell silent. Its small body curled in on itself where it landed, head and tail nearly touching, eyes wide open yet utterly still.

Xiaokui, who had been sobbing into her hands, suddenly froze. Her pupils dilated as she turned, staring at the motionless Shiba Inu. The lingering warmth of its tongue against her cheek sent a shudder through her.

Tears slipped from her vacant eyes as she reached out, hand trembling toward the lifeless body. Her voice was barely a whisper. "...Xiaokui."

The man watching her broke into a pleased chuckle, his previously impatient expression giving way to something almost delighted. He clapped his hands.

"Crying!"

His grin widened. "Didn't expect that. Crying over an offering already? That's a good start." He turned to the figure beside him, waving a hand. "Bring in more. A few cats, another Shiba Inu."

Soon, more animals were brought in.

The man crouched beside Xiaokui, his voice unnervingly gentle. "Xiaokui doesn't like dogs, does she? What about cats?"

Xiaokui's breath hitched. Her tears wouldn't stop, her voice hoarse and brittle. "No..." Her head shook weakly. "...I don't want a dog. I don't want a cat."

Her shoulders trembled. "I don't want to see another Xiaokui die just for being my friend."

The man exhaled in mock disappointment, then reached into a cage, plucking out a kitten by the scruff. He dangled it in front of Xiaokui. "Really? Pushing them away so coldly?"

He smiled. "You used to love animals the most out of all the sacrifices."

The kitten, oblivious to the tension, let out a soft mewl. It hesitated, then arched its back, nuzzling against Xiaokui before curling up against her shoulder.

Xiaokui's fingers curled into fists. She forced her gaze away, her voice cold and detached. "Even if you kill them in front of me, I won't feel anything anymore."

The man sighed, shaking his head as if disappointed. He leaned in, his breath ghosting against Xiaokui's ear.

"Xiaokui should know by now, shouldn't she?" His voice dipped into something almost tender. "Animals that can't make you suffer… have no value on this ship."

Without hesitation, he tightened his grip around the kitten's tiny neck.

The soft mewls of playfulness turned to strangled cries. The kitten writhed, paws scrabbling weakly against his hand, trying to leap free —but it was helpless, its body so small it could fit entirely within his palm.

Xiaokui clenched her jaw, refusing to look.

The kitten's desperate gasps grew fainter. Its black-and-white eyes bulged, blood vessels bursting red. Its paws, which had clawed and kicked so frantically, slowly fell limp.

Then, as the final, choked sound left its throat—

Xiaokui broke.

She spun toward him in a frenzy, hands reaching. "Give it to me!"

The man let go, letting the near-lifeless kitten drop into Xiaokui's arms. It let out a muffled whimper, curling against her as though seeking comfort, as though it had been wronged.

Xiaokui clutched it tightly, her tears soaking into its fur. "I want this kitten. I want this Xiaokui. Please—please let me keep it!"

Her voice cracked. "I promise—I'll feel pain for it. I'll suffer. Just let me have it!"

The man studied her for a moment—then suddenly laughed.

"Ah… I see. Xiaokui was never chosen by the evil gods before, was she?" He mused, eyes gleaming. "Guess it wasn't painful enough."

Casually, he reached down, prying the kitten from Xiaokui's trembling hands.

She stared in blank horror as he cradled it gently, almost affectionately, stroking its fur twice, then placed his fingers back around its fragile neck.

He whispered.

"Then… let's make it hurt more, Xiaokui."

The kitten let out a strangled cry, but this time, the man did not stop.

Xiaokui didn't scream. She didn't move. She sat, numb, as he clapped his hands and carelessly discarded the tiny, lifeless body beside her.

Then, without looking back, he turned to leave. "Bring her another Shiba Inu," he ordered flatly. "If she won't take it, crush it and bring in another cat."

His voice was light, almost amused.

"Keep going—until she stops crying."

> Every word, every action, reeks of cruelty—a calculated, deliberate violence meant to break something sacred.
> How dare they? How dare they make something so small, so helpless, suffer for their own twisted satisfaction? How dare they strip Xiaokui’s grief bare, turn it into a game, force her to watch the things she loves die, again and again, until love itself becomes a source of terror?

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After the imperial ship departed, silence settled over the cabin, broken only by the occasional sob of a frightened child and the clueless barks and meows of small dogs and cats.

Cang Tai, clutching the small black kitten he had been given, stood behind Bai Liu in silence for a long time. When he finally spoke, his voice trembled, as if the words were difficult to force out.

"Bai Liu… can you see Xiaokui? How is she?"

Under the faint light, Bai Liu glanced down at Xiaokui. She lay on the bed, her head buried in her arms, fingers pulling absently at the bandages on her wrists. With her other hand, she stroked the kitten resting beside her, her voice hoarse and barely audible.

"Good kitten… so good."

Cang Tai froze.

"...Xiaokui is so good."

He fell silent for a long moment, his gaze dropping to the black kitten in his arms. His hands trembled, fingers clenching and unclenching around the small body.

The kitten, sensing the shift, lifted its head in confusion. It mewed softly, uncertain, gazing up at the boy who was suddenly reluctant to hold it close.

Cang Tai turned his head away, his breath coming heavy and uneven.

So that's why they give the offerings pets.

It is the dream of nearly every child to have a small animal of their own—one that shares their name, one that clings to them with unconditional affection.

But it can't be that. That would be too... cruel.

The realization filled Cang Tai with a terror far worse than hard labor ever had.

And then the inevitable happened. As Cang Tai huddled on the bed, he watched helplessly as the two kittens named Xiaokui, along with the Shiba Inu, were killed. Xiaokui's screams tore through the air, raw and agonizing, until Cang Tai could no longer tell whether the one dying was the kitten or the girl herself.

He curled into himself, hands pressing over his ears, desperate to shut out the sound.

I don't want to be the next Xiaokui.

If he never grew attached to the pet they forced into his arms, if he distanced himself now, maybe—just maybe—he could survive.

Then another wave struck, sending the entire cabin lurching. Cang Tai, already bracing for impact, watched as the black kitten lost its footing. It slid off the bed, paws scrabbling against the floor, yelping in panic.

Without thinking, Cang Tai turned sharply, his breath catching.

"Cang Tai!"

His voice startled him. Before he could process what he was doing, his hands shot out, gathering the small creature into his arms. He held it close, cradling it against his chest, as if protecting it could somehow protect him.

By the time he realized his mistake, it was too late. He stared down at the kitten in his arms, frozen, his grip tightening involuntarily. Tears welled in his eyes, spilling over before he could stop them.

Why… why is it like this?

He had only just met this kitten, and yet, the thought of watching it die was unbearable.

All around them, in the dimly lit cabin, small children clung to their pets the moment the waves struck, sobbing as they whispered the same name—their name—over and over again.

Drifting in a vast ocean, on a journey where only pain and death awaited them, these children—destined to be sacrifices to the evil gods—reached out for the only warmth they had left. The small creatures, soft and trembling, latched onto them in return, too innocent to understand their shared fate.

"You won't be able to let go," Bai Liu murmured. His voice was flat, devoid of comfort. "Not once you know it has the same name as you."

Cang Tai choked on a sob, pressing his face into the kitten's fur. "Why?"

Bai Liu remained as calm as ever.

"Because like you, it is an animal cub raised by adults. Like you, it is alone, adrift in the ocean after being abandoned. Like you, it is nothing more than a tool, soon to be tortured for the sake of increasing suffering."

"By all accounts, you are kindred spirits, sharing the same fate."

"In the world you came from, you should never have met a creature that was kind to you. Every being you've ever encountered—every human—has brutalized you. Otherwise, you wouldn't have been trafficked onto this ship."

"But here, under these conditions, you have been given a companion—one carefully selected, one that must like you, one that shares your name. How could you not become attached?"

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, his sharp gaze falling on Cang Tai.

"In other words," he concluded, "the cat in your arms is no longer just a cat."

"It is another you."

"It is another Cang Tai."

"You won't be able to stand watching it die—just as you won't be able to stand watching yourself die."

Cang Tai looked straight into Bai Liu's dark eyes. He suddenly recalled the rumors and shuddered. His lips parted as if to ask something, but he hesitated and fell silent.

Bai Liu spoke calmly. "Are you asking why, if someone in the orphanage had the capacity to empathize with an animal in distress, they would also abuse one?"

Cang Tai hesitated, then glanced at Little Bai, who was curled up in Bai Liu's arms, belly flopped over. He explained hesitantly, "I don't actually think you did it. But if—if someone like the person described in the rumors did exist, why would they do something like that?"

Bai Liu was silent for a long time before speaking. "A fundamental aspect of empathy is the recognition of shared emotions."

"The first step is perceiving that another being experiences emotions like yours. For example, you and the black cat in your arms both feel pain, awe, and fear under the same circumstances. That recognition—that you share something in common—is the foundation of empathy."

"But if someone undergoes experiences that cause emotions different from those of the people or animals around them, they lose that commonality. Without shared emotions, they cannot empathize. It's not that they refuse to—it's that they are simply incapable of it."

"If there is no emotional connection, they won't see others as similar to themselves. And if something isn't like you, then harming it won't feel like hurting yourself."

"He was raised in an orphanage, just like us," Cang Tai pressed, his voice carrying an edge of disbelief. "So why can't he feel the same emotions as we do? Is it because his brain is different?"

"I don't think so." Bai Liu's tone was light. "Plenty of people who are perfectly rational are capable of empathy—until they choose not to be."

"For example, Lord Gosho—Luming County's prefect, as Xiaokui calls him—seemed like a kind man before. He should have been kind to Xiaokui. But now? He has no empathy for her at all. He doesn't even see her as a person—just as a sacrifice."

Cang Tai murmured in a daze, "...Right. Why is that?"

"I think it's because of desire." Bai Liu's voice remained steady. "When a person is consumed by desire, the first instinct upon seeing another living being isn't connection—it's exploitation."

"Extreme desire makes people see themselves inside a grand social food chain, where every other person is simply another rung in that hierarchy. They reduce those around them to two categories: those who can exploit them and those they can exploit."

“To them, weak creatures—kittens, puppies—exist only to be trampled underfoot. And the highest power exists only to be served.”

“In their world, the weak perish, the strong survive, human nature is inherently cruel, and people devour those beneath them to gain more wealth and power. They take it as a given that empathy is a sign of weakness because beasts do not empathize with their prey.”

Cang Tai’s voice was barely a whisper. “But we’re human. We’re not beasts.”

Bai Liu paused. “A human who remains in the food chain of self-indulgence for too long can devolve into a beast—or even a monster.”

“Only humans who desire too much are capable of cannibalism.”

Cang Tai fell into a trance-like daze, repeating Bai Liu’s words as if spellbound. “...Cannibalism?”

From the bunk, Xiaokui let out two small, nervous giggles. She murmured in a trembling voice, “Xiaokui, Cat, that’s a good girl.”

The sea finally calmed, and Bai Liu’s ship, laden with its cargo of sacrificial offerings, docked in Luming County’s harbor under the afternoon sun.

At the dock, a figure stood fully dressed, a bamboo cane in hand, gazing down at the offerings—heads bowed, feet unsteady, bodies frail—as they disembarked.

The sacrifices were young, no older than fifteen—the ideal age, according to Luming County’s standards. Bai Liu, nearly seventeen, was an outlier. Normally, offerings that old weren’t taken—they were harder to break in—but he was small and thin, his face delicate enough to pass for fifteen. That was why he had been sold here without issue.

Clinging desperately to the weak little creatures in their arms, the sacrificial children trembled. Some were barely able to stand, but their only concern was the tiny animals they carried. They checked their puppies’ and kittens’ paws over and over, pressed their faces against their bellies to feel them breathing. Silent tears streamed down their cheeks, but none dared make a sound. None dared ask for help.

The imperial officer overseeing the docking nodded in satisfaction at the sight of the tearful offerings. He tilted his head toward his subordinate. “Take them to the boathouse and tend to their pets.”

From the corner of his eye, Bai Liu noticed how the children’s eyes lit up at this command, even those who had been terrified of Gosho after the Xiaokui incident.

A few of the younger ones even whispered, “Thank you, Lord Gosho.”

At fifteen, when the concept of right and wrong was still forming, many of these children had grown up in cramped, dysfunctional environments. Presumably, they had little real understanding of the world.

How convenient.

Lord Gosho softened his expression. “I’m very pleased with you, children. You are all good children—kind, affectionate, compassionate to both animals and people.”

“I know some of you were frightened when I disciplined Xiaokui on the boat. But let me be clear—Xiaokui is a bad child.”

His face darkened sharply. He gripped his cane and struck it against the ground. “She doesn’t love small animals. She failed the ritual test multiple times. She even injured her own squire and dog before escaping from us. A terrible, terrible child.”

“We do not treat bad children kindly. So I hope you won’t follow Xiaokui’s example. Strive to be good children instead, and we will treat you well.”

All the children turned toward Xiaokui. She stood motionless, her expression numb, as if she hadn’t noticed the wary, disgusted glances thrown her way. She simply held her cat, silent and still.

Gosho withdrew his gaze from her and turned back to the group of sacrificial children, their faces tilted up toward him.

“The place where you will stay is called the Boathouse,” he continued smoothly. “It sits on a beautiful coast, where you can wake each morning to the sight of the sea.”

“But before you reach the Boathouse, there is a small task you must complete.”

Gosho’s tone grew darker, more unsettling. “You must pair off and become good friends. One of you will be the squire. The other—the honored sacrifice."

His smile was almost serene.

"Children chosen as offerings will receive only the best. The finest food, clothing, education—everything Luming County has to offer. Your pets will receive the best care, and no one will ever dare harm them again."

"We will assign you prestigious foster families. You will become the noblest beings in Luming County, above the common people. And if you succeed in enduring the pain required for the sacrificial rite… all of this will be yours forever."

A spark of longing flickered in the children's eyes.

"But those who become squires," Gosho sighed, his voice filled with mock sympathy, "will remain just that. Squires."

"You will live as you have before. Disposable. Worthless."

"If your best friend ever decides they don't like you anymore…" His smile widened, warm and reassuring.

"We'll send you back."

"But your pet will stay here."

"I'm sure everyone listening would rather be a sacrifice than a squire," Gosho said, clasping his hands behind his back. A meaningful smile curved his lips. "But here's the good news—in Luming County, sacrifices and squires aren't fixed roles. Every six months, you're tested."

"In this test, sacrifices who fall short will be demoted to squires, while those who excel will be promoted to sacrifices."

He paused, letting the words sink in before continuing, "I'm sure you're all wondering—what determines who is a sacrifice and who is a squire?"

The children's eyes shimmered with anticipation.

Gosho swept his gaze over them, then spoke slowly, deliberately:

"Pain."

"The one who suffers more will become the sacrifice."

A murmur rippled through the children. Some shrank back, their expressions flickering between confusion and fear. The vague yet ominous concept of pain unsettled them.

From the imperial ship, a woman observed their reactions. She exhaled sharply through her nose and said, "Of course, the pain of being a sacrifice is sharp—but brief. You endure it once, and it's over. But the pain of being a squire? It lingers. It may not be as intense, but it stretches on for a lifetime."

She glanced down at them with an air of indifference. "A short agony or a long torment. The choice is yours."

Gosho checked his watch, then spoke carelessly, "For those who become sacrifices, your pets will receive the best medical care available."

"For those who become squires, however, we can only take them to a regular vet. Whether they survive or not… will depend on their own luck."

At that, the children hesitated, instinctively grouping themselves into two factions—sacrifices and squires—before forming teams. Expressions shifted: some children trembled, tears slipping down their cheeks; others clenched their fists, determination burning in their eyes.

Bai Liu observed the scene without expression, unmoving.

The food chain of desire had taken shape. Under the subtle guidance of the imperial boat, the children had willingly divided themselves into two unequal classes: sacrifices, who would bear the pain once and rise above, and squires, condemned to lifelong servitude.

Cang Tai, pale-faced, darted glances around before stepping behind Bai Liu. He folded his hands in front of him and bowed his head respectfully—the traditional posture of a squire submitting to a sacrifice.

Bai Liu turned slightly, his gaze sliding toward Cang Tai. "Have you made your choice? Are you sure you want to follow me?"

Cang Tai nodded slowly. His eyes flickered toward Xiaokui, who remained motionless in the crowd. His voice was muffled as he admitted, "…I can’t be a sacrifice. Xiaokui scares me too much."

Gosho, watching from the side, gave a cold command. "Beiyuan Xiaokui—return her to the original boathouse."

His tone remained indifferent as he added, "Let her see what happened to the good friend who took responsibility for her. Show her what she abandoned when she ran away without a word."

Xiaokui flinched. Moments later, two adults stepped forward and dragged her away.

"The rest of you," Gosho announced, sweeping his coat aside as he turned, "follow me to the boathouse. You will receive your shelter there."

Bai Liu followed the group, his steps unhurried. It wasn’t long before they arrived at the boathouse.

Compared to the one Bai Liu had seen seven years later—when he would be forced to perform the Evil God’s ritual dance, this boathouse was pristine. Facing the shimmering sea, its hull gleamed in the setting sun, golden scales catching the light. The edges were painted a deep crimson, and the intricate designs adorning the entrance reflected brilliantly in the waves.

It did not resemble a place of suffering.

It looked like a gilded palace.

The children gawked. One pointed at the boathouse in disbelief. "Is this… really where we'll be staying?!"

"Yes," the imperial ship's captain confirmed. He gestured toward a side entrance. "Go there to collect a wooden token with your name on it. Once you have it, enter the boathouse and insert the token into the wooden niche beside an available room. That room will be yours."

The children's excitement bubbled over, and they prepared to rush toward the entrance.

But before they could move, the captain's voice cut through the air, sharp and cold:

"Sacrifices choose their rooms first. Squires wait until every sacrifice has chosen."

The eagerness drained from the squires' faces. They stood frozen, their hands tightening around their wooden tokens as they watched the sacrifices run ahead, cheering as they picked their rooms.

The voices of the sacrificial children echoed through the boathouse:

"This place is amazing!"
"It's so big! Look at my room!"

The squires, left waiting, clenched their fists harder.

Bai Liu stepped inside, his wooden token in hand. A row of neatly arranged boathouses stretched before him, bathed in warm, golden light. Yet as he looked closer, he noticed—

The rooms grew smaller the deeper they went.

The largest, most spacious rooms were near the entrance. At the farthest end, there was only one left—the width of two doors.

The realization dawned.

The children who had once bonded over their shared struggles on the boat—their so-called comrades—immediately turned on each other.

They ran.

They shoved.

They fought.

"This room is mine!"
"I got here first! I put my token in first!"

The largest room had become a battlefield.

Bai Liu swept his gaze over the remaining rooms before withdrawing it, passing by the largest ones without a second glance. The scene reminded him of his orphanage—children scrambling to grab toys.

But such things had never been of much relevance to him. The toys the others fought over rarely interested him, just as in this case. Without hesitation, he walked straight to the last room, lifted his head, and flatly inserted his wooden sign before pushing the door open.

Sure enough, the layout was identical to the one where Cang Tai had taken him to rest earlier. Even the picture of waves still hung on the wall. The only difference—this time, there was no shrine hidden behind it.

Bai Liu retracted his hand from where he had been absently stroking the wall.

It seemed there was no idol in the last room. That meant the next key idol for this branch should be on [Old Evil God - Spirit].

—In other words, as it had been in the Siren copy, the idol should be on Xie Ta's body.

Outside the door, footsteps echoed as children poured in. Then, abruptly, they stalled.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze.

It seemed the [squires] had realized the truth.

The children stood motionless for a long time, staring blankly at the boathouses they had longed for—places they had believed they would get to live in. One of them hesitantly asked, "Where are we supposed to stay if all the boathouses are full?"

All four rows of boathouse rooms already had wooden signs beside them. Not a single one was unoccupied.

"You will, of course, have a place to stay."

Gosho's tone took on an eerie edge, laced with an unsettling excitement as he watched the children's stunned expressions.

"But there is still a space in this boathouse where you lowly squires can lie down and get some rest."

He stepped forward unhurriedly, moving through the townhouse until he stopped beside an open-air masonry water tank. Turning back, he smiled at the children.

"This is it."

The children who had chosen to become [squires] stared at the water tank in disbelief.

The ground around it was damp and dark, covered in barnacle-like growths. Blood from slaughtered fish, discarded oyster and clam shells, and rotting seafood lay scattered, the scent of decay mixing with the thick, pickled stench of mud.

But that wasn't the worst of it.

Cang Tai stared dazedly at the row of spiked wire cages lined up beside the tank, each only half the size of a human body. A tattered plastic water shelter sagged over them, while in front of each sat a filthy water bowl and feed dish, filled with murky sludge.

Inside these cages, chickens and ducks clucked and squawked—meat walkers waiting for slaughter.

—This was a kennel. A pet cage.

Hanging above each cage was a nameplate, long since inscribed. Whether those names belonged to the squires' pets or to the squires themselves was unclear.

Gosho lifted a hand and pointed at the cages.

"This is where you will live."

The children stared in stunned silence. No one spoke.

Gosho continued in a practiced tone, as if reciting instructions he'd given a hundred times.

"Every morning at 5:30, you will crawl out of these cages alongside your pets. Then, you will grab an animal from the cage next to yours, slaughter it, and prepare it for the kitchen. By 8:00, the freshest and most delicious offerings will be ready for the sacrificial lords."

He paused, then added carelessly, "Keep in mind—morning light only fully arrives every five and a half days here. Until then, it's still dark. If you happen to grab the wrong animal and accidentally kill someone else's pet…"

Gosho smiled.

"Well, that's none of our concern. You'll just have to handle it yourselves."

His tone was light, indifferent, almost amused.

"But really, that might not be a bad thing for you," he continued. "After all, the last squire who lost their pet—because someone next to them killed it by mistake—ended up being promoted to Lord of the Sacrifice in their very first test."

"Such an industrious, motivated boy," Gosho said, his voice dripping with satisfaction. "I liked him quite a lot. After earning his place as a priest and securing the privileges and reverence that come with it, he was terrified of falling back into the squire ranks in the next round of examinations."

"So, to consolidate his suffering—"

Gosho smiled, as if recalling something delightful.

"—he forced himself to eat his own pet."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"This is where you'll be staying from now on." Without glancing back, Gosho turned away. "Tomorrow morning, at 7:30, you and the offering adults will travel together to the homes of some of the largest clan families in Luming County."

"Make sure your appearance and dress are in order. I don't want to see any indecent attire or behavior."

Once the imperial boat had departed, the [squires] stood stunned, staring at the rusted cages. Soon, a man in grey squire's clothes emerged wearily from the boathouse, holding a bony puppy in his arms. With practiced ease, he pushed open one of the cages, climbed in, and dumped part of a plastic bag of leftovers from the Lord of the Offerings into the dog's bowl, eating the rest himself.

The dog eagerly devoured the scraps, then retreated, curling up in the narrow cage to sleep. Cang Tai stood frozen, almost in disbelief.

Soon, more attendants emerged from the boathouse, feeding their pets the leftover food and eating the rest themselves. They curled up in their cages, settling into various positions to keep each other warm as they slept.

Some of the new [squire] children recoiled in fear and retreated, while others, seemingly resigned to their fate, reluctantly opened the cage doors and entered.

The older squires watched them closely. One spoke up, breaking the silence.

"Are you the new squires this year?"

"What are the sacrificial lords like this time?"

The others were unsure how to answer, but Cang Tai hesitantly replied, "They're all pretty good... I think."

A squire with his back to them sneered. "How can we know what the sacrificial lords are really like? If they torment us squires, we'll have to wait for the test in six months."

Another squire whispered to him, "He fell from his squire position during the first half of this year's exam because his pain wasn't as bad as that of his own squire."

"He broke down when his squire killed his own kitten, holding its body and crying for a whole week. Somehow, he managed to get promoted to sacrifice in the test."

"But I think he'll be back for the second half of the year." The squire glanced over at the one who had spoken earlier. "Apparently, he and his squire were close friends, and he never let his squire or his squire's cat live in a cage or eat leftovers. They ate and lived with him."

"But his squire was soft-tempered. When he ascended to the position of sacrifice, the first thing he did was force him and his dog to live in a cage here."

Cang Tai was taken aback. "A squire can live with the sacrifice?"

The squire nodded. "Yes, a squire can stay with the Lord of the Offerings as long as the lord wishes, but..."

"Few sacrificial lords are willing."

Cang Tai was confused. "Why?"

Before the squire could respond, the one curled up in the cage with his back turned spoke coldly, "It's simply disrespectful. After all the pain the sacrifice has endured to earn a boathouse, to just give it to a squire is a slap in the face."

The squire next to him added softly, "That's what this man's squire told him when he came to power. He said that if he allowed him to share a room with him so easily, he would dishonor the kitten who died at his hands and helped him get promoted to sacrifice."

When the squire saw Cang Tai's face turn pale with fear, he sighed and kindly reassured him, "Being a squire isn't as terrible as you think. We are the lowest rank among the squires, and many others are treated better than us."

"You're supposed to be taken tomorrow by the Lord of Offerings to the Great Houses for selection. If you are chosen by them to bear their name, the Lords will provide you with a room in the boathouse, and you won't have to live in a cage."

Cang Tai looked confused. "The Great Families? Why are we being taken to them for selection?"

The squire seemed surprised. "Don’t you know the rules of Luming County's evil rituals?"

He continued, "There are two evil god festivals here each year: one in winter, one in summer, held in August and January. A month after the Winter Festival, Lord Gosho, the Prefect of Luming County, will begin purchasing sacrifices for the next round of conditioning. In about six months, around June or July, your batch will be semi-mature enough to be offered to the evil gods during the Evil Festival. If your pain is sufficient by then, your sacrifice will succeed. If not, it will fail."

The squire paused, recalling, "But historically, less than half of the sacrifices manage to reach the required level of pain within half a year. More often, they have to wait until the Winter Festival again to be offered."

"In general, the chances of a sacrifice succeeding in the Winter Festival are much higher than in the Summer Festival. If any sacrifices remain unsuccessful, they go to the next year's Summer Festival and continue the process."

The squire shrugged. "But usually, if a sacrifice isn’t successful in the first year, it’s unlikely to succeed later on."

"Of course, it won’t work again." The squire, facing away from the crowd, spoke in a hoarse voice. "If the pain lasts too long, people become numb."

He sighed again. "But if a sacrifice endures the pain for a long time, overcoming the numbness and becoming even more painful, then it can be successfully sacrificed at an evil god festival. Such a sacrifice would supposedly please the evil god, and the wishes granted would be of much higher quality. That's why many great families intentionally store such sacrifices and avoid offering them too early."

"The Beiyuan Xiaokui from the Bei Yuan family is one such offering."

"Each year, Luming County distributes the offerings and attendants based on the previous year's contributions. The top eight tax-paying families in the county get to choose two offerings or attendants each, in order of rank."

"The leftover offerings are then distributed randomly to the people during the Funamiya Night Celebration Festival, just before the Evil God Festival."

"These leftover sacrifices are typically less willful and of inferior quality, often unable to endure the painful cultivation. Even if they are successfully sacrificed, the wishes granted are of lesser quality, which is why the great families do not value them."

The squire looked at Cang Tai. "The Bei Yuan family came first in taxes last year. They sacrificed a young boy, only a year and a half old, at the Winter Festival, and I heard it was Beiyuan Xiaokui's younger brother. They made a significant wish with that sacrifice."

"Exactly what they wished for is unclear to us retainers, but it seems to have helped the Bei Yuan family grow rapidly over the past year, overtaking the Gifune family as the top tax-paying family in Luming County."

"You don't want to end up in a cage, so think about getting chosen by the eldest of the Bei Yuan family tomorrow."

As they spoke, a group of adults wearing long tunics entered. They carried a cage covered in black cloth and casually tossed it in front of Cang Tai and the others. "Some of your pets died without treatment. Some are still alive. Pick them out yourself."

Cang Tai rushed to the cages, sifting through them until he finally found his dying kitten in a cage that had been thrown into a corner.

Instead of receiving treatment, the little black cat had grown weaker, lying limp in Cang Tai's arms, blood covering its lower body. It was unclear whether it had pooped blood or been bitten by another animal in the cage.

"[Cang Tai]!" Cang Tai's face turned pale as he stared at the blood on the kitten's body. Tears immediately filled his eyes. "How could this happen?"

The other children's pets weren't in much better shape—most were struggling to breathe.

For a moment, the backyard was filled with the sound of children crying.

The squires standing by the cages looked uneasy. One who had been speaking to Cang Tai earlier poked his head out and, with a mixture of emotions, told them, "It's going to rain today. Don't take the cubs out of the cages. They'll freeze to death."

"If you're on good terms with the Lord of the Sacrifice, go and beg them to take you in."

The children seemed to find hope in this suggestion.

"Yes, he and I agreed that we would be paired together. I'd be his squire first, and he would take care of me as a sacrifice. If he fell from sacrifice, I would become his sacrifice in return. That way, we'd both be chosen!"

"Me too! I'm going to find her now!"

The children ran toward the front yard, clutching their pets as though they had found a lifeline.

The squire watching them had a complicated look in his eyes. He glanced at the squire behind him, as though wanting to say something.

The squire behind him, whose back was turned, suddenly let out a nervous laugh. "I told him to do that in the first place."

"I said I couldn't last and didn't want to suffer. He said he'd endure for me and become a sacrifice so that I would be sheltered. What happened?"

The man, holding a lifeless, already cold dog, laughed hoarsely and brokenly. "My dog froze to death outside. Didn't he open the door for me?"

The children, already running ahead, did not hear this and continued knocking eagerly at the doors of the offerings.

The offerings inside pulled open the doors. Most were dressed in comfortable yukata, holding wooden tubs that had clearly just come from the hot springs. They radiated warmth, and the floor was scattered with unfinished pots of hot soup and fried lobster—an opulent scene.

The pets inside were dressed in delicate, warm outfits, lounging on plush white blankets, stretching, and sleeping soundly.

In contrast, the squire standing outside was disheveled, his clothes torn and reeking of rotten food. Muddy water, like petroleum, dripped from the edges of his hair after the light rain. In his arms, he clutched a small, shivering, filthy animal, its body stained with blood.

When the door opened, the expressions of both the offerings and the attendants froze for a moment.

—In just a few hours, it felt like they were from entirely different worlds.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The heat wafted lazily from the room, brushing over the faces of the stunned attendants and causing them to disperse. They blinked in a daze, their eyes gradually falling upon the small creature licking itself lazily inside the room.

"May we...?" The squire couldn't help but step closer to the warm room. "Go in?"

The offering instinctively stepped in front of them, gathering her yukata. She glanced at the squire's dirty, dripping shoes and her expression shifted to one of resistance and embarrassment. "What's the matter? Can't you just say it outside?"

The squires looked at the offering in disbelief, their breath fading as they held the little creatures in their arms.

Outside the door, Cang Tai shivered, clutching the unmoving black cat in his arms. He watched as the attendants were ushered away, one by one.

... Bai Liu. The infamous Bai Liu, rumored to be able to kill small animals at will. Would he really take him in?

Nervously, Cang Tai swallowed, closing his eyes as he prepared to clap his hands together.

The paper door slid open on its own, revealing Bai Liu, draped in a loose white bathrobe. Water dripped from the ends of his hair, the collar slightly open to reveal pale skin with a coin pendant dangling from it.

Bai Liu's cold, clean brow was thick with the steam rising from his body. His voice was flat, as though he had been expecting Cang Tai at his door. "You've been standing here for almost ten minutes. What's the matter?"

In Bai Liu's arms, the silver-blue-eyed, white-haired Little Bai cat, its bell untied, nestled curiously, tilting its head to look at Cang Tai. The little cat mewled, extending a paw to play with the black cat in Cang Tai's arms.

Bai Liu didn't stop the gesture; he let his pet interact with Cang Tai.

For some reason, Cang Tai suddenly felt a surge of emotion. He knelt before Bai Liu, tears streaming down his face. "Please, save [Cang Tai]."

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "What do you bring to the table if I don't do something worthless?"

Cang Tai clutched the corner of Bai Liu's robe, his eyes red with desperation. "If you save [Cang Tai] now, I'll be your most loyal servant. I'll never betray you."

Bai Liu was silent for a moment before raising his eyes, his pupils dark. "Deal's up."

Thirty minutes later, a dazed and freshly cleaned Cang Tai sat on Bai Liu's tatami, next to the similarly cleaned black cat. Its fluffy tail was held high, visible for all to see.

It was hardly a surprise.

Bai Liu's gaze shifted from the little black cat's tail back to Little Bai, who sat beside him in a dignified, elegant manner.

Little Bai leaned against Bai Liu, tilting its head and meowing softly. It nuzzled him, then curled up by his leg to sleep, behaving perfectly.

This quiet routine made Bai Liu think of Xie Ta.

The other little black cat, after eating and drinking its fill, dashed around Bai Liu like a playful dog. It jumped into Bai Liu's arms, pushing Little Bai aside, then licked his nose and wiggled its behind as it chased Bai Liu's robe.

In short, it resembled a certain lizard.

A black cat and a white cat, both strikingly similar in appearance and habits.

Bai Liu had never believed in coincidences in games. If he was right, this was the twisted sense of humor of some sadistic game designer.

He lowered his eyes to look at the two cats sleeping peacefully on his lap, one on the left, one on the right.

Cang Tai, embarrassed by his black cat's hyperactivity and wanting to return it, looked up—then froze.

He saw Bai Liu, who was rumored to kill small animals, calmly stroking the heads of the two kittens with the back of his hand. Instead of moving them, Bai Liu looked up and spoke softly, "It's late. Go to sleep."

With a chuckle, Cang Tai lay down on the extra tatami that Bai Liu had provided. The two tiny cats curled up beside Bai Liu's pillow, like little guardians.

Bai Liu, under the watchful eyes of his two 'guardians,' soon closed his eyes and drifted to sleep.

Cang Tai had expected a restless night, but before long, he found himself fighting against his eyelids, yawning before he finally fell into a deep slumber.

Day 2

Cang Tai had slept soundly, and by the time he woke up, Bai Liu was already dressed.

Bai Liu wore a black tunic with long white lining, featuring a crane-and-cloud motif on the collar, while Cang Tai was dressed in a more understated grey valet tunic.

Once they were dressed and stepped out of the room, Cang Tai noticed several squires standing in the central piazza. Their red eyes and sleepless expressions were the result of a restless night in the rain. They held small animals, their heads drooping and their fur tangled, while their bodies were stiff from the cold. They stared vacantly across the room.

The offerings began trickling out of their rooms one by one. Upon seeing the attendants, they quickly avoided their gaze and moved on, walking briskly as they gathered in small groups, whispering among themselves.

"They chose the squire themselves, so the squire should do what the squire does."

"Why should I share a room with them? I've just enough space for myself, and it's not like they don't have a place of their own."

"Yeah, and who knows what diseases their dogs and cats might have.

What if they infect my cat? It looks sick."

"Why should I suffer for them? I need my own space."

"Why not go back to your place and stand outside my door all night?"

Cang Tai, who overheard these complaints, paused. He felt the shift in how everyone viewed him and the others. It reminded him of the food chain theory Bai Liu had discussed with him the day before on the boat.

[People who enter the food chain of desire lose their ability to empathize.]

[In their eyes, there are only predators who are inferior to them and predators who are superior to them.]

He glanced at Bai Liu standing beside him. Bai Liu's expression remained calm, as though he had anticipated this shift.

After breakfast, all the offerings and attendants gathered outside the boathouse. It was a sunny day, with the heat radiating down. The attendants held black umbrellas over the offerings, their faces mostly neutral.

Gosho, the man leading the group, appeared less than pleased.

"Today, we're taking you to the Bei Yuan family. They were the top tax-paying family in Luming County last year. You'll go there first, and they'll choose from among you."

"After noon, you'll head to the Gifune family, my family, the top tax-paying family the year before last."

"You'll be visiting eight families today, and if you're lucky enough to be chosen by any of them, you could even take on their surname and become part of their clan. If that happens, you'll be moved out of the boathouse and enjoy better living conditions."

Lord Gosho grimaced, pulling the corners of his mouth into a stiff smile. "Now, let's go to Bei Yuan's house."

As soon as Gosho's words left his mouth, Bai Liu heard a clear system beep in his ears.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has unlocked the side quest - Obtain the shrine key in the hands of Bei Yuan's family head.]

[The body of the old evil god is imprisoned behind the shrine on the hill, where He slumbers, day after day, listening to the suffering of the multitudes. Only the most anguished souls can make Him open His eyes and gaze upon the sacrifices who are mad with pain.]

[Ask player Bai Liu to steal the shrine key from the head of the Bei Yuan family and make the Old Evil God open His eyes for you.]

Bai Liu lowered his eyelashes.

Holding an umbrella over Bai Liu, Cang Tai glanced at him. In the sunlight, Bai Liu's complexion appeared almost translucent, and Cang Tai felt a momentary daze. This was the first time he had seen Bai Liu so closely in such strong light.

"From what you said to me yesterday, combined with the reaction of the Gosho today, it seems like the Bei Yuan and Gifune families have a rivalry. Is that right?" Bai Liu asked, his voice soft, almost a whisper as he turned his face slightly toward Cang Tai.

Cang Tai froze for a moment before stammering, "Sh-should be."

"If I want to be chosen by the Bei Yuan family today," Bai Liu mused, "what should I do?"

After a pause, Cang Tai scratched his head nervously and leaned closer to Bai Liu, whispering, "You shouldn't worry about whether Bei Yuan will choose you. The extended family always picks the most attractive offerings, and you're by far the best-looking of the group. They'll definitely choose you."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Bei Yuan's home was perched atop a hill, and the group ascended a long trail, or rather a series of steps, before they could catch a glimpse of the magnificent building hidden deep in the dense jungle.

The house's enormous eaves loomed over the forest, and as one looked up, a slightly smaller but more dignified wooden building with soaring eaves became visible behind Bei Yuan's house. Its floor, made of mahogany, held birdhouses, standing higher up in the landscape.

"Closer to us is the residence of the Bei Yuan family," Gosho remarked, lifting his gaze to the flying eaves behind the torii. He gathered the hem of his garment and bowed respectfully. "Higher up is the residence of the evil god, the Luming Shrine."

The offerings and attendants bowed in unison, mimicking the movements of the imperial boat.

The path ahead, a well-worn rocky trail, led to the gate of Bei Yuan's house. Two stone lanterns stood on either side of the gate. Bai Liu glanced at them briefly and noticed they appeared very new—seemingly only a year old. Their heads were intricately carved into the shape of a simple Shiba Inu, its tongue playfully sticking out.

The imperial boat knocked on the door of Bei Yuan's house.

The door creaked open slowly, revealing an elderly servant with white hair. He peered out, first glancing at the knocker, then at the offerings behind him. With a slight bow, he withdrew his gaze and bent down to open the door wider. "Lord Gosho, the master has been waiting for you."

Gosho grunted in acknowledgment, entering without sparing a glance.

Bai Liu followed the imperial boat inside, where he was greeted by an elegant and extravagant Japanese garden. Jagged rocks flanked the left and right sides. Clear water bubbled over them, creating a lively and interesting display. The water, seemingly drawn from the mountains, should have been frozen at this time of year, but the Bei Yuan family had cleverly installed stone ovens to heat the pipes, allowing the water to flow hot and steamy over the rocks and grass despite the cold weather.

Bai Liu took a moment to study the stone ovens, estimating there were nearly a hundred of them, cleverly integrated into the courtyard for both practical use and aesthetic purposes.

Unable to resist, Cang Tai leaned over and whispered in Bai Liu's ear, "So many retainers and animals nearly froze to death in the rain last night. If even a third of these stone ovens had been distributed down there, they would have been able to survive..."

The old servant, who had been observing, turned his head and shot Cang Tai a condescending look before speaking.

"What you should be thinking about, as newcomers, is how to work your way up to be chosen by the lord of the Bei Yuan family to enjoy the beautiful courtyard these stone ovens create. Don’t waste your pity on the self-serving, caged inferior animals who don’t even deserve to see these stone ovens."

"The stone ovens are for the viewing of the sacrificial adults—those who endure pain and sacrifice for the evil gods to bring value to Luming County—not for the squires to warm themselves."

"In Luming County, these squires, who aren't suffering enough to live in cages, are nothing more than animals who cannot produce value and shouldn't consume any resources to live."

Cang Tai flinched under the servant’s gaze, lowering his head and replying softly, "Yes... I understand," and said no more.

The servant turned his gaze away indifferently and bent forward, quickly leading the procession down a series of solid wooden cloisters.

From the courtyard, one could view the serene landscape: the bubbling spring, birds flitting among the flowers, bamboo gently knocking against a stone jar, and petals falling into the courtyard’s lake, creating a scene of pleasant, refreshing elegance.

The offerings and attendants continued to express their admiration for the beauty and delicacy of the courtyard. It was clear from their eyes that they longed for this place.

The last to walk was Cang Tai, his head bowed, clutching his umbrella. A feeling of quiet discontent and gloom weighed on him.

Bai Liu also wished to be chosen by the Bei Yuan family... Was he the same as these offerings?

Would he... also agree with the old servant?

"If you have something to ask, just say it," Bai Liu spoke calmly, not looking at him. "You've been staring at me for ten minutes now."

"I'm sorry!" Cang Tai apologized in a panic. He slowly raised his head and asked in a soft voice, "Bai Six, do you think the old servant was right just now?"

"That a stone oven is more for ornamental purposes for the sacrifices than for warming the attendants?"

Bai Liu responded, "The rightness or wrongness of someone's words depends on their perspective."

"From the viewpoint of these people who are now sacrifices, from the viewpoint of the servants of the Bei Yuan family, and from the viewpoint of those with a vested interest in exploiting others at the top of the food chain, they naturally feel their actions are justified."

"A stone oven doesn't benefit the squires by keeping them warm, but when placed here for display, it's a daily benefit that they can see and enjoy."

Cang Tai gathered his courage. "What about from Bai Six's point of view? Do you think they're right too?"

Bai Liu turned his head slightly, his gaze serene as it landed on Cang Tai. The intensity of his stare made Cang Tai hold his breath, gripping the umbrella so tightly his palm turned white.

"No," Bai Liu replied in a soft, measured tone. "I don't think they're right."

A long breath escaped Cang Tai, his eyes widening. "But Bai Six is now also a sacrifice, with a vested interest. Why not think they are right?"

Bai Liu studied him for a moment, his eyes dark and shifting. The fine wind tousled the strands of hair hanging over his forehead. "At the top of the food chain, these people have constructed a system with an old evil god who is meant to exploit everyone."

"But because he chose not to exploit them, he's now being tortured and exploited by everyone."

"That old evil god... he's my lover."

Cang Tai froze, completely stunned.

Bai Liu shifted his gaze to the old servant ahead, his voice devoid of emotion. "I came here to deal with those exploiting him and to dismantle the system built on his suffering."

"And when that's done, I'll tell him," Bai Liu added with a pause, "No matter what happens, he wasn't wrong to make the choice in the first place."

Cang Tai's eyes burned, and though he had a thousand questions, he simply nodded with a heavy "Hmm," his voice tinged with emotion. "Neither the evil god nor you are wrong."

"Enough with the chatter!" The man leading the procession, Gosho, turned back, impatience clear in his expression. "Hurry up! We're going to the parlour to choose the offerings!"

"Yes!" Cang Tai hurriedly grabbed Bai Liu's arm, pulling him into a quick pace. "We're coming!"

The Bei Yuan family's parlour was vast, its open space almost resembling the main hall of a dojo. The floor was covered with soft silken cloth, and a few servants sat on their knees behind a low table. A man with a traditional goldfish-ben hairstyle—shaved at the back of his head—sat there. His strong body gave him the appearance of a man in his forties or fifties, but the wrinkles on his face made him seem much older, like someone in his sixties. His expression was tense and grim.

He glanced down at the offerings book in front of him, flipping through it casually before raising his gaze to sweep over the offerings kneeling before him. His eyes paused on Bai Liu, who had entered last.

"There's a kid named Bai Six, right?" he asked in a deep voice. "Look up and let me see you."

Bai Liu slowly raised his head, meeting the man's gaze directly.

The head of the Bei Yuan family nodded with apparent satisfaction. "Good-looking, strong-willed. Can be conditioned over time."

"Take the boy," he ordered, "and keep his squire with him."

The head of the family then rose, casting a glance over Bai Liu and the others. "Since you are now the Lord of the Bei Yuan family's offerings, you will stay here from now on."

"I'll send someone to the boathouse to bring your pets and luggage. Someone will show you around, explain where you can and can't go, and tell you what you need to do to enjoy everything the Bei Yuan family has to offer."

He nodded to the old servant who had led them in. "You show them the way."

The old servant nodded respectfully, then turned to Bai Liu and the others. "Come, follow me."

"First, congratulations to all of you," the servant said with a smile, though it didn't reach his eyes. "From now on, you will live in the mansion of the family that brings joy and prosperity."

The servant's steps were quick and measured, like a snake weaving through the shaded wooden cloisters. The ground was littered with broken red maple leaves that had just fallen, their sound a soft rustle underfoot. The leaves drifted into the nearby water pavilion, outside the house.

The air was thick and warm, clinging to their skin despite the cold weather—a strange, unsettling atmosphere.

"A beautiful yet eerie place," Bai Liu thought to himself.

"In the Bei Yuan family, the sacrificial lords are the supreme beings. The family has grown to what it is today because of the dedication of generations of sacrificial lords. Without their suffering, the beauty of the Bei Yuan family grounds would not exist."

"So, the first thing anyone who enters the Bei Yuan family must do is pay homage to these sacrificial adults, who have endured supreme suffering for the family's development."

The old servant stopped in front of a well-constructed room and bowed before pushing the door open.

Cang Tai drew a sharp breath as he saw what was inside.

The room contained a large wooden shelf designed in the style of a shrine, with flying eaves and tails. Dozens of shrines were arranged on the shelf, each containing black-and-white photographs of people who appeared no older than teenagers—or even younger.

The old servant stepped aside, his hands clasped. "These are the sacrificial candidates purchased by the Bei Yuan family. They didn’t survive until the end and committed suicide out of pain. They are enshrined here."

"If you don't survive and take your own life, you’ll be offered up here too."

"Now, ask the four lords to come in and pay their respects."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The other chosen sacrifice, who had been eager to be selected, stood dumbfounded at the sight before him.

The old servant indifferently restrained the two unresponsive children, bowing to the offerings in the shrine. "Pay your respects to the predecessors who broke the jade for the Bei Yuan family."

The two children emerged from the shrine in a daze, their shoulders trembling.

It didn't quite match the privileged life they had imagined.

The old servant, seemingly unaware of the shift in the children's expressions, bowed slightly and continued walking briskly with small, quick steps. "The residence of the chosen sacrifices is in Bei Yuan, at the highest part of the house."

"That place is the closest to the shrine—the largest shrine in Luming, which you'll see every morning when you wake up. It's where you will be sacrificed."

"The shrine holds the beautiful body of the evil lord. We cannot disturb it often, and it is only open to the public during the hottest and coldest times of the year—winter and summer—when the prefecture holds a grand festival in honor of the evil god."

"Funya and the sacrifices in the great houses go to the shrine to worship the evil lord. But the evil lord resides in the shrine, and only the tears of a sacrifice in enough pain can wake him up."

"Don't go up to the mountain on ordinary days. Lord Evil is sleeping and dislikes being disturbed. The shrine doors are always locked, and there is no need for daily prayers."

Bai Liu's eyes twitched. "The shrine is locked, so who holds the key? Is it with Lord Bei Yuan?"

The old servant stumbled in his steps and glanced at Bai Liu. "Yes."

"The key to the shrine is passed to the highest taxpayer each year. The Gifune family held it last year; this year, it belongs to the Bei Yuan family."

The old servant led Bai Liu and the others to an isolated, high loft. He bent down slightly, raising his hand in respect. "This is the residence of the lords of sacrifice."

"I understand that the offerings are new to the Bei Yuan family and are curious about this place, but it is late. I advise you not to wander."

The old servant raised his head slightly, revealing his cloudy, aged eyes. "The Bei Yuan house is dangerous after dark. If any of the sacrificial lords meet their end at the hands of spirits, their bodies will not even enter the shrine of Bei Yuan."

Bai Liu noticed Cang Tai and the other children had turned pale with fear and immediately shouted in response, "Yes!"

The old servant's eyes flicked to Bai Liu. "Where is Lord Bai Six?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes slowly, speaking in a submissive tone. "I will offer myself properly to the evil gods here."

Slightly satisfied, the old servant withdrew his gaze, bent down, and closed the door with a bow. "We will bring your Lordships' belongings from the boathouse shortly. Please rest well."

Within ten minutes of Bai Liu and his family settling into the loft, the hesitant and quiet maid arrived with Bai Liu's luggage.

Cang Tai's eyes brightened at the sight of the little black cat in its cage. He tried to hug it, but the cat wriggled free, gave a high-pitched meow, and darted towards Bai Liu, who sat by the attic window.

Bai Liu stroked the two cats gathered at his feet with the back of his hand, his gaze drifting from the open window through the fading darkness of night to the Luming shrine deep in the jungle.

Cang Tai approached and whispered, "Is Lord Bai Six’s lover the evil god who resides in that shrine?"

Bai Liu’s eyes moved away from the window, and he looked down at the well-behaved Little Bai cat in his arms. "It’s not living," he said softly. "It’s trapped in that shrine."

"So, I’m going to bring him out."

"...Just now, you asked for the key to the shrine." Cang Tai swallowed nervously. "Bai Six, are you planning to steal the key after dark?"

Bai Liu hummed, a flat sound of acknowledgment.

Cang Tai tensed. "But the old servant said that Bei Yuan's house is haunted at night, and you don't even know where the key is! It's too risky!"

"There's always a way around it." Bai Liu raised his eyes to look at Cang Tai. "As long as you're willing to help me, Cang Tai."

Cang Tai blinked, dumbfounded. "How am I supposed to help you?"

Bai Liu replied coolly, "Find out about Bei Yuan Xiaokui."

After nightfall, the courtyard of Bei Yuan's house lay in darkness. The grass and trees cast eerie shadows on the veranda, and the stone fireplace by the rocky rockery glowed faintly, its fire flickering ghostly in the still air. The atmosphere was thick with hot, sticky humidity.

Cang Tai hurried down the corridor, not daring to glance at his surroundings. His mind raced, repeating the instructions Bai Liu had given him:

— Beiyuan Xiaokui, one of the Bei Yuan family's offerings, and her brother were both bought by the family during the first year of the evil god festival.

And last year, Beiyuan Xiaokui's brother had been sacrificed.

This brother was intentionally raised by the Bei Yuan family, enduring over a year—almost two—of suffering. His sacrifice, made to fulfill a wish, had propelled the Bei Yuan family to the top of Luming County, underscoring the extreme torment he had endured during those two years.

Not to mention the immense value to the Bei Yuan family of Xiaokui, who bore three years of pain. She was undoubtedly one of the family's most important offerings, which is why it was no surprise she was recaptured after escaping.

Bai Liu lifted his gaze and fixed Cang Tai with a steady stare. "The key to the shrine should be with Beiyuan Xiaokui or her brother."

Cang Tai blinked, confusion spreading across his face. "Wait, isn't the key to the shrine a highly valuable item? Why would the Bei Yuan family keep it on the body of a sacrifice?"

"Because they are the ones closest to the gods," Bai Liu replied calmly. "This family deludes itself into thinking they can get closer to the gods. They built their mansion to gaze at the dwelling of the gods, they constructed the attic we're in to overlook the shrine. Their obsession with the evil gods is extreme. So, it's likely that the key, which holds the power of the gods, is kept with the sacrifices—the ones closest to the gods."

Cang Tai hesitated, still uncertain. "But even if it's placed on the sacrifice, how can you be so sure it's Xiaokui and her brother? The Bei Yuan family has more than a few sacrifices..."

"Yes, they have many," Bai Liu's voice remained calm, "but these two siblings are the ones who have contributed the most to the family and are the most memorable."

"They were the first pair of squires and sacrifices in the Bei Yuan family."

"They were the first to enter the shrine on behalf of the Bei Yuan family."

Cang Tai shivered at Bai Liu's judgment.

He walked through the warm night air, the flowers blooming and the water flowing in the courtyard to his right. He took a deep breath, the rich, warm fragrance filling his lungs. Yet, to him, it seemed more like the stench of resentment, the bitter cold hidden beneath the surface warmth, born from the sacrifices' agony.

Bai Liu had said that Beiyuan Xiaokui, the most precious and valuable offering, had endured three years of pain and must have lived in the highest, closest attic of the Bei Yuan family.

After circling the area a few times under various pretenses, Cang Tai finally spotted a particularly tall loft opposite their own.

This attic had only one room, like a lighthouse with empty wooden shelves below it. The entrance was guarded by two servants, and a long flight of steps led up from the attic door.

Cang Tai sneaked through the grass, eyeing the guards, then turned to examine the lavishly constructed loft, its windows and doors closed, surrounded by piles of flowers.

Beiyuan Xiaokui lived here.

“It’s almost like a place where a princess would live,” Cang Tai whispered, a hint of trance in his voice. “But it’s just a sacrifice…”

With that, Cang Tai crouched in the grass, waiting patiently.

As night fell, the servants guarding the entrance left for their quarters, retreating to a side room to keep watch over Xiaokui.

Sure enough, the two servants climbed into the attic and went to sleep in separate rooms, one on each side.

Cang Tai breathed a sigh of relief. He darted through the grass, grabbed the ladder's base, and began climbing, one step at a time. He carefully gripped the sill and knocked gently.

“Xiaokui,” Cang Tai whispered softly, “It’s me, Cang Tai. Are you there?”

After a long silence, long enough for Cang Tai to think Xiaokui wouldn’t open the window, it creaked open. Xiaokui, clad in a close-fitting shirt, her face pale and weary, appeared at the window. Her voice was indifferent. "What are you doing here? Is this another trick from the Bei Yuan family to lure me into escaping, only to catch me again and make me suffer more?"

Before Cang Tai could respond, Xiaokui started to close the window again. In a panic, he scrambled through the gap, rolling into her room, shaking his head as he explained, “No, I was chosen by the Bei Yuan family as a squire.”

“I’m here because Lord Bai Six wants the key to the shrine.”

Cang Tai looked at her eagerly, folding his arms. “He said you would help me. Do you have the key?”

Xiaokui raised an eyebrow. "Bai Six? Why did he send you for the key?"

Cang Tai scratched his head, thinking before choosing to tell the truth. “He said the evil god at the shrine is his lover, and he plans to elope with him.”

Although Bai Liu hadn’t said it quite like that, that was essentially the message Cang Tai took away.

Xiaokui’s expression changed. She froze for a moment, then clapped her hands and laughed, as though hearing something ridiculous. Tears streamed down her face as she laughed. “Take the evil god and elope? Hahahaha!”

Cang Tai froze, terrified. He knelt and quickly covered her mouth. “Stop laughing! If the maids hear you, we’re in trouble!”

“It’s fine,” Xiaokui said lazily, lying back on the floor, her gaze unfocused as she stared at the ceiling. “I often laugh like this at night, in a psychotic way. They won’t care.”

“They just need to make sure I’m alive and in pain. That’s all.”

Cang Tai looked at her, bewildered. “What’s so funny?”

Xiaokui wiped tears from her eyes and, still a little dazed, answered, “Bai Six made up a ridiculous story, and you actually believed it.”

“There’s no way he and the evil god are lovers, let alone that they would elope.”

Cang Tai wasn’t convinced. “But when Lord Bai Six talks about evil gods, I think he’s serious!”

Xiaokui whispered softly, “My brother was very serious too. He once said he would take me away from this place.”

Cang Tai paused, then hesitantly asked, “Were you and your brother... sacrifices and squires too?”

Xiaokui closed her eyes. “Yeah.”

"I am the sacrifice, and he is the squire."

"My brother, who is three years younger than me, is so oblivious to these things that he can't grasp the meaning behind many of them. He doesn't know pain the way I do. Even when he's tortured, beaten, and covered in blood by the Bei Yuan family, he cries when he sees me, hugs me, calls me his sister, and showers me with affection."

"He only understands pain, not suffering."

Tears slid from the corners of Xiaokui's tightly shut eyes, her voice hoarse. "But when I saw him like that, I was scared, and it hurt constantly."

"Even when we were tortured in the same ways, my pain was far greater than his. It felt as though the things he couldn't understand were being transferred to me—so that I became the sacrifice."

"I thought it would go on like that, and when the day came for me to be sacrificed, he would be cast out of the Bei Yuan family and probably return to the boathouse to live in a cage. Even then, I thought it would be better than staying in the Bei Yuan family as the sacrifice."

"Because he's always been raised in this environment, I knew that even if he was caged, he could live a happy, carefree life, without knowing suffering. This world, this cruelty, was all he knew since he was a child. He didn't understand anything else."

"He thought this was the way the world was supposed to be—that this is how cruel the world should be."

"But one day…" Xiaokui's hollow eyes widened, "The Bei Yuan family sent a teacher to my brother and me."

"They began to teach us about the real world."

"Every day, we saw how much happier others were than us. Millions of people—who from birth had loving parents, good friends, who studied normally, grew up loved, married, had children, and continued to live joyfully. The teachers told us that this was normal, that this was the life everyone should live. We were deviants, they said. We were living an abnormal, lowly existence—one that had to be tortured to survive."

"Then the Bei Yuan family began to teach us all of this, while torturing us more and more."

"One day they told us that mothers and fathers love their children. The next day, they invited our parents to watch us being tortured, giving them vast amounts of money."

"One day they told us we could play with our favorite animals. The next morning, I woke up to find the sunny doll hanging outside my window had changed. It wasn't a doll anymore. It was my puppy."

"The sun was so strong, and my little dog hung by the eaves, his tongue hanging out. The collar around his neck had the little flowers I had sewn for him. Flies buzzed around him."

"My brother and I broke down in tears as we buried the puppy's body." Xiaokui's eyes glazed over, tears spilling down her face. "That was when my brother finally understood."

"The world isn't that cruel. It's just cruel to us."

"He told me, 'Sister, I must take you away from this place.'"

"He started to torture himself more and more. He wanted to be more miserable than me; he wanted to become the sacrifice. He'd come to me, crazy with pain, crying, saying, 'Sister, if I sacrifice myself, we can live a normal life.'"

"We will be happy, he said. The Lord of Evil will see our suffering. If I sacrifice my pain to Him, then we can escape. We'll run away, and we can go to all those places we saw in books and on TV. We can have puppies without them being hung, without mom and dad watching us suffer every day, forced into dog bowls, whipped, and fed dog food."

"'Sister, someone must love us. All this suffering is just to lead us to a better life, a hopeful future.'"

Xiaokui took a deep, shaky breath. "I knew the teachers were teaching us this to give us hope."

"Hope is what makes the pain of torture bearable. With hope, we won't kill ourselves. We endure for the hope that things will get better, until the day of sacrifice comes."

"My brother really became a sacrifice, and I became his squire."

"On the day he was sent to the shrine for the sacrifice, I confirmed with the Bei Yuan family over and over: All it took was one painful sacrifice for my brother to receive a large sum of money, and they would no longer restrict his movements. He could leave Luming County whenever he wanted."

"I watched him walk into the shrine, and then I heard the sound of the shrine doors loosening. People around me were ecstatic, claiming that the Evil Lord had opened His eyes and stepped down from the shrine. I was excited too."

"But then my brother came out of the shrine, head down, hands trembling."

Xiaokui turned to Cang Tai, her tear-streaked face twisted into a half-smile, her voice hoarse.

"He looked up at me, his eyes blank. His hands were cold, like a corpse, and his speech was incoherent. His mouth dripped with saliva, but I could understand what he was trying to say. Years of knowing him, the things we shared, let me piece it together."

"He said, 'Sister, it was a trick. A lie.'"

"If the sacrifice's suffering doesn't move the Evil Lord, He won't open His eyes and grant the wish. The sacrifice won't leave."

"If the Evil Lord does open His eyes, the pain will drive the sacrifice mad, and we would die just from looking into His silver-blue eyes."

"We can't escape."

Xiaokui's laughter was wild, almost manic, as she broke into tears. "And then, after he came back, my brother hung himself outside my roof."

"Like a sunny doll."

She wriggled up from the ground, pushing herself up with trembling arms, her messy hair falling around her bloodless face. Her laughter was nervous, strained. "You tell me…" She looked at Cang Tai with hollow eyes, "How did Bai Six fall in love with Him? How did he become lovers with Him?"

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"Your brother is dead?!" Cang Tai's mind spun in disbelief. He staggered back two steps, eyes wide. "But Bai Six, my lord, said he was going to find your brother!"

Xiaokui turned her head slightly, lying on the ground, and let out an eerie, mindless laugh. Her entire body shook as she stifled the laughter, which seemed almost desperate. "Looking for my brother? Then he'll have to go to whatever shrine is filled with sacrificial tablets to find him."

"But right now, Bai Six can't see my brother through the shrine—only the remains of..."

Cang Tai's eyes widened in horror. "The spirits of the discontented?!"

"It's not my brother's spirit," Xiaokui smiled darkly, "He's not buried in the shrine. The Bei Yuan family doesn't allow sacrificial corpses inside their shrines."

Cang Tai blinked, stunned. "But isn't the shrine supposed to house the sacrifice? Why wouldn't the body be allowed?"

"How could they place a body in a sacrificial shrine?" Xiaokui rolled her eyes, giving Cang Tai a look of disdain. "Of course, they need something much worse than a mere body."

Xiaokui covered her mouth with a miserable blush, stifling a giggle. "Guess what they put in there?"

Outside the shrine, Bai Liu stood motionless.

As nightfall descended, the shrine grew quiet. A strange, pungent smell of blood seeped from the doorway, and through the paper-covered windows, a dark, writhing shape could be seen moving inside. Above the door, a thick, hand-rolled knotted rope hung at regular intervals, adorned with imperial rice paper—legend has it, this paper can seal away evil spirits.

And when the rope breaks, the demon is released.

Bai Liu raised his hand, breaking the rope, and calmly stepped into the night, entering the shrine.

A translucent wave of water rippled around him, expanding and dissipating, as the knotted rope snapped. Blood stained the imperial paper, and Bai Liu's temperature dropped several degrees. The shrine lit up, though no lights had been switched on.

The light wasn't that of a shrine lamp. Instead, it was a faint, flickering orange—a treacherous glow that resembled the reflection of a huge beast's eyes in the dark, radiating malice.

A gust of wind blew from the closed shrine, coming and going as if the shrine were breathing. It stirred the hem of Bai Liu's coat, carrying with it a strong, fishy scent, like the mouth of a vicious dog.

Bai Liu walked on, unfazed by the smell, his expression shallow. He approached the large wooden cabinet inside the shrine, offering a slight bow with folded hands, then raised his head, lifted the hem of his coat, and stepped onto the shrine.

The wind, like breath, paused momentarily, as if confused. Then it surged louder, howling like a dog baring its teeth at an intruder—snarling, warning, and growling in fury. A massive yellow eye appeared on the back of the wooden cabinet, staring maliciously at Bai Liu.

Unperturbed by the strange sights, Bai Liu climbed to the first level of the wooden cabinet and looked up, seeing the shrine placed at its highest point.

Inside the shrine, there was a black-and-white photograph of a young boy, no older than twelve or thirteen, with a babyish face, grinning in the picture.

—This was the only posthumous photograph of a smiling offering in the entire Bei Yuan family shrine.

Below the photograph was a tablet with the inscription [Bei Yuan Jiro].

Bai Liu reached up, without hesitation, and grabbed the black altar beneath the shrine. His fingers brushed the wet, blood-smeared carcass of an animal, which he then removed.

It was a tiny black Shiba Inu, its neck snapped unnaturally, soaked in some kind of embalming fluid.

The dog's limbs hung limply, its body dripping fluids onto the floor. Its once-bright yellow eyes were now a clouded, yellowish haze.

As Bai Liu lifted the corpse, the huge yellow eye behind him narrowed to a vertical slit. The iris flickered, and the light in the shrine dimmed. Something leapt out from behind the wooden cabinet, snarling at Bai Liu with sharp teeth.

In the pitch-blackness, a massive, beastly roar reverberated through the shrine.

Loft

Cang Tai scratched his head in anxiety. "Bai Six, is already in the shrine now. Xiaokui, please, tell me—what's really inside the shrine?"

"If there's no sacrificial corpse there, then why did that old servant say there are terrible spirits there and we shouldn't go out at night?"

Xiaokui curled her lips wryly. "Of course, there are spirits in the shrine. It's true the bodies of the sacrifices aren't there, but the bodies of pets with the same names as the sacrifices are."

"The evil spirits formed by animals are much more terrifying than those of humans."

Cang Tai, kneeling, was dumbfounded. "A pet's corpse?! How could it be the corpse of a pet?!"

Xiaokui raised an eyebrow. "A pet's corpse, of course."

"The Bei Yuan family tortures sacrifices every day. Why should they fear the spirits formed by the sacrifices? Even if a person turns into a ghost, it's the ghost that fears the person, right?"

Xiaokui's expression remained indifferent. "But animals are different."

"They don't remember as well as humans. Once they become spirits of grievance, they won't remember who tormented them in life. They'll only remember who their master was. The evil spirits they form will relentlessly attack humans near the shrine, trying to protect their master."

Cang Tai sat paralyzed, lost in thought. "Why is the shrine full of dead pets?"

Xiaokui replied, "Because the bodies of the sacrifices are not allowed in the shrine."

Confused, Cang Tai asked, "Why?"

Xiaokui laughed bitterly, choking on her laughter until tears flowed. "Because the shrine does not accept those who died in vain."

"The sacrifices here either couldn't endure the pain and killed themselves before the evil sacrifice, or they endured the pain and successfully became part of the evil sacrifice, but killed themselves because they saw the evil god's eyes and went mad."

"Anyone who commits suicide is unclean and cannot enter the shrine to receive offerings."

Her expression turned fierce as she pounded the floor, cursing viciously. "But these bastards from the Bei Yuan family, who obviously take pleasure in the suffering of the sacrifices, pretend to glorify their pain by erecting a plaque to honor their 'contribution' to the family. As if their suffering wasn't suffering, as if it was a voluntary sacrifice!"

"Even the standing shrines for sacrifices—most of these sacrifices died tragically by suicide. They don't follow the rules of shrine holiness!"

"That's when the family came up with a solution." Xiaokui sat up, propping herself up on the floor. Her gaze was cold and emotionless as she stared at Cang Tai. "They decided to replace the sacrifices with substitutes to be put in the shrine and receive worship."

Taking a shaky breath, Xiaokui continued, "I was going to bury my brother's body by the sea, but the Bei Yuan family said they would let my brother enter a shrine where he could be worshipped and appreciated forever. They promised that after committing suicide, my brother's vengeful spirit could become a Buddha instead of being trapped as an earthbound spirit in their family."

"As much as I hate them, I want my brother to escape here—even if he has to be a ghost, I just want him to leave."

"So I agreed and let them take my brother's remains."

Xiaokui's lips twisted into a smile, but it was hollow. "My brother had a Shiba Inu with the same name as me. Mine died, but his is still alive."

"After my brother died, that Shiba Inu stayed under the same roof where my brother hung. It didn't eat or drink for over three days until I force-fed it to keep it alive."

"Then, it seemed to realize my brother was gone. It would eat when I gave it food, but mostly it stayed by the eaves, staring."

Xiaokui's eyes welled with tears. "It was a very docile dog. It never hurt anyone, even when beaten. But after my brother's death, when the Bei Yuan family tortured me, it would rush at them, showing its teeth, trying to protect me. It wouldn't back down, even after being beaten several times. It was stubborn—just like my brother was when he was alive."

"It would always follow me around, but when they were about to take my brother's body to the shrine, I couldn't find it anywhere."

"I searched everywhere. I shouted its name—'Jiro! Jiro! Where are you? Come out, Jiro!'"

"I searched from dawn till dusk, shouting until it was dark, but still no sign of it."

Xiaokui leaned closer to Cang Tai, her smile twisted and grotesque, tears streaking down her face. "And then I finally found it."

"They told me to go to the shrine to worship my brother, and as I walked there, worried about Jiro, I entered the shrine and saw [Jiro]."

"Jiro had been strangled, his neck broken and sealed up!"

Xiaokui's sobs were heart-wrenching. "They chose an animal — a pet — when there were so many other alternatives!"

"They just want us, the living, to keep suffering. To become sacrifices in the next round!"

Her voice cracked as she continued, tears flowing freely. "After that, I heard rumors about spirits of resentment."

"I know that it's Jiro's ghost, transformed into a vengeful spirit, guarding my brother's shrine day and night. Anyone who dares to look at him, anyone but me, will be chased and dragged into the shrine, torn apart."

Xiaokui suddenly burst into a frantic laugh, her face streaked with tears, her eyes distant. "If Bai Six had gone to the shrine, he would have been eaten by [Jiro] before even meeting the evil god!"

"What!? I need to warn Lord Bai Six about this!" Cang Tai panicked, scrambling to climb out the window.

But as soon as he stood, Xiaokui lunged and grabbed him by the ankle, pulling him back to the ground.

With a wild, tear-streaked grin, she looked up at him, her expression maddened. "[Jiro] hasn't been fed in a long time."

"Instead of letting your Lord Bai Six become a painful sacrifice to the Bei Yuan family's cause, why not let him feed [Jiro] well?"

Bai Liu sat casually on the floor of the shrine, his left hand gently stroking a large black Shiba Inu beside him.

The Shiba Inu had golden pupils and exuded an unsettling aura of resentment. Its white neck bones were clearly visible, yet it continued to nudge its head against Bai Liu's hand, sticking its tongue out and offering its bony neck for more attention.

When the Shiba Inu suddenly flopped onto Bai Liu's coat, it seemed to catch a strange scent and immediately bared its teeth. But as Bai Liu reached over, it sniffed his hand twice in confusion before lying back down and exposing its belly.

The process repeated itself, over and over.

The Shiba Inu was unfamiliar with the scent on Bai Liu's body, but the scent on his hands was unmistakable—it was the scent of Xiaokui, its owner's sister.

Bai Liu glanced down at what he was holding—a roll of soft, fine hair that he had taken from the outer curtain of the window, which had been thrown down by the pale lady who had climbed up.

It was Xiaokui's hair, one of the weaknesses of this [Black Dog Grudge] monster.

From the two Shiba Inu-shaped stone lanterns in front of Bei Yuan's house, where the previous year's offering had been Xiaokui's brother, to the photo of the highest offering at the shrine, which resembled Xiaokui, the old servant had mentioned that the shrine did not accept people who had died in vain. Yet, the offering here was Xiaokui's brother. All this information combined gave Bai Liu enough to deduce the location of the key.

Bai Liu slowly slipped two fingers through the Shiba Inu's teeth, gently sliding them down its throat to remove an antique key wrapped in plastic.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for completing the side quest - Stealing the key to Bei Yuan's shrine.]

[Two tips:]

[1. Player Bai Liu can now use the Shrine Key to open the Shrine and meet the evil gods, but doing so carries a greater risk of losing your spirit level. Please choose your path carefully.

2. Every morning at five o'clock, the master of the Bei Yuan family will come to the shrine to pay his respects and check the key inside the black dog's corpse. Be sure to return the key before then.]

Bai Liu placed the hair on the tip of the black dog's nose, then turned and walked out of the shrine, alone in the night. His thin, almost transparent white coat barely disturbed the air as he moved toward the shrine above Bei Yuan's house.

Cang Tai, struggling on the windowsill, suddenly saw a dim light on the road leading to the shrine.

She jerked Cang Tai away, staring in shock at the light that was approaching. "Bai Six actually got the key...?"

"Doesn't he want to die? He's heading straight for the shrine with the key," Xiaokui muttered. "Isn't he afraid the evil gods will drive him mad?"

"Or maybe he's already crazy because of the evil god," Xiaokui added absently, watching the light draw closer to the shrine.

"Maybe they shouldn't really be lovers," she said quietly.

Cang Tai, arguing softly, replied, "I told you, Lord Evil is Lord Bai Six's lover."

Xiaokui paused for a moment, then spoke with sudden calm, "So what if they're lovers? Even if he opens the shrine, he won't see the evil gods."

Cang Tai asked incredulously, "Why not?!"

Xiaokui sneered, her gaze cold. "This evil god only opens his eyes when someone suffers enough. The rest of the time, he's a corpse—sealed in a massive shrine. No one can wake him up."

"The Bei Yuan family tried various methods to force the evil god awake once they had the key," Xiaokui continued. "But all they accomplished was alienating those who came near, turning them into monsters, driving them to suicide, or being killed."

She fixed her gaze on the shimmering light at the top of the hill, her tone as cold as her stare. "That is a cruel and evil god."

"It's dangerous to get involved with someone like that," she muttered. "Thinking he can love someone... that's just wishful thinking."

Cang Tai's face flushed with anger. She swung her fist, shouting, "No! Lord Bai Six said they are lovers! A pair!"

Xiaokui glanced at Cang Tai before turning her attention back to the light at the hilltop, her expression lost in thought, as though in a trance, or perhaps asking a question.

"Can an evil god who feeds on human suffering truly understand love... and how to love someone?"

Bai Liu tilted his head, gazing at the closed door before him. With a flicker of light, he slid the key into the lock and turned it.

"Squeak!"

The door creaked open, dust and dead leaves falling as Bai Liu stepped inside, holding a flickering gas lamp. He passed through door after door, ward after ward, until he reached a shrine hut with flying eaves.

In front of the hut was a money box. Through the top compartment, Bai Liu could see scattered coins—offering tokens people used to make wishes to the evil gods.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze to the coin hanging over his heart—his game manager.

It turned out that the coin, the human God Xiang wish-granting parasite, was the reason the system manager appeared as it did when the players entered the evil god's game.

—Because this coin was the medium through which people made their wishes to the evil one.

Bai Liu raised his head as he circled the ringing bell, stepped over the cipher, and pushed open the last wooden door to finally enter the shrine.

The interior was spacious, with tatami mats spread across the floor. Directly opposite were two wooden doors, set a distance apart and closed in the center, likely leading into a larger shrine, depending on the style.

If there were no surprises, Xie Ta would be inside.

Bai Liu paused in front of the shrine and reached out to open the door. However, the moment his hand touched the door’s handle, it felt as though time had frozen. His hand hung motionless in mid-air for several moments.

Bai Liu rarely hesitated, as there were few things in this world that could make him do so.

But pushing open this wooden door—at this moment—was one of those things.

He lowered his eyes to his hand, still paused in front of the door.

The Xie Ta of this game world would be the same as the Xie Ta from the other worlds before they met. In other words, the Xie Ta of old.

No matter how much Bai Liu had pried, Xie Ta had never revealed anything about his past. Now, this mystery was finally unfolding in front of him.

What would the former Xie Ta—who had been killed by [him]—be like when they met again?

Would he kill him? Would he hate him? Or would he simply pretend he didn’t exist, as he had with [Bai Six] in this world line?

It was reminiscent of how Xie Ta had treated the other children at the orphanage.

He ignored everyone—children, investors, everything around him—existing in the world like a statue, never acknowledging any human being.

It was from Xie Ta that Bai Liu first understood that there seemed to be no room for humans in God's eyes—not out of arrogance, but simply because…

He was incapable of generating affection.

Bai Liu still didn't understand why, of all the humans, of all the children, of all the [Bai Six], Xie Ta would choose to look at him.

He had asked Xie Ta, who had paused thoughtfully before responding, "The problem isn't with me. It's with you, Bai Six."

At the time, Bai Liu had found it amusing. "How could the problem be mine?"

Xie Ta had looked at him seriously, "Yes."

"Because the way you look at me, no matter what time of day it is, I'm bound to turn back."

"Something like a look doesn't convince me." Bai Liu had propped his chin up and smiled lazily. "How do you tell the difference between the way I look at you and the way others do? Can you even tell when someone who looks exactly like me is looking at you?"

"I can." Xie Ta had gazed at him with his silvery-blue eyes. "Because you are different."

"No matter how many [Bai Sixes] there are, you're the only one who looks at me differently."

"The moment you looked at me with those eyes, I was given your soul, and I developed feelings."

"It's because of you that I have a soul."

Bai Liu pushed open the shrine door, and a blinding light flooded out from within.

Beyond the shrine, there was a backyard. In the soft moonlight, a man sat on the veranda. His silver-blue curls fell to his waist, shimmering faintly.

He wore a wide kimono, looking no older than eighteen or nineteen, his long body draped in graceful folds. Golden chains trailed behind him, jangling lightly as he moved. He appeared to be engrossed in a book.

In the center of the backyard was a large goldfish pond, the bright orange and red fish swimming gracefully, their flower-like tails stirring the water into shimmering ripples. The light reflected off the water and the pages of the book, illuminating the quiet side of the man's face. His long lashes fluttered like snowflakes, catching the moonlight.

Bai Liu stopped behind him, close enough to almost glimpse the book he was reading.

The night breeze rustled the trees, and their wide, gauzy tunics fluttered in the wind, merging together like leaves caught in a breeze.

The man put down his book and turned back to the table. His eyes, familiar and silvery-blue, met Bai Liu's gaze through the gauzy fabric.

The breeze swirled between them, and Xie Ta looked at Bai Liu with a calm expression. He raised the book, now broken and reassembled, in his hand.

"I haven't seen you before. Is this your first time at the shrine?" he asked, his voice light.

"Want to read it together?"

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The moonlight shines on the surface of the pond where goldfish swim, creating a fractured, shimmering light.

The silhouettes of two people reflect on the glistening water as they sit close together, reading a book. A soft night breeze stirs their quiet conversations, and in the stillness, the only sounds are the gentle flow of water and the distant chirping of birds.

"How did this book get torn up?"

"A child from the orphanage I was at tore it up and threw it in the pond. But I really liked it, so I picked it up and glued it back together."

"Why did he tear up your book?"

"I don't know. Maybe he doesn't like me or my books. After all, no one likes a monster that won't die."

Xie Ta says this in a light, casual tone, as if it's nothing significant.

Bai Liu's voice pauses for a moment. "How did you end up here?"

Xie Ta lowers his eyelashes. "The kid who tore up my book cut me up and pushed me into the water. I drifted with the current for a long, long time, slowly piecing myself back together. By the time I regained consciousness, I was in this shrine."

"Have you ever thought about..." Bai Liu turns his head, looking at the side of Xie Ta's face. "Leaving here?"

Xie Ta turns to meet his gaze. "I can't leave."

He opens his arms slightly, and in the reflection of the moonlight, Bai Liu catches a glimpse of the millions of silver threads wrapped around Xie Ta's body. The strings stretch through the air from all directions in the shrine, tying around his wrists, ankles, limbs, and torso, constricting him tightly.

"This is the puppet string the gods have tied to me," Xie Ta says, his voice flat. "Because I haven't met God's expectations, I am here to be refined until I become a competent evil god."

Bai Liu looks at him. "A qualified evil god?"

Xie Ta turns his head, his eyes calmly watching the goldfish swimming in the pond. "A vessel for all desires, strengthened by the pain of human sacrifice, capable of turning the world upside down into an evil game."

"I couldn’t do it, so I was banished."

Bai Liu’s eyes darken. "Banished from what?"

Xie Ta falls silent for a moment. "I don’t remember."

"All I remember is being covered with a white cloth, unable to move. A man would visit me every day, asking if I wanted to become an evil god."

"Each time I answered no, he would carve and trim my face and body with instruments through the cloth, then leave, returning the next day to ask me again. Eventually, he sighed and told me, 'You will never have a soul in my hands. You need to go through the experience.' And so, I was banished."

Bai Liu asks, "Why didn’t you want to become an evil god?"

Xie Ta pauses. "Because I don’t understand it."

"Every sacrifice that comes to the shrine to see me—those who awaken me from my slumber—carry the desire for extreme pain."

"They approach me, push aside my slumbering shrine, and look up at me with obscured eyes. They kneel before me, praying with tears, or curse and force me to fulfill their desires."

"But I don't have the power to grant wishes. Only true evil gods do."

"If the pain of these sacrifices meets God's standards, God will be satisfied and grant their wishes. But in doing so, God transfers their pain, desires, and memories to me, making me feel the agony they have endured."

"God always says that pain makes the soul worthy, that I need pain to carve it up."

Looking down at the carefree goldfish swimming in the pond, Xie Ta extends his fingers and taps the surface of the water. The ripples spread out, and the goldfish scatter as he continues.

"But no matter how much human suffering and desire I take in, I’m like an inferior funnel—unable to hold or use it to become an evil god."

"I don't understand human desire or pain, and the one who carved me said I have the most evil and powerful body in the world, yet I'm a failed vessel—unable to contain any evil."

"He said it was because I had no soul, and that pain means nothing to a soulless monster."

"I don't understand why people desire and suffer, nor why, despite it all, they continue to pray to the evil gods who torment them to fulfill their wishes."

"Why not just give up?"

Xie Ta turns to look at Bai Liu, gently placing his hand on the back of Bai Liu's hand, gazing at him earnestly. "Bai Liu, you came to me and awakened me. Can you tell me what desire you have that must be fulfilled, no matter the pain?"

"Can you tell me why you won't give up on this desire?"

Bai Liu avoids Xie Ta's gaze, lowering his eyes and pulling his hand back. His fingers curl slightly, and he mutters softly.

Xie Ta leans forward, his curiosity shining through as he stares into Bai Liu's eyes. "Why won't you give up on this desire, no matter how painful it is?"

Bai Liu pauses, his tone shallow. "Probably because the pain of losing this person is more intense than the pain of never having them."

Xie Ta falls silent.

Slowly, he straightens up, pulling his hand away from Bai Liu's and distancing himself. He furrows his brow as he looks at the reflection of his trembling bare feet in the water, the chains rattling around his limbs.

Xie Ta asks softly, almost rhetorically, "Bai Liu's desire... is it a person?"

"It's rare, isn't it? To feel such pain for only one person that it wakes you up."

Xie Ta lowers his eyes. "Can you describe the pain you feel for this person? What kind of pain would make you come to pray to the evil god?"

Bai Liu, too, lowers his gaze, staring at Xie Ta's reflection on the water. Turning slightly sideways, he speaks calmly. "Probably painful enough to become an evil god."

Xie Ta's eyes widen, and he turns to look at Bai Liu's face. But Bai Liu stands up, says indifferently, "It's getting late. I have to go." He turns to leave.

"Please wait!" Xie Ta reaches out, trying to grab Bai Liu as he turns away.

But the moment his hand stretches out, countless threads surge, wrapping tightly around his wrist and halting just as his fingertips brush the fluttering hem of Bai Liu's shirt.

Xie Ta's fingers stretch white with the effort, but he still gently and firmly grips Bai Liu's shirt, tugging it as he tilts his head back to look at him. His tone is light. "Will you come back tomorrow?"

Bai Liu pauses but doesn't look back. "Do you want me to come?"

Xie Ta's long eyelashes tremble. "Yes."

Bai Liu's tone is flat. "I'll be here tomorrow night, then."

As Bai Liu pushes open the shrine door and disappears from view, Xie Ta, still restrained by the puppet strings, feels a wave of sleepiness. Slowly, he collapses onto the wooden floor, his books scattered around him.

This was the first time he'd seen a sacrifice wake him up simply by walking into the shrine.

The sacrifice, Bai Liu, looked into his eyes—calmly, despite the intense desire and pain within him. He didn't lose himself to it; he simply stared back, unmoved, as the terrible evil god.

—That look was full of emotions Xie Ta didn't understand.

He would love to see it again.

Xie Ta leaned against the old wooden board, staring in the direction Bai Liu had gone. He slowly closed his eyes.

Bai Liu descended the hill with his nightlight, returned to the shrine, and put away the key. He then went back to the attic where he lived. When he opened the door, a startled Cang Tai lit up upon seeing him, slapping his chest in relief. "You're back at last! It's almost dawn!"

Cang Tai then worriedly told Bai Liu what Xiaokui had said to him, and Bai Liu nodded, much as he had expected.

"Then won't we be tortured during the day too?" Cang Tai said, already anxious as he thought about the scenarios Xiaokui had described.

"You're a squire. Don't worry too much," Bai Liu said, unzipping his tunic and placing it next to his pillow. With his eyes closed, he prepared to sleep. "They'll mainly focus on torturing the sacrifice."

There were many words on his lips, but in the end, none came out—just a long, quiet sigh.

It was clear he would be tormented by the twisted Bei Yuan family members, but he still fell asleep quickly and easily.

He, as a squire, hadn't even slept the night before.

Lord Bai Liu, as a sacrifice, had a good heart...

"Oh, yeah. I'm going to break into the shrine tomorrow night and steal the key." Bai Liu suddenly spoke, eyes still closed. "The black dog spirits at the shrine recognize their owners. I need something that smells like Xiaokui. Did you steal Xiaokui's clothes and bring them back?"

Cang Tai slapped his forehead in realization. "I almost forgot! I brought them back!"

Then, as Cang Tai processed it, he gasped in shock. "What! You're going to steal the shrine key tomorrow night?!"

"Mm." Bai Liu snorted lazily, rolling over to sleep. "He's stuck there and can't leave. That'll have to do for now."

Bai Liu fell asleep quickly, leaving a nervous Cang Tai anxiously biting his hand, lost in thought.

Second Night

The bandages were being applied to Bai Liu's shoulders, but blood seeped through as soon as they were wrapped. How could they lynch you like this right out of the gate?!

Bai Liu appeared unfazed as he donned his coat after securing the straps and stood up. "I'm leaving."

Although he had managed to use Liu Jiayi's panel to heal the wound earlier, in this situation, quickly healing it wouldn't be ideal for a sacrifice.

Cang Tai knelt anxiously at Bai Liu's feet. "Bai Six, sir, you returned last night and barely slept. Then, during the day, you were... taken by Bei Yuan's family. Are you still going tonight?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied succinctly.

One Hour Later

Xiaokui, bored and lying by the window, was topless. Her back, much like Bai Liu's, was covered in fresh knife cuts, still raw and exposed to the air, untreated.

She stared out the window, one hand propping her chin, lost in thought. Suddenly, something caught her eye, and her gaze froze as she noticed a small, dark figure on the road leading up to the shrine at the top of the hill.

Again? Xiaokui's face twisted in shock as she frowned. Does this guy have a death wish? He was just tortured during the day, and now he's going back out there at night?

Bai Liu pushed open the door of the shrine, following the same path as yesterday. He stepped inside, pushing open the shrine's door.

The moonlight was clear, and Xie Ta was still sitting in the same position, looking back at him. Bai Liu stepped onto the old wooden planks of the veranda, and a wave of dizziness hit him.

The blood loss from his wounds, the chase with the black dog, and the rush to reach the shrine had left him slightly lightheaded. He steadied himself against the pillar at the entrance, trying to regain his balance.

Xie Ta instantly sensed something was wrong. He frowned and stepped forward, reaching out to support Bai Liu, who was swaying on the edge of collapse.

A small, delicate dress with cherry blossoms embroidered on the chest slowly slipped out of Bai Liu's sleeve and floated to the ground.

Xie Ta and Bai Liu’s gazes met at the same time.

This was the dress Bai Liu had used to deceive the black dog's spirits, which Cang Tai had hastily stolen from Xiaokui’s attic.

It was a woman's undergarment.

Xie Ta slowly withdrew his hand and tucked it back into his sleeve, his eyes fixed on the dress. "...Is this the clothing of the person, whom you can’t restrain your desires?"

"You’re carrying it with you?"

Bai Liu didn’t respond.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"It's not her," Bai Liu said plainly. "This is Beiyuan Xiaokui, another sacrifice's clothing."

"She and I never interacted at Bei Yuan's. These clothes just ended up with me for some random reason."

"Beiyuan Xiaokui?" Xie Ta echoed.

Bai Liu's sharp gaze lifted. "You know her?"

Xie Ta shook his head slightly, his eyes meeting Bai Liu's evenly. "I haven't seen Beiyuan Xiaokui in this world line yet," he said. "But I have met her before."

"She was brought to me by another child."

"Who?" Bai Liu asked.

Xie Ta was silent for a few seconds before answering. "In every world line, God creates a derivative of Himself—one that grows up in that world. And when this derivative reaches around fourteen years old, he finds his way to me at the orphanage."

"Though derivatives are creatures of God, they inherit His innate hunger for greed and power. They plunder, they destroy, they are ruthless and dominant in every world line."

"Like me, each derivative is a candidate to inherit the role of the evil god. But we both share the same fatal flaw that keeps us from becoming one."

Xie Ta's voice softened as he looked at Bai Liu. "Neither of us has a soul."

"To correct this, God devised two different methods for us to gain souls in each world line."

"He first exposes us to a large number of humans, waiting to see if we develop emotions toward one of them. That person becomes our [anchor]."

"Once we have an [anchor], we go from being soulless creatures of God to potential successors of the evil god—with a soul."

Xie Ta lowered his eyes. "After that, the evil gods create elaborate games, forcing us to destroy—"

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. "—Destroy your [anchors], and in the agony of losing them, make your souls 'complete.' That's the goal, isn't it?"

"Yes." Xie Ta turned his head slightly, watching Bai Liu. "God calls it the 'shaping influence'—the destruction and reconstruction of the soul through loss."

Bai Liu averted his eyes, his tone light and mocking. "Sounds like the kind of experiment an evil god would come up with just to pass the time."

Xie Ta didn't refute him. Instead, he sat casually by the cloister, his knees bent as he gazed up at the moon. His expression was unreadable. "But the experiment never worked on me."

"No matter how many people the evil gods threw into my path, I never found my [anchor]."

Bai Liu's voice was quiet but firm. "Not only that. You became an [anchor] yourself—for one of God's derivatives, didn't you?"

Xie Ta hesitated, then nodded. "Yes."

"Because we were created as competing products, even when He lost his memories at the start of a new world line, his curiosity about me was stronger than for anyone else."

"He would watch me. The books I read, the places I went, how I reacted when touched, the food I ate, my expression when I was punished. Even—"

Bai Liu's voice remained eerily flat. "Even the pinholes in your body. The eyes you deliberately covered. He stood at your bedside while you slept, leaning down to count the flutter of your eyelids, the rhythm of your heartbeat. He memorized the exact temperature of your skin."

Xie Ta's fingers curled slightly where they rested beside Bai Liu. His gaze dropped to the pond below, where goldfish swam lazily beneath his chained feet.

Bai Liu turned his head, watching him. "After observing you for so long, He realized you were different from the greedy, lust-filled people around him. He fixated on you. Developed some… unusual desire to be near you. That’s why you became His [anchor], isn't it?"

Xie Ta’s long hair swayed in the wind as he responded lightly, almost cryptically. "That’s true. But not quite how you put it."

He met Bai Liu’s eyes, his silver-blue gaze shimmering in the moonlight. "Derivatives don’t 'feel' the way you’re suggesting. That kind of desire doesn’t apply to them."

"To be an [anchor] doesn’t require positive emotions. Extreme negative emotions can shape a soul just the same."

"Every derivative in every world line only feels one thing toward me."

Xie Ta’s voice was soft, almost gentle. "Killing intent."

"His hunger for wealth makes him view me as an obstacle. I am the [anchor] that tethers his desires, and the moment He kills me—discards me—He is free."

"The [anchor] sinks, and He sails forward, filled with His own desires. He enters the game that God has already laid out for Him, walks the path set in stone, and ascends to the top—becoming the king of the world line."

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly. "Then God should be satisfied. He found His perfect heir, didn't He?"

Xie Ta shook his head. "God is not satisfied."

"The last derivative who stood before Him possessed a soul—but it was empty. A vessel filled with nothing but desire. There wasn’t a shred of pain inside it."

"And a soul without pain is worthless to Him."

Xie Ta's voice was quiet, but final. "So He keeps trying. Keeps opening new world lines. Keeps experimenting—with His derivatives, with me, and with every human trapped in this world."

Xie Ta spoke in a calm, measured tone. "Of all God's experiments, I am the only creation that has failed to find its [anchor]."

"God exiled me to countless places, made me meet countless people, hoping I would find it."

"But I still cannot understand human desires or feelings."

"So God sent me further, so that I might comprehend the depths of human longing and sin." Xie Ta lowered his lashes slightly. "He cast me beneath the sea, into the heart of the earth, to a universe 13.7 billion light-years away—and then transformed my body into a seat."

"Under His hand, I became a monster, a creature of inherent evil."

"The gods say that when human desire touches me, it breeds boundless suffering and hell. That because I am a god who receives humanity's faith, I must also bear responsibility for the tragedies born of my own evil."

"Anyone who comes near me will have their deepest, most depraved desires drawn from their subconscious. When those desires grow strong enough, or when enough people surround me—once the sum of their desires surpasses a threshold set by some cruel god—my body will transform, fragmenting into instruments that fulfill their longing."

"When these [tools] seep into human society, they heretically warp people into creatures like me."

"In response, humanity formed an organization to combat these [tools] and the monsters they create."

Xie Ta lifted his gaze. "Within this organization, they call these [tools] —and those who are altered by them—heretics."

"I am the sum of all heretics, the being they most wish to destroy."

"In every worldline, on every path God has laid before me, regardless of who they are—good or evil, powerful or weak—whenever people look upon me, they are left with only two thoughts: to dismantle me or to annihilate me."

"When they meet my eyes, they experience only one extreme emotion —"

"—fear."

Xie Ta's eyes remained half-lidded, the moonlight washing over his face. His long, silver-blue hair shimmered, glowing faintly, casting him in an ethereal pallor. Beneath the light, he looked as flawless as a jade carving, so still that, save for the subtle movement of his lips, one might not even realize the god whispering before them was alive.

"God sees humanity as a mirror."

"When a person stands before a mirror and directs an emotion toward it, the mirror reflects that emotion back. If one harbors hatred, the reflection returns that same hatred.

"The first emotion God wanted me to possess was fear. So He made all who stood before me afraid, hoping I would reflect their terror and, in doing so, develop a soul powerful enough to become an evil god—a being feared by all."

"But no matter how many people cowered before me, I could never understand what they were feeling. I could not mirror their emotions, nor could I create them within myself. And so, I was never able to form a soul of my own."

"God calls me a broken mirror, incapable of reflecting what stands before it."

Xie Ta turned his head, his gaze falling upon Bai Liu. The wind stirred his hair and the leaves, shifting like dark clouds across Bai Liu's vision, as light as the tone of Xie Ta's voice.

"But Bai Liu is different."

"When Bai Liu looks at me, I feel something unfamiliar."

Xie Ta braced a hand against the wall of the corridor, leaning in. His silver-blue eyes dilated as he approached, catching the moonlight and water's reflection—bright yet unfathomable, like an ambiguous haze. And yet, his gaze remained as clear as a still pond, untouched by understanding.

"This feeling makes me want to watch you all the time, to sit beside you and read, to visit the places you frequent, to know how you react when others touch you, to know what kind of food you've eaten—"

"—to undress you and examine the wounds you try to hide, to stand by your bedside after you've fallen asleep, to lean down and count the minute flutter of your eyelashes, the steady rhythm of your heartbeat, to touch you differently than I ever have—"

"—to feel warmth."

Xie Ta reached out, fingers brushing against Bai Liu's face as if he were touching the surface of a pond, as gentle and careful as one would be with a goldfish. His eyes lowered, his voice quiet, yet weighted with sincerity.

"Bai Liu, can you tell me—what is this feeling? The one that refracts from you to me whenever you look at me—the one that makes me feel... strange?"

Bai Liu's heart skipped a beat.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Bai Liu turned his head slightly, his gaze dropping to avoid Xie Ta's eyes. He stood up quickly, his tone steady.

"It's morning. I'm going back."

Xie Ta tilted his head, his silver-blue eyes reflecting both the dim moon above and Bai Liu standing at the edge of the veranda. His voice was soft.

"So... are you coming back tomorrow?"

Bai Liu remained silent. He didn't ask, Do you want me to come? like he had the night before. But Xie Ta, as if reading the unspoken question, answered naturally,

"I want you to come tomorrow."

The light in his eyes flickered, catching the pale glow of the clouds at dawn.

"I want you to come every day."

"So I can see you every day."

Bai Liu's breath hitched for a moment. His fingers curled at his side. When he spoke again, his voice was flat, distant—like that of a stranger.

"Why do you need to see me every day?"

"I'm just an ordinary sacrifice."

"An evil god like you has no reason to waste so much curiosity and attention on someone as insignificant as me."

Xie Ta studied him intently.

"That is… if you were just an ordinary sacrifice."

"Then why did you steal the key and come to see me the night before?"

"We were already going to meet at the Evil God Festival in a few months, weren't we?"

Bai Liu stiffened.

Xie Ta suddenly smiled. His long lashes trembled as he glanced at Bai Liu's right hand, which was curled slightly behind his back. Then, lifting his own left hand, he slipped his fingers between Bai Liu's, slowly interlocking them.

"You were the one who woke me up with pain to come and see me," he murmured. "And now you're asking me—an evil god who knows nothing—why I want to see you day after day."

"I'm just a flawed, imperfect mirror."

Xie Ta lifted his gaze, his silver-blue eyes meeting Bai Liu's.

"So naturally, the reason I want to see Bai Liu… is the same reason Bai Liu wants to see me."

"Can I wait for you tomorrow night?"

Bai Liu's lips pressed into a thin line. His grip on Xie Ta's cold fingers tightened for a fleeting second—before he let go. Without another word, he turned and strode toward the exit of the God Xiang Society, leaving behind only a single, emotionless sentence.

"I won't be here tomorrow night, so you don't have to wait."

Xie Ta's hand was left empty as he slowly leaned back against the veranda.

The wind stirred the trees in the courtyard, sending leaves drifting down, rippling the pond's surface.

Behind him, Bai Liu heard the faint rattle of chains. He recognized the sound—the chains around Xie Ta's feet, dragging across the ground, then tensing as if being pulled taut.

Xie Ta was following him.

Bai Liu didn't turn around. He simply stopped in his tracks. The lingering cold of Xie Ta's fingertips still pressed against his skin. Closing his eyes, he exhaled slowly before asking,

"What did you want to say to me?"

A pause. Then, in a whisper,

"I don’t understand."

Xie Ta’s voice was quiet, uncertain.

"I could sense that you wanted to come see me."

"But… why didn’t you?"

Another pause.

"Are you angry?"

"I'm not angry," Bai Liu said after a few seconds of silence. "But I’m not particularly pleased, either."

"It’s true—I’ll do anything to see someone if I want to see them." His voice was calm, measured. "But if that person only sees me because I want to see them… it feels like I’m giving something without receiving anything equal in return."

"Because that’s not a fair deal."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes.

"You’re only reflecting my feelings for you."

Xie Ta’s voice softened. "Then… what is an equal deal?"

Bai Liu finally turned. His expression was unreadable as he gazed into Xie Ta’s clear, emotionless eyes.

"I need you to want to see me."

"If one day, the Lord of Evil himself desires to see me, then naturally, I will come to see you."

With that, Bai Liu picked up the lantern by the door. He bowed slightly, his tone polite and detached.

"Good morning, Lord Evil. I have a lesson in sacrifice to attend."

"I’ll be leaving now."

Xiaokui, propped up by the attic window and stifling a yawn, raised an eyebrow as she watched Bai Liu approach with a lantern in hand.

"You're early today."

Bai Liu stepped into the attic where he lived, gingerly set the lantern down, undressed, and lay down on the tatami.

Despite his careful movements, Cang Tai stirred beside him. Blinking groggily, he turned his head and immediately stiffened. Bai Liu was lying on his back, staring at the ceiling with dark, unreadable eyes. His expression was so empty that it sent a chill down Cang Tai's spine. Rubbing his arms, he hesitantly asked,

"...Lord Bai Six? Are you in a bad mood?"

Bai Liu murmured, "Sort of."

Cang Tai, still groggy but now intrigued, scooted closer. "Why? Didn't you just meet the Evil God-sama?"

Yesterday, Bai Liu had come back from his meeting in an uncharacteristically good mood. But tonight…

"Because I hate it when people like me just because I like them," Bai Liu said flatly. "That kind of affection is cheap. It's not even as solid as a transaction—it's the same as how people give affection to a dog."

Cang Tai reeled. "What do you mean, 'the same as a dog'?! Dogs are adorable! I love dogs!"

Bai Liu gave him a sideways glance. "Then why do you like dogs?"

Cang Tai blinked, caught off guard. "Because they're cute, obviously!"

Bai Liu turned his gaze back to the ceiling. "No. People like animals because they assume the animals will love them back. That's why they choose ones they can discard if they don't—like dogs, cats, rabbits."

"Because these animals have no real power to resist humans. Their only two options are to be domesticated or abandoned."

Cang Tai's pupils trembled. He opened his mouth to argue, but no words came out.

Because… wasn't that true?

What would he do if he had a dog that didn't love him? If the dog bit him every day, bared its teeth, hurt him and his family over and over?

Cang Tai faltered. The honest answer sat like a stone in his throat. He'd give the dog away. Maybe worse.

“That’s why humans choose ‘safe’ pets to love,” Bai Liu continued softly. “It’s all about minimizing risk while maximizing return.”

“That’s not all it is!” Cang Tai protested, scrambling for a counterpoint. “I genuinely love dogs for their personalities too!”

Bai Liu glanced at him. “If you had to choose between two pets—one a dog with a snake’s temperament, the other a highly venomous lizard with a dog’s personality—which would you pick?”

Cang Tai hesitated. “...The dog.”

Bai Liu didn’t pause. “And if you had the option to pick neither?”

Cang Tai instantly snapped, “Then I’d pick neither!”

Bai Liu let out a slow exhale, resting his scarred arm over his eyes. His voice was so calm it was almost unsettling.

“But I picked the lizard with the poison.”

Cang Tai was stunned. “?! Why? If you could choose neither, why —?!”

“Because I didn’t want to choose either,” Bai Liu murmured, “but I still fell in love with that lizard. And when you love something, you want to keep it.”

Cang Tai took a shaky step back, swallowing hard. "Lord Bai Six… you fell in love with… a lizard?"

Bai Liu didn’t acknowledge the shock in Cang Tai’s voice. He just continued.

"But this lizard doesn’t know he's human. So he has no way of giving me the same… human affection.”

Cang Tai’s breath caught in his throat.

"I'm probably the only human in the world who would keep such a lizard—one that could poison everyone just by looking at them."

Bai Liu's voice grew quieter. “He only knows that I'm the one person who will reach out, touch him, stay with him forever. So he comes close to me, holds me, treats me well… the same way a person would feel fondness for a dog that licks their hand.”

He took a slow breath.

“Even gods must feel this way toward those who are weaker than them.”

His breathing became uneven, his hand clenching into a fist over his eyes. His voice wavered.

"But he still doesn’t understand what it means to me."

His chest rose and fell erratically. Then, silence.

Cang Tai thought Bai Liu had finally fallen asleep when, after a long, long pause, he heard a hoarse whisper.

“This is the most unfair deal I’ve ever made.”

A bitter chuckle.

“I can’t believe I ended up loving a god the way someone loves a dog.”

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Third Night
Xiaokui, growing more and more bored, lay sprawled on the windowsill. When she saw Bai Liu approaching the shrine with a lantern, she sighed, resting her chin on her palm.

"There you go again."

But then, something unusual happened. She straightened up, surprised—Bai Liu had stopped at the shrine's entrance. He stood there, lantern in hand, without pushing open the door.

An hour passed.

Two hours passed.

Bai Liu remained motionless in the long, dark night, his dim lantern flickering like a lone firefly. He stood like a stone lantern guarding the shrine, silent and unyielding.

Then, the shrine door creaked open just a sliver. A pair of long, pale hands curled around the frame, straining against the unseen force keeping them inside. The evil god's hands.

He wanted to step out.

But Xiaokui recalled her brother's words—the evil god was bound in chains, unable to leave the shrine.

Bai Liu could have stepped inside and met him, yet he never crossed the threshold. He remained outside, forcing the god—stirred by his presence—to struggle, reaching toward him from within.

"What is this?" Xiaokui frowned. "He went through all that trouble to steal the key, even while seriously injured… just to stand outside all night?"

Yet Bai Liu did just that.

When Xiaokui woke at dawn, she saw him still standing there, lantern in hand, before finally turning to leave. He descended the mountain without so much as a backward glance.

The hands grasping the shrine door slowly withdrew.

Xiaokui furrowed her brow. "What the hell is this man thinking?"

The Fourth Night. The Fifth Night. A Month.
No matter how severe the torment during the day, no matter the weather—rain, snow, or storm—Bai Liu climbed the mountain every night.

Every night, he stood outside the shrine until dawn.

Even Xiaokui, who had initially watched out of idle curiosity, could see the toll it was taking. He grew thinner, paler, hollow-eyed. And yet, his expression never changed. As if the exhaustion, the sleepless nights, the quiet vigil—none of it mattered.

It was as if he had never spent those endless hours standing there, waiting.

The Summer Festival Draws Near
The first sacrifice took his own life.

The Bei Yuan family master came to inspect the remaining offerings and praised the trainers for their work. A new lesson was added to their education: love.

The snow melted, replaced by ceaseless rain. Buds bloomed among the shrine's trees.

Xiaokui, watching the days blur together, realized—summer was coming.

Then, another sacrifice—the one who had arrived with Bai Liu—took his own life as well.

He had been drowning in suffering, while Bai Liu remained eerily calm. Bai Liu's impassivity had drawn little attention before, but now, beside the other's obvious agony, it became apparent. Unsettling.

And so, the Bei Yuan family's focus shifted toward the more responsive sacrifice.

When the second man attempted suicide again, the family head waved a hand, smiling. "Good. He's nearly ready. No more training for today —give him whatever he asks for. Keep him alive long enough to reach his peak."

Bai Liu bowed his head and stepped away.

No one stopped him as he left.

The summer storms arrived, bringing heavy evening rains.

Bai Liu climbed the mountain as always, a paper umbrella shielding his lantern from the downpour.

Now that he was no longer closely watched, he moved more freely.

Xiaokui lay on the windowsill, chin propped on her hands, watching the dim light flicker through the misty night. Watching Bai Liu ascend the path had become one of the few amusements in her dull life of servitude.

She still didn't understand—what did Bai Liu want?

As the rain thickened, his lantern wavered in the distance, an insect-like glow drifting toward the shrine. Through the veil of rain, he emerged—wavering, wandering—before stopping once more at the shrine's entrance.

Xiaokui's breath caught.

The door creaked open. And from within, a pale hand reached out once more.

Over the past few days, the evil god within the shrine has been pushing farther and farther outward. What began as a mere sliver of an opening has grown—first a small gap, then enough to push the door halfway open. At one point, Xiaokui even thought the god inside would finally step out.

What Xiaokui cannot see is the hand pushing open the door—pale and long, yet scarred. Wounds from silk threads and chains mar the skin, blood dripping down the outer robe, joining the rhythm of the rain as it falls into the pond.

"There you are, Bai Liu."

Xie Ta stands by the door he has forced halfway open, his voice soft, his gaze downcast. "I heard your footsteps. I felt your pain. So I woke up and waited for you."

He hesitates, then asks, "Aren't you coming in to see me today either?"

Outside the shrine, the only answer is the relentless downpour. Bai Liu does not speak. He never does. Night after night, he comes. And night after night, Xie Ta speaks to him as if Bai Liu might, one day, respond.

Xie Ta is used to the silence. He tilts his head slightly, watching the wind chimes tremble beneath the eaves, listening to the rain grow heavier. The silk threads binding his wrists and ankles dig deep into his flesh, fresh blood seeping through the thickly scarred fabric of his robe. Drops slide from his fingertips, mixing with the rain pooling on the ground.

Outside, Bai Liu stands beneath an umbrella, the water dripping from its edges as steadily as the night itself. Blood and rain fall to the earth together, vanishing into the mud.

"...You've been coming for days now," Xie Ta murmurs, his voice barely carrying over the rain. "I've been waking up earlier and earlier. And you—" He closes his eyes briefly. "You seem to be in more and more pain."

He lifts his gaze toward the heavy wooden door, knowing Bai Liu stands just beyond it. Every night, Bai Liu remains there, unmoving, until dawn. Then he leaves—only to return again the next night.

Will Bai Liu get sick in this rain...?

The thought unsettles Xie Ta. His fingers curl against his chest in quiet confusion.

He is the one who is bleeding. His body is the one in pain. And yet, the thought of Bai Liu falling ill—that is what tightens around his heart.

A strange kind of pain.

Xie Ta doesn't understand it. He cannot see Bai Liu's expression through the door, cannot sense his emotions as he can with others. And yet, somehow, he knows them.

Every night, his heart races as Bai Liu approaches. Every night, it slows when he wakes and realizes Bai Liu has not stepped inside. And every night, when Bai Liu leaves, Xie Ta listens to the fading footsteps —his own heartbeat following that rhythm, fast, then slow, until sleep takes him again.

Now, the thought of Bai Liu leaving again makes his chest tighten. But the thought of Bai Liu coming back makes it loosen.

"It's raining too hard tonight," Xie Ta says to the door. "Maybe you should go back earlier."

Silence.

Then—Xie Ta hears the shift of the umbrella. The quiet sound of footsteps retreating down the hill.

So strange.

Xie Ta stares at the door, his fingers clenching against his heart.

He was the one who told Bai Liu to leave. But now that Bai Liu is truly walking away, he feels as though the time they spent together—just standing on either side of the door—has ended too soon.

Again, he is left with a hollow, inexplicable loss.

Why?

Alone, he should be unable to reflect anyone's emotions. But then, where do these two conflicting feelings come from?

Still, just as every night before, Xie Ta calls out as Bai Liu departs:

"Will you come back tomorrow?"

For a moment, amidst the downpour, Bai Liu's breathing hitches.

Xie Ta hears the pause in Bai Liu's steps. A single step forward. The faint brush of fingers against wood.

His heartbeat spikes.

Xie Ta leans toward the door, heedless of the silk threads cutting into his bones, of the blood soaking into his robes. He shouldn't meet Bai Liu in such a state, but he can't bring himself to care.

He smooths his appearance briefly, then fixes his gaze on the wooden door, breath caught, light flickering in his eyes.

Will Bai Liu open the door?

Will he finally speak?

For a moment, Bai Liu's hand lingers against the wood. Xie Ta straightens unconsciously, anticipation curling through his chest.

Then—Bai Liu's hand falls away. He hesitates, turns, and walks away.

Just like every other night.

Xie Ta's shoulders slowly slump. His empty gaze remains locked on the door, the dim glow in his eyes fading.

As Bai Liu's footsteps disappear, Xie Ta can barely hear the sound of his own heartbeat.

It is as if it, too, has left with Bai Liu tonight.

He sinks to the ground, the heavy silk threads carving deep into his skin. His vision dims as he closes his eyes, whispering to himself:

"Whether you come back or not—"

"I will always wait for you."

Xiaokui rests by the window, expecting another rainy night of watching Bai Liu stand outside the shrine, just as he has for days. She yawns, drowsy with routine.

But then, just before dawn, Bai Liu suddenly steps forward.

Xiaokui sits up, watching as he moves closer to the shrine's wooden door, lamp in hand.

He raises his hand, pressing it lightly against the damp wood.

Xiaokui leans in, eyes narrowing. "Is he… going in today?"

She watches as Bai Liu's fingers shift.

"No…" she murmurs. "He's writing something?"

Inside, Xie Ta's voice is lost beneath the rain.

"Will you come back tomorrow?"

"It doesn't matter if you don't answer me. Whether you come or not, I'll still be waiting."

Outside, Bai Liu stands motionless, umbrella in hand, rain streaming down in sheets. Then, without a word, he turns.

The lamp in his grasp casts a dim glow over the wooden door.

Droplets bead across its surface, refracting the light.

Bai Liu lowers his gaze, pressing his palm against the wood. Then, carefully, he lifts a finger and begins to write.

Stroke by stroke.

He lingers for a moment, staring at the words. Then, without another glance, he turns and descends the hill.

The rain intensifies.

Through the mist, Bai Liu’s lantern fades into the distance, swallowed by the downpour.

Slowly, the sky begins to brighten.

As the first light of dawn washes over the shrine, it illuminates the words Bai Liu has left behind—etched into the rain-damp wood.

[I'll come tomorrow.]

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The following day, the sky was clear.

Deep within Bei Yuan House, sunny dolls hung from the eaves, their painted smiles swaying gently in the warm breeze. Sunlight filtered through, casting shifting patterns on the wooden floor.

Inside, Xiaokui knelt on the tatami, her gaze drifting lazily from the golden light outside to Bai Liu, who sat directly in front of her, his back perfectly straight.

—Is this guy made of steel? After a night of torrential rain, he's already back in full regalia, ready for a refresher course on sacrifice… just three hours later.

At the front of the room, a middle-aged man with sloping beards and a dull, somber expression walked slowly, reading from a book. A subtle, eerie smile tugged at his lips.

"The beautiful lesson we will teach you today, my lords of sacrifice, is a brand-new course called 'Love'… or 'Love.'"

His voice was soft, measured.

"It is that time of year when the offering adults enter their flowering season, a time when one should be full of fantasies about love. Would anyone like to share with the teacher—what is the best love story you have ever imagined?"

Silence.

Bai Liu kept his head bowed. Xiaokui stared absently out the window. Another offering laughed madly, his eyes hollow.

The teacher, unfazed, simply nodded and turned to Cang Tai, who was seated respectfully behind Bai Liu. "Cang Tai, would you like to tell us what you think is the perfect love story? Perhaps the first one that comes to mind?"

The sudden attention drained the color from Cang Tai's face. Cold sweat beaded at his temples. He swallowed and replied in a barely audible voice, "…I'm not sure."

The teacher lowered his gaze. "Not sure at all?"

Cang Tai flinched under the scrutiny. He swallowed again, voice even quieter. "…There are fairy tales. Like the one with the princess and the prince, right?"

The teacher leaned in slightly, his expression unreadable. "Very well. What kind of fairy tale exactly?"

Cang Tai's fingers curled into his sleeves. He stole a glance at Bai Liu's unreadable profile before stammering, "The prince… the prince would risk great danger every night, sneaking past evil monsters just to reach his princess, who was trapped in… a god—no, no, a very high place. He would stay with her all night, trying to find a way to free her."

Xiaokui, who had been gazing out the window, flicked her eyes toward Cang Tai and Bai Liu, intrigued.

—Isn't that exactly what Bai Liu does every night?

The teacher nodded, as if something had clicked. "Ah, so it's Rapunzel."

Cang Tai frowned. "What's Rapunzel?"

"It's the fairy tale you just described." The teacher straightened up and waved a hand. A servant stepped forward, placing fairy tale books on Xiaokui and Bai Liu's desks.

The cover depicted a girl with long golden curls cascading from a high tower. Her face was obscured, but her hair spilled past the narrow attic window, where below, a man clung to the strands, looking up at the unseen girl.

The teacher's voice was smooth as he began reading aloud:

"Long, long ago, there was a girl whose hair held great magical power. From the moment she was born, the magic in her hair attracted passing witches. One such witch stole the girl away and took her deep into a dark forest filled with monsters. She locked her in a towering structure, forbidding her from ever stepping outside, using the magic in her hair to sustain her own power."

"The girl grew up day by day in that tower."

"She knew nothing of the world beyond. Isolated, untouched by reality, she believed the world to be nothing more than the narrow, dim attic she lived in."

Cang Tai listened with rapt attention, eyes wide. He shuffled forward on his knees, breath hitching. "And then what?! Did the white—did the prince appear?!"

The teacher gave a slow nod.

"One day, a passing prince caught sight of her. Enchanted by the long-haired girl's beauty, he began standing watch outside the tower night and day. He called up to her—"

"Beautiful maiden, let down your long hair so that I may climb up to meet you."

"The girl, who had never seen such a handsome man, let down her hair. The prince climbed up."

"They met in secret every night, hidden from the witch's eyes. But in the end, the witch discovered them. Furious, she separated them, banishing the girl to an even farther, lonelier place."

Cang Tai gasped. "But what about the prince?! Didn't he defeat the witch?!"

The teacher smiled faintly.

"In the end, the prince did defeat the witch. He reclaimed the long-haired girl… and they lived happily ever after in the castle."

Cang Tai exhaled in relief. "That's a good ending."

The teacher clasped his hands and surveyed the room, that ever-present false smile curling his lips.

"What do you think of this story, my lords of sacrifice?"

His gaze landed on Xiaokui.

"For example, Lady Xiaokui, if you were Rapunzel, what would you do?"

Xiaokui propped her chin up with a hand and answered easily, "I'd probably lure the stupid prince with my beauty. Then, once he climbed up, I'd stab him with a pair of scissors, steal his clothes, and disguise myself as him to escape the attic."

Cang Tai looked horrified. "That's not a love story! That's a horror story! And wouldn't killing the prince be a crime?!"

Xiaokui glanced at his alarmed expression and chuckled under her breath. "Maybe."

"But even if it's a crime, it's still better than spending the rest of your life trapped in an attic, growing hair for a witch, don't you think?"

Cang Tai fell silent, lips pressing together.

The teacher, unsurprised by her response, turned next to Bai Liu.

"And what about Lord Bai Liu? If you were the prince, what would you do?"

Cang Tai, who had just ducked his head, lifted it again in anticipation.

—Bai Liu is just like the prince in the story. He's bound to give the same answer, right?

Bai Liu was quiet for a moment. Then, slowly, he lifted his gaze.

"If I were in this story…" He spoke evenly. "Chances are, I wouldn't be the prince."

Cang Tai stiffened.

The teacher raised an eyebrow. "Then what would Lord Bai Liu be?"

Bai Liu's expression remained calm.

"I'd be one of the monsters lurking in the dark forest, watching the tower from below, coveting what's inside, waiting for the day when the one above finally falls."

Aoi Tai: QAQ

—Why is it turning into a horror story again?!

The teacher rubbed his chin, intrigued. "A monster-and-princess romance? So something like Quasimodo and Esmeralda, then?"

He studied Bai Liu carefully.

"So does that mean Lord Bai Liu, as the monster, would still climb the tower to rescue the beautiful princess and elope with her? Would the princess fear you at first, only to later recognize the love hidden beneath your monstrous exterior? Would she finally accept you and stay by your side?"

Cang Tai: QAQ!!!

—As expected of Lord Bai Liu… Even this version of the love story is… strangely moving?!

"No." Bai Liu's pupils darkened as he looked at Mr. Xiang. "If he loved me only because I loved him, odds are I'd kill him."

Cang Tai froze mid-step, moved by the tears clinging to Bai Liu's cheeks.

The teacher started as well. "Why?"

"If I fell in love with him and took him away from the tower because of that love—" Bai Liu's expression remained emotionless, his tone as calm as if he were explaining a mathematical theorem. "—but he only loves me in return because I love him, then for him to keep loving me, I must keep feeding him my love, as if I were buying his affection. That is not an equal transaction."

He paused.

"And if I can no longer stop myself from making this transaction—"

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. There was no light in his eyes, only a depth so vast it seemed to stretch to the bottom of the sea and the dome of the sky.

"—then to stop myself from losing more in this deal, I'll make sure he can only ever love me this way when—"

"I kill him."

The room fell into stunned silence.

Even the teacher, who had maintained a hypocritical smile, faltered. He placed his hands on Bai Liu's desk and asked, still smiling, but with an edge of unease, "Surely it's not that extreme, Lord Bai Six? Maybe the princess fell in love with you simply because you saved her from the high tower?"

"Isn't it natural for a princess to fall in love with the man who rescues her?"

Bai Liu's voice was quiet, his tone sparse. "Is that so?"

The teacher nodded confidently. "That's how love works."

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. "Then she simply loves [the person who saved her]. It doesn't matter who that person is—even if they aren't a person at all. Even if they're a monster like me, she will love them just the same."

His lips curled into a lazy smile.

"Tell me, how is that any different from a dog wagging its tail at its master?"

The teacher hesitated.

"A dog will love whoever feeds it, regardless of whether its owner is a rich man, a worker, or a stray." Bai Liu leaned back slightly, tilting his head. "All dogs wag their tails for their masters."

His gaze bore into the teacher, unblinking. "This kind of 'love' isn't about the person themselves. It's just a reflex, a conditioned response. It depends on nothing more than who happens to be there first—who climbs the tower before anyone else. A fleeting, inevitable trick of the mind."

The teacher inhaled deeply, composing himself. "That may be true, but you're speaking in extremes. The kind of relationship you want doesn't exist. If a princess falling in love with her rescuer isn't good enough, if an elopement isn't good enough—then tell me, Lord Bai Six, under what circumstances do you want a princess to fall in love with you?"

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly.

"I want him to love me right there in [the tower]."

His voice was eerily steady. "I want him to know that I am a monster, standing below the tower with a sword, waiting to kill him. And even then, I want him to cut the threads that bind him and jump—"

The teacher stared, his breath catching. Bai Liu's eyes were so dark they seemed to swallow all the light around them. Empty, yet suffused with something too intense, too deep, too layered to name. Paired with his flat, dispassionate voice, it created a chilling dissonance.

"—I want him to fall, knowing full well what I am. I want him to descend from godhood to humanity—for me."

Bai Liu turned his face slightly.

The teacher jolted back to his senses, shaking his head violently as if dispelling a spell. He took a panicked step away, clenched his fist, and coughed to steady himself.

Forcing a smile, he murmured, "Lord Bai Six, you ask too much of your princess."

"I'm not in love with any Rapunzel." Bai Liu's tone was flat.

The teacher blinked. "If not Rapunzel, then who lives in the high tower of your dark forest?"

Bai Liu turned his gaze to the window. Through the dense woods, he could faintly see the shrine perched atop the hill. He was silent for a moment.

Then, softly, he said, "A lizard with poisonous eyes."

The teacher was taken aback. "A lizard?! Why a lizard?"

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "I don't know."

A pause.

Then, with an absent tilt of his head and a lazy curl of his lips, he smiled.

"But whatever form he takes, he is something I love."

His voice was almost a whisper.

"And when the people come to his tower—to touch his hair, to claim his power—"

His fingers idly propped up his chin as his gaze darkened, the smile lingering.

"—I will kill them all before he ever chooses to fall for anyone but me."

"He will always have only one choice—me."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The teacher stood still for a moment, visibly shaken, before regaining his composure. "That concludes today's lesson."

His gaze swept over the gathered sacrifices, his expression settling back into its usual calm. "In the coming days, you have something important to prepare for beyond your studies."

"The Summer Festival is approaching, and before you're sent to the shrine, the sacrificial lords will visit the boathouse for a pain test."

He smiled, his tone reassuring. "But you needn't worry too much about the results."

"I doubt any of you will reach the necessary threshold—except for Lady Xiaokui, of course. After all, it's only the Summer Festival. You won't be fully ripe until at least the Winter Festival."

He gestured dismissively. "The sacrificial lords may now leave."

Then, turning to Xiaokui, his smile took on a more deliberate edge. "But Lsdy Xiaokui will stay a little longer."

"With the level of pain you're already experiencing, you'll be more than ready for the offering table this Summer Festival."

"But to ensure that your suffering reaches its full potential, we'll conduct some... special training over the next few days. After all, the greater your suffering, the more value you bring to the Bei Yuan family."

The teacher stepped closer, a condescending smirk curling at his lips as he looked down at Xiaokui.

"You're sixteen now, aren't you? Old enough to fall in love."

"And since you already understand what makes a good love—"

His smile widened.

"—it's time you experience its pain as well."

"Tomorrow, we'll gather a group of [princes], and you, Lady Xiaokui, will choose the one you wish to fall in love with as your [prince]."

"They’re all very fine [princes], you know."

"Handsome, yet dying of cold. Squires handpicked from the boathouse by the Bei Yuan family."

"The Bei Yuan family saved them from their cages and told them it was because of your kindness. Naturally, they admire you."

"They love you already, just like those Shiba Inu dogs you once adored. If you reach out your hand, you can have their love and loyalty just as easily."

The teacher leaned down, his breath warm against Xiaokui’s ear. His voice softened, almost playful.

"Of course, you don’t have to choose one of these [princes]."

"But if you don’t..." His smile deepened. "We’ll dispose of them. Just like we disposed of the stray cats and dogs you didn’t want on the ship."

"I do hope our [princess] won’t be so cruel."

Xiaokui, who had just begun to rise, stopped. Inch by inch, the light faded from her eyes. She lowered her head, her voice barely a whisper, as if speaking from the bottom of a well.

"Yes, teacher."

"I will choose a [prince]."

That evening.

Xiaokui slumped vacantly against the windowsill, her long hair slipping down her shoulders.

A teru teru bōzu hung under the eaves of the attic—where her brother and dog had once played—swaying gently in the night breeze. High above, in the attic’s window, where even the moonlight did not reach, the darkness loomed like a towering coffin.

A faint glimmer of light flickered in the distant mountains.

Xiaokui’s gaze shifted. For a moment, the frozen stillness of her face thawed as she let out a soft grunt.

“There you go again.”

Bai Liu walked along the mountain path, lantern in hand, climbing steadily toward the peak.

Xiaokui shifted slightly, propping herself up on her hands as she watched him in a daze. A whisper slipped from her lips.

“...He’s still coming?”

Her fingers clenched.

“Is love really so... magical?”

At the entrance of the shrine, Bai Liu came to a stop. A voice soon drifted from inside, clear and composed yet tinged with something almost eager.

“...I’ve been waiting for you. I thought you wouldn’t come tonight.”

A pause. Then, as if correcting himself—

“So, you were just late.”

A soft inquiry followed.

“Did something happen?” Xie Ta’s voice was gentle, inquisitive. “Was the offering lesson delayed? Or did today’s lesson injure you, slowing your climb up the mountain?”

Bai Liu remained silent.

Xie Ta’s breath hitched. His heartbeat quickened. He stepped toward the door, glancing down at his hands—thread-thin cuts blooming red where the silk bindings had bitten into his skin.

“Tonight, Bai Liu still won’t come inside,” Xie Ta murmured, “nor will he say a word to me.”

His fingers tightened around the wooden frame. The silk threads around his wrists and ankles constricted, sinking into pale skin. More blood welled up, tracing a cruel contrast to the casual tone of his voice.

“The threads... are growing.”

He tilted his head slightly, eyes dark with quiet contemplation.

“The gods told me that these threads are spun from the pain of sacrifices—their suffering turned into chains that bind me. The more agony they endure, the more threads I receive, weaving deeper into my body.”

A faint chuckle.

“But that’s what’s strange.”

His fingers ghosted over the gossamer bindings.

“I haven’t received any sacrifices lately. No offerings of pain. And yet... the threads keep multiplying.”

He lifted his gaze to the door.

“So whose pain... is this?”

The translucent threads shimmered in the dim light, forming a web around him. Slowly, they tightened—biting into his skin, slicing his cheek. Blood dripped from his jaw.

“Is it Bai Liu’s pain?”

His voice wavered, almost questioning.

“But Bai Liu hasn’t been here. He hasn’t offered his pain to me.”

More threads materialized out of thin air, coiling around his limbs, tightening, suffocating.

“If it’s not Bai Liu’s pain, then whose is it?”

Xie Ta furrowed his brows, pressing a hand to his chest.

“Why... do these threads only appear when you’re near?”

Why did they wound him so deeply—why did these injuries ache more than any before?

Outside, Bai Liu still said nothing.

A soft drizzle began to fall, the rain tapping lightly against the wooden beams.

Through the mist and rain, Xie Ta heard Bai Liu’s footsteps retreating. His body moved instinctively—he took a step forward.

And in that instant—

A reaction.

Countless silk threads lashed out from every direction, binding him in place. They coiled around his limbs, his torso—twisting, tightening, suffocating—until he was trapped in a translucent cocoon, only his eyes left visible.

Blood trickled from the fresh cuts, staining the shrine floor.

Xie Ta looked down at his bound hands, then back at the door.

The gods had said these threads would only manifest when he received a sacrifice's pain.

But Bai Liu had never offered his pain to him.

So then... why?

The sound of Bai Liu's footsteps faded into the distance.

Xie Ta remained standing in place, dazed, staring at the closed wooden door.

This time, Bai Liu had left. And he hadn't slept through it.

For the first time, he remained awake. The threads did not fade. The shrine was empty—save for him.

Slowly, Xie Ta lowered his lashes, his expression unreadable.

—These threads keep me awake. Keep me wounded.

And they are spun from my own pain.

On that penultimate rainy night before the summer festival, the moment the sacrifice departed—

For the first time, the desireless god felt [pain].

The overwhelming, suffocating weight of it—so dense, so unrelenting—it kept him sleepless. It held him captive, unmoving, bound to this place, to this door, to the fleeting presence of the one who left.

And so, night after night, he remained.

Waiting.

Enduring.

Offering his own pain—as if it were a sacrifice.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The Next Day

Bai Liu's group was escorted to the boathouse for testing, but Xiaokui was left behind at Bei Yuan’s house.

Bai Liu was still being received by the imperial boat at the boathouse.

The man had grown gloomy and aged in the months since their last meeting. His head was shrunken, his face wrinkled like old leather, and he stared at Bai Liu with eyes that resembled those of a deep-sea fish—murky and predatory.

The offering beside Bai Liu stood neatly, dressed in fine clothes. However, the attendants were a different story.

Aside from those chosen by the clan, like Cang Tai, the squires left behind in the boathouse were disheveled, thin, and reeked of fowl. Their eyes were vacant, heads bowed as they shuffled after the offerings like walking corpses.

"Come here," Gosho beckoned grimly. "I hope your suffering will satisfy us before it satisfies the gods."

Bai Liu followed the imperial boat with his gaze lowered. After a few turns, they entered a spacious and gloomy Japanese-style room.

At the center of the room were two hollowed-out tiles in the floor, revealing a formation of mountain stones beneath. A small yet intricate balance sat atop the stones, with a red wooden tray placed on a stone platform. The tray held a dozen gilt, translucent silk threads.

Bai Liu’s eyes flicked over the threads. They were of a similar size and material to the ones that had been tied to Xie Ta’s body.

All the offerings and attendants stood in rows in front of the stone formation, their heads lowered.

“These are the instruments used to test your pain from the past six months: the Hoowolf Scales and the Threads of Pain,” Gosho said, standing with his hands behind his back beside the scales. He tilted his chin slightly, eyeing everyone. “These threads are condensed from the pain of previous sacrificial masters. With the blessing of the Supreme God of Dreams, we have carefully stripped these threads from the bodies of the evil gods in the shrine to test your [pain] levels."

"You will place your right hand on one side of the scales, and we will place the thread of pain on the other side," he continued. "The Hoowolf Scales can detect the pain in your hearts. If the pain in your heart outweighs the thread, the scales will tilt to your side. If the pain is lighter than the thread, they will tilt to the other side."

"Based on our previous experience, a sacrifice whose pain weighs as much as a silk thread is a qualified offering."

The imperial boat cast a sidelong glance at all the offerings. "There is no order to the testing. Who will go first?"

Unease rippled across the offerings' faces. After a moment of hesitation, one of them took a deep breath, raised his hand, and shakily said, "I... I'll go."

Gosho waved his hand, and a servant bowed beside him. He moved the scales into position under the mountain rock, carefully holding a sterling silver tweezer in one hand and a painful silk thread in the other. He placed the thread on the left side of the scales.

The balance immediately tipped, the left plate hitting the base with a loud crunch.

Cang Tai, watching from the side, whispered in Bai Liu's ear, "This silk thread looks so heavy."

The offering looked at the thread, momentarily relieved to think that it would be easy to outweigh the scales with his pain. He raised his right hand and placed it on the right plate of the scales.

The scales didn't move.

The offering's face went white.

He pressed harder, his face turning red with effort, but no matter how much force he used, the scales stayed level as if nothing had been placed on the right side at all.

The imperial boat frowned in anger. "Not a single grunt of pain, you punk!"

He kicked the offering, sending him tumbling to the ground with a loud thud. Without sparing a glance, the imperial boat turned to the servants. “Where is the squire who served him? Tell his attendant to come and inspect!”

The servant knelt and bowed. “Yes, Lord Gosho.”

Moments later, the squire of the offering was brought forward. The man appeared nearly broken, too weary to react to a human voice. He was held by a servant who placed his hand on the right plate of the scales.

When his hand made contact, the scales shifted slightly, tilting just two frames to the right.

The imperial boat’s expression softened. “Nice. Two frames—two-fifths of a silk thread in pain.”

He looked over at the squire with dull eyes, nodding in satisfaction. “From this day forward, you are the Lord of the Offerings.”

“And the sacrifice you serve becomes your attendant.”

The blood drained from the face of the sacrifice who had been kicked aside. He threw himself at Gosho’s legs, breaking down in tears and begging, “Lord Gosho, please let me try again! Please!”

The imperial boat remained unfazed. “Take him to the cage and lock him up with his pets.”

The maid bowed her head. “Yes.”

Two servants dragged the crying offering away.

Not long after, the servants returned. One of them kneeled and reported to Gosho, “Shortly after we placed him in the cage, he suddenly went mad, cried out, and strangled his kitten. He then kowtowed, begging us to test him again. Lord Gosho, should we test him again?”

The imperial boat shook his head, indifferent. “Let him suffer a while longer.”

“The next sacrifice.”

The offerings were stunned by the brutal start to the tests. One by one, those who were tested looked paler than the last. The ones who barely passed stumbled down, disoriented. Cang Tai overheard some of the offerings muttering to themselves, trying to figure out what they had to do to make their pain seem greater.

Dozens of sacrifices were tested, but none of them managed to tilt the scales more than three frames when their hands were placed on them.

The imperial boat's expression darkened, and the harshness in his gaze towards the sacrifice was palpable. "Not a single sacrifice able to reach even the slightest level of pain. It seems we've been too generous with you all."

The offerings trembled in fear, none daring to lift their eyes to meet the imperial boat's gaze.

The situation took a sharp turn when the deranged sacrifice from the Bei Yuan family stepped forward.

As soon as the man placed his hand on the scales, guided by his attendant, the scale arm snapped around, hitting the last cell on the right with a sharp click.

Gosho's eyes twitched as he regarded the offering. "Whose sacrifice is this?"

The maid bowed respectfully. "It is from the Bei Yuan family."

Gosho's expression clouded, a sneer forming on his lips. "The Bei Yuan family has always excelled at torturing sacrifices."

He turned to the servant and said grimly, "Release the silk thread again. I want to see just how much pain the Bei Yuan family has managed to cultivate in the last six months."

The servant stepped forward and, with tweezers, added another filament to the left side of the balance.

The needle wavered slightly, two frames to the left, but still fell short of the center.

"Is it really heavier than two..." Gosho's face darkened with frustration. "Add more!"

The maid added another thread.

The needle on the scale shifted further to the second compartment on the right. The servant looked up at Gosho, his surprise evident. "My lord, this offering has two and a half roots of pain, which is more than enough for the offering table at the summer festival."

Gosho muttered an approving "oh" and turned to survey the other offerings. "Where is the other Bei Yuan family sacrifice?"

The maid removed the two silk threads and pointed towards Bai Liu, who stood at the back. "It seems it's him."

Gosho raised his chin. "You, come forward."

Cang Tai swallowed nervously as he watched Bai Liu calmly rise. With deliberate precision, Bai Liu extended his pale fingers and placed them on the right side of the scale.

The balance, with only a single thread on the left, spun immediately. The hand on the scale didn't stop when it hit the last frame; it continued, striking the bottom with a sharp crunch.

The scales, which had resisted all the offerings' efforts, now trembled under Bai Liu's light touch, the wire and frame visibly shaking.

Gosho turned sharply to observe Bai Liu, his eyes narrowing. He spoke in a low voice, "Add the threads."

The servant complied quickly, adding threads one by one to the left side of the balance.

One... two... ten sticks.

By the time the eleventh was added and the needle still pressed against the bottom right, everyone in the room had fallen silent.

The offerings stared at Bai Liu, sitting serenely at the right end of the scale, while the maids' hands trembled as they continued adding the threads. Gosho's gaze never wavered from Bai Liu, his eyes filled with a mixture of disbelief and growing intrigue. Cang Tai watched in stunned awe as the pile of silk threads grew on the left side of the balance.

"Seventeen," the servant said, eyes wide with disbelief. "Lord Gosho... we've run out of silk threads."

Without taking his eyes off Bai Liu, Gosho waved his hand dismissively. "Go to the Gifune family's warehouse."

His expression turned calculating. "There's plenty more there. Bring it all."

The servant bowed deeply. "Yes, Lord Gosho."

Ten minutes later, servants hurried into the room, each carrying several heavy-looking boxes, which they lined up in neat rows.

Inside these wooden boxes were bundles of silk thread. Though few in number, collectively they added up to a significant amount.

Gosho gestured again. "Add them all."

The servants unloaded the silk threads, piling them high on the left side of the scale. When the final bar from the last box was placed, the scales groaned under the weight, and the cross-frame creaked as if it were on the verge of breaking. Finally, Gosho raised his hand.

"Stop."

The maids wiped the sweat from their foreheads with trembling hands, their eyes flickering nervously between the scales, still pressed firmly against the bottom right, and Bai Liu's calm face. A look of fear began to creep into their expressions.

These were nearly all the threads taken from the body of the evil god.

When a person's level of suffering matches that of a god and they don't lose their sanity...

This man must be capable of truly dreadful things.

A twisted excitement flickered in Gosho's eyes as he stepped forward, lifting Bai Liu's face with his fan. He examined him as if he were a rare treasure, asking in a hoarse voice, "What is your name?"

Bai Liu met his gaze without a flicker of emotion. "Bei Yuan Bai Liu."

Gosho sneered contemptuously at the name. "Bei Yuan... not a name to be proud of."

He leaned closer, his eyes burning with greed as they locked onto Bai Liu's pupils.

"You are a sacrifice of immense pain. Perhaps you'd be better off named Gifune."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

After testing all the offerings and attendants, Bai Liu was left alone by the imperial boat.

Cang Tai looked anxiously at Bai Liu's back, stealing a fearful glance at the imperial boat standing next to him before retreating on his knees.

As Gosho circled Bai Liu, he tapped his fan thoughtfully against his lower lip. His eyes lingered on Bai Liu before he suddenly smiled. "If you're willing to cooperate by changing your surname and coming to our family as a sacrifice, I can guarantee you the highest honor in our house after completing just one successful sacrifice for us."

Bai Liu looked up at Gosho, his expression impassive. "Can a sacrifice like me still have the right to change my name?"

"Normally, no," Gosho replied, unfolding his fan to cover the lower half of his face. His eyes narrowed slightly, a smile tugging at the corners of his lips. "Normally, it's impossible for a sacrifice chosen by a major family to change its surname and be passed on to another family."

"But if the sacrifice escapes and is then captured by another family, it's a different matter." Gosho's tone turned cold. "An offering during an [exodus] can be unstable, after all."

Bai Liu maintained a shallow, level gaze. "I don't seem to understand what Lord Gosho is suggesting."

Gosho's grin turned wry as he leaned forward, settling across from Bai Liu. "As I'm sure you've noticed, Bai Liu, it's difficult to mass-produce offerings that meet the standards of divine suffering."

"Of the dozens, even hundreds of sacrifices we acquire each year at great cost, less than one layer of sacrifice can produce even a single thread of pain after six months. After a year, maybe a quarter or fifth of the sacrifices may be successfully sacrificed."

"No matter how tempting the bait used to catch these uninitiated sacrifices, no matter how twisted the methods used to inspire them to torture themselves, these sacrifices will become desperate and numb after a year. When they realize they must live their entire lives for something as abstract as pain, they start to wither."

Gosho's expression darkened. "A numb sacrifice can't produce quality pain, and so those who can't be sacrificed after a year are discarded—they usually end up committing suicide."

"We learned over time that both the attendants and sacrifices could endure more torment, producing more pain, when their hearts were filled with hope."

"So, we experimented, trying various approaches. Eventually, we discovered the key to rekindling these numb sacrifices: we let them go."

"We planted our people among the servants, hinting that they could escape. After creating various mishaps, we let the sacrifices believe they had managed to slip away. But we don't capture them immediately—this doesn't produce enough bitterness or provide the best time for these sacrifices to fully realize the depth of their situation."

Gosho's smile widened into something darker, his eyes gleaming with twisted satisfaction. "We usually let them stay out for six months before we catch them again."

"During this time, we surround them with well-meaning people—people who will offer kindness, however small. It could be something as simple as a generous restaurant owner who gives them a free meal, or a stranger who offers them an umbrella in the rain. Sometimes it's a kind-hearted person who helps them find a job or offers to take them in temporarily, letting them reintegrate into society and live a 'normal' life—father, mother, friend, lover roles."

Gosho chuckled lazily. "It's hard for these tortured sacrifices to resist such kindness. It's like a dog beaten with poison—though wary, it still can't resist the temptation of the meat thrown at it."

"When these desperate exiles, having briefly tasted normal happiness, begin to adjust to their new lives, slowly believing the world might be kind to them, they start to hope again..." Gosho's voice dropped, a sick grin spreading across his face. "That's when we shatter their false happiness."

"The moment their happiness is destroyed, and they're dragged back to hell, the pain they experience is unlike anything before."

Bai Liu's eyes flickered. "Beiyuan Xiaokui was deliberately let out by you?"

Gosho nodded, a smug expression on his face. "Smart man."

"With your level of pain and intelligence, there's no need for such cheap tricks to cause you pain," he added, then flicked his fan as he turned his attention back to the scales, his gaze heavy and contemplative.

"Usually, we recycle the offerings used in the evil festival six months ago, and introduce new offerings for the next festival. This is why sacrifices typically have a maturation period of a year. We let them become utterly desperate, reignite their hope, and then sacrifice them so that the pain isn't just seasonal, but a full six-month cycle of suffering."

"This ensures the sacrifices we use are mature and properly conditioned. We differentiate between old and new offerings to avoid confusion when they're recaptured."

Bai Liu glanced at Gosho. "What about Beiyuan Xiaokui?"

Gosho's expression darkened immediately. "Beiyuan Xiaokui was an exception. She was taken back early."

"She still had four months left to mature, but the Bei Yuan family insisted on taking her back. They'd already collected last year's tax and didn't want their sacrifice under the influence of our [exodus program]. They claimed she already had nearly three years' worth of pain built up and didn't need further conditioning by us, the Gifune family."

Gosho slammed his hand on the table, his anger barely contained. "This arrogant attitude is a complete disrespect for the Gifune family's method of sacrifice, and a violation of the entire [Exodus Project]!"

His chest heaved with rage. "The original [Exodus Plan] was to release the sacrifices once they had all been captured and returned, so that these sacrifices, in utter despair, would try to escape again."

"The eight families would have priority in hunting these desperately fleeing sacrifices, a sort of divine mega-hunt before the summer festival arrives."

"The moment these escaped sacrifices are caught, their pain will be at its peak. That is the best time to appreciate their suffering, and whoever catches the sacrifice can immediately drag them to the shrine for the sacrifice."

"It would have been a perfect plan, but the Bei Yuan family became disgruntled and refused to comply."

Gosho's face turned cold. "The hunt was originally supposed to be random, but the Bei Yuan family suspects something fishy about the fact that the Gifune family has caught the most painful sacrifice two years in a row, made the most valuable wish, and then remained the number one family in taxation the following year, all thanks to that wish."

"Last year, they used this as an excuse to force a reform of the sacrifice cultivation program. They pushed for an early distribution of sacrifices, so each family could cultivate their own offerings."

Gosho sneered. "This proposal was actually supported by seven of the eight great families."

"But under this new cultivation system, everyone received sacrifices that were far less painful than those cultivated through our [Exodus Program]. So last year's Summer Festival had very few sacrifices that could be used to make a wish. The ones that were returned were mostly useless, all but discarded."

"Except for the Bei Yuan family." Gosho's expression twisted. "The sacrifices they cultivated themselves offered the deepest pain, and they were able to make the most valuable wish of last year, becoming the number one family in taxes this year."

"So this year, the six families have returned to align with the Gifune family, opting to use the [Exodus Program] to breed their own offerings, but the Bei Yuan family is still stubbornly sticking to their own breeding program."

Gosho looked at Bai Liu with a twisted smile. "- And they've managed to produce an even more painful sacrifice than last year."

"I'm not curious about what the Bei Yuan family can do to make you all suffer like this, but I can tell you one thing for certain: the Gifune family can offer something even greater than what the Bei Yuan family will give you."

"The summer festival [Exodus Program], which the Bei Yuan family is participating in this year, is why your new batch of offerings will be sent to live in a new place for six months before being captured and returned."

"The specifics of the program for each sacrifice in the [Exodus Program] are the responsibility of our house, the Gifune."

Gosho leaned forward, his eyes fixed on Bai Liu. "If you wish, I can swap you with a common sacrifice, sending them to your rightful place of exile to be tortured. You, on the other hand, can wait until after this year's Summer Festival. The Gifune family will give you whatever you want, and we'll send you far from Luming County to start a new life—exactly where you want to be."

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. "Anything I want?"

"Yes, anything." Gosho's tone became bolder, more arrogant. "Luming County is under the rule of the Gifune family. Anything within Luming County, you can take if you wish."

Bai Liu stared coolly at the imperial boat. "So, what do I need to do?"

"Sacrifice once." Gosho's gaze never wavered. "On the day of the Summer Festival, you will be released as the new sacrifice, and the old sacrifices that were released and captured six months ago will be released again, with all eight families returning to hunt them."

"I will mix you in with the old sacrifices. You just need to ensure that you are hunted by the Gifune family, then go to the shrine and make your sacrifice."

Bai Liu was silent for a moment, then a small smile tugged at the corner of his lips. He looked at Gosho, whose puzzled expression matched his confusion, and spoke softly, "I agree to the deal with you."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Meanwhile, at the Bei Yuan family.

Xiaokui removed her magnificent garments with a numb expression. The servant beside her, head bowed, softly advised, "Lady Xiaokui, you've chosen your [prince's lord]."

"You know what will happen to your [prince-sama] if you run away before the summer festival, don't you?"

Xiaokui gazed out the window at the sunny doll hanging from the eaves, then lowered her eyes.

The maid folded her arms, bowed, and stepped back. Xiaokui stood frozen in the middle of the room for a long time, then turned to the window and stared, motionless, at the shrine.

It was now nighttime, but the Bai Six had not yet returned. Word was that they had been detained at the boathouse by the Imperial Boat. The head of the Bei Yuan family was on a rampage, and the entire family was preparing to negotiate with the Imperial Boat over the detention of the offerings.

Her nightly ritual of watching Bai Six head to the shrine was interrupted.

After staring at the shrine for a long time, Xiaokui yawned tiredly. Feeling bored, she was about to look away and go to bed when she noticed the door of the shrine was slightly ajar.

Xiaokui’s eyes narrowed suspiciously at the gap, and then she glanced around to ensure she didn’t see Bai Liu. Her heart skipped a beat.

Had she not been watching every day, she would have never noticed the faint opening in the door.

This evil god, who resided in the shrine—could it be awakening now, in the absence of painful sacrifices?

Xiaokui quickly opened the window, glancing around to confirm the only person in the attic was the sleeping servant. She swiftly climbed down the side of the building with practiced ease.

The Bei Yuan family would be gone for at least an hour, likely heading to the Gifune family. During that time, the Bei Yuan estate would be relatively empty. Xiaokui calmly calculated that if she returned before their return, she would be safe from detection.

Although she had been caught once before, she had managed to escape the Bei Yuan family successfully. She was comfortable with the idea of visiting the shrine without leaving the estate's gates.

Swinging herself down from the loft, Xiaokui took a steady leap to the ground, then sprinted toward the shrine.

Unbeknownst to her, the servant she thought was sleeping had silently opened the window and was watching her escape.

The servant, holding a corded phone, approached the receiver and spoke softly into it, "Bei Yuan Xiaokui is approaching the shrine, following the same path Bai Six has taken for the past few months."

"House Master, the summer festival is only two days away. Since we've confirmed that Bei Yuan Bai Six has the qualifications to awaken the evil gods, should we delegate the escape route to the two sacrifices tonight after testing whether Bei Yuan Xiaokui can also awaken the evil gods?"

"Yes, delegate it," came the hoarse voice of the Bei Yuan family head, "We can't allow the Gifune family to claim the number one spot."

"We've been working with these two sacrifices for over half a year now. It's time they pay the price called [pain]—the gift of the Bei Yuan family."

"Understood," the servant replied quickly, glancing at the [Offering Parenting Plan] form hanging on the wall. He respectfully continued, "Allow me to confirm the details."

"Our parenting plan for Bei Yuan Xiaokui involves [educating for cognitive bias] as well as [Exodus twice]."

"Last year, we had to let Bei Yuan Xiaokui go on the run during the [Exodus Program] guided by the Gifune family, spending two months drifting outside. During that time, the Gifune family tried to reach out to her. But since we didn't want her under their control, we secured the tax first and brought her back this year."

"After recalling her, we nurtured her [educational cognitive bias], torturing her while teaching her that the outside world is wonderful, inspiring her desire to escape again."

"Tonight, we'll arrange an escape route for Xiaokui and place a [good person] from the Bei Yuan family along the route to help her, capturing her heart once and for all."

"At the Winter Festival in six months, we will have this [good person] betray her, sending her back to the Bei Yuan family tied up by her own hands. Then, she'll be the perfect painful sacrifice."

The Bei Yuan family head laughed hoarsely, "A wish made with her will be quite perfect."

The servant hesitated for a moment before continuing to read the [Sacrificial Parenting Plan].

"The sacrifice, Bei Yuan Bai Six, who stole the shrine key on the first day he arrived at the Bei Yuan family and awakened the evil god, was a mature sacrifice from the start."

"During these past four months, Bai Six went to the shrine daily to worship. We initially thought he was a devout cultist, so we planned his formation under [blasphemy], which involved making the evil gods fall and collapse in his heart of faith."

"For example, torturing him in the shrine, forcing him to pray to the evil god for help, but the god never came, which deepened his suffering."

"But soon, we realized Bai Six wasn't a devout cultist," the servant said, confused. "Through six months of observation, we found that rather than being a believer in the evil god, Bai Six was...?"

The Bei Yuan family head finished the sentence quietly, "He was tempering the evil gods, forcing them to suffer for him and believe in him."

The servant nodded, "Yes, so we don't have a particularly effective breeding plan for Bai Six. We're just taking it step by step, putting him into the [escape program], and seeing what happens in six months."

"Tch." The Bei Yuan family head narrowed his eyes. "It's just a shame we don't have a tool to measure pain like the Gifune family. Otherwise, we wouldn't have to wait six months for results."

"The two key props for cultivating the sacrifice—the balance and the house of boats—are in the hands of the Gifune family. We can't openly open the shrine at a non-sacrificial node, so we can only observe from outside the shrine to see if the sacrifice can awaken the evil god."

The servant sighed, "Even so, we've lost many people in the course of these observations due to the evil god's alienating influence on those who see him."

"However," the Bei Yuan family head chuckled dryly, "judging by the way the Gifune family snatched Bai Six tonight, Bai Six should indeed be quite the painful sacrifice."

The servant hesitated, "Then, my lord, should we still delegate the escape route to Bai Six, given how much he's already suffering?"

"Let him go," the Bei Yuan family head replied. "We can't compete with the Gifune family, so if we don't let them take him, we'll just lose him anyway."

"Understood," the servant nodded obediently. "I'll immediately arrange to meet the escapees."

Hilltop, Shrine

Xiaokui hurried up the hill, her gas lamp in hand, her gaze fixed in a trance on the massive shrine perched at the summit. The hot night breeze brushed past her face.

Is this what it's like for a Bai Six to walk around here every night... on a night like this?

By the time she reached the towering shrine door, Xiaokui regretted her impulsive decision, a rare feeling for her.

Stalls had been set up on both sides of the shrine, knotted ropes hung from posts, and lanterns were strung up one after another. The area around the shrine had been meticulously cleaned.

The summer festival was only two days away. The shrine was about to open to the public, and preparations were well underway. This meant the area was guarded and bustling with activity. Xiaokui was taking a significant risk by coming here now.

But it was late, and she hadn't spotted the caretaker...

Xiaokui took a deep breath and stepped up onto the last rung of the ladder.

A soft voice drifted out from behind the door, "Who is it?"

Is that the voice of the evil god?

Xiaokui froze at the sound. Her heart raced, but at the same time, an inexplicable surge of hatred rose within her.

The one who dwells here is the evil god who killed my brother.

"You're waiting for Bai Six, aren't you?" Xiaokui asked, her voice calm.

There was a long pause inside. Then, the sound of chains scraping reached her ears, followed by a strong, metallic scent of blood that wafted out of the door. The voice inside grew softer, distant, yet sincere, as it responded, "Yes, I've been waiting for him all day."

"Normally, he'd have been here by now, but... for some reason, he hasn't come today."

"Do you know what happened to Bai Liu?" the voice asked, pleading.

Xiaokui gripped the handle of the gas lamp tighter, inhaling slowly before exhaling. Then, with an inexplicable smile, she spoke, "You don't have to wait."

"Bai Liu won't be coming to see you again."

The voice inside fell silent for a moment before asking, its tone growing flatter, "Why?"

Xiaokui's smile deepened as she responded, "Do you know what the latest lesson in our offerings is?" She chuckled darkly. "It's 'Love.'"

"We told the love story of Rapunzel yesterday, and today, we let the offerings choose their favorite [prince] from the handsome young men around them to experience the wonders of love."

"Bai Liu has also chosen his [prince], you know."

The voice inside the shrine went completely silent.

Xiaokui waited, a thrill of vengeance bubbling up inside her, but at the same time, she felt a strange sense of suffocation.

It was as if the only light she saw in the dark, twisted forest of this cursed place—her home, Luming County—was the dying glow of Bai Liu's gas lamp, flickering before her eyes.

Cang Tai's sparkling eyes flashed before her, his voice serious as he spoke:

"[Lord Bai Liu and the evil god must be true love, as beautiful as in fairy tales.]"

Xiaokui gritted her teeth. "What, are you giving up?"

As her words fell, the shrine door creaked open, revealing a pale, slender hand. In the faint moonlight, the evil god—bloodstained and disheveled—struggled to push open the half-doors, dragging himself toward the entrance with the effort of his trembling fingers.

His delicate face was stained with blood, his body pulled toward the shrine by countless silk threads. She gasped as he spoke, his voice weak, "Has the selection ended for Bai Liu [Lord Prince]?"

"Can I ask Bai Liu to return to the original prince, and perhaps choose me as well?"

Xie Ta's closed eyelashes fluttered slightly, and his face flushed with a faint red hue. "I'm not young, but I'm still quite handsome."

Beiyuan Xiaokui stood frozen, struck speechless by the sight of Xie Ta. Just as she opened her mouth to speak, her head jerked to the side, startled by the rustling in the grass.

"Who's there?"

A figure slowly emerged from the shadows.

Beiyuan Xiaokui froze again.

It was a woman with a tall, graceful figure who looked eerily similar to Xiaokui. Her body was bruised and battered, showing signs of having endured severe hardships before arriving here.

Xiaokui whispered in disbelief, "… Sister."

It was the eldest of Xiaokui's four siblings.

After Xiaokui and her brother Jiro were sold, her older sister had severed ties with the family and was forced out of Luming County to marry in a small seaside town far from here.

"I didn’t agree with our parents selling you and Jiro, but I couldn’t do anything about it. I was kicked out of Luming County and banned from returning." Xiaokui’s sister grasped her hand without speaking and urgently said, "I came here, especially during the summer festival, when the guards are lax in Luming County."

She half-crouched, gripping Xiaokui’s shoulders, and looked at her with pleading eyes. "Run away with me, and leave this hell behind!"

Xiaokui stared blankly at her sister’s outstretched hand, uncertainty flickering in her eyes.

Slowly, she lifted her hand and placed it gently in her sister’s palm.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Beiyuan Xiaokui replied in a daze, “Sister Apricot, I’ll go with you.”

Tears of joy welled up in Apricot’s eyes as she grasped Xiaokui’s hand tightly. But her gaze flickered warily toward the half-open door of the sinister shrine. “Who were you talking to?”

Xiaokui turned around. Xie Ta, who had been standing there just moments ago, was gone.

“Shh—!” Sister Apricot pressed her index finger to her lips, glancing around quickly. “Someone’s coming. Move.”

Xiaokui turned back, still dazed. The shrine’s doors swayed gently in the night breeze, revealing the god hanging from the center of the shrine, suspended by countless silk threads.

Moonlight poured in, illuminating the god’s unnaturally long neck, bloodied by the threads that hoisted him aloft. His silvery-blue eyes, glistening like a deep pond, locked onto Xiaokui just as she turned back.

Xie Ta only watched her leave, his gaze filled with moonlight.

The moment she met his eyes, Xiaokui’s mind buzzed. Everything around her slowed, as though caught in an eerie, dreamlike motion. Strange noises crept into her ears.

Beiyuan Xiaokui's vision blurred. She felt herself being pulled backward at an unnatural speed, memories flooding into her mind—so vivid, so real, yet completely fabricated. She had never lived these moments, yet they had been forcibly implanted in her consciousness.

Everything seemed the same at first. She had escaped, only to be captured and returned two months later. On the boat back, she met [Bai six].

But from that point forward, nothing followed the expected path.

She remembered Cang Tai's voice trembling as he confronted this [Bai six], asking if he had killed small animals—and people—back at the orphanage.

And she remembered [Bai six] smiling softly as he admitted it.

[Yeah.] His voice was pleasant, almost lighthearted. [What, am I not allowed to kill?]

[No one even remembers these things when they're gone. So why shouldn't I kill them?]

[It's not like anyone loses anything. I'm just clearing out the worthless parts.]

[That goes for you all too. No one would remember or care if you were killed, either. You're even lower and more meaningless than the things I've cleared out before.]

Among the muffled cries of fear, Xiaokui—huddled on the bed below—clearly heard [Bai six] say lazily:

[Because you're just NPCs in a game I'm playing.]

By the time they arrived at the boathouse, [Bai six] had, unsurprisingly, been chosen as a sacrifice. He coerced Cang Tai into becoming his squire and was eventually selected by the Beiyuan family to become [Beiyuan Bai six].

On the first night at the Beiyuan estate, [Bai six] stole the key and went to the shrine—just as she had once done. And just like before, Xiaokui saw him from the attic.

But [Bai six] never awakened the evil god.

One night. Two nights. Over and over.

[Bai six] went to the back of the shrine every single night. And every night, the evil god remained silent.

During the day, this [Bai six] lounged in class, but his self-inflicted torment was so brutal, so methodical, that even the Beiyuan tutors—who reveled in cruelty—were left shaken. These people, who had inflicted all manner of torture upon others, sometimes fled the room with pale faces, clutching their stomachs as if about to retch.

As if, rather than a helpless sacrifice, the chamber held a monster that truly terrified them.

Xiaokui vividly recalled the hushed whispers among the tutors. [Bai six] was a complete lunatic.

At night, that same lunatic climbed the shrine again and again, staying there until morning, only to return looking slightly paler each time, as though he had encountered something unbearably repulsive.

Xiaokui, watching from afar, never understood his actions. And she dared not ask.

Not until the summer festival came. Not until the trial—the agonizing test that every sacrifice had to face—began.

And then, at last, she understood why [Bai six] had never awakened the evil god.

She understood why he had driven himself to madness.

During the trial, as Cang Tai watched, [Bai six] placed his hand on the right-hand plate of the scales.

The needle didn't even move.

It was as if there was no pain in his heart at all.

"How is that possible?" Xiaokui asked Cang Tai afterward.

Cang Tai was just as stunned. He thought he must have been mistaken. With the way [Bai six] tormented himself, it should have been impossible.

But there was no mistake.

[Bai six] had failed the test. He was demoted to a mere squire.

Yet he didn't seem to care.

Night after night, lantern in hand, he still climbed the shrine.

Xiaokui gradually realized what this man was trying to do—

[Bai Six] was deliberately torturing himself, trying to invoke pain to awaken the evil gods.

But then what?

Why was he doing this?

Xiaokui was curious, but she had to accept that she might never get an answer.

She was too terrified of [Bai Six] to ask.

His cruelty and indifference had reached a level that would even make the Bei Yuan family tremble. Despite his demotion to squire, no one dared to treat him as such. Not out of respect—no, no one respected [Bai Six]—but out of fear. His lazy, smiling face as he tormented himself cast a shadow over everyone's hearts.

Even more outrageous was how, after only a month as a squire, he had caught the attention of the Bei Yuan family's master—not for obedience, but for his skill in inflicting pain. He was promoted from a mere squire to a teacher.

Xiaokui, as a key offering, worked with [Bai Six] one-on-one twice a week.

In the dim, silent peace room, they sat together.

Xiaokui knelt on a cushion, her hands trembling in her lap. No matter how hard she tried to suppress her fear, she couldn’t stop them from shaking. She didn't dare lift her head to look at the boy sitting across from her.

But she could feel his lazy, half-lidded gaze drifting over her, tracing her with unsettling patience.

Xiaokui had feared the adults who captured her, feared the teachers at the Bei Yuan house—but this was different.

Fearing someone her own age, even more than those adults, was a new experience entirely.

How could a boy—sixteen, maybe seventeen—who could still be called a child, terrify her so much that she could barely breathe?

"You must be wondering why I go to the shrine every night."

[Bai Six's] voice broke the silence. He was sitting cross-legged, propping his chin against his palm, his posture casual, a light smile on his face.

"I know you've been watching me."

Xiaokui's heart nearly leaped out of her chest. She was about to deny it when [Bai Six] lazily cut her off.

"I can tell you why."

"Because I have a wish I want God Xiang to grant."

Xiaokui hesitated, then clenched her teeth and forced herself to ask, "Bai Six… Teacher… what is your wish?"

[Bai Six] lifted his gaze.

"They didn't like me at the orphanage." His voice was light, almost distant. "They threw a lot of dirt on me—framed me for abusing small animals, for doing all sorts of terrible things. And then, in the end, they accused me of murder."

Xiaokui was startled. Instinctively, she looked up.

"Were… were those all false accusations?! Then why did you admit to it on the boat?"

"Because denying it wouldn't have changed anything, would it?" [Bai Six] lowered his eyelashes, his face shadowed. "You all believed the rumors anyway. Might as well wear them."

"It's not like anyone would care about a monster like me—someone who can't even feel pain."

"Someone who can't even serve as a proper sacrifice."

Xiaokui clutched the fabric of her shirt, staring blankly for a moment.

[Sister, I know pain—but not suffering.]

[Sister, is it my fault that I can't feel pain? Why does everyone hate me?]

[Can't I take my sister's place as the sacrifice?]

…Jiro.

Her brother.

Her poor brother had been just like this.

If he were still alive, he would be around [Bai Six's] age, wouldn't he?

Beneath [Bai Six's] long lashes, his dark eyes showed no hint of despondency. There was only an indifferent sort of amusement, a detached curiosity. Yet, his voice remained soft as he said:

"That's all for today's lesson, Xiaokui-sama. Go get some rest."

"Don't wait for me at the shrine tonight. I know I can't feel pain. I've given up on fulfilling my own wishes."

He stood up to leave.

Xiaokui clenched her teeth.

And just as [Bai Six] reached the door, his fingers brushing the paper frame, she called out hoarsely—

"Bai Six, please wait!"

He paused. The corners of his mouth curled up slightly, but he didn't turn around. His voice remained subdued.

"Is there something else, Lord Xiaokui?"

Xiaokui's throat tightened. Still, she tilted her head and forced the words out, voice trembling.

"Can you tell me… what exactly your wish is?"

"My brother… he was like you. At first, he couldn't feel pain either."

Her vision blurred.

"All his wishes were for me. So I wonder… what kind of wish would someone like him make, if it was for himself?"

For the first time, [Bai Six] stopped completely.

Slowly, he turned back to her.

His gaze landed on the tear tracks clinging to the corners of her eyes, and he smiled—not mockingly, not cruelly, but with something unreadable.

"Do you really want to know?"

"You swear you won't tell anyone?"

Xiaokui nodded fiercely. "I swear!"

[Bai Six] crouched down.

He reached out his right hand, extended his pinky, and looked up at her with a surprisingly childish expression.

"Then… pinky promise."

"Hook your pinky with mine, and we'll be bound for a hundred years."

Xiaokui froze.

Her breath caught.

…Jiro used to say that, too.

Pulling pinkies, making promises—he used to do the same thing.

Swallowing back a sob, she took a deep breath and extended her hand, linking her pinky with his. She gently curled their fingers together twice, just like she used to with her brother.

"I promise," she whispered. "I won't tell anyone."

[Bai Six's] lips curled slightly. His voice was light, almost teasing.

"A liar swallows a thousand needles, Sister Xiaokui."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Xiaokui and Bai Six hooked their pinkies and shook them. She raised a hand to wipe the tears from the corners of her eyes before asking softly,

"...And Bai Six, what is your wish?"

Bai Six propped one hand on the tabletop, lowering his gaze. He tapped his knuckles against the wood, the rhythm steady and unhurried.

"I want to sacrifice the evil god."

Xiaokui's breath caught. "Sacrifice the evil god?!"

"Yeah." Bai Six's lips quirked into a lazy smirk. "It's because of Him that you're all suffering, isn't it? Wouldn't everything end if He were sacrificed?"

Something about his words felt wrong, but Xiaokui couldn't pinpoint what. She frowned.

"...Why is that your wish?"

Bai Six tilted his head slightly, his loose kimono slipping off his shoulder, revealing patches of dark, scaly skin. He winked.

"Because I hate evil gods, of course."

Xiaokui hesitated. "Hate evil gods…?"

Most of the sacrifices hated the evil god, but something told her Bai Six's hatred ran deeper—different from the others'.

"That's right." Bai Six's eyes half-lidded, his voice carrying an almost bored amusement. "When I was at the orphanage, no one liked me. The teachers found me unsettling. The other children rejected me. No matter what I did, I was always left on the outside."

"But there was someone else like that. His name was Xie Ta."

Xiaokui found herself listening more closely.

"I was curious about him. He liked the same books as me, played the same horror games. Even the same teachers and children hated him. I thought he was interesting. I wanted to understand what he was thinking."

Xiaokui couldn't help but smile. "You wanted to be friends with him."

Bai Six paused as if considering it. "Logically, that would be the expected conclusion."

"...But he rejected me."

Xiaokui blinked. "Why?"

Bai Six shrugged. "I don't know. No matter how many times I invited him to play, he ignored me. Even when I stood directly in front of him, he just walked past me—cold, indifferent."

He let out a soft exhale, his smirk returning.

"So, naturally, I started to hate him."

Xiaokui frowned. "That's not right. Even if he wanted to say no, he should've at least said it properly."

Bai Six leaned his cheek against his palm, his tone growing more subdued.

"Then, one day, he disappeared. Some said he died."

Xiaokui's stomach clenched. "Died?!"

"Mm." Bai Six sighed, almost regretful. "And because I was the one who had openly shown hostility toward him, and because I returned late that night, they accused me of killing him."

Something about Bai Six's tone unsettled her. Xiaokui suddenly recalled the way he had laughed on the boat, the ease with which he had confessed to killing Xie Ta and dismembering his body.

…That wasn't the attitude of someone who had been falsely accused.

But before she could dwell on it, Bai Six continued, his voice calm, unhurried.

"As more children started hating me, wanting me gone, the teachers took it upon themselves to punish me. They drowned me repeatedly in the baptismal pool, forced confessions from me—methods not too different from the ones used here in the Bei Yuan family."

He gave a light chuckle, as if telling a mildly interesting anecdote.

“The only thing I could do was escape to the church where Xie Ta had disappeared. I prayed there, day after day, because there was no one else to help me. I thought maybe God would save me.”

Xiaokui swallowed, her throat dry.

“But that act of prayer… the others twisted it into something else. My teachers and the other orphans said that I was a murderer—returning to the scene of my crime to relive the thrill of it.”

His voice lowered.

“All because I smiled when I prayed.”

Bai Six lifted his gaze then, locking eyes with Xiaokui. There was something terrifyingly vast in those dark eyes, as if they could swallow all the light in the room.

Xiaokui froze.

She couldn’t move.

Bai Six leaned forward, resting his head lightly against her shoulder, his breath warm against her skin as he whispered,

“Do you think the same way?”

“Was it my fault that I didn’t know how to show suffering? That I thought prayers should be offered to God Xiang with devotion, not misery?”

Xiaokui’s heart twisted painfully.

Jiro…

Isn’t this just like her Jiro?

Overcome, she reached out, stroking Bai Six’s hair as she loudly denied, “It’s not your fault!”

“It’s the fault of the people who tortured you!”

Against her shoulder, Bai Six’s lips curled ever so slightly. His voice was quiet, almost childlike.

"...Is that so?"

Xiaokui took a deep breath. "Yes!"

Bai Six exhaled softly, his tone slipping into a near whisper.

"I don't know how long I prayed to God Xiang… but one night, I had a dream."

"In it, I was no longer a child from the orphanage. I was a resident of Luming County, feeling the call of the evil god."

"The evil god brought me into a game with many others. He said that if I won, I could gain many things."

"Money. Power. Tools."

"Then I woke up on a boat."

"The evil god told me the game was called TheEvil God Festival – Boathouse, and the only way to win was to sacrifice the evil god in the shrine."

Bai Six lifted his head slightly, looking at Xiaokui.

"That first night, when I stepped into the shrine, Sister Xiaokui…"

"Guess what I found?"

Xiaokui shook her head, her thoughts a tangled mess.

Bai Six smiled.

"I found the evil god's body sleeping in the shrine."

"The very one I was accused of killing."

His smirk widened, and his next words sent ice down Xiaokui's spine.

"Xie Ta."

Xiaokui's pupils contracted.

She walked out of the room where Bai Six had been giving her lessons, her mind almost blank. As she stepped through the doorway, Xiaokui hesitated, glancing back uncertainly. Bai Six stood there, effortlessly accepting the next offering, his posture relaxed, his expression unreadable.

"Lady Xiaokui," he said with a light smile, arms crossed as he leaned against the doorframe. "Don't forget our pact."

As the days passed, she found herself growing closer to Bai Six. During lessons, he would teach her how to avoid torture, slipping her quiet reminders when no one was watching. Sometimes, he would distract her with games of horror and backgammon. Other times, they would do nothing at all—just lying on the tatami mats, staring at the ceiling, speaking of things that meant nothing and everything at once.

"If only I had met you earlier, Lady Xiaokui," Bai Six murmured one day, sprawled across the floor. "If only someone had been there to play with me back then... maybe I wouldn't be here now."

His voice dropped, softer than a breath.

"If only... I had a sister, too."

Someone who would never abandon him. Someone who would miss him when he was gone.

"Because having people who long for your presence, even in death... that makes it all worth it."

Xiaokui found herself saying, without thinking, "Bai Six is valuable, too."

"Is that so?" Bai Six let out a quiet laugh, unamused. "Valuable to whom?"

The more time she spent with him, the more he reminded her of a child.

—Particularly like Jiro.

Slowly, she let her guard down.

One day, Bai Six looked at her and asked, suddenly, "Beiyuan Xiaokui, do you want to leave this place?"

Xiaokui froze. The answer should have been obvious, but she found herself hesitating.

"...Yes," she finally admitted.

"I have a way for you to escape," Bai Six said, his voice quick and even, without a trace of emotion. "Soon, there will be a major conflict between the Gifune family and the Beiyuan family. In the chaos, the guards around the boathouse will be at their weakest."

"If you want to run, that's your chance."

Xiaokui bit her lower lip, as if on the verge of saying something—but in the end, no words came.

"If you want the other sacrifices to escape too, spread the word," Bai Six continued indifferently. "But once you leave, don’t come back."

Xiaokui's head snapped up. "What about you?"

Bai Six smiled, casual as ever. "My goal is here. I’m not leaving."

She opened her mouth to argue, but he cut her off before she could.

"I’ve already contacted your sister. She’ll be waiting for you and take you straight to the county where she lives now."

"Run. Get out of here. Stay alive. Forget everything that happened in this place and start over."

Bai Six’s gaze softened, something unreadable flickering in his dark eyes.

"Including me, Sister Xiaokui."

Panic flared in her chest. She stepped forward, reaching for him. "Then come with us!"

Bai Six turned away. His voice was quiet, but firm. "Lady Xiaokui, today’s lesson is over. Go back."

"Don’t come back."

Xiaokui clenched her teeth, struggling to find the right words, but Bai Six's footsteps stilled.

"If I get the chance," he murmured, "I’ll come see you in six months."

On the night of the conflict, the Gifune family set fire to the Beiyuan estate. Half of Luming County burned in the blaze.

"—Bai Six!"

"Where are you?!"

Xiaokui searched desperately through the flames, but she never found him.

She was dragged from the inferno by Cang Tai, her body weak, her mind spinning. When she reached the path leading to the shrine, she saw Apricot waiting there.

The moment she laid eyes on Xiaokui, Apricot threw her arms around her, sobbing.

"Finally… finally, I found you!"

Xiaokui turned back with a blank expression, her gaze drawn to the shrine atop the hill. Amidst the raging inferno, a lone figure in a white kimono stood untouched by the flames. He smiled faintly, lifting a hand in a slow wave, as if congratulating her on her escape.

—It was Bai Six.

Her vision blurred with tears, and she murmured unconsciously,

“…Thank you.”

“Thank you, Bai Six.”

She had finally escaped this hell. With her sister by her side, she left for a place where spring blossoms bloomed.

At first, she lived in fear, dreading that men from Luming County would come for her. But as the days passed and no one came, she began to let herself believe in safety. She settled into a normal, peaceful life, welcomed with warmth by Apricot and her kind husband.

Good news seemed to follow. Before long, Apricot announced that she was pregnant.

Her husband sighed, exasperated yet indulgent. “Look at the dates—you were already pregnant when you went to save Xiaokui. I told you to let me go instead, but you wouldn’t listen.”

Apricot cradled her belly, her eyes soft as they rested on Xiaokui. “Even if I had known, I still would have gone myself.”

“She is as much my sister as my own children will be.”

“When Bai Six contacted me, he said Xiaokui had suffered greatly and might not trust strangers. He insisted that I be the one to come.”

Apricot exhaled, shaking her head. “That Bai Six… He really is a good person, isn’t he? Willing to help our Xiaokui.”

Xiaokui blinked in surprise at the mention of Bai Six name. She hesitated, then reached out to gently touch Apricot’s stomach. Her voice felt distant, as if she were speaking of something from another lifetime. “I wonder if he’s left Luming County yet.”

Apricot flicked her forehead playfully. “Don’t worry, Bai Six is smart. I’m sure he’s long gone from that wretched place.”

“Didn’t he say he’d come see you in six months? There’s still a month left—who knows? Maybe when you open the door, you’ll find him standing there.”

Xiaokui inhaled deeply, then let out a quiet hum of agreement.

But when the six months were up, it didn’t happen as she imagined.

On a gloomy afternoon, rain poured relentlessly from the sky. Apricot and her husband were out for a maternity check-up when Xiaokui heard a knock at the door. She opened it—

And there stood Bai Six, pale and drenched, rainwater dripping from his hair.

Xiaokui froze in shock. “Bai Six… teacher?”

Without a word, Bai Six seized her wrist and pulled her into the rain.

“Come with me,” he said, his voice eerily calm. “I have something to show you.”

Xiaokui stumbled after him, struggling to break free. Fear crept up her spine. After all this time, after finally building a peaceful life, what horror was about to befall her now?

“What’s wrong, Bai Six?” she asked, her voice unsteady.

“Did you come to see me?”

“I did.” Bai Six strode forward through the downpour, his expression unreadable. “But I also came with bad news.”

“We’ve all been deceived.”

Xiaokui frowned. “…What do you mean?”

“You won’t believe me if I just tell you,” Bai Six said evenly. “So I’ll show you.”

“Besides you, seventy-three other sacrifices escaped that fire. Four of them ended up in a county near here.”

“One of them is Cang Tai. You remember him, don’t you?”

Xiaokui’s unease deepened. “I do.”

Cang Tai had fled with her that night. He had been taken in by a kind couple, and under their care, he had flourished. They encouraged him to study hard, to aim for university. He was preparing for exams, full of hope for the future.

Just like the others.

The other escapees who had come to this county were doing well, too. They met up from time to time, talking about their days in Luming County like old war stories, distant and surreal.

“…Isn’t that a good thing?” Xiaokui asked hesitantly.

Bai Six’s voice was cold. “Don’t you think it’s strange?”

“Why is it that every single one of you is thriving?”

“Because the world outside is beautiful,” Xiaokui said automatically—words ingrained in her by the Bei Yuan family’s teachers.

Outside Luming County, the world was a paradise. That was what they had always been taught. So long as they escaped, happiness awaited them.

Bai Six let out a humorless laugh. “No.”

His soaked hair clung to his face as he turned to her. “From the teachings to the fire, to your so-called escape—it was all a lie. A long, carefully orchestrated deception.”

A chill ran down Xiaokui’s spine. “What… do you mean?”

Bai Six didn’t answer. “See for yourself.”

They traveled by foot, then by carriage, taking two rides until they reached the outskirts of a town.

Their first stop: the home of Cang Tai.

The house was tucked away in a quiet area. They had to walk some distance before reaching it.

As they neared, Xiaokui heard muffled sobbing—then a sharp, pleading cry.

“No… Mom, Dad, you’re lying, right?” Cang Tai’s voice was raw, desperate. “It—it can’t be true, can it?!”

Bai Six didn’t spare her a glance as he pulled her toward the side of the house. “There’s a window here. Look inside.”

Through the warm glow of lamplight, Xiaokui saw Cang Tai kneeling on the floor, clutching a torn A+ report card, tears streaming down his face.

“I got in! I passed the entrance exam!” His voice cracked. “Please, please, don’t send me back!”

Sitting across from him were the couple who had taken him in. The same couple who had fed him, encouraged him, given him a home.

They weren’t looking at him.

Instead, their eyes were fixed on two men in black standing before them.

Xiaokui’s breath caught in her throat.

—She knew those men.

They were servants of the Bei Yuan family.

One of them pulled out a thick stack of bills and handed it to the couple. “Thank you for your efforts these past six months.”

The couple accepted the money with beaming smiles. “No trouble at all, no trouble at all! We were happy to do it.”

The servant’s gaze swept over Cang Tai, who knelt on the floor, trembling. “To ensure Lord Cang Tai suffers a little more, we ask that you personally escort him back to the shrine. Watch as he is sacrificed.”

The husband nodded eagerly. “Of course, of course. We agreed to this six months ago. We’ll do exactly as we were told.”

Xiaokui felt like she was going to be sick.

The wife, still smiling, turned to the servants and handed them cigarettes. “Next time you have another child for us to raise, do let us know. It’s been such an easy way to make money.”

The servants took the cigarettes without a word, indifferent.

And Cang Tai—

Cang Tai had stopped crying.

His eyes were empty.

Completely void of light.

Outside the window, the rain poured relentlessly.

"I'm sure you can see it now," Bai Six said, his voice indifferent. "This was all by design—a carefully orchestrated escape meant to make the sacrifice even more agonizing." He glanced at Xiaokui, unreadable. "Even I was just a pawn, used to deliver a message to you."

"No, that's not true." Xiaokui shook her head, dazed. "It was my sister who came to pick me up, not some stranger."

She clung to the thought as if saying it aloud would make it real. "She was always the kindest to me. She fought with my parents when they tried to sell me. She wouldn't—she couldn't do this to me. We're real sisters..."

"Is that so?" Bai Six asked, his voice eerily calm. "And yet, it was your real parents who sold you, wasn't it?"

Xiaokui flinched.

"Your sister was already pregnant when she came to get you," Bai Six continued. "She wasn't well-off, and she came for you at the exact moment she needed money the most." His words were clinical, methodical. "For years, she never came. Then, suddenly, two months into her pregnancy, she did."

His dark eyes held no light as he asked, "Are you sure she won't sell you?"

Xiaokui turned away, staring blankly at the watch on her wrist. She muttered as if in a trance, "My sister will be back from her maternity checkup soon... I still need to go home and cook. If I don't, she'll come back from the rain with nothing to eat, and she'll be starving... The baby too..."

She stumbled forward, taking a few steps before collapsing to the ground. Her palms scraped against the gravel, blood pooling from the cuts, but she barely noticed. She pushed herself up, staggered forward again, and fell once more, whispering feverishly:

"That won't do... That won't do..."

The rain drenched her, running down her face—she wasn't sure if it was rain or tears.

Bai Six approached her slowly. As she knelt there, trembling, he held out a hand.

"There are three more sacrifices," he said.

His voice was void of warmth. "Do you want to see them?"

Xiaokui lifted her head, her eyes unfocused.

"...Alright."

"Yota, please, don't leave me behind! I'll do anything!"

Sonoko clung to her boyfriend's leg, sobbing hoarsely. "I love you. Please, don't send me back!"

Her voice cracked with desperation. "I can earn money—more than they'll ever give you! Just don't do this!"

A short distance away, a boy stared at his older brother in disbelief. His voice wavered as he forced out a shaky smile.

"Kawano... brother?"

He glanced at the Bei Yuan family's servant handing money to Kawano, then back at him, his voice almost hopeful.

"Is... is it a customer, Kawano-go?"

The older brother turned to him with the same easy-going smile he always wore.

"Yeah, of course, it’s a big order." He fanned himself with the stack of bills. "And only you could’ve done this one."

The boy's smile froze.

The realization sank in, slow and suffocating.

"You—"

Before he could finish, Kawano rolled up his sleeve and backhanded him across the face. The slap sent the boy sprawling, teeth and blood flying from his mouth.

He stopped struggling after that. The last light in his eyes flickered and died.

Kawano counted his money, then pointed at the boy lying on the floor.

"Be good now. I raised you for six months for this payout. If it weren’t for the money, who’d waste their time feeding a freeloader like you?"

Xiaokui stood motionless in the rain. Bai Six stood beside her, a black umbrella shielding him from the downpour.

She didn’t know how long she stood there. Long enough for the boy to be dragged away like a discarded doll, for the rain to wash away the blood on the ground.

Her vision blurred.

That boy had been sacrificed—just like that.

Bai Six's voice cut through the storm.

"I can send you somewhere Bei Yuan’s family will never find you," he said. "But your sister and her family already know about you. If you want to truly escape, to make sure they never come after you—"

His expression didn’t change as he placed a black dagger into Xiaokui's trembling hands.

"Then there's only one way."

His voice was steady, emotionless.

"Either you let them use your love for them to keep you trapped in a never-ending nightmare, offering yourself up again and again as a sacrifice..."

"Or—" He met her eyes.

"You sever the ties completely and choose freedom."

Xiaokui didn't remember how she got home.

Didn't remember how she showered, changed, cooked.

She sat at the dinner table, back straight, posture perfect, waiting.

The only difference from before was the black dagger resting silently on her chair.

Ding dong—
The doorbell rang twice before the door finally opened.

Apricot sighed with mild exasperation. "Xiaokui, really. Not answering the door again?"

"You have a key," her husband pointed out with a chuckle. "You could've let yourself in. You're just being lazy again."

Apricot shot back defensively, "I was carrying a ton of shopping bags! I didn't have a free hand, okay? It's not laziness!"

Her husband nodded with amusement. "Mostly, you're just too excited about buying baby stuff before the baby is even born."

Apricot sat down excitedly across from Xiaokui, beaming. "The baby's healthy! Just another month or two to go!"

Xiaokui stared at her blankly, her eyes unfocused. "Is that so?"

Apricot frowned, finally noticing something was off. "Xiaokui, what's wrong?"

Xiaokui lowered her gaze. "Just... a little tired."

"Then let me tell you something that'll wake you right up!" Apricot looped her arm around Xiaokui's, her enthusiasm returning. "Guess who I ran into on the way here?"

"Bai Six!"

"He saw me and gave me a big red envelope—said it was a tradition from his homeland, a blessing for a new baby." Apricot scratched her cheek, looking a little shy. "I felt awkward accepting it, but he said it was for you too. Told me to ask if you wanted it."

Her husband pulled a thick wad of cash from his briefcase. "Here it is."

The moment Xiaokui saw the money, she froze.

The wrapping paper.
The thick texture.
The familiar markings.

They were exactly like the bills the Bei Yuan family's servants had used when paying for the others.

A lie.

Xiaokui lowered her head, her voice barely a whisper. "That's impossible… Bai Six was with me all afternoon."

Her breath hitched.

"This money—this is the same as theirs."

Tears welled in her eyes as she lifted her face, her voice breaking.

"It was them, wasn't it?! They paid you!!"

Her grip tightened around the knife hidden behind her back.

"Liars! You're all liars!"

"You're no different from my wretched parents—both of you got happiness at the cost of my suffering!"

"You don't deserve to be parents at all!"

Apricot gasped, instinctively shielding her belly. Her husband paled, rushing forward to stand between them.

A cold flash of steel.

A scream.

For a moment, it was impossible to tell whether the cries came from the attacker or the victims.

Bai Six leaned leisurely against the doorframe, arms crossed, glancing at his watch. He waited patiently, listening to the agonized sounds within. When the screaming finally subsided, he pushed the door open and stepped inside, unhurried.

The room was drenched in blood.

Apricot's husband lay motionless on the floor. Xiaokui knelt beside him, her hands trembling, the knife slick with crimson. Her eyes were vacant.

Across from her, Apricot was barely clinging to life, cradling her stomach.

She reached out weakly, fingers brushing Xiaokui's face.

A bloodstained handprint.

Through tear-filled eyes, Apricot whispered, "My... poor Xiaokui."

"Sister... doesn't blame you."

"Sister knows... you were tricked."

Bai Six stepped lightly over the husband's body, humming a tune as he approached Xiaokui.

Apricot's voice was fading, but she forced out her last words.

"If... if I truly am just a sacrifice..." Her lips quivered. "Then let my wish be..."

Blood seeped from her ashen lips.

"Let someone save my sister."

"Let Xiaokui escape this nightmare."

"Let her live... happily ever after..."

Her body slumped.

Her arms, once wrapped protectively around her stomach, fell limply to the floor.

The pool of blood grew wider.

Bai Six gazed down at Xiaokui as if inspecting merchandise. Then, he knelt before her and smiled.

"Sister Xiaokui, you're finally perfect."

"You're the most exquisite sacrifice in this entire copy."

Xiaokui barely reacted. She lifted her head slightly, her pupils shrinking.

Bai Six chuckled.

"Yes, that's right."

"It was all set up for you."

"I can't generate pain myself, so I needed a first-class sacrifice—someone whose agony was pure enough to awaken the Evil God and make a wish worthy of sacrifice."

"The other sacrifices? Those were all real. The Bei Yuan family really did orchestrate them as part of their so-called 'Exodus Plan.' I didn't lie to you about that, Xiaokui."

Xiaokui's fingers slowly unfurled.

The knife slipped from her grip, landing with a soft squelch in the blood pooling beneath Apricot's body.

Bai Six's smile widened.

"But Apricot was the exception."

"She wasn't paid by anyone."

"She was truly a good sister."

"So, Xiaokui... you were the exception too."

"You are both a victim of hell and a sacrifice of happiness."

He leaned closer, his voice dripping with delight.

"Tell me, Sister Xiaokui—how does it feel?"

"To seize happiness with your own hands... only to destroy it?"

Xiaokui couldn't remember how Bai Six took her back to Luming County, nor how he dragged her to the shrine.

But she remembered how, just before she lost consciousness, he wrenched her wrist and broke it.

She remembered the sensation of her hair being gripped, her body hauled like a discarded object and dumped beneath the shrine.

For years, the shrine doors had never opened for Bai Six.

But the moment Xiaokui stepped inside—

They opened.

A pair of bloodless, bare feet descended before her.

Threads—countless, translucent threads—floated outward, tangled in the air like puppeteer's strings.

Long silver-blue hair cascaded around the figure, glowing with an eerie luminescence.

Xiaokui gazed up in a daze, tears slipping down her cheeks.

This... is the Evil God?

Bai Six's voice rang cheerfully in her ears.

"I offer a sacrifice to the Supreme Evil God, Beiyuan Xiaokui."

"And my wish is—" Bai Six's smile deepened. "To sacrifice this Evil God's vessel, Xie Ta, and clear the game."

The figure before her began to change.

Their body glowed, their limbs stiffening, warping into the form of a wooden effigy.

But those silver-blue eyes—holy and inhuman—remained unchanged.

They stared at her.

Waited for her.

A true sacrifice, born of her own pain.

Waited for her to wish.

Xiaokui’s vision blurred with fresh tears.

Her voice trembled.

"I wish..."

Apricot’s dying words echoed in her mind.

Let someone save my sister.

Let her escape this nightmare.

She clutched her chest, sobbing uncontrollably. Then, she threw her head back and screamed—

"God, please!"

"Let the one who can save us appear!"

"Let us escape this nightmare!!!"

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The moon shone down on the earth.

In the dark forest, the "princess" who had fled from the high loft staggered down the hill, her mind spinning.

As the memories returned in full force, Xiaokui collapsed to the ground, her body convulsing as she vomited uncontrollably. Her fingers dug into the dirt, her tears mixing with the burning acid she expelled.

Bai Six...

Bai Six!

The cowardly, self-doubting sacrifice had been nothing more than a prop in his hands. Her pain—real and searing—was just another game piece he moved to pass the trial.

"Xiaokui!"

Apricot fell to her knees, cradling Xiaokui's trembling body, tears streaming down her face. She, too, had remembered. Her sobs were soft but broken. "My poor sister..."

A sharp scoff cut through the night air.

From the darkness of the forest, a figure emerged, the shifting moonlight gradually illuminating his features. The young man smiled.

"What a performance, Sister Xiaokui."

Xiaokui stiffened.

Bai Six took a slow step forward, his eyes glinting with amusement as he reached out, tilting her chin up with a finger. Her face was frozen in a blank, immobile expression.

"To think you almost sacrificed the evil god," he murmured, chuckling softly. "I never expected..."

He trailed off before leaning in slightly, his voice filled with cruel delight.

"There are actually other players who can lure the evil god out of the shrine and trigger this special game path."

He let out a quiet laugh.

"It's hilarious, really."

Bai Six half-closed his eyes, his voice light. "Tell me—do you think your suffering alone is enough to lure the evil god out now?"

Xiaokui shuddered violently.

"If it isn't..." Bai Six tilted his head. "What will you do?"

She barely registered Apricot moving beside her.

Then, a blur—Apricot had grabbed a large stone, her expression twisted with desperation as she raised it high.

"You're insane! Stay away from Xiaokui!"

Bai Six smirked, his fingers slipping into the folds of his sleeve. A glimmer of black.

A bone whip.

"Sister, no!" Xiaokui's scream tore through the night.

Apricot swung—

In a blink, Bai Six flicked his wrist.

The bloodstained black bone whip shot out, wrapping around Apricot's neck with chilling precision. With a single tug, he dragged her toward him, her feet scraping helplessly against the ground.

She choked, fingers clawing at the whip strangling her, her face quickly turning blue.

Bai Six tilted his head as if remembering something. "Oh, right." He feigned surprise. "Apricot-san... you're pregnant, aren't you?"

His voice was light, almost friendly. "How long does it take for a pregnant woman to suffocate before the baby in her belly dies from lack of oxygen?"

A pause. Then, he mused, "I think... about three minutes?"

The whip tightened.

Apricot convulsed, her limbs thrashing violently against the dirt. Her fingers, once desperately pulling at the whip, were slipping.

Her lips parted—her voice was hoarse, barely a whisper.

"Xiaokui..."

Apricot's gaze, blurred and dimming, held hers.

"Don't let my death make you suffer."

Her voice cracked.

"Pain... that's what he wants."

Xiaokui's vision swam.

Apricot's hand fell limply to the ground—

A snap tore through the air.

From behind Bai Six, a white bone whip sliced through the darkness.

Reacting instantly, Bai Six released Apricot and spun, both hands swiftly intercepting the incoming strike.

Black and white whips clashed in midair, ringing with a sharp, vibrating hum.

The force sent a gust through the clearing.

Xiaokui barely had time to react before she threw herself forward, catching Apricot as she collapsed.

She pressed trembling fingers to her sister's face—warm. Breath.

Alive.

Tears spilled down Xiaokui's face. "You're alive... you're alive!"

Bai Six's expression shifted. He turned, eyes narrowing toward the direction of the attack.

A figure stepped into the moonlight.

He wore a broad white hari-kari coat, the fabric flowing with each measured step. A long red ribbon was tied around his hair, trailing in the wind as he moved.

The ribbon passed the corner of his eye.

Bai Six let out a slow whistle, a smirk curling his lips.

"Now that's a nice outfit."

The man's expression was unreadable. "This is ceremonial attire for the sacrifice." His voice was calm, detached. "But I don't recall ever agreeing to let the Bei Yuan family sacrifice me."

Bai Six's smile faltered slightly.

Bai Liu's eyes met his.

"It's not for Bei Yuan," he said quietly.

"It's for the Gifune family."

Silence.

Then—

A startled gasp.

Apricot, still clutching Xiaokui for support, turned her head, eyes wide as she stared at the distant mountainside.

A glow.

A massive, roaring fire.

Her voice trembled. "What's going on?!"

Beneath the shrine, where the Bei Yuan family estate lay, flames devoured the compound.

The mansion—once imposing and untouchable—was engulfed in a raging inferno.

From even this distance, the desperate cries and frantic shouts of the Bei Yuan servants echoed up the hillside.

"The altar and shrine are burning!"

"The master's collection—get water! Save the books and paintings!"

"The sacrifice's loft collapsed!"

"Shut off the warm water to the rockery! Redirect the garden springs to fight the fire!"

Xiaokui's breath hitched.

She had dreamed of this.

Dreamed of seeing the ugly, rotting Bei Yuan estate burn to the ground.

But now that it was happening, right before her eyes... it felt surreal.

Like a divine miracle.

Her gaze snapped to Bai Liu.

"You..." Her voice shook. "Did you set the fire?!"

But before Bai Liu could respond, Xiaokui nervously and self-consciously denied it, her voice shaky:
"How could Bei Yuan's house, so heavily guarded, suddenly burst into flames like that?"

"It would take at least 30 or 40 ignition points for a fire of this scale to ignite. Even if it were set, the Bei Yuan family invested a lot in drawing mountain spring water. They'll have the fire under control soon..."

"The fire will be put out soon enough."

But as soon as she said this, the light in Xiaokui's eyes seemed to fade.

She recalled a fire at the Bei Yuan house in her memory, realizing it was part of a sacrifice ritual designed to facilitate a reasonable exodus.

The fire wouldn't even burn.

As expected, the intense flames at the Bei Yuan house were soon under control, with the fire in the southeast corner quickly extinguished. Many servants were cursing furiously.

"Catch the arsonist!"

"Must have been one of the sacrifices!"

"Bring them back and torture them!"

But before anyone could leave, the fire reignited.

In the southeast corner, a servant screamed desperately, "Help, the fire's back!"

"How did it reignite?"

"Didn't we already divert the mountain spring water?"

Xiaokui stood frozen, confused.

"Interesting," Bai Six said, leaning in as if watching a spectacle. His black whip curled in his hand as he glanced at Bai Liu, amusement in his voice. "Did you tamper with Bei Yuan's spring water supply?"

Bai Liu shot him a glance but didn't reply.

"Lord Bai Six!" A distant voice shouted from the hilltop, filled with excitement. A figure waved frantically in the dark. It was Cang Tai. "I secretly took the key from Bei Yuan's house and gave it to the Gifune family, just as you ordered!"

"They said they were celebrating the summer festival and had plenty of sake carried up through the shrine!"

"Sake, mountain spring water, the supply system..." Xiaokui mumbled, snapping to attention. "When the Gifune family got the key to the shrine, they could have cut off the spring at the mountain top and replaced the water with sake."

"To create the illusion of warm water for the garden, the Bei Yuan family always kept the fireplace burning in June, so the spirits would ignite as soon as they entered the furnace!"

"Bei Yuan’s home has at least a hundred stoves—that’s over a hundred fires..."

Xiaokui's eyes gleamed as she looked down at the flames below, then her lips curled into a smile. She clutched her stomach and laughed until tears streamed down her face.

"The brutes who let so many squires freeze to death in winter!"

"Deserve to die!"

The Bei Yuan family panicked as the fire raged, but the Gifune family had already blocked the mountain, declaring, "Summer Festival—no one is allowed near the shrine."

The once-powerful family couldn't escape the flames. They had no choice but to walk toward the shrine, fear evident on their faces. It was as if they feared the [evil god] more than the fire itself.

The mountain fires blended with the darkness, the moon shining behind the shrine. In the distance, members of the Gifune family could be seen unloading bottles from the top of the hill, then heading down.

At the waterfront, a lively scene unfolded. Ritual dancers filled the stands, while at the boathouse, the attendants and offerings, who had been locked away, burst from their cages and fled, as if they had received some kind of signal. They scattered into the darkness, like animals escaping captivity.

From high on the bleachers, a figure lowered his telescope with satisfaction. He turned to the servant beside him.

"The new offerings have been released. Inform the [anchor men] to take their positions and prepare to receive the new batch."

"Remember, give them the happiest six months of their lives."

The servant bowed and held up the box containing the binoculars. "Yes, Lord Gosho."

Gosho smiled as he put the binoculars away. Looking toward the Bei Yuan house burning in the distance, he said with a smirk, "Tonight is the eve of the summer festival. Everyone has enjoyed six months of happiness. Now, it's time to have some real fun."

"The new offerings are out. Let’s release the old ones for hunting and games."

The Royal Boat floated beneath the stands, where the guests from Luming County cheered and laughed. Gifune raised his hand, signaling the start of the festivities.

"The Evil God Night Celebration Festival begins."

Hilltop.

"So this is the night," Bai Six remarked, as if finally satisfied with the unfolding scene. He stepped forward, his smile thin and impassive.

"The Bei Yuan house is burning, the Gifune family attacked, the new sacrifices fled, and the old ones are being hunted."

"If it’s this night... it’s happening now..."

Bai Six grinned as he looked intently at Bai Liu, counting down softly. "5, 4, 3, 2, 1..."

The air crackled as a massive beam of light shot up from behind Bai Liu, exploding into the dark sky. Thousands of sparks rained down like fireworks.

The sound of explosions filled the air, mixing with the bright moonlight and glittering fireworks, casting light and shadows on the shrine below, illuminating it in vibrant colors.

-- It was like the grand stage of a game.

Bai Six's smile grew as he hid his whip behind him. "The game has finally begun."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

On the vast expanse of sand by the sea, countless sacrifices ran for their lives, their bodies pushed to the brink. Blood streamed from their seven orifices, their airways felt as though they were burning, and their bodies screamed in pain, yet they never stopped running.

The sacrifices glanced up at the beautiful moon and the fireworks lighting the sky, their faces marked with a trance-like, relieved smile despite the blood dripping from their mouths.

If they could just get out of here, they would be completely free.

Beyond this nightmare, a better world awaited them, one free from pain!

In the distance, the maid from the Gifune family, standing atop the fire station, watched the fleeing sacrifices with indifference. She picked up the phone. “Lord Gosho, the sacrifices have escaped from Luming County. Should we release their [anchors] now?”

“Hold off for now,” Gosho’s voice crackled from the other end. “Make sure they don’t get close to the old sacrifices. The seven family lords are hunting them, and I don’t want them ruining the fun.”

The maid glanced back up the hill when she heard the mention of the seven great families.

From a distance, she saw only a faint glow at the shrine. Rather than notifying the fire brigade, she smiled slightly. “After tonight, the Bei Yuan family will be completely removed from the Eight Families, correct?”

Gosho’s smile was audible. “I will make sure the Bei Yuan house is reduced to ashes.”

“Lord Gosho... won’t you attend the hunt for the old sacrifices tonight?” The servant hesitated slightly, uncertain.

“No need.” Mikoto’s lips curled into a smile. “I already have the most valuable sacrifice.”

“Tonight, I will offer him to the evil gods.”

With that, a massive firework shot up from the back of the lookout, exploding at the highest point of the hill. The colorful light burst into the night sky, revealing the men of the Gifune family, weapons drawn, carefully descending from the top of the hill toward the shrine. Meanwhile, the Bei Yuan family, cornered at the base, scrambled up the hill in fear.

“It’s time to enter the shrine.” The leader of the Gifune family turned to those behind him, barking orders. “Keep your skins tight and your eyes covered.”

“If anyone accidentally catches a glimpse of that corpse and turns into a monster, don’t say I didn’t warn you!”

“Yes!”

The man from the Gifune family swiftly pulled a thick black cloth from his pocket and tied it around his eyes as he entered the shrine’s grounds.

Taking a deep breath, the leader continued, “Lord Gosho said the sacrifice Bai six has already been taken outside the shrine. Our task is simple: grab Bai six, bring him in, and sacrifice him. Once that’s done, tonight’s mission will be complete.”

“We must be quick. By the time the next Funakya night wraps up with the sacrifice, the other lords will be bringing in old sacrifices they’ve hunted. We need to finish Bai six’s sacrifice before then!”

At the base of the hill, the servants were hurrying along.

“Hurry!” they urged. “Ladies and lords of the Bei Yuan house, tear off your clothes and cover your eyes!”

“We’re almost at the shrine!”

“Please, do not open your eyes! If you see the evil gods in the shrine, you’ll either become a sacrifice and go mad, or transform into a monster and be hunted!”

The men on the hill moved cautiously, their feet testing the ground, while those at the bottom stumbled along, their eyes tightly shut, faces full of fear and panic.

At the shrine, Bai six stood with his hands behind his back, slowly approaching Bai Liu. He raised an eyebrow, his lips curling into a smile. “What an interesting scene.”

“Everyone stumbles forward, eyes closed, toward the evil gods they worship daily, yet fear so much for their own desires.”

As Bai Liu spoke, Bai six’s whip lashed out from behind his back toward him. Bai Liu raised a hand to block, his dagger materializing in his palm. The blade pierced the loop of the bone whip, twisting around and pulling it from Bai six’s grasp.

Bai six stepped back, the whip disappearing from his hand. As he raised his hand again, the whip reappeared, and he swung it toward Bai Liu, twisting it as the bone spurs unfurled with a sharp hiss.

Bai Liu remained calm, transforming his dagger into a monkey’s claw, gripping the long, spiked bone whip with his bare hand, and yanking it toward him.

In the process, the bone whip disappeared once more from Bai six’s hand. He quickly dodged back, narrowly avoiding Bai Liu’s claws aimed at his neck. As he spun around, the whip reappeared at his waist, and he lashed it toward Bai Liu’s face.

Bai Liu sidestepped, the claws of his monkey's hand leaving four deep scratches on Bai six’s shoulder.

Bai six winced, clutching his wounded shoulder, then looked up at Bai Liu with a grin. “Should I really say, not bad for someone who can make an evil god suffer enough to walk out of the temple?”

“You’re much better than I expected.”

Bai Liu regarded the injured Bai six, his dark eyes unblinking. “Is this your first time playing a game copy?”

“Rolling out so soon?” Bai six smirked. “The Evil God Festival – Boathouse was indeed my first copy, but I’m curious. I shouldn’t look like a new player, so how did you figure that out?”

Bai Liu merely stared at Bai six without answering directly, his gaze falling to the bone whip in Bai six’s hand. “If this is your first copy, then you wouldn’t have been rewarded with props for failing the game.”

“Where did you get this bone whip?”

“How about a trade?” Bai six smiled, eyeing Bai Liu. “You answer my question, and I’ll answer yours.”

"You have no skills, so this must be your first game," Bai Liu replied calmly, his tone dry. "Now, it's my turn. Where did you get the bone whip?"

Bai Six smirked, lifting the black bone whip in his hand and giving it a shake. "Isn’t that the only way to get props in the game?" he said. "The first one is a bonus, but the second drops from killing monsters."

The smile on his face widened. "In my version of the Evil God Festival, I got the key to enter the shrine map and found the evil god NPC." He paused, eyes glinting. "But I didn’t suffer when facing Him, so I couldn’t awaken the evil god." He shrugged. "Still, since the Evil NPC’s face reminded me of a very annoying person I met in reality, I decided to take out my frustrations on Him. He wasn’t waking up, and I couldn’t push the game progress forward, so I decided to relive what I did to that person in real life. That’s when this bone whip fell out of His body."

Bai Liu’s expression shifted, a quiet understanding dawning in his eyes. Slowly, he lifted his gaze and fixed it on Bai Six, his voice steady but chilling. "You cut him open and took his spine out, didn’t you?"

"You could say that," Bai Six replied with a nonchalant shrug. "I was going to take some other things he dropped, but they were too fragmented to be useful, so I left them. He grew back, or refreshed, the next night, so it took me several days to dissect him properly and get the most intact piece." He raised the bone whip again, his grin widening. "How’s that? Looks good, doesn’t it?"

Meanwhile, Xiaokui, standing off to the side, glanced down at the bottom of the hill with a solemn expression. Turning to Bai Liu, she spoke urgently, "Bai Six! The men from Bei Yuan’s family are coming up!"

Cang Tai scrambled down from the top of the hill, his eyes wide with shock. "Bai Six, my lord! The Gifune family’s men are coming out of the shrine too!"

When Cang Tai reached Bai Liu, he blinked in astonishment, looking back and forth between Bai Liu and Bai Six. "Huh? How can there be two Bai Six?"

Xiaokui raised an eyebrow. "Is this guy's memory not fully integrated?"

Bai Liu gave Cang Tai a cold stare, his voice icy. "Cang Tai, take Beiyuan Xiaokui and her sister down the side path—the one I told you about, the one I sometimes use to get to the shrine."

Cang Tai snapped to attention. "Yes!"

Bai Liu's gaze shifted slightly, his eyes flicking to Xiaokui. "At the boathouse, the old and new sacrifices are fleeing," he said. "Beiyuan Xiaokui, your sister was contacted by someone from Bei Yuan's family to lure you out. You should be able to judge for yourself whether she really wanted to save you, right?"

Xiaokui took a deep breath, clutching her sister's hand. "Mm!"

"Your sister and you are safe," Bai Liu continued, his voice calm. "You'll encounter many other sacrifices during the [exodus]. If you want to help, use your sister as an interface and guide them along a different path of escape." His eyes hardened. "That way, they won't run into the [anchors] set up by the Gosho family."

He raised his gaze to Xiaokui, his words carrying a note of finality. "But the world isn't as nice as Bei Yuan's family has taught you." His tone turned colder. "In addition to the [anchors], there are many others who will try to deceive you, feeding off your pain." He paused for emphasis. "It's a cruel world."

Xiaokui's voice trembled. "I know."

Bai Liu nodded calmly, his eyes turning back to Bai Six, who was slowly backing away toward the shrine. He raised his whip nonchalantly, his expression unreadable. "Good to know."

"Now, learn to live for those who don't feed on your pain but those who will make you weep and suffer—for you," Bai Liu continued, his voice carrying a dark edge. "They're the kind of idiots you read about in textbooks—the ones who can give you a good life."

Xiaokui watched Bai Liu's retreating back, a mixture of confusion and awe on her face, hearing his final words as he chased after Bai Six.

"Take Cang Tai with you to escape," Bai Liu called over his shoulder.

Xiaokui's tears fell unexpectedly, and she choked back a sob, her voice shaky as she replied, unsure which question she was answering. "I will."

"I will, Bai Six teacher!"

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The moment the men of the Gifune family cautiously stepped into the shrine, their eyes blindfolded with black cloths, Bai Six stepped back and pushed open the shrine door.

The heavy red wooden door creaked loudly as it swung open, alerting the leader of the Gifune family. He immediately drew his sword and shouted, "Who's there?"

"Sacrifice Bai Six." Bai Six turned back with a smile, raising an eyebrow slightly. "The Gifune family's sacrifice you wanted is here. Won't you come and get it?"

The Gifune family leader paused, his sword swinging harshly toward the sound of Bai Six's footsteps. "Go! Get him into the shrine!"

"Yes!" The other Gifune family members shouted, pulling out their swords despite the blindfolds and jogging toward the direction of Bai Six's footsteps.

Just as the group of samurai neared Bai Six, the shrine door opened again.

A lighthearted Bai Liu pushed his way through.

"Who is it now?!" The leader of the Gifune family spun around, his sword quickly clamping onto Bai Liu's neck as he stepped through the door. "Who are you, and what are you doing here at this late hour?"

Bai Liu shot a quick glance at Bai Six and instantly understood what had happened.

Bai Six flashed a smile at Bai Liu before waving and disappearing behind the shrine.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze and blocked the man's sword at his neck with his hand. "Didn't you ask me to come?"

"That voice—are you Bai Six?!" The leader of the Gifune family asked in surprise, his sword twirling as he looked in the direction Bai Liu and Bai Six had gone. "You're Bai Six, but then who was that man?"

"I'd like to know too." Bai Liu didn't pause as he walked swiftly inward, cracking the whip in his hand. He flicked his wrist calmly. "So move out of the way. I'm going in."

The blindfolded man, sensing the long whip in Bai Liu's hand, grew tense. "If you are Bai Six, there's only one thing you're here to do—be sacrificed."

"What are you doing with that weapon?!" he shouted, swinging his sword toward Bai Liu's neck in an attempt to force him back. At the same time, his left hand reached down to grab the long whip.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu snapped the whip with his right hand, striking the Gifune family leader across the face with a resounding crack. The man was sent flying backward, and Bai Liu deftly jumped over his fallen body, heading straight for the shrine.

Realizing something was wrong, the man from the Gifune family quickly turned and tried to grab Bai Liu's ankle as he moved past. But with a swift flick of his wrist, Bai Liu dodged the attempt.

"There's something wrong with him!" the man shouted as he hit the ground.

The silvery light of the swords reflected off Bai Liu's cold eyes, causing him to frown as he raised his right hand, lifting the white bone whip with its bloodied end. He swung it down with great force and speed.

When the bone whip reached its highest point, it looked like the inverted tail of a scorpion, poised to hook the silver moon in the sky.

With a sharp "swoosh," the bone whip came down.

"Whoosh—bang bang bang—!!!"

Sporadic flashes of light erupted from the moon, and as if scattered by the raised whip, they exploded into thousands of bits of smoke and flames, which cascaded downward in a flurry.

"Don't panic, everyone!!!" A servant of the Bei Yuan family shouted, waving his hands to calm the frightened, blindfolded members. His voice was hoarse but loud as he explained, "It's just fireworks! Not weapons!"

"Everyone, follow my voice and come along! The shrine is fully equipped to avoid fire, and there's a pond that draws spring water from the mountains. We'll be safe inside!"

The wooden door of the shrine creaked open again.

The smell of blood was so pungent that the Bei Yuan servants' noses twitched, their cold sweat dripping down their sideburns, darkened by the smoke of the fire and staining the white veils they used to cover their eyes.

The hand of the Bei Yuan servant who had pushed the door open trembled slightly as he reached for the handle to pull it down and see what had happened inside the blood-soaked shrine. But as his fingers brushed against the gauze, he stopped.

If he removed the gauze and saw the evil god’s corpse, he would be dead.

As the Bei Yuan servant stood frozen, unsure whether to move forward or retreat, a heartbreaking cry of fear echoed from the men behind him: "Why aren’t the people ahead inside yet? The fire’s spreading!"

Before the servant at the front could react, the men behind him pushed forward, panicked and rough.

The Bei Yuan maid at the end of the line fumbled for the door valve, finally feeling it on one side. She slammed it down hard, barely avoiding the tongue of flame licking at her.

The pair of ornate lapis lanterns at the shrine entrance were instantly reduced to ash as the fire surged upward.

The servant who had managed to close the door inside fell to his knees, his hands on the ground, a look of relief and ecstasy on his face. "We did it! There are pools in the shrine! We’ll be safe here!"

"The soil here is damp..." At this, the servant scooped up a handful of earth with both hands. He paused, slowly straightening up, and brought the wet dirt close to his nose to sniff.

A salty, rusty taste filled his nostrils.

His face drained of color, and with horror, he tossed the dirt aside, screaming as he recoiled, "It’s blood! It’s all blood!"

Soon, his back was pressed against the leg of another man, blindfolded and trembling. The man turned and grabbed the servant's leg. "There’s something wrong with this shrine... Should we leave?"

A drop of blood landed on the man's gauze, freezing him in place for a moment. Slowly, he lifted his head, as if realizing something.

Peering through the loose top edge of his blindfold, his face drained of the last trace of color. He let go of the servant's leg, staring vacantly, his mouth agape.

The man—no, the corpse—he was leaning against was dressed in the black samurai uniform of the Gifune clan. A short knife had been thrust through his nose, and his wide eyes stared blankly as his body slumped against the shrine gate bell. In his hand, he still gripped the large rattle used for shrine wishes.

The ground was littered with the bodies of black-samurai warriors from the Gifune clan, their necks snapped cleanly by a whip. Heads were scattered across the ground, eyes still open in death. Some had thrown their short swords, others had not, and some swords lay broken, only half left in the palms of the headless bodies.

A servant from the Bei Yuan family shakily nudged one of the corpses, which slowly fell face-down, its grip on the bell tight as if trying to alert the others. As the body fell, the bell rang out.

The bell's toll, combined with the servant's hysterical, sobbing scream, echoed through the burning shrine: "Someone's slaughtering the shrine!!!"

The moon above the shrine seemed to reflect in the blood that stained the ground, while the fireworks surged and exploded with a faster pace. From a distance, the sound of cheers and celebration from the crowd on the beach could be heard, as if the summer festival fireworks display was reaching its grand finale.

"Shoo—shoo—bang!"

The fireworks transitioned from vibrant colors to a blinding red, and a flare burst among them, just as vivid, hidden within the red explosions without drawing attention.

The Gifune family servant, stationed at the fire lookout, scanned the flare with his binoculars. His face paled as he quickly dialed Gosho: "Lord Gosho, the warriors surrounding the shrine have sent a call for assistance."

"A call for assistance?" Gosho, standing on the towering bleachers, narrowed his eyes. "Are you sure it's a request for help and not a signal that the mission is complete?"

The servant lifted his binoculars again, confirming the signal before replying, "It's still sending. It's definitely a flare for assistance."

"This group of trash," Gosho muttered, glancing at the six clansmen under the stage, busy collecting arrows from the old sacrifices. His face darkened. "The Evil God Festival for hunting old sacrifices is almost over. The major clans have finished their hunting and are preparing the sacrifices. They've just completed the simple task of clearing the Bei Yuan clan remnants and sacrificing Bai Six. And they still haven't finished? They need assistance?"

"And...?" the servant asked hesitantly. "Would you like to offer assistance, Lord Gosho?"

Gosho gritted his teeth. "Of course, I'll provide it! Otherwise, everything I've set up will be lost!"

The servant nodded quickly. "Yes! I'll inform the remaining Gifune samurai on the hill to enter the shrine immediately!"

He pulled a purple-red flare from his pouch and ignited it, sending it into the sky.

"Shoo-!!!"

As the fuchsia smoke and fire erupted, the Gifune warriors stationed on the hilltop saw the signal and exchanged wary glances in the darkness. Quickly, they raised the black cloths around their necks to shield their eyes and moved swiftly toward the God Xiang community.

"That's..." Beiyuan Xiaokui, halfway through her run and pulled by her sister, suddenly heard the peculiar sound of a firework explosion. She looked up sharply and froze as the fuchsia flare shot upward from the fire station. Her pupils contracted. "A flare from the Gifune family's siege!"

Her memories, now fused, seemed to ignite the moment she saw the flare's piercing colors.

"Sending out this flare is like issuing a mandatory kill order from the Gifune family. All their samurai will be mobilized, and they won't stop until they finish their mission."

"They want to kill Bai Six and completely wipe out the Bei Yuan family..."

As Xiaokui spoke to herself, she caught sight of a few rising sky lanterns. Their glow reflected in her pupils, sending a shiver down her spine.

--That's the lamp Bai Six carries every night when he goes to see the evil gods and walks the mountain.

But the lamp, which Bai Six had tossed aside while rushing to save his sister, was now reduced to a skeleton by the fire, drifting upward toward the deep black sky.

It seemed as if the gods themselves were taking it—like a soul being claimed.

Cang Tai, shaking Xiaokui's hand off, ran toward the fire, coughing as the smoke engulfed him.

Xiaokui grabbed his shoulders, shock in her voice. "That's the shrine and the Bei Yuan house burning! What are you doing?!"

"Didn't you say the Gifune family was going to kill Lord Bai Six?!" Cang Tai coughed, tears streaming down his face. "I have to save Lord Bai Six!"

"And Bai Six... and the kittens!"

"I left them in the attic of the Bei Yuan house! If this keeps up, they'll burn to death!"

Xiaokui gritted her teeth. "Are you crazy?! Do you realize what it means to have all the samurai of the Gifune family mobilized?!"

"It would be easier to kill you than to cut a turnip!" she shouted.

Cang Tai shook his head, sobbing. "I don't know. All I know is that Lord Bai Six and the kittens made it possible for me to live here, without being used as a sacrifice or suffering. They've helped me so much and taught me so much."

"I never thought the world could be beautiful because of the Bei Yuan family's teachings, but I believe Lord Bai Six's love for the evil gods is beautiful."

Cang Tai cried out, "I don't want to see Lord Bai Six dead!"

"They were supposed to have a happy ending! Isn't that what they write in fairy tales?!"

"Fairy tales are..." Xiaokui's teeth clenched, her eyes closing as she tried to shatter Cang Tai's fantasy. "It's all..."

--Lies.

The burned lamp fluttered down near her and slowly extinguished, like the light in her eyes in another world.

[Love is all a lie.]

Bai Six smiled, kneeling before the shrine, her hollow eyes fixed on the flames as she said, [In this world, there is no love.]

[Because no one who believes in love truly exists.]

[Only pain is eternal.]

Xiaokui's eyes snapped open. She stared at the burning mountain, her eyes now reflecting the fire's light. Taking a deep breath, she said, "You go to Bei Yuan's house and rescue the two kittens. I'll go up the mountain and search for Bai Six along the back roads."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

Xiaokui, halted by her sister's panicked shouts, turned and ran back down the path she had just come up, not daring to look back.

The sound of weapons clashing under the unquenchable fire, along with the sharp crackling of burning wood, echoed through the hills.

Xiaokui covered her mouth and nose, her gaze lifting toward the shrine perched at the top of the hill, now enveloped in heat and ash.

Inside the shrine, Bai Liu dragged the bloodstained whip with his right hand, his left hand coldly pushing the door open with two fingers.

The heavy wooden door creaked slowly open.

Bai Six, gripping the whip in his right hand, smiled as he drove the sharp bone spikes of the whip into Tawil's neck, forcing him to lean back. The black bone spikes pierced Tawil's pale, thin skin, and blood trickled down his body, staining his white tunic.

Tawil's silver-blue eyes were half-closed in weakness as he looked up at Bai Liu, his voice hoarse from the pressure of the whip against his throat. "You're here at last," he rasped. "I thought you wouldn't come today."

Bai Liu's gaze remained on Xie Ta's neck, where bone spikes were piercing the flesh and bleeding out. His voice was calm, but his grip on the whip tightened, his fingertips turning white. "Why did you think I wouldn't come?"

"You spoke to me," Tawil half-smiled, his silver-blue eyes gleaming faintly. "I thought you'd left with your Prince Charming."

His voice softened with earnestness, as if expecting something. "Are you here now to choose me as your Prince Charming?"

Bai Six's playful eyes flicked between Bai Liu and Xie Ta, finally resting on the bloodied side of Xie Ta's body. His gaze lingered there, his smile widening.

"You trained him," Bai Six continued, his tone amused. "You went out of your way to create a monster, someone who would fall in love with you."

Bai Six’s eyes sparkled with a mixture of admiration and mockery. "What a completely new way of solving the problem."

He grinned, as though sharing a playful tip about the game. "I'm curious, Bai Liu—how did you do it?"

"How did you manage to make such an evil creation, one that remembers all the memories of the worldline, with no humanity or human feelings, fall in love with you?"

"Even God hasn't managed that."

Bai Six's amusement grew as he examined Bai Liu across the room. "How did you pull it off?"

Bai Liu didn't answer. With a swift motion, he swung the bone whip toward Bai Six without hesitation. But before it could land, his left hand shot out, placing itself between Bai Six’s whip and Xie Ta’s neck, bending back to protect Xie Ta. In one fluid motion, he ripped the black bone whip from Bai Six's grip.

Bai Six sidestepped, his smile still present, though his eyes were devoid of emotion. He tightened his right hand, wrapping the whip back around Xie Ta’s neck, and turned his wrist. The bone spikes flared outward, sinking deeper into Xie Ta's flesh.

The white tunic around Xie Ta’s neck was soaked with blood, the bone spur lodged deep in his throat, preventing him from making a sound.

"It’s not advisable to pull on these bone whips," Bai Six warned, glancing sideways at Bai Liu. "It’ll tear the head right off."

A rare, dangerous aggression flickered in Bai Liu’s dark eyes as he glared at Bai Six. His right hand loosened its grip on the whip, and in the next instant, the bone whip morphed into a sharp, short blade. He struck swiftly, aiming to sever Bai Six's head from his neck, but Bai Six narrowly avoided it.

A strand of black hair from Bai Six’s temple was sliced off, drifting lazily to the ground, while a few drops of blood splattered on the falling strands.

Bai Six slowly turned his head back, lifting his eyes with a grin as he licked the blood dripping down his face. His excitement grew. "That’s what makes it fun, big brother."

"Show me more. I'm curious to see what interesting skills you have left."

Before he could speak further, Bai Liu didn't hesitate. He yanked the black bone whip tighter around Xie Ta's neck, using his body's force to widen the gap. With a swift roll, he kicked Bai Six hard in the spine.

Bai Liu's shoulder absorbed the blow, and blood seeped from the corner of his mouth as he smiled through the pain. Instead of defending himself, he yanked on the bone whip around Xie Ta's neck, sending both Xie Ta and the whip flying.

Bai Liu's right foot landed on Bai Six's shoulder, and he pushed back, narrowly dodging another strike from the whip that came crashing down into his blind spot.

A large hole was cut into the wooden floor beneath them, with the black bone whip's spikes embedded deeply in the ground. The floorboards around it were turned over, revealing a pond below.

Goldfish swam aimlessly in the pond, their scales reflecting the flickering light from the fireworks in the black sky, giving the illusion that they were swimming in a festival of summer fireworks.

Bai Liu knelt on one knee near the hole, his back straight. His waist was only centimeters from a bone spike that had been thrust upright behind him. He gripped the black bone whip in one hand and looked coldly across the hole at Bai Six.

Bai Six eyed the black leather gloves that appeared on Bai Liu's hands. "A short blade, gloves... So, a shifting skill weapon?"

He grinned. "Or—could it be that I'm using your skill weapon now, Bai Liu?"

Before Bai Six could finish his question, Bai Liu threw the knife from his hand. Bai Six dodged it fluidly, but the blade grazed his neck, spinning into a bottle of poison.

The poison splashed as it hit the water, and the pond instantly turned black, bubbling as thick, toxic mist rose into the air. Bai Liu felt his health bar drop, but he didn't care. Instead, he summoned the white bone whip with his right hand and gripped it tightly. Without pause, he swung it toward Bai Six.

The white bone whip flew through the hole Bai Six had made, sending a large wooden slat flying through the air.

"Flutter!"

The sound of water splashing reached Bai Liu's ears as he heard Bai Six fall into the poisoned pond behind him.

After completing his usual barrage of strikes, Bai Liu stood up and sidestepped toward the spot where Xie Ta had just been thrown. He kept his eyes on the pond below, scanning it from the corner of his vision. The whip in his hand transformed into a gun, and he fired rapidly at each bubbling spot in the water.

"Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang-!!!"

Bai Liu stood in front of Xie Ta, facing the pond with an indifferent expression. Though the water had settled, the gun in his hand remained aimed at it, poised and alert.

The plank beneath him creaked, and Bai Liu’s focus sharpened. He fired six quick shots at the plank beneath his feet before smoothly reloading, shifting his aim to where the water had shifted beneath it. He pulled the trigger again, releasing six more precise shots.

Silver cartridges clinked as they hit the ground.

The barrage continued until the first system beep echoed in Bai Liu’s ears.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has hit player Bai Six with his skill weapon (Rose Revolver).]

Blood spread across the dark water, and Bai Liu’s eyes locked onto the spot where it rippled out. His gaze was cold, filled with aggression—like a scaly dragonfish enraged by its prey, ready to strike again, leaving no chance for the prey to escape.

Bai Liu raised his left hand, calm and intent, aiming at the bloodstained water.

"Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang-!!!"

Six clean shots rang out, and Bai Liu reloaded again, smoothly adjusting his aim as the blood shifted. His shoulder moved slightly to absorb the recoil, then he pulled the trigger again.

"Bang! Bang! Bang-!!! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG--!!!"

Another system beep sounded.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has hit player Bai Six with his skill weapon (Rose Revolver). Player Bai Six's life is decreasing...]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu... (repeated)]

Bai Liu continued his relentless assault, emptying magazine after magazine, ensuring that no part of Bai Six had the chance to resurface. Cartridges littered the ground beneath him. Finally, the system prompt changed.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six has zero life and is out of the game.]

[Congratulations to player Bai Liu for killing player Bai Six!]

Bai Liu's dark eyes lingered on the still waters of the pond for a moment. The gun in his hand morphed back into a whip.

He raised his hand, snapping the whip into the water, stirring it from side to side. The whip made contact with a heavy body, and with a flick of his wrist, he looped the whip around Bai Six's waist. He pulled the corpse out of the water and flung it onto the plank.

Bai Six's body, lifeless and ashen, was dropped onto the wood with a dull thud, shaking slightly as it settled.

Bai Liu approached the body, eyes cold, observing it with the same indifference as one might examine a stone.

Bai Six was bloodless, his skin showing signs of severe poisoning—patches of it were corroded, ravaged by toxins.

Bai Liu nudged the body with his foot, flipping it over onto its side so that it lay face down, spine exposed. His eyes narrowed, watching the spine with intense focus.

Then, with a calm, practiced motion, Bai Liu cracked his whip, opening the body's clothes to reveal the skin beneath. He reached into his belt and produced a bottle of poison, preparing to pour it into the hollow at the center of the back.

But just as he was about to do so, Bai Liu felt a tug at his sleeve.

"You're at...?" Xie Ta's voice, strained and weak, came from the ground. He had been bound by a silk thread and could only crawl. His neck was covered in bloody puncture wounds from bone spikes that continued to bleed. Despite his injuries, Xie Ta gazed up at Bai Liu with a calm, almost detached expression.

Bai Liu glanced down, lowering his gaze. "I was going to corrode his skin with poison and extract his spine."

Xie Ta was silent for a long moment, his eyes distant. He coughed softly, then asked in a muted voice, "Why?"

"Xie Ta." Bai Liu crouched down, his right hand gripping Xie Ta's jaw and lifting his chin. He stared into Xie Ta's eyes with a cold, steady expression. "Do you really not know why I'm doing this?"

"You remember the memories of other world lines. That means you're the Xie Ta from those lines. You've had your spine drawn out by this [Bai Six] at my feet—by countless versions of me in other world lines."

Bai Liu's gaze deepened as he locked eyes with Xie Ta. "Why didn't you speak up while I was torturing you?"

"Why didn't you tell me I was forcing you to develop feelings for someone who looks exactly like the bastard who manipulated and hurt you?"

"Why didn't you tell me you knew you were trapped in a game and that I, as a player, was here to use you for my own gain?"

Xie Ta's breathing stilled slightly, and his eyes darkened in confusion. He didn't seem to fully understand Bai Liu's words. "Is any of this important?"

"This world is just a game for me," Bai Liu replied flatly.

Xie Ta's silvery-blue eyes reflected Bai Liu's face completely. "That's what's real to me."

"You are real to me," Xie Ta added, his voice earnest.

Bai Liu paused, his fingers tightening around the bottle of poison.

Xie Ta, his face bloodied and his white robe torn, slowly sat up. He was covered in blood but still knelt devoutly, looking up at Bai Liu with a serious expression.

"It doesn't matter if it's a game to you," Xie Ta said, his tone unwavering. "It doesn't matter if it's just for a pass."

"Now, can I be your Prince Charming?"

Bai Liu remained still for a moment before shifting his position, kneeling in front of Xie Ta. He met Xie Ta's gaze, and in that moment, he saw the subtle tension in Xie Ta's eyes, a silent anticipation. Both their heartbeats quickened.

Thump-thump-thump.

The two men's heartbeats began to sync, thumping in unison.

"I don't want a Prince Charming who will die," Bai Liu said softly, his eyes downcast. "Will you die?"

Xie Ta's reaction was swift, panic flickering in his eyes. "I won't die! I'm a monster!"

Bai Liu raised his eyes slowly. "Then we make a deal."

"You give me your soul, your life, and your love," he said.

"I'll give you my wish, my faith, and my love."

Xie Ta nodded. "Good."

He asked earnestly, "Is there anything else I need to do for the deal?"

"I need money as a medium," Bai Liu said, his voice light but firm. "Close your eyes."

Xie Ta obeyed, closing his eyes without hesitation.

Bai Liu looked down at Xie Ta's bloodied face. His gaze softened, then drifted down to the coin hanging over Xie Ta's chest.

—The coin, a symbol of Bai Liu entering the game's task manager.

It also symbolized the foolish, lust-driven players who made deals with evil gods.

Bai Liu remained silent for a long moment, then took the coin into his mouth, pressing it under his tongue. It tasted cold, metallic—like rust, like the blood from Xie Ta's body.

"Are you done?" Xie Ta's voice came softly, his eyes still closed.

Before Bai Liu could respond, he leaned forward, raising his right hand to gently close Xie Ta’s eyes.

Their lips met.

"What was that?" Xie Ta asked, his voice muffled as he tasted the foreign object in his mouth. "Is it a coin? It makes my heart beat so fast."

"No," Bai Liu’s voice was soft. "It was a kiss."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

“Huh.”

A low, mature male laugh echoed from behind Bai Liu.

The moment Bai Liu heard it, his pupils contracted. Instinctively, he kicked Xie Ta away from him and then swiftly pivoted, placing one foot across his body. His muscles tensed as he raised his shoulder and flicked his wrist. The spurs of his whip flared out, and with all his strength, he hurled the whip toward the source of the sound.

The whip struck the ground with a violent thud, its bone spikes digging into the floor. But the force of the strike didn’t dissipate. It tore through the boards, crashing into the pond with a loud splash.

“Phew—bang, bang, bang!”

Water shot into the air, falling in a cascading curtain through which brilliant fireworks exploded in the night sky.

Twisted and beautiful.

A pale, bony hand, clad in a black glove, emerged from the water’s curtain. It gripped Bai Liu's whip with relentless strength, pulling the weapon towards its owner.

The man behind the curtain stepped forward, emerging like an actor taking the stage. His face was bloodied, his body riddled with the gunshots Bai Liu had just fired. Yet, there was no sign of panic or evasion, only calm confidence as he walked steadily toward Bai Liu.

With a smile in his eyes, he gazed at Bai Liu, whose chest rose and fell with heavy breaths. He spoke with admiration.

“Wow, quick reflexes.”

“You almost killed me just now.”

[System Alert: Player Bai Six sacrifices the shrine offering (Tawil) and the suffering of Player Bai Liu before exiting the game and makes a wish -]

[--- Invite the evil gods to come to earth and destroy them.]

Bai Six tugged at the glove on his right wrist with his left hand.

Behind him, huge fireworks bloomed continuously, casting a demonic splash of light against the side of his face, making his smile appear even more dangerous.

“I forgot to mention,” he said with a smirk, “while you acquired your identity as an evil god believer in the third game, the Bai Six of other timelines didn’t hesitate to choose me as their evil god the moment they entered their first game, The Evil God Festival—Funhouse. The moment they stepped into the shrine, they learned of my existence.”

Bai Six’s smile widened as he hooked his index finger around the brown thread hanging in front of his chest. Instead of a coin like Bai Liu’s, a shiny, inverted cross pendant swung from the cord.

“And I can come to earth by inhabiting the bodies of these believers.”

“Just like you did with Yuan Guang, right?” Bai Liu replied coolly, taking a step back without breaking eye contact. “Another one of your special tricks?”

Bai Six shrugged, his smile unreadable. “I’ll take that as a compliment.”

“What game do you want to play next?” Bai Liu asked, eyeing him with a piercing gaze.

Bai Six grinned, his lips curling slightly. “The game has already begun.”

With a violent crash, the door behind Bai Liu flew open. A group of blindfolded, armored Gifune warriors, armed with shuriken, charged in. They shouted, raising their swords as they hissed, “- Kill!”

From the open doorway, Bai Liu saw the bodies of Bei Yuan clan members scattered across the ground, slain by the warriors of the House of Gifune. Blood stained the shrine courtyard, with pools still visible on the ground.

Bai Six, unfazed, extended his left hand flat and spread his fingers wide. Transparent threads flew from the inner layer of his glove, snaking around his wrist.

“Let’s see how much you’ve grown recently, my heir.”

[System Alert: Evil God Bai Six uses skill (Puppet Silk).]

The sharp tips of the rapidly flying threads embedded like needles into the necks and joints of the oncoming Gifune warriors. They let out stifled grunts of pain as they clutched at their necks in confusion.

Before they could react, Bai Six twisted his wrist downward and slowly closed his left hand into a fist. His fingers danced across the puppet silk, flicking the threads outward. The warriors' movements were immediately controlled by the threads, and they began attacking under Bai Six's manipulation.

The warriors raised their shuriken high, aiming to strike at Xie Ta, who had been kicked into a safe corner by Bai Liu and bound in place by heavy silk threads.

Bai Liu jerked back, whipping out his weapon and deflecting the short knives slashing toward Xie Ta. The silver blades gleamed, reflecting the light of the surrounding fireworks, their brilliance making the walls of the room shimmer like fish scales. Bai Liu quickly averted his gaze, avoiding the blinding flashes.

Suddenly, a long black bone whip flew through the air, wrapping around the handle of one of the short blades, then swinging toward Bai Liu's neck, hidden amidst the flashing blades.

His eyes cold, Bai Liu raised his hand, turning his whip into a sword. He held it diagonally across his neck in a backhanded grip. The two blades collided with a deafening clatter of metal.

Bai Liu pressed the knife outward, backhanding the incoming blade away. It bounced back along the same path, and Bai Liu casually deflected it with a flick of his whip.

Bai Six smiled, his eyes locked onto Bai Liu. "Just a reminder," he said, "I'm the one you should be wary of. Those minions? Not worth your full attention."

In the blink of an eye, Bai Six's coat swirled as he vanished like a gust of wind.

Bai Liu sidestepped, raising his hand almost instinctively. He spun his blade, making a defensive gesture through the air in front of him.

"Boom—!!!"

Without warning, Bai Six reappeared directly in front of Bai Liu, his own short knife held in a backhanded position. He tried to overpower

Bai Liu, pushing him backward.

[System Alert: Player Bai Six uses Player Liu Huai's personal skill (Flashing Strike).]

Bai Six laughed, using his elbow to push Bai Liu's knife inward, shifting their positions so that Bai Liu was now pinned beneath him. Slowly, he brought his blade closer to the pulsating blood vessels at the side of Bai Liu's neck.

His smile deepened. "Not bad. You can predict my moves, just not as smoothly as I can. You're growing quickly. I'm looking forward to the day you manage to kill me."

As Bai Six's knife hovered near his neck, Bai Liu made his move. Without hesitation, Bai Six withdrew his hand, gripping the knife tightly, and slashed upward, aiming for Bai Liu's neck.

But there was no blood-spurting sound. The slash came up short.

Bai Six's expression remained impassive as he barely paused, grabbing the hilt of his shuriken and reversing it across the back of Bai Liu's neck.

"Pop—!!!"

The two blades collided again.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses Player Muke's personal skill (Flashing Strike).]

Bai Liu appeared mid-air behind Bai Six, dropping down slowly. Using the momentum of his body and his position behind Bai Six, he squeezed the man's wrist, bringing his own blade down toward the back of Bai Six's neck.

Quickly, Bai Six turned the horizontally positioned hilt outwards, deflecting the downward slash with ease.

Bai Liu didn't retreat. His gaze was fixed on the reverse cross pendant hanging at the back of Bai Six's neck. His blade shifted, becoming a monkey's claw, aimed at the brown silk thread that held the pendant.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses Player Mu Sicheng's personal skill (Thief Monkey Claw).]

Bai Six instantly detected Bai Liu's intention. He was now facing away from Bai Liu, and his response was too slow to match Bai Liu's. The strength difference was immense, making it unlikely that Bai Liu could kill him in this position. But this was the perfect opportunity for theft.

Bai Six smirked.

Clever. Bai Liu had quickly identified the key prop in the game they were playing.

The short blade at the back of Bai Six's neck shifted, no longer extending protectively. It pressed tightly against his skin and rose upward, slicing through the hair that had been holding his long locks in place.

As the hairline was cut, long black hair tumbled down Bai Six's shoulders, blocking Bai Liu's view of the pendant.

At the same time, Bai Six's gloved fingers twisted, and a sharp-edged playing card appeared between his index and middle fingers. The card sliced through the long strands of hair at the back of his neck, heading straight for Bai Liu's face.

Bai Liu snapped back, narrowly avoiding the card. But his monkey's claws continued their path, striking toward the back of Bai Six's neck.

The claws, once aimed at the pendant, now hit Bai Six's shoulders instead.

The card flew past Bai Liu's eyes, embedding itself in the wooden board behind him. The face of the card trembled, its red peach heart spinning as it displayed shifting images of various people.

Bai Liu's breath caught as he eyed Bai Six, whose turned expression mirrored a familiar, unsettling warmth.

[System Alert: The Evil God Bai Six uses the personal skill (Heart for Heart) of Player Queen Hearts.]

The peach heart continued spinning, eventually framing a picture of Xie Ta reading in the orphanage library, surrounded by shelves of books.

Bai Six turned, his long black hair shifting into silver-blue curls as it cascaded down his shoulders. He looked at Bai Liu with a gentle smile, his silver-blue eyes gleaming. "How unexpected. My heir seems so deeply in love with a creation I have long since discarded."

And then, Bai Six transformed completely—his appearance now mirroring Xie Ta's.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The warriors who had been struck down by Bai Liu collapsed to the floor, writhing and wailing in pain as they kneeled in twisted positions.

They scrambled across the crumbling wooden floor like spiders, quickly crawling toward Xie Ta, who was cornered.

Xie Ta's eyes and nose were obscured by dense threads, almost like cloth, and his arms and legs were bound to the ground. He could only move slightly, his bloodstained white kimono spread out around him. His head turned just enough to where Bai Liu stood, and at the edge of his field of vision was the coin Bai Liu had given him earlier—now whipped away by Bai Liu.

His fingers trembled slightly as he gripped the board beneath him, bracing against the taut wire, as though trying to rise. His hand brushed the ground in search of the coin he had dropped.

A warrior twisted in an unnatural, agonizing manner as he raised his short sword, slashing at Xie Ta's slender fingers that reached out to touch the ground. "Die, monster!" he hissed.

The long, white whip lashed out with such force that the spike at its end passed directly in front of the warrior's chest.

The warrior released the whip in shock, blood spurting from his body as he slowly collapsed.

Bai Liu gasped for breath, blood spilling from his lips as a short knife was thrust completely into his right shoulder. Bai Six, the one holding it, smirked as he gripped the handle and yanked it upward.

Blood sprayed out.

"It's so touching," Bai Six commented, his smile cold. "When you and Xie Ta were both attacked by me at the same time, unable to defend each other, you didn't hesitate to choose to save him."

Bai Liu quickly jerked his shoulder back, stepping away. He pressed his hand to the still-bleeding wound, his face pale and expressionless. He gazed at Bai Six, calm and unfazed. "Isn't that exactly the choice you wanted me to make?"

Bai Six nodded thoughtfully, still smiling. "True. But I also wanted you to experience something. A feeling... or perhaps, pain."

His silver-blue eyes shimmered as he smiled wider. "What does it feel like to be hurt and tormented by the one you love, Bai Liu?"

Bai Liu exhaled sharply.

"That was what Xie Ta suffered before," Bai Six continued, his smile widening. "Now, you've tasted it too. How does it feel?"

Bai Liu slowly released his grip on his shoulder, his expression calm as he began to laugh softly. "It's not your place to give me the pain I gave him."

"And you think you're worthy?" Bai Six teased, curling his fingers around the silk threads on his left hand. "It seems I can't inflict pain on you as I do with the others I've created in this world line."

"You are the only one among all my humanoid creations whose suffering is beyond my control."

Bai Six leaned forward, a curious glint in his eyes. "I'm really, really curious—what would it take for me, a god, to make you suffer for my amusement?"

As the threads vibrated, a warrior jerked to life, kicking the coin Xie Ta had been reaching for.

The coin flew and clattered into the corner with a sharp thud, before rolling into the water.

Bai Liu's gaze followed the coin as a black bone whip stabbed toward him from behind. He sidestepped and caught the whip with his left hand, which had transformed into a monkey's paw, while his right hand held the white bone whip and flung it out.

The bone whip lashed across the floor, sweeping all the warriors into a pool of black poison.

Bai Liu's monkey paw disappeared the moment he released the whip, and a vial of poison appeared in his hand. He popped the cap with his thumb and tossed it into the pond.

Screams and shrieks filled the air as the warriors, their metal shells melting, tried to escape the corrosive pool. Each time they reached out, Bai Liu whipped them back, sending them plunging back into the pool to continue their screams.

When the screaming stopped, Bai Six raised his hand, retracting the puppet silk.

The threads burrowed through his gloves as Bai Liu smirked. "You've cleared the field, now it's my turn."

His eyes shifted toward Xie Ta in the corner.

As Bai Liu approached Xie Ta, Bai Six's bone whip lashed down toward his face. Bai Liu jumped back twice to avoid it, raising an eyebrow as he glanced at Bai Six.

Bai Liu's expression and tone were cold. He looked at Bai Six flatly, twirling the bone whip in his hand as the spines clicked out.

"Who says I'm done clearing the field?" he said, his voice steady. "Isn't there still a big piece of trash to clean up?"

"Maximum trash... are you talking about me?" Bai Six asked with a tilt of his head, watching Bai Liu with interest. "Are you angry? I've been watching you for twenty-four years, and it's rare to see you so outwardly emotional."

Ignoring Bai Six's words, Bai Liu threw another whip at him.

Bai Six flipped his palms upward, and a wall of water patterns appeared before him. The whip hit it, bouncing back as if it had struck latex.

Bai Liu's eyes snapped to Xie Ta, who was trapped behind the watery wall with Bai Six. His pupils constricted to pinpricks.

Bai Six clapped his hands, smiling. "Okay, our only audience, focus on me and stop looking at the NPC."

"Our interactive TV game is about to begin."

"Before we start, let me introduce the background of the game."

With that, Bai Six snapped his fingers, and the silk thread binding Xie Ta lifted him off the ground.

The silk thread gently lowered Xie Ta into a chair that had mysteriously appeared in front of the watery wall. Xie Ta's head drooped as though he had fallen asleep, his gaze fixed on Bai Liu on the opposite side of the wall.

With a slow wave of his hand to the left, Bai Six summoned a crimson velvet curtain that hung gracefully over the battered wooden pillars flanking the shrine. The floor's cracked planks slowly repaired themselves, restoring their pristine condition, gleaming like the well-maintained stage planks Bai Liu had seen earlier during the festival.

"Pop!"

Bai six clapped his hands together, and the crimson velvet curtain descended smoothly, concealing Xie Ta behind it. In the middle of the curtain, a wooden sign swung lightly, painted in red lacquer with yellow writing that read:

-- [The Festival of the Evil Gods - The Boathouse - Act I Scene].

Bai six glanced at Bai Liu across the watery wall, a soft smile playing on his lips. "I hope you don't mind that I’m handling the voice work for the background of the game," he said.

"Pop!"

Another light clap from Bai six.

As the curtain rose, Xie Ta vanished as though by magic, replaced by an unfinished wax figure sitting where he had been. The wax figure slumped against the chair, like a human statue in an art class, a delicate white cloth draped over it, fluttering in the night breeze—ready to slip away with the wind.

Bai six placed his left hand behind his waist, his right hand raised in front of him. He made a slight bow in a gentleman’s salute before raising his eyes, a smile tugging at his lips.

"At the beginning of this tale, allow me to introduce myself," he said smoothly. "By status, I am the arch-villain of this game, an evil god who will strike down all players indiscriminately."

"In human terms, I am called the God of All-Seeing. Through the medium, I see everything happening."

Bai six straightened up casually, still wearing his trademark smile as he looked across the watery wall at Bai Liu.

"Humanity calls me the All-Knowing God, describing me as having dominion over time and space. I am the door to all the time and space in the universe."

"The past is me; the present is me; the future is me. All space and time converge and cease in me. I am an unimaginable entity, one so overwhelming that texts within human culture say even a mere glimpse of me—through dreams or fantasies—can drive a person mad."

Bai six lowered his gaze and tapped his index finger lightly in the air. In an instant, darkness spread from his fingertips, consuming the scene around him, leaving only the stage planks beneath his feet.

The once sacred shrine was swallowed by an impenetrable black void, and the shattered planks beneath Bai Liu's feet vanished, leaving him to seemingly fall into an endless void or deep ocean. Weightlessness and suffocation slowly crept in.

"Huh."

Behind the watery wall, Bai Liu chuckled, reaching out with his black leather-gloved hand to pull a puppet silk from the air, wrapping it around his wrist as he descended.

Bai Liu glanced upward, his wrist tethered by the thread, and saw Bai six peering down at him from behind the watery wall, his expression one of pity—or was it indifference? Bai six murmured:

"Behold, mortal, so weak and vulnerable in the vastness of the universe."

Bai six released the puppet silk, sending Bai Liu into another free fall, though this time he was caught by a stool from the audience, gently floating back towards the opposite side of the watery wall. There, he once again faced Bai six, now surrounded by a bizarre universe—one so dark that it was impossible to discern anything.

"It's too dark, isn't it?" Bai Liu heard Bai six's voice, low and contemplative. "My apologies. I neglected to give our audience enough light."

A soft wave of Bai Liu’s hand summoned colorful, dense orbs of light, which burst from his body, emitting warmth and energy. As the spheres flowed, they stirred the air, causing Bai Liu's hair to flutter slightly.

Bai Liu observed Bai six's emotionless, dark eyes reflecting the glowing spheres, as if the brightest parts of the universe had been captured in those eyes. Through them, the unknown expanse of the universe seemed to unfold before mortal eyes.

The luminous orbs swirled around, gathering together in a cosmic dance. They formed streams of starbursts and ribbons of light that illuminated the endless darkness surrounding them.

The scene was surreal—magnificent, as though Bai six's simple words had illuminated the very universe.

"Humans often describe my appearance through glowing spheres," Bai six whispered, his voice soft as the spheres of light hovered around him. He held up a shimmering white orb in his right hand and extended it toward Bai Liu through the watery wall.

The warm glow from the orb bathed Bai Liu's face.

Bai six chuckled lightly. "Do you know what this sphere is?"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "What is it?"

"It is time, space, the future—it is the door," Bai six said calmly. "It represents the myriad of world lines I have created."

"And this one, right next to you, is world line 658—where you are."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The sphere was casually released by Bai Six, floating into Bai Liu's face. It shifted from white to translucent in an instant, its surface refracting colors like a bubble caught in sunlight.

The bubble drifted off into the depths of the universe, merging seamlessly with the other spheres until it became indistinguishable from the band of light surrounding them.

"I was born from these," Bai Six said, lounging lazily in one of the spectator chairs behind the watery wall. He propped his chin up, eyes lifting to smile at Bai Liu. "Of course, so were you."

"I've existed for so long, I no longer remember how I became an evil god. I've been a god for as long as I can recall."

Bai Six removed his gloves, spreading his palms toward Bai Liu. Seven or eight weak, twitching spheres struggled to emerge from his hands. He lowered his gaze, gently cradling the spheres as they fought to escape.

With a soft "ki," Bai Six squeezed the sphere, causing it to explode into countless points of light that vanished into his hands.

He looked up, smiling. "In that moment, ten world lines where you existed were destroyed in my hand."

"Interesting, isn’t it?"

"I don't think it's funny," Bai Liu replied, his tone calm.

"Hmm," Bai Six mused, thoughtfully rubbing his chin. After a moment, he smirked. "Well, then, it's not funny."

"I don't think it's interesting either. It's boring," Bai Liu stated flatly.

Calmly, Bai Liu asked, "Aren’t you going to tell me about the game's backstory? What about the rest of your villainous setup?"

"What’s your purpose, for instance?"

"You didn’t seem interested in me," Bai Six leaned back in his chair, casually folding his legs. His long hair fell lazily over his shoulders, and he tilted his head slightly, resting his forehead on his right hand.

He smirked. "My goal, of course, is to escape this endless and tedious existence."

Bai Six looked down at his right hand. "Whether I wish it or not, the world lines continue to spill out from my palm, as if I'm creating them with my own hands."

"But that's not quite true."

"I am merely a door," he continued. "These pre-existing world lines must pass through me—the door of time and space—to come into being. If they don't, they remain on the other side of the door, stagnant and useless."

Bai Six raised his eyes, a subtle smile curling at his lips.

"On the other side of the gate lies the inorganic abyss—the darkness and the unspeakable evil that has no end. The creatures from the world lines that end up there will remain trapped, lost to madness, ultimately leading to their own destruction."

"At first, I found it entertaining to watch them destroy themselves on the other side of the door. But after witnessing it countless times, the spectacle grew tiresome."

"So, I began to place the world lines on this side of the door."

Bai Six raised his index finger, pointing at the watery wall. The ripples spread outward, and from the tip of his finger, spheres began spilling out, dimly visible beyond the wall. He whispered softly.

"This side of the gate holds the objective logic of the universe—the truths of the stars and the workings of all things. The world lines gain light here; they can survive and flourish."

"Here, in this realm, the world lines evolve into a rich variety of creatures, so different from those on the other side. Dogs, cats, roses, primroses—just to name a few."

"I've enjoyed watching these different species evolve, and I find them endlessly fascinating."

Bai Six rested his jaw lazily on his hand, eyes locking onto Bai Liu. A soft laugh escaped him. "But of all the species, the one I find most intriguing is the human."

"Other creatures merely require visible, tangible things to survive—sunlight, air, water, food, shelter. But humans," Bai Six's voice dropped, "they need something unseen."

"Even with plenty of sunlight, air, water, food, and shelter, it doesn't take long before a human, abandoned and alone in a world line, succumbs to despair. Eventually, they will turn to self-destruction in their agony."

Bai Six smiled. "Besides material needs, humans require kindness and love to survive."

"This is so curious. It's the first time I've encountered a species with such a fantastical need. I'm fascinated by what drives this need in you, and under what circumstances it could be abandoned."

"So I've conducted numerous experiments on humans across various world lines to uncover the core of this need." Bai Six's eyes glinted as he smiled. "And I discovered the essential truth: you have souls."

"I try to create souls."

"But even if I fabricated an identical shell to imitate a human from the worldline, infused it with the same memories, and threw it into an identical worldline I created, this creation still wouldn't produce a soul."

"No matter how many factors I unified, this creation of mine would never produce a soul. It seems that a soul must be formed autonomously by humans, in a social environment where I do not interfere, and where it naturally comes into being."

"In all the time I've existed, I've never encountered something I couldn't create or possess, but now, something has finally appeared."

Bai six curled the corners of his mouth into a smile. "And it's just too much fun."

"What I cannot create or own is the most valuable thing." He leaned back, the amusement evident in his eyes.

"I've observed many worldlines and discovered a pattern in the birth of a human soul. It occurs when a human experiences two particularly strong emotions. These emotions hold the potential to give rise to a soul."

"These emotions, as human society calls them, are [love] and [pain]."

"To test this theory, I descended into each worldline as an evil god, demanding that they sacrifice either [love] or [pain] to me. In return, I would grant them some material object they desired."

Bai Liu's smile deepened. "But soon, I discovered something even more interesting."

"Soul, love, and pain—three things I cannot create and which I find most valuable—these humans would actually sell their love, pain, and soul to me in exchange for something external that I offered at my whim."

"Eventually, they reached a point where they could no longer produce [love] to offer me. But, in their desperation to continue receiving my material rewards, they chose to torture their own kind, sacrificing the suffering of their people to me in exchange for my favor."

"It's clear that kindness and love are necessary for their survival, yet they abandon all of it for an external object. They fanatically pursue me as their evil god."

Bai six smiled as he glanced at Bai Liu. "It's funny, don't you think? How creatures like humans tend to destroy themselves?"

Bai Liu's gaze was cold. "This kind of 'fun' won't satisfy you for long, will it?"

"Indeed," Bai six sighed, as if regretting something. He spread his hands and shrugged his shoulders. "Soon, these humans began killing each other, abusing their kind at my command. Their hearts became so filled with evil and darkness that they could no longer produce the pure emotions and souls I sought. They became just as lustful and monstrous as the very creatures they feared."

"The side of the Gate that was once bright began to lose its truth, logic, and light, becoming dim under the chaos of humanity's struggles."

Bai six smiled darkly. "It became as dark as the other side of the door."

"On the other side of the door, however, because all the worldlines crossed through me to get here, the worldlines there dwindled. The other side has grown brighter instead."

Bai Liu spoke with quiet precision. "Isn't it because you, the evil god, didn't intervene to maintain the balance? That's why the other side returned to its normal state?"

"You can say that if you like." Bai six smiled, his expression nonchalant. "Anyway, in the end, the universes on either side of the Gate have swapped. I had grown bored of playing with humans, and the whole universe was starting to feel tedious. I needed an heir to take my place as the Gatekeeper."

"I think the previous evil god may have had a hand in this, so I was chosen to be the successor."

"But to become the Gatekeeper, to succeed as the evil god, there is one crucial condition that must be met." Bai six's smile widened. "The successor must bear the difference between the universes on both sides of the Gate without causing them to collapse. He must have the ability to contain the desires and evils of the entire universe. And most importantly, he must be more valuable than I am."

"So, I want my heir to be a human with a soul."

"There is value in this request," Bai Liu observed, his gaze sharp. "Isn't it your request?"

Bai six curled his lips into a smirk. "Yes."

"If someone less valuable than me sits in my place, he will be devoured by the awakened me one day." Bai six crossed his arms, leaning against the chair. "Because this universe is so boring, I want my heir to kill me." He seemed almost wistful, as if the thought itself amused him.

"I searched for a long time but could never find an heir who met my criteria." He paused. "Eventually, I grew so bored that I decided to create one myself." Bai six stood up, casually walking towards the wax figure sitting in the chair behind him, his voice taking on a tone of excitement.

"I stripped most of my divine power from my body and poured it into this creation. I sculpted him into my ideal form, giving him a perfect body and bestowing upon him the highest qualities that humanity has praised throughout the ages."

Bai six extended his right hand, gently touching the wax figure's features, his gaze soft as he looked down at it.

"I gave him all the best things I learned from human society, trying to make him my most perfect and valuable creation."

The blurred face of the wax figure slowly began to melt, reshaping into delicate features. The wax dripped down the back of his head, silver-blue hair falling loosely. The hands, once waxen, solidified into white, firm forms that dropped unconsciously to the side of the chair. The figure's chest began to rise and fall, as if breathing—like an idol in slumber.

Bai six rested his hands lightly on the back of the chair, looking at Bai Liu with a smile.

"I call him the embodiment of my good will, and I name him Tawil."

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"I gave this creation, called Tawil, all the qualities I thought might grant it a soul. I made it a god and cast it into all the worldlines that passed through the gate, hoping that some human in those worldlines would make it feel love and, thus, grant it a soul."

Bai Six slowly raised his eyes and sighed, as if in regret.

"But no matter how many worldlines it passed through, it remained like a cold statue—a broken mirror—sitting on its throne, looking down indifferently at the humans who bowed before it. It gave them external objects, step by step, yet could not feel human emotions in any way."

"I realized that such a method was not feasible and called it back from all the worldlines."

"I inquired of it," Bai Six lowered his eyes, lifting Tawil's jaw gently. He spoke softly to the still slumbering figure, "Why do you refuse to become an evil god?"

"Why not feel love and pain, and become a keeper of souls?"

Bai Six's gloved hand caressed Tawil's closed eyes, his tone growing softer, "I received an interesting answer."

"It looked at me with those pure black eyes and said it thought humans were fine as they were—without the presence of gods or gates."

"In Tawil's eyes, it was good that they simply warmed each other in this universe, where love and pain are intertwined."

"He didn’t understand why God must exist, why God must guard the door, why God must give these things to humanity, or why God must keep the door. Instead of improving the worldline, these things seemed only to make them more miserable."

Bai Six looked up at Bai Liu and smiled. "I told it that it was not God who wanted to exist, but that God already existed—not you, but someone else."

"It couldn't understand and asked me if there was no worldline where God existed."

"I told it, no."

"To be honest, Tawil has been a bit of a disappointment to me," Bai Six said, stepping back slowly. He flicked his hand, and silk threads wrapped around Tawil's body, lifting him up like a puppet on strings. "No matter how much I told it these truths, no matter how much I taught it to become an evil god, it couldn't understand or do so."

"It has a foolishly naive perception of humanity."

"I gave it so much divine power, and yet it foolishly expended itself bit by bit, fulfilling the wishes of mankind."

Bai Six gazed at Tawil, suspended by the silk threads, a look of pity on his face. "I had hoped that Tawil's gratuitous giving and gifting would make the humans love him, but no—he was always met with more greedy demands."

"No matter how much Tawil, as a god, gives to mankind, what he receives in return is always only desire—endless desire."

"I became bored, and after the last bit of patience I had for this creature of my own creation ran out, I chose to banish him."

"Since humans can't teach you to love, I'll let humans teach you to suffer."

Bai Six lowered his eyes as he loosened the silk thread holding Tawil, and the creation fell into an endless universe of darkness.

With one hand, the silk thread shot out, suspending Tawil once more.

Bai Six smiled, glancing at Bai Liu across the watery wall. "Don't be so nervous. I'm not really going to let him go."

"He's the only leverage I have to speak to you face-to-face. I wouldn't dare discard him, or I'd never find another way to get you to sit down and pay attention to my words."

Bai Six’s attitude toward Tawil was that of a doll, playing with him and Bai Liu at will.

Bai Liu, gripping the handle of his chair, looked at Bai Six. "So, what did you do to him?"

"I put a part of [the door] in Tawil's eyes." The silk thread in Bai Six's hand opened, and Tawil's eyes slowly began to open.

Tawil floated in the universe, his eyes half-open—silver-blue orbs that seemed to reflect the entire universe behind them. Stars and rivers of light danced in his gaze, but there was no emotion, no soul—just a reflection of the world, like well-crafted glass, complete yet empty, reflecting everything but never truly engaging with it, unlike Xie Ta's open, flat gaze.

There was no emotion in Tawil's eyes, and no soul.

"When humans look into Tawil's eyes," Bai Six continued, "they see the abyssal universes on the other side of the door, where countless mad worldlines struggle. Desire is reflected from the other side, plunging them into the same madness as on that side of the door."

Bai Six turned to Bai Liu and explained briefly, "Soon, they will develop the ultimate hatred for the gatekeeper, who both grants their wishes and shackles their desires."

"So they will hurt the bearer of this door, the one who owns these eyes, until their desires are satisfied."

Bai Six's lips curled into a smile. "Until the monsters from the Abyss, through their mutilation of Tawil, manage to create a gap in the door and come through—becoming heretics in the eyes of these humans."

"Those monsters were not caused by Xie Ta," Bai Liu asked calmly, as if rhetorically. "It was the desires of these people that destroyed the door over Xie Ta's eyes, allowing the monsters on the other side to pass through and reach this side. Yet you made Xie Ta believe it was his fault, convincing him that those around him would also think it was his fault, increasing their hatred and causing him even more suffering. Didn't you?"

"Bingo," Bai six chuckled. "That's right."

Bai six shrugged with a regretful sigh. "Honestly, I feel like I've made a mistake, letting things get this tragic." He paused. "I originally wanted to give Tawil a soul out of love, so I sculpted him into a non-aggressive god. But my ultimate goal was for him to kill me. But a Tawil with that character could never bring himself to attack me, even if I tortured him to destruction."

"So I changed my strategy," Bai six continued with a laugh. "I erased his memory and told him you were the original evil god and gatekeeper, and that I was just a greedy human who had stolen your godhood." He mimicked an earnest tone. "You want to preserve the order of the universe and the integrity of the Gate? Then come and kill the greediest, most desperate being who wants to destroy you—me." He shrugged. "Then I banished Tawil to the next 658 worldlines, and at the same time, I sent my derivatives into them. I whispered in their ears, in their dreams: 'By killing Tawil once and for all, you will obtain the most valuable thing in the world.'"

"I know what kind of god I am," Bai six said, his eyes flashing silver-blue for a moment as he looked directly at Bai Liu. "So I know exactly what my creatures will do. They can't resist such temptation." He looked down for a moment, almost lost in thought. "Because they, like me, are a collection of the two greatest desires from either side of the door."

"I had expected Tawil to rebel against me to protect the door and preserve truth and order. But he never did." Bai six shook his head. "He was like countless gods before him—allowing me and others to slaughter, abuse, and mutilate him. It was in that moment I realized that Tawil was not compassionate towards humans, nor was he trying to fulfill human desires." He smiled darkly. "It was pure naïveté and indifference. He never saw humans or me with any positive regard. Even when I stood behind him in 657 worldlines as the enemy who killed him to take the throne of God, he would only look coldly at the book in front of him, never turning back." Bai six chuckled. "Because he found books more interesting than humans." He paused, then continued with a slightly amused tone, "Later, even when I tortured him more, banishing him further into the game, he still had no emotions for me—no love, no hate, no resentment. Because he had no desire for me, or for any human, at all."

"It's interesting, to say the least," Bai six mused, letting out a soft laugh. "At this point, Tawil is surprisingly less human and arrogant than I am, for one of my creations."

"But just when I was about to give up on him, two incredible things happened in the 658th worldline." Bai six's grin deepened as he looked across the watery wall at Bai Liu. "The first thing was that my derivatives slipped out of my control." He leaned forward slightly, eyes glinting with intrigue. "I couldn't reach him through his dreams anymore, couldn't entice or influence him like before. This derivative grew up like a perfectly normal human child, isolated in this worldline." He chuckled softly. "It was fascinating to watch him. Despite the extreme rejection by his kind, he survived in a hostile environment." He shook his head in disbelief. "Humans—especially juveniles—are prone to suicide when they're rejected by their kind.

But this one survived, without any love or acceptance from anyone." His voice dropped slightly, his tone growing darker. "And not only did he survive, but he found Tawil, a creation incapable of emotions, and in his mind, he thought Tawil was the only other of his kind."

Bai six leaned back, eyes glinting with satisfaction. "This misconception gave the derivative affection for his destined enemy, who didn't even acknowledge him. Day and night, he wandered around, thinking he was watching Tawil, hiding his food from him because he didn't want him to starve, and secretly stashing books for Tawil, who never showed any response." He smiled almost wistfully. "It was amazing, really."

Bai six's smile widened as he added, "Then an even more amazing thing happened." He paused for dramatic effect. "This derivative, despite Tawil's total lack of emotional response, generated a soul based on his own feelings, driven by his own misperceptions. This is the first time I've ever seen a human create a soul without being loved." He chuckled softly, clearly pleased by this outcome. "A soul born from nothing but misperception and isolation."

The last trace of expression faded from Bai Liu's face as he listened. He said nothing.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"I’m very curious about that." Bai Six tilted her head slightly, smiling. "What’s it like to fall in love with a creation that doesn’t respond, to deceive yourself into love?"

"Do you suffer when you watch Tawil reading alone in the church, when he looks back at you?" she continued. "You do mind that, don't you?"

"Nobody likes a kind that makes them miserable—you just don’t have a choice," Bai Six went on. "After all, since you were born, you’ve never received spontaneous love from other humans. Everything you've ever traded for has been conditional. So, can you tell if people care for you because of who you are, or because of what you give them?"

"Xie Ta was like this. Lu Yizhan was like this. Your later teammates—Muke, Mu Sicheng, Liu Jiayi, Tang Erda—each and every one of them."

"You have to meet their expectations and give them what they want in order to draw them near."

"So, did you really win their affection, or did you simply buy their presence?"

"If one day, you can no longer offer what they want, will they abandon you? Leave you forever?"

Bai Six curled her lips into a smile. "- Like the once-dead Xie Ta."

Bai Liu’s breath slowed as he hung his head, his hair falling over his face, his expression unreadable. His body shrank, and his clothes transformed from a kimono to the wide uniform of an orphanage. He became thin, frail, and took on the appearance of the fourteen-year-old Bai Liu.

A frail Bai Liu sat motionless in an audience chair opposite the watery wall, drops of water falling from the ends of his hair into the universe.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has been attacked by the evil god Bai Six. His spirit value has dropped and is about to fall below 60. Hallucinations are imminent...]

Bai Six smiled, watching Bai Liu—or little Bai Liu, aged fourteen—across the watery wall.

"You're essentially the same as Tawil at the beginning," Bai Six mused. "You gathered people to yourself by pre-giving to them, but I've proven in countless experiments that such pre-giving doesn't bring love. It only brings desire."

"Are you sure that what you're receiving from others now is truly affection, or is it just desire disguised as affection?"

Bai Six lowered her eyes, as if pitying him. "You, like Tawil, are a lonely god."

"It doesn't have a soul, so it doesn't feel the loneliness or misery when it doesn't receive love—but you do."

"Your soul will only produce pain endlessly, because of your lack of love."

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's spirit level continues to drop and will soon fall below 40!]

Water gradually seeped from Bai Liu's clothes, as if he had fallen into a non-existent pool. His hair and clothes began to levitate in the universe, his hands floated in front of him, and a door-like black hole appeared beneath him, spinning with a faint silvery-blue glow inside.

Bai Six gazed at Bai Liu with her silvery-blue eyes, smiling, and continued.

"The pain born from a person's soul binds them, trapping them in place, unable to move forward. It's like a silk thread, manipulating them, until they become a puppet of their own pain."

A transparent thread of silk flew from the depths of the universe and wrapped around Bai Liu's wrist, lifting his frail arm like a puppet on a string.

"Tawil is a true monster. You, however, are a monster with a soul. You were never the same kind from the start."

Bai Six whispered softly.

"And you are surrounded by humans—good and bad—who have been loved, and who have loved in return. They've gained souls because of the pain others have caused, and they have human beings who truly hold them."

"They don't come from the same place as you. Even if they wander to you now, they won't end up in the same place as you. They all have their own place to return to, and people who will welcome them back."

"You're just a god who took them in for a brief moment."

Bai Six looked across the watery wall at fourteen-year-old Bai Liu. "When they leave, you'll still be alone."

"No one will stop for you."

"No one ever expected you to be born. No one ever expected you to grow. No one ever expected you to become a good person. And you, a derivative of an evil god, struggled to control your desires, to satisfy their conditions, and turn yourself into an ordinary good person. In doing so, you tried to make yourself one of their kind and earn their fleeting affection."

"- It's like the fourteen-year-old you turned yourself into a monster in order to be a match for the monster-like Tawil."

"After all these years, all this effort, you still haven't found your kind, Bai Liu."

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's spirit level continues to drop and will soon fall below 20!]

Two silk threads flew out, wrapping around Bai Liu's left wrist and neck. Slowly, he raised his head as the threads tugged him upward.

"In this world, I am the only one who has been watching you, who has been expecting you, since the very beginning of your existence," Bai Six said.

Bai Six removed his right glove, looked down, and gently cupped the side of Bai Liu's face with his hand. His voice was soft, almost tender.

"I understand what you're thinking, what you have to do. I will present the most fascinating game in the world to you," he continued. "The birth of your soul surprised me. It made me abandon that old creation. Your growth, your self-restraint, made me realize that I was witnessing something invaluable."

"You opened my eyes to the possibility of a human being, with a soul, becoming a god—guarding the gate in endless pain and loneliness."

Bai Liu's warm palm grazed the side of his face, his thumb brushing beneath Bai Liu's eyes. His face held a compassionate smile.

"I know that if it were you—even surrounded by abysses, darkness, hatred, lust, and all manner of negative emotions—you would still manage to hold onto your sanity. You would keep your soul in some kind of love, one that comes from nowhere, to maintain your human form and guard the door for eternity in the vast, infinite universe."

"Just like guarding those you thought were your kind, even though they weren't."

"Of all the world lines you can perceive, the one who truly understands your thoughts, the one who expects you to live forever, the closest thing to your kind of existence, is actually me—the one you hate."

Bai Six crouched in front of Bai Liu, his silvery-blue eyes shifting to a deep blue as he gazed at the fourteen-year-old sitting in the chair. He gently stroked Bai Liu's soft hair, like a wise, affectionate elder.

"Out of 658 world lines, you are the one I have harbored the most malice for. So many people hate you. Yet, all I can do is watch you struggle against the malice others have given you."

"I'm sorry," Bai Six whispered.

Suddenly, he leaned forward and embraced little Bai Liu, burying his face in Bai Liu's thin shoulders. He held the fragile shoulder blades tightly, his voice sincere.

"I'm sorry."

"In all 658 world lines, you exceeded my expectations. Yes, I caused harm, and hurt many people—but only you. It was never my intention to toy with you in this game."

"You are not just a game NPC, nor are you a creature born of my creation."

"You are just like me—without a kind, but with a soul."

Bai Six gently patted the motionless little Bai Liu on the back, as though soothing a child.

"I've been thinking for a long time—back when I saw you dive into the church, throwing yourself into Xie Ta's arms, soaked in blood and water—"

"What if, at that moment, instead of twisting yourself into Xie Ta's embrace, someone had come along and offered you a hug?"

"What if I had come to you, as one of your kind, and embraced you?"

"But I can't touch you. I want to, though." Bai Six's tone softened, becoming lighter. "He's already human, with a soul. He loves others. And one day, he'll wait for the one who comes to offer him an embrace."

"So, I watch quietly by your side, waiting with you, waiting for that person to appear."

"In these ten years, you've had people fighting alongside you, people who believed in you, people who stopped you from going astray, people responsible for you, surrounding you with many, many people —"

"But still, no one has come to offer you a hug."

"You've become an omnipotent god, a monster without evil in the eyes of others—but no one sees you as human."

"Only I know," Bai Six whispered. "Only I know that you're a human, with a soul, a good soul that has always loved others."

"You're waiting for a hug."

"I thought humans were like mirrors, reflecting emotions. I thought you, who gave love, would have waited for your own hug long ago. But, to my surprise, you took in so many people, and in the end, it was me who gave you that hug."

Bai Liu's eyes were wide open, emotionless, as he stared behind the watery wall at the cold statue of Tawil. The eyes of the statue reflected the fourteen-year-old Bai Liu, huddled in the chair, held by Bai Six's shoulders.

Bai Liu opened his mouth, whispering [Xie Ta] softly, as if speaking into a muzzle.

Tawil’s silver-blue eyes met his, but he didn’t respond.

Then, a single tear slowly fell from Bai Liu’s eye, as if in response. Bai Six's voice came, soft and resigned.

"Be my heir, my child."

"This is where you will end up."

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu’s spirit value will soon reach zero! Warning! WARNING!!!]

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"Xie Ta."

An indistinct voice floated through the air. Spades, standing in the boat, instantly turned around, his lips pressed tight as he scanned the crowd, searching for Bai Liu among them.

The bustling crowd, dressed in costumes and chatting animatedly as they headed toward the festival, did not include Bai Liu.

Yet, that had definitely been Bai Liu's voice.

Spades pushed against the crowd, his eyes darting between the people, while he casually tapped his system panel, dropping an item to check if there were any other players nearby.

[System Alert: No other player's movement track detected nearby.]

[System Warning: You are currently in the middle of a league, player Spades. You have not moved within the map for three hours. A yellow card warning will be issued for negative play. Please engage actively by exploring the map, contacting NPCs, and completing the main quest as soon as possible!]

Immediately after, the main quest panel appeared in front of Spades, its bold red text practically jumping up to his eyelashes, almost as if it feared he wouldn't see it.

Spades clicked his tongue in annoyance, flicking his fingers and dismissing the system panel with a glance, uninterested.

[System Alert: Player Spades' status is set as (Servant) to this year's greatest sacrifice of the evil gods.]

[Main Quest: Find the largest sacrifice and offer it to the other side to make a wish to the evil god.]

The sacrifice you're seeking is the one who has been tortured the longest since the festival's inception, having accumulated the most pain.

Reluctantly, Spades skimmed through the main quest again, forced to read it by the system, and then quickly retrieved his panel, resuming his search for Bai Liu in the crowd.

A few young girls in summer kimonos whispered as they passed Spades.

"I heard that this year, the Gifune family is going to sacrifice that one?"

"No way, right? How could they sacrifice him after all these years of hiding him away?"

"I heard the Gifune family was instructed in their dreams that this one won't be needed for the Evil God Festival anymore, and that the Evil God-sama will choose a new successor."

Spades, a violent player who never bothered gathering information, walked past the gossiping NPCs without a second glance, not paying attention to their words.

A moment later, a group of men in bathing suits walked by, laughing among themselves.

"Last year, my family caught a sacrifice at the Funeral Palace Night Festival, made a successful wish at the Sea Shrine, and had a pretty good year. This year we caught another one, so it looks like next year should be just as good."

"No matter how well they do, they'll never compare to the Gifune family," one man said, rubbing his chin with a sigh. "Ever since the fire five years ago, when the Bei Yuan family was burned to the ground and their biggest sacrifice fell into the hands of the Gifune family, I knew Luming County would be ruled by the Gifune family for the next twenty years."

"Eh, didn't they say the Gifune family is sacrificing their biggest offering this year?" another man chimed in, poking his head up curiously. "Is that true? Isn't it said that this sacrifice is particularly evil? Wasn't that the reason the Bei Yuan family was destroyed?"

"After the fire, people died, went mad, leaving only a few demented survivors to guard those inferior sacrifices that couldn't be used initially."

"Hush," the first man said, his tone serious as he looked around, lowering his voice. "If you don't want to be punished, stop talking about that incident from five or six years ago."

"Five years ago, half the village could've been wiped out as offerings.

A large number of people committed suicide by jumping into the sea, and everyone was terrified of the shrine," he warned, his voice tense. "Why do you think the shrine was moved to the sea? People were too afraid to stay on the same land as it anymore."

The men fell silent, casting their gazes downward as they passed Spades, walking in quiet unease.

But Spades, still uninterested, didn't pay them any mind, continuing to search the crowd.

The system, almost apologetic, popped up a reminder.

[Please pay attention to the key quest information provided by nearby NPCs! You've missed two important quest messages!]

Spades paused and muttered, "Why should I care what they say?"

The system responded: [Some key game information will be provided through NPC conversations. Please be aware of the information around you.]

"Is that so?" Spades replied, his face expressionless. "I thought the game designer wanted me to follow the path they laid out for me, which is why they keep sending me these messages?"

"I don't like playing games that way."

Spades drew his whip, his black eyes reflecting the large, gilded ships docked in the harbor. His tone was cold: "Playing this game like this... what's the difference between me and these scripted NPCs?"

"It's not even my game, it's his game."

The system panel popped up briefly before vanishing from Spades' face. He gripped the whip with an emotionless expression and walked straight toward the large ship docked in the harbor.

He made his way to the harbor—the very spot where he had heard Bai Liu's voice earlier. With a sweeping glance, he surveyed the area.

On the side of the harbor stood a massive wooden platform with raised corners and a gable structure, complete with a wooden stage for ritual dances. Thick, knotted ropes hung from the wooden frame, adorned with white paper at regular intervals to ward off evil spirits.

Under the high platform, a wooden sign painted in red read: [The place where the dance of the divine priest is performed].

Across from the high platform, a large gilded ship was docked. It wasn't just a ship, but a stage for a theatrical performance shaped like one.

The stage had three tiers, each lined with numerous light bulbs on the sides and overhead, glowing brightly like daylight even at night. The center stage was bathed in light.

Crimson velvet curtains hung from loops on either side, with a polished wooden floor in the middle. Two actors dressed in hari-kari costumes sat on wooden stools facing each other, separated by a piece of watery glass. A male actor in a shimmering quicksand-colored coat stood beside them.

A small sign in front of the stage read: "The Evil Gods Festival Play - Act 1."

The audience's chairs were neatly arranged in front of the stage, though not all of them were filled. New people continually arrived from the distance, taking their seats.

A newcomer turned to an older audience member and asked, "What's the play about?"

The veteran leaned in and whispered, "This play is a traditional part of our annual Luming County festival. It tells the story of the emergence, development, and changes of the festival. We're only in the first act."

Curious, the newcomer asked, "What's this first act about?"

The old audience member pointed at the actors on stage. "This act introduces the process of the evil gods choosing their heirs to come to Earth and preside over the festival. The two sitting on either side of the watery wall are the heirs chosen by the evil gods, and the one beside them in the bright-colored sarong is our evil god lord."

Suddenly, the two actors sitting on stools leapt to their feet and began exchanging insults, sparring across the watery wall:

"I am the one most favored by the Lord of Evil! I am the most exceptional heir!"

"I am the one who is the logical successor to the evil god!"

The old audience member chuckled and shook his head. "The Lord of Evil created all living things and chose his heirs from among them. In the end, two heirs met the requirements—"

The "evil god" on stage nodded with his hands behind his back, watching the two heirs compete for the top spot. "You are both excellent, but there can be only one successor to me."

"I will erase all your memories and cast you into every world line I've created. You will each be given a new identity: [sacrifice] and [squire]."

"The [sacrifice] will be aided by me during their training, while the [squire] will be hindered by me in countless ways." The evil god paced around the two heirs. "But this status is not fixed. At any moment, the one who suffers more will become the [sacrifice], and the one who suffers less will become the [squire]."

"At the end of all the world line adventures, the [sacrifice] will become the next evil god, after sacrificing pain and soul to me."

"And the [squire] will lose everything: friends, loved ones, lovers, and their soul."

The older audience members nodded in agreement. "Yes, that's right. That's where the Luming County [sacrifice] [squire] system comes from."

The heir sitting across from the watery wall suddenly spoke softly, "Xie Ta."

—It was Bai Liu's voice!

Spades, still searching for the stage, snapped his gaze upward. Without hesitation, he jumped, gripping the edge of the stage.

As he leaped, the curtain fell behind him, plunging the stage into darkness. The sounds of the audience outside faded, and the footsteps of the three actors on stage overlapped, gradually converging into a single figure moving toward Spades.

The stage lights, previously blindingly bright, suddenly shimmered around him like swirling stars, reflecting in Spades' emotionless eyes as the approaching figure came into focus.

Bai Six curled his lips into a smile. "Long time no see, Spades."

Spades stared at him in silence.

Bai Six's gaze dropped to the black bone whip in Spades' hand, and his smile deepened. "The whip I gave you... is it working?"

[System Alert: Player Spades triggers a plot point and enters "The Festival of the Evil Gods - Act II Play."]

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

"It seems you don't want to discuss the whip with me." Noticing Spades' retreat, Bai Six smoothly changed the subject, offering a smile. "Would you like to talk about Bai Liu instead?"

Spades' steps faltered, and he turned to face Bai Six.

"Perhaps we could sit down and talk?" Bai Six gestured with a smile. As he did, a stool slid from the shadows of the stage, stopping right in front of Spades' knee. Bai Six made a polite invitation with a nod.

Spades stared at him for a moment before slowly sitting down.

"The last time you saw me was when you won the championship, wasn't it?" Bai Six spoke casually, walking behind Spades, his hands resting on the back of the chair. "You told your whole team not to make a wish on me, to leave it with me."

"An interesting approach," Bai Six added with a slight smile.

He leaned down, looking at Spades with an amused expression. "But this is the second time we've met. Do you remember the first time?"

Spades was silent for a moment before responding, "Siren Small Town."

"Yes, I was the first person you met after you emerged from Siren, and I gave you my bone whip." Bai Six's eyes softened with a touch of compassion as his hand brushed the top of Spades' head. "Do you know why?"

Spades remained silent.

Bai Six smiled again, his voice soft. "Because you were the vessel of creation I once held most dear."

"Do you know what you were born for?" Bai Six's tone shifted slightly as he leaned closer to Spades, raising his hand. A wall of water materialized in front of Spades, rippling and expanding into a circle, revealing an entirely new scene.

Behind the watery barrier, a scene unfolded. A fourteen-year-old Bai Liu sat alone in a solitary confinement cell at the Home, curled up in the dark. He shivered, either from the cold or something more, his eyelids fluttering and his body curled tightly as if he were a frightened animal. His lips moved faintly, whispering something in his sleep.

"[Xie Ta]."

The name escaped his lips in a soft murmur.

Spades' eyes flickered as Bai Six explained quietly, "This is fourteen-year-old Bai Liu."

The image on the watery wall shifted, showing a bandaged figure, followed by a tall, thin, ghostly doll that clumsily raised its arms, shaking them in an odd, humorous gesture.

"Are you sure you won't consider playing with dolls when you grow up?" A youthful, teasing voice echoed, and the scene changed to reveal a smiling, fourteen-year-old Bai Liu. His gaze was focused on Xie Ta, a playful grin on his face. "I think you have a real talent for it."

The doll, seemingly unaware of Bai Liu's mockery, responded earnestly, "Really?"

"And how much money can you make playing with dolls? Will it be enough to support us both?"

Bai Liu paused, his expression turning indifferent as he glanced away. "I don't need you to feed me, and you can't afford it."

"Just mind your own business."

Though Bai Liu seemed to dismiss the suggestion, Spades noticed the faintest smile at the corner of his mouth as he turned away.

Spades had never seen Bai Liu smile so easily before. It left him speechless, his gaze fixed on the watery wall, the light reflecting off his eyes.

The watery wall flickered like a giant television screen, replaying the memories from the orphanage.

They met, they read together, they were punished together, chased together, hated together.

--Together in the darkness, resting peacefully in each other's arms.

But then Xie Ta died.

So Bai Liu read alone. He was punished alone, chased alone, beaten alone, hated alone.

--A man curled in the dark, lost in uneasy slumber.

And as all this unfolded, Xie Ta—whom Bai Liu thought was dead—was not. Spades saw Xie Ta's translucent spirit hovering in the watery wall, desperately circling Bai Liu and pleading with him.

"Go away, don't stay here."

"Don't feed me, you'll die if you eat too little!"

Bai Liu couldn't see or hear Xie Ta's desperate pleas. He continued walking, numb, following the same path he had when Xie Ta was still alive.

Bai Liu grew thinner, his lips turning pale, then white and blue. His body shrank, growing visibly frail.

Spades' brow furrowed deeply.

On one occasion, when Bai Liu had collapsed from the cold and lay unnoticed by the pond all night, Xie Ta's spirit descended, wrapping his ethereal form around Bai Liu's unconscious body, just as they had done when they fell asleep together.

Xie Ta closed his eyes, speaking quietly, "God."

"If you exist now and are watching this, I ask you to appear."

"I wish to make a wish to you."

The wind swirled around Xie Ta, lifting his soul as an old, carved door flickered into view. Beyond it lay endless spheres of silvery-blue light, and from within, a hand emerged, grasping the door handle and pushing it outward.

The spheres shattered into points of light, and Bai Six stepped through the fragments, standing before Xie Ta. He looked down at the kneeling spirit with a compassionate smile. "Tawil, what is it that you wish from me?"

Xie Ta knelt before Bai Liu's unconscious body, tilting his head slightly before speaking in a soft voice.

"God," he began, "I want to give this man all the happiness that any ordinary person in this world can have."

"I want him to have companionship in his loneliest times, for his suffering to disappear, and everything he has lost to be restored."

"I want him to always have someone to play his favorite horror games with."

Xie Ta lifted his head, his silver-blue eyes shimmering faintly. "I believe that he and the one he loves will never be separated."

"They will meet in a human way, be together in a human way, and eventually, end beautifully in a human death."

Bai Six smirked. "What a greedy creation. These wishes are far more than one. What would you offer in exchange?"

Xie Ta fell silent for a long while before responding in a soft tone. "I would give my soul for that."

"I have a soul now, and I will become the next evil god, as you wish, guarding the gate forever."

He lifted his gaze toward the swirling silvery-blue spheres behind Bai Six. "I will never leave this door as long as I know there is a world where he can live happily ever after."

"Never leaving the abyss, full of desire and pain."

"Are you sure?" Bai Six smiled. "No matter how many times you see him happy with someone else in the future, there will be no turning back for you."

Xie Ta grasped Bai Liu's cold hand, unwavering. "I'm sure."

"Then it's a deal." Bai Six extended his hand, and in an instant, the shimmering, glowing silver-blue swirls behind the door surged forward, curling around Bai Six's outstretched right index finger like waves. They nodded at Xie Ta's brow.

A silver-blue vortex shot into Xie Ta's forehead, sending his entire body reeling backward, his eyes glazing over.

Bai Six's ethereal, smiling voice echoed in Xie Ta's ears.

"I grant you the ability to change the world line. You may bring those you believe can alter Bai Liu's fate into this place, allowing him to have friends and loved ones in any way you choose."

"But Bai Liu is still too young to understand love. When the time comes, I will bring him the one he loves, just as you wished."

"But," Bai Six added with a slight smile, "now you have a soul, yet it doesn't bring you pain."

"In order for you to successfully become an evil god in this world line, Tawil, I will need to give you other painful experiences." His gaze drifted to the small, frowning form of Bai Liu behind Xie Ta, and his smile deepened. "If you can't provide me with the pain I require, I may choose another, more miserable child to be my heir."

"If you don't want that, try harder to become more miserable."

A silvery-blue whirlwind passed by, and Bai Liu stirred, coughing as he woke. He looked around at the empty pond, glancing at his right hand in confusion.

For a moment, it felt as though Xie Ta was still alive, holding his hand so tightly, unwilling to let go.

Spades, gazing at the watery wall, seemed to sense something. His face, once vivid, now reflected emotional resistance as he turned his head away. "I don't want to look."

The watery wall followed his gaze, shifting to face him no matter how hard Spades resisted, getting closer.

Spades closed his eyes, gripping his whip tightly.

Bai Six chuckled softly and snapped his fingers. "If you don't want to see, I can explain what happens next."

"Because Tawil made a wish at the cost of his soul, Bai Liu gained a friend and a loved one of his own. He became one of the ordinary people, living a simple life."

"In contrast, Tawil was exiled by me, to be slaughtered and tortured by the other players in the game."

"But even then, he did not suffer, not truly. His suffering only came because of Bai Liu. So I had Bai Liu enter the game, a year before he met Tawil, in order to grant Tawil's wish—that they would meet and fall in love in a human way."

Spades interrupted, his voice cold. "I can't hear you."

Bai Six smiled impassively and continued, "I separated Tawil's spirit from his body in Siren Small Town, trapping the spirit in the game for seven days of reincarnation, while his body was released to live normally with Bai Liu."

"His body is you, Spades."

"You were born from Tawil and Bai Liu's obsessive love, but in truth, I created you for one reason only."

Bai Six laughed. "And that's what makes Bai Liu and Tawil miserable."

"Your very existence means the demise of the soul Bai Liu truly loved —Tawil."

"The first time you met Bai Liu, you ripped Tawil's remaining heart from his body and crushed it. The second time you met him, you forced him to accept the evil god's heirship I gave him, because that was the only way to save Xie Ta."

Spades' eyes snapped open, and with a sudden motion, he lashed his black whip across the room. Bai Six dodged, and a multitude of watery wall screens surrounded Spades, all showing scenes of him hurting Bai Liu.

Bai Liu lay pale in his hospital bed as Du Sanying wept beside him. "How did his heart get cut open?" he cried, turning to the doctor.

Bai Liu, his eyes filled with a watery sheen, whispered softly, "I miss you so much, Xie Ta," just before he was swallowed by the pond at "The Edge of the Dense Forest."

Bai Six's voice echoed from behind the myriad watery screens with a smile.

"Your very existence means constant harm to Bai Liu, constant pain for him."

"You've done your duty well, but what surprises me even more—"

Bai Six laughed softly, suddenly breaking through the walls of water. He pinned Spades to a chair, his eyes gleaming as he looked down at the figure prepared to fight back.

"You've managed to produce your own soul under Bai Liu's loving gaze."

"Though that love isn't for you—it's merely for Tawil, through you."

As Spades raised his hand to swing the whip, an excruciating, burning pain erupted from his back, forcing him to drop his weapon.

The wound felt all too familiar—an agony that had tormented him before. Yet this time, the pain was different.

It wasn’t a sharp, stabbing pain like being sliced by a blade. This pain seemed to burn from deep within, causing his heart to sour, his limbs to slow, and his eyes to blur with water.

It wasn’t unbearable, but it made him feel... helpless. As if no matter what he did, he couldn’t win.

But what exactly was it that he couldn’t win? It wasn’t the game...

Spades, confused, barely noticed a transparent thread flying toward him. It wrapped itself around his right wrist.

Bai Six chuckled. "You now possess a soul, and with it, pain. In a way, you qualify to be my heir."

"But tell me—who do you think Bai Liu will choose as his lover? And who will he abandon, to become the lone heir to the evil god?"

Spades finally looked up, a drop of water unconsciously falling from his eye. It landed in the watery screen, where the past of Bai Liu and Xie Ta was projected.

Oh, so this was it.

The thing he had just realized he couldn’t win.

Evil God Festival – Boathouse

The tears melted on Xie Ta's face within the watery wall, expanding in layers until they formed a bright, mirror-like surface on one side. In it, Spades reflected Tawil, who was also shedding a tear.

This mirrored hydrographic wall separated Spades from Tawil, much like the glass on a stage where two actors gaze at each other. However, this was a one-way mirror: Spades could not see Tawil behind the glass, but Tawil could see Spades.

On one side of the mirrored wall, Bai Six stood to the left of Spades, while on the other side, he stood to the right of Tawil. Bai Six spoke, his smile evident in his voice.

"What is it like to see your own vessel in tears, Tawil?"

Bai Six's smile softened as he whispered in Tawil's ear, "Haven't you already accepted all of this? So why are your tears falling now?"

"What are you suffering for, my child?"

"You are in pain, and your vessel will meet Bai Liu."

Suddenly, Tawil's left hand expanded into a wall of water, revealing Bai Liu reaching for Spades' hand as he stepped into the game pool.

Bai Six whispered, "Read the same."

To Tawil's right, another watery wall opened, displaying two men in the Dense Woodland Frontier, reading a mechanical manual.

"Closer."

In this watery wall, Spades wrapped his arms and legs around the struggling Bai Liu, hiding under the bed, their breaths intertwined.

"Kisses."

Another watery wall appeared. Spades looked down at Bai Liu, whose eyes were closed, and slowly leaned down to kiss him.

Tawil's fingers curled around the handle of the chair, his breathing quickening as he closed his eyes.
